But by March 18 a new command came from Vienna to Dietrichstein to seize several citizens of Leoben, who were reported to be Anabaptists. Four weeks later an order came to deal severely with two of the captured Anabaptists, unless they were very young. The confiscation of the property of fugitive Anabaptists continued; on April 21, 1529, Ferdinand (from Speyer) sent to his councilor and chamberlain Veit Zollner the property of the two Anabaptists, Franz Intzinger (q.v.) and Peter Schuster, with the obligation to pay 200 guilders to Pruner, the clerk of the provincial court, who had been promised a share in such estates.

The flight of individual Anabaptists from Leoben continued; for on May 3, 1529, Dietrichstein ordered Leoben to seize the wife of Jörg Schlesinger, who had escaped to Moravia and had asked her to come to him. The report of the council that she had already gone brought severe censure upon the magistrate. Her departure could not possibly have been accomplished so secretly that no one noticed it! Let him immediately find those who knew of it! Three weeks later the magistrate of Freienstein managed to capture an Anabaptist, who was sent to Graz and imprisoned on the Schlossberg, where several of his brethren already lay. On June 2 the magistrate of Leoben was ordered by the government to ask the wife of the fugitive Anabaptist Wieser, under oath, whether she was not also "contaminated by this sect."

In 1530 Intzinger apparently returned to his home for a short time; he was recognized and pursued, but not captured. The magistrate of the Frauenburg in the upper Mur Valley reported on March 20 that he had arrived too late. Intzinger and his family had already moved on.

The Anabaptists from Leoben and other places in Upper Styria, who were imprisoned in the Schlossberg at Graz, lay there a long time. The new magistrate, Hans von Ungnad, who considered them "pious and simple people" and would soonest have let them go, received orders from the king on July 19 to spare the penitent, the young, and the simple, but to put to death the obstinate. It is Baron von Ungnad, of whom Antoni Erfordter said in the epistle he wrote when he left Klagenfurt (September 1538), "that he would rather give up all his honor than kill a man because of his faith"; among the nobility of the four hereditary lands there was not another who was marked by "such manly honesty, valid before God."

Until 1533 there is occasional mention of Anabaptists who were trying to gain adherents in secret. But they were no longer strong. According to the register of martyrs in the chronicles, there were none at Leoben. The Geschicht-Buch relates that in 1539 Christoph Gschäl traveled from Moravia through Upper Styria, but his very dangerous work brought no results. Among the prisoners in the Falkenstein prison there was a Brother Peter Schuster, who was perhaps the fugitive from Leoben.

P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; J. Loserth, "Zur Gesch. der Wiedertäufer in der Steiermark," in Mitteilungen des hist. Ver. f. Steiermark L (1903) and Ztscht des hist. Ver. f. Steiermark X (1913); Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; P. Dedic, Der Protestantismus in der Steiermark im Zeitalter d. Ref. u. Gegenref. (Leipzig, 1930); ML II, 639 f.

Leonhard, Grand Master of the Teutonic Knights: see Dorfbrunner, Leonhard.

Leonhard the Schoolmaster, whose true name was Leonhard Eleutherobios, brother of Christoph Eleutherobios (q.v.), was a schoolmaster at Linz, Austria, who joined the Anabaptists in 1527, probably being baptized by Hans Hut. Little is known of him. He published a German translation of Johann Bugenhagen's booklet, Was und Welches die Sünde sei in den Hl. Geist. (See Eleutherobios.) H.S.B.

Leonhard van Tongeren: see Lenart van Ysenbroeck.

Leopold, Joh., a martyr: see Leupold.

Leopold I (1640-1705), Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 1658-1705, the son of Emperor Ferdinand III. His reign covered a long period of 47 years. He was a friend of the sciences and of music, a composer, and a lover of books; personally fond of splendor and full of the joy of living, his morals were above reproach. The influence of his Catholic education was felt in the severe and unjust treatment of Protestants, which sometimes resulted in revolts, especially in Hungary. Through the good fortune of having able generals, he raised Austria to the status of a great world power.

The struggles "with Turks and Tartars" resulting from his interference in Transylvania caused the Hutterian Brethren at Alwinc much suffering. In Slovakia (then belonging to Hungary), where they had become a cultural factor, the emperor granted them a letter of protection (Protektionsschreiben und Privilegium) on Jan. 29, 1659 (the only one ever granted by a Hapsburg ruler), for the districts of Neutra, Pressburg, and Trentschin, directing the authorities there to give them full protection. But this did not prevent the quartering of troops and the burning of parts of these Bruderhofs as well as that at Alwinc in the first Turkish war in 1663-64. A copy of the "privilege" is kept in the Imperial Chancellery at Vienna; Beck reprints it in his Geschichts-Bücher (496).

The imperial government at that time took a hostile attitude to the Mennonites of Germany. In 1672 it protested the settlement of 300 to 400 Mennonites in Hamburg (q.v.), calling their admission a violation of the Instrumentum of the Peace of Westphalia. The Hamburg senate nevertheless warmly defended them, declaring that the Mennonites "are peaceful and also capable citizens, who have nothing to do with the Anabaptists of Münster, but have instead taken the government into their church prayer."

The severity of Leopold's enforcement of the Counter Reformation led to a revolt and to the second Turkish war. Four years previously the Jesuits, accompanied by soldiers, had entered the Bruderhof in Sobotiste and had made a futile attempt to convert the Hutterian Brethren; now another attempt was made by summoning the leaders Poley and Milder (q.v.) to court. But the steadfastness of the Brethren, and the lenience of Archbishop Kollonitsch, president of the Hungarian chancellery, put an end to the oppression of the Hutterites. Against Lutherans and Calvinists, however, it continued unabated; members of their clergy were sent to the galleys.

The Brethren suffered very severely in 1683 at the hands of Turkish and Hungarian troops overrunning the country after the Turkish defeat. The victory at Munkacs and Belgrade strengthened the imperial rule. In 1688 Kollonitsch ordered that the Hutterite children in Velke Levary (q.v.) be baptized. Some obeyed, thus making the first breach in the brotherhood. The Brethren at Alwinc put an end to the demoralization and reorganized their Bruderhof in 1694.

In Jülich the emperor also intervened in favor of the Anabaptists in 1694. Elector John William (q.v.) had (through a band of peasants and soldiers, led by three commissioners) attacked the Mennonites in Rheydt, especially those settled as tenants on the estates of the nobles. This band plundered and destroyed much on these estates, and kidnaped about 30 persons, including women and children, mistreating some of them. The Crefeld Mennonites redeemed them at great cost. This disgraceful persecution evoked intervention by foreign powers. King William III of England wrote a letter to the elector on Aug. 11, 1694, requesting that the persecution be stopped, the property be restored, and that protection be granted them in the future. The Dutch States-General on Sept. 16 made an earnest protest to the emperor himself, with the same demands, pointing out the bad precedent set here in John William's attitude toward peaceful and quiet subjects like the industrious and competent Mennonites. Thereupon the emperor actually appealed to the latter to spare them, admitting that the Peace of Westphalia declared only "three religions permissible in the empire," and that "said Minists were not included" among them; but he asked the elector to consider the weight and importance of the foreign intercessors. John William replied that the Mennonites had been settled in his territory without his knowledge by avaricious officials, but finally yielded, and on Aug. 17, 1697, restored the possessions of the refugees, including the confiscated books and printed matter, gave them permission to sell their property, and promised to grant them free "commercium" in his domain.

There is no record of further oppression of the Mennonites before the death of Leopold I in 1705.

P.De.

K. V. Wurzbach, Biogr. Lexikon d. Kaiserl. Oesterr. V. (Vienna, 1859); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; K. L. v. Heigel, "Neue Beitr. z. Charakteristik Leopolds I.," Sitzber. d. bayr. Akad. d. Wiss. II (München, 1890); F. v. Krones and K. Uhlirz, Oesterreich Gesch. III (Leipzig, 1915); K. Uhlirz, Handbuch d. Gesch. Oesterreichs (Graz, Vienna, Leipzig, 1927); Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; G. Loesche, Gesch. des Prot. in Oesterreich (Vienna, Leipzig, 1930); Rembert, Wiedertäufer; A. Brons, Ursprung, Entwickelung und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (3d ed., Norden, 1912); ML II, 240, 640 f.

Lepers, Paraguay Mission to, was projected by the Mennonite Central Committee in co-operation with the Fernheim (q.v.) Colony in 1945 as an expression of appreciation to Paraguay for its reception of the Mennonites from Russia in 1930. The assistance of the American Leprosy Mission was secured, which pays two thirds of the cost of the buildings and current operations, the rest coming from the MCC budget for work in Paraguay with a small support from the Mennonites in the Chaco. Dr. John Schmidt of Mountain Lake, Minn., was appointed director of the work in 1950, which is located east of Barrio Grande, 50 miles east of Asuncion, on land purchased by the MCC. Originally one clinic was conducted here, and two others at Coronel Oviedo and Kilometer 81. The latter was the only one in operation in 1956; it treated 180 patients during the year. Emphasis is put on ambulatory treatment, the doctor going out to the grass huts where the people live. A territory of about 5,000 sq. mi. is registered with the Paraguayan government as the area of MCC work, within which the mission tries to find and treat all leprosy cases. The Paraguayan Mennonites help with voluntary service workers. Paraguay has an incidence of about 3-5 per thousand, one of the highest incidences of leprosy in South America.

H.S.B.

Lepp (Loep, Leepp, Lipp, Lippe), a common Mennonite name of Prussian or Dutch background. The name apeared in Heubuden, Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Neunhuben, etc. It is first recorded in Orlofferfelde in 1601. From Prussia the name spread to Russia and North America. It is likely that the name Leppke found in Mennonite Brethren circles in the United States is of different background. Outstanding was Peter H. Lepp (q.v.), the pioneer Mennonite industrialist of Chortitza. Aron Lepp (q.v.) was an elder of the Mennonite Brethren Church at Einlage. Eduard H. Lepp (q.v.) was a significant member of the Mennonite church of Danzig. Hermann P. Lepp is pastor of the Mennonite church at Harrow, Ont. (Reimer, Familiennamen, 113.) C.K.

Lepp, Aron, an elder of the Mennonite Brethren at Einlage, South Russia. He had been baptized by immersion on April 22, 1862. In consequence he was accused of being an "Anabaptist" by the Fürsorgekomitee in Odessa, and was dismissed from his office of civil and economic supervision of the Jewish settlement (see Judenplan, ML II, 439 f.). In 1866 he was put in charge of Andreasfeld, a subsidiary congregation, by the Baptist preacher August Liebig (q.v.); at a conference in 1868 he was chosen to the ministry, and on Oct. 18, 1869, ordained by the Baptist Elder Oncken of Hamburg. Although Lepp had received a Baptist ordination, he was reordained by the Mennonite Elder Janz of Friedrichsfeld, when he was chosen to fill the place of Elder A. Unger in 1876.

Lepp was a determined opponent of the union of the Mennonite Brethren with the Baptists. He argued that the Mennonites would jeopardize their rights, and that the confessions of faith were too divergent. It is therefore largely due to his influence that the Mennonite Brethren did not merge with the Baptists. Lepp served in the office of elder until an advanced age. In 1901 he retired. (Friesen, Brüderschaft; ML II, 641.) A.B.

Lepp, Eduard Hermann (1850-1926), a merchant and chairman of the Danzig (q.v.) Mennonite Church, was born June 26, 1850, at Tiegenhof in the Danzig Werder, and served from 1894 until his death as a member of the church board and as treasurer of the mother deaconess house and the Augusta Victoria foundation, and was also a city councilman and president of the Danzig merchants' association. He worked long for the welfare of his church, cooperating with his friend H. G. Mannhardt (q.v.). On Dec. 8, 1926, he died. (ML II, 641.) O.W.

Lepp, Pieter Heinrich (1817-71), a pioneer Mennonite industrialist of Russia, was born in Einlage near Chortitza Dec. 29, 1817. His father, Heinrich Lepp, was a carpenter and died when Peter was 13 years old. Since Peter had no inclination to follow agricultural pursuits, to which his stepfather encouraged him, he was permitted at the age of 15 to go to Prussia to learn clockmaking from one of his relatives. Having mastered this, his desire to continue the study of machinery led him to visit German industries. His relatives, fearing that such unsteady life would not be conducive to good character building, sent him back to Russia. Soon after his return he married.

P. H. Lepp bought a home in Chortitza and began to make the typical Mennonite wall clocks, as a rule with two apprentices. Through German book dealers he obtained many books on mechanics and industries and gained an unusual knowledge of science and the manufacture of machinery. Compelled by poor eyesight to discontinue watch- and clockmaking, he acquainted himself with foundry work and the building of machinery in Lugansk. In 1853 he produced his first threshing machine in Chortitza and sold it to a large estate owner. By 1861 more of the Russian large estate owners were attracted by his work. His small factory obtained parts from a foundry in Ekaterinoslav, which were often faulty. In 1860 Lepp erected his own foundry to be able to supervise the production of all parts himself. However, his machinery met very strong competition through British import. Since Lepp was able to guarantee his product and replace parts directly at any time, and could also instruct people in the operation of machines, it gradually came to be preferred to the imported machines. It took a long time for him to win the confidence of the banks so that they would lend him the necessary funds to develop his enterprise.

In 1867 the factory produced 115 threshing machines, 50 winnowers, 175 iron horse rakes, 125 chaff cutters, 12 reapers, and 8 trieurs. With the invention of the lobogreyka (reaper) the factory rapidly expanded. Lepp now took as his partner Wallmann, who possessed some capital. During the early 1880's the new concern became known as Lepp and Wallmann. A branch factory was established in Schönwiese, a suburb of Alexandrovsk, now Zaporozhe. In 1889 the firm employed 250 men in its two factories. During that year 1,200 reapers, 220 threshing machines, 500 winnowers, 15 steam threshers, and 15 boilers were sold. In 1908 the capital stock was 1,200,000 rubles, the output was 900,000 rubles, and 270 men were employed. By 1911-12 the number employed was 700, and by 1914 the capital stock had mounted to 2,400,000 rubles. The Lepp and Wallmann business was the largest of the eight large Mennonite factories in Russia. During the Russian Revolution the factories were nationalized but continued their work.

P. H. Lepp, who died in Prussia while visiting his brother in 1871, did much to revolutionize and improve agriculture in the Ukraine. His descendants continued his work. (See also Agriculture Among the Mennonites in Russia, Business and Industry among the Mennonites of Russia.) C.K.

"Mennonite Industry in Russia," Menn. Life X (January 1955) 21 ff.; D. H. Epp, "P. H. Lepp," Der Bote (Rosthern, 1928) No. 10 ff.; D. Rempel, "The Mennonite Colonies in New Russia" (doctoral dissertation, Stanford University, 1933).

Leraar (Leeraar), designation given in the Netherlands to Mennonite preachers: see Lehrer and Ministry.

Leserlin (Leslin), Georg (Jörg), of Ingersheim, Besigheim district of Württemberg, Germany, an Anabaptist preacher, had very early—the Passau records say in 1535 at the age of ten, which is impossible—baptized Margarete, the wife of Hans of Schüchtern, and together with Hans Schmidt (q.v.) he wrote the song, "O Herre Gott vom Himmelreich, Merkt auff und sich die worte," which deals with the persecution of the believers. Leserlin was imprisoned in Stuttgart in 1533, because he had been misled by "perverted people and cunningly devised booklets," but in consideration of his youth, simplicity, and his willingness to recant, he was released after instruction by experienced and learned men, and most humbly thanked all who had helped in his conversion. Young Leserlin was probably the son of the Leserlin who had died in prison. According to the Passau court records Georg also died in prison; hence it must be assumed that he again joined the Anabaptists, was put into prison, and died there. G.Bo.

TA Württemberg; 179, 198; Wackernagel, Kirchenlied V, No. 1070; K. Steiff and G. Mehring, Geschichtliche Lieder und Sprüche Württembergs (Stuttgart, 1912) 1076 f.; ML II, 641.

Letters of Protection (Schutzbriefe) were given the Mennonites in Altona (now Germany) by Duke Ernst von Schaunburg in 1601 (in 1604 by King Christian IV of Denmark and confirmed by all the succeeding kings of Denmark). As a rule they were granted free exercise of their religion and release from the oath and military service. The Mennonites in Eiderstedt and Friedrichstadt received a letter of protection from Duke Friedrich of Gottorp on Feb. 13, 1623; the Mennonites were given such letters by Countess Anna (q.v.) and Count Carl Edward in East Friesland in 1738, and the Mennonites of Danzig on Feb. 12, 1792, etc. (See the concession of Charles Louis in the article on him.) NEFF.

Lettonitz (Lettnitz), a village (pop. 1,000) northeast of Austerlitz in Moravia. Little is known of the Bruderhof of the Hutterian Brethren set up here. In 1619-20 it was plundered by Polish troops of the imperial army which had surprised Pruschan and Kobelitz (q.v.), murdering five Brethren and shooting a child at its mother's breast. P.DE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 381; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 725; ML II, 642.

Leubel, Michel, an Anabaptist martyr, who recanted in 1532 and then bitterly repented his deed; "he stumbled like Peter and did it against God; his flesh had been weak; but he had acquired grace. Let no man persuade him that water without faith has any value; the covenant and the water must be together, as Peter says; on this faith he would die." On the night of Jan. 30, 1533, he was drowned in the Rhine (court records of Speyer). (ML II, 642.) NEFF.

Leupold, Hans (Hans Schneider, i.e., tailor), one of the first Anabaptist martyrs in South Germany, not to be confused with Hans Seibold. He came from Kleinaitlingen near Augsburg, Bavaria, Germany, and early in the summer of 1527 he joined the Anabaptists there. He was baptized by Jakob Dachser (q.v.) and served as a deacon. He took part in the Martyrs' Synod (q.v.) on Aug. 20, 1527.

In those days Urban Rhegius (q.v.) wrote his book, Wider den neuen Tauforden, notwendige Warnung an alle Christgläubige, dated Sept. 6, 1527. At the same time a systematic persecution of the Anabaptists in Augsburg began. On Aug. 28 several members were arrested and tortured, among them the preacher Jakob Dachser. On Sept. 15, 1527, others were arrested, including Hans Hut (q.v.) and Jakob Gross (q.v.); and soon afterwards Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.) and Siegmund Salminger were seized. Now all the Anabaptist preachers in Augsburg lay in prison; the plan was to make them recant together with a considerable number of the Anabaptists of the city, after instruction by the city parsons.

One of those arrested was Hans Leupold. He refused to confess that the doctrine of the Anabaptists was erroneous and was therefore, with eight others, expelled from the city on Oct. 1, 1527, on the pledge never to return. On the following days further exiles followed. The preachers, however, remained under arrest, since they would not recant. The congregation, robbed of its preachers, at once chose Hans Leupold to be their leader at Bobingen near Augsburg. Fearlessly he proclaimed the Gospel, strengthened and consoled the harassed brethren and made contacts among the South German Anabaptist groups. For several weeks he preached in Esslingen, and with a letter from the Esslingen Anabaptists he visited the Worms congregation; with a letter of consolation from Worms to the brethren at Esslingen, he returned to the vicinity of Augsburg. The members of the Augsburg congregation who had not yet been discovered had been visited by preachers traveling through, especially by Leonhard Dorfbrunner (q.v.), who baptized about 100 persons in Augsburg in 1527.

On the evening of March 26 Hans Leupold managed to reach Augsburg undetected. On April 2 he assembled about 60 persons in a narrow cellar to observe communion and to choose leaders for the growing congregation. The choice fell on Claus Schleiffer of Vienna and Peter Ringmacher. The latter was at once sent to Regensburg to preach for the Anabaptist brotherhood. Under the leadership of Hans Leupold and Jörg of Passau, the Augsburg brethren met on Easter (April 12) morning in the home of the sculptor Adolf Doucher. Some of the members, seeing armed guards near by, had become suspicious and returned to their homes; those at the service were restless and fearful of an attack. Leupold invited the timid to leave while there was still time, and some escaped. But the remaining 88 were seized and expelled from the city, some having holes burned through their cheeks.

Leupold was questioned with and without the rack. He confessed whom and where he had baptized, and added that he was always glad when someone was converted. He declared that the Anabaptists were not planning an attack, as some seemed to fear. At their meetings they considered God's Word, principally the Gospels and the Prophets, which had recently been translated into German by Hans Denk, who had likewise been baptized in Augsburg, and Ludwig Haetzer. The brotherhood, Leupold continued, was very watchful to keep out false doctrine, and if a member erred he was instructed. Nor did they wish to have all things in common; they did not want anybody to be deprived of his possessions by violence. But aid should be voluntarily given the needy, regardless of whether or not he belonged to the brotherhood. He taught that one should acknowledge God, live according to His commands, and strive to attain the truth. Members who did not live a proper life, and did not show a deep interest in love and the truth, were warned several times and then put out of the brotherhood if the warning was fruitless. He had taught repentance and that the end time was at hand, without indicating when it would begin or end (Roth, 60-65).

Although the trial of the 88 prisoners (Roth, 71 f.) revealed no unchristian attitude or doctrine, Hans Leupold was condemned to die. The sentence was based on the mandate of Oct. 11, 1527, which prohibited on penalty of death, imprisonment, or fine, joining the Anabaptists, withholding baptism from infants, feeding their preachers, or taking part in any mob (Meyer, 251). He had secretly come to the city, had held meetings in pits, cellars, and other unsuitable places at suspicious times in the city and its vicinity, rejected infant baptism, preached adult baptism and other evil doctrines under the guise of the good, had also baptized a number of persons within and without the city, and also carried letters for the Anabaptists. He was beheaded on April 25 at Augsburg. Leupold was survived by his wife and two children, the youngest of whom was five months old.

When the verdict that he was to be sentenced from life to death was read to him from the Rathaus, he cried out, "No indeed, gentlemen of Augsburg, but from death to life!" causing great amazement among the spectators (Beck, 37). This mood also pervades the song, "Mein Gott Dich will ich loben," which he wrote in prison shortly before his execution. It reveals the "singleness" of his mind and the genuineness of a faith that he not only taught, but also lived. He admonishes his brethren to trust in God, and prays for his persecutors. This hymn is the only written record left by him. It was printed in the Ausbund (q.v.) and by Wackernagel in his collection, Das deutsche Kirchenlied (III, 478).

For the Augsburg Anabaptist brotherhood Leupold's death was a devastating blow; their surviving leaders (Dachser, Gross, and Salminger) were in prison or expelled from the city. But the spirit permeating them lived on. HEGE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Chr. Hege, Ein Rückblick auf 400 Jahre mennonitischer Geschichte (Karlsruhe, 1935); Chr. Meyer, "Die Anfänge des Wiedertäufertums in Augsburg," in Ztscht des Hist. Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg I (1874) 207-53; Fr. Roth, "Der Höhepunkt der wiedertäuferischen Bewegung in Augsburg und ihr Niedergang im Jahre 1528," in loc. cit. XXVIII (1901) 1-154; idem, Augsburgs Ref.-Gesch. (Augsburg, 1901 and 1904); ML II, 642 f.

Leutscher, a Dutch Mennonite family, descending from the Swiss Mennonite family of Lötscher (q.v.), Latscha (q.v.). Among the Swiss emigrants forced to leave the country and moving to the Netherlands in 1711 was Emanuel Lörtscher (Leutscher), a farmer from Erlenbach (Berner Oberland) and his family. They settled on the farm of Vinkhuizen, near Hoogkerk, about five miles from the city of Groningen. Numerous descendants are still living in the Netherlands. Some of them were preachers and elders of the Swiss Mennonites: Rudolf Leutscher, who according to Naamlijst served 1755-61, but according to other information was already a preacher in 1741, Izaak Jannes Leutscher, b. 1740, d. Nov. 20, 1826, a farmer first at Noorddijk, then at Noordhorn near Groningen, serving 1791-1811, and Christiaan Jacobs Leutscher, a farmer at Hoogkerk, d. Aug. 8, 1824, serving 1812-24 at Groningen. After Rudolf's death the Swiss congregation at Groningen merged with the United Mennonites; in Sappemeer the Swiss congregation had united with the Dutch Mennonites some time before. The son of preacher Izaak Jannes Leutscher, Jannes Izaak Leutscher (1772-1866), a farmer, at Noorddijk, Noordhorn, and Hoogkerk until his death, even after the Swiss congregation had dissolved, faithfully held to the Swiss simplicity of dress and style of living. vdZ.

J. Huizinga, Stamboek . . van Samuel Peter (Meihuizen) en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890) passim, see Index, 124; Ter Nagedachtenis van C. Leutscher (n.p., n.d.); Naamlijst 1829, 61; ML II, 694 f.

Leuvenig (Leuvenich, Leuvenigh), van, a Dutch Mennonite family, a branch of the Crefeld von Loevenich (q.v.) family, is found at Amsterdam, where they usually were cloth merchants. They joined the Amsterdam Zonist (q.v.) congregation. Deacons of this congregation were Sander Hans van Leuvenich 1670-74, 1682-86, Abraham van Leuvenigh 1684-8, 1703-6, Steven van Leuvenigh 1722-26, Hendrik van Leuvenigh 1758-62, 1768-72, Gerrit van Leuvenigh 1763-66, 1773-76, and Pieter Johan van Leuvenig 1782-86, 1791-1806. Other members of this family, including the preacher B. van Leuvenig (q.v.), belonged to the Amsterdam Lamist congregation. vdZ.

J. Rogge, Het Handelshuis van Eeghen (Amsterdam, 1948) passim; Church records of Amsterdam.

Leuvenig (Leuvenigh, Loevenigh), Bartholomeus van, b. April 15, 1691, at Burtscheid, Germany, d. Dec. 18, 1759, at Amsterdam, was a son of Bartholomeus van Loevenich, a cloth merchant at Burtscheid and a member of the well-known von Loevenich (q.v.) family. Bartholomeus van Leuvenig, who received his theological training at the Amsterdam Athenaeum and from the Remonstrant professors Clericus and van Limborgh, and who was married to Joanna de Clercq, of Amsterdam, in 1713 became an assistant preacher of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation, being its pastor 1716-39, in which year he resigned because of his health. He was a member of the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs, and frequently corresponded with the West Prussian churches; a number of these letters are found in the Mennonite Archives at Amsterdam. He published Lykreden ober het Afsterven van D. Eekens (his Amsterdam colleague) (Amsterdam, 1732); Gods Tugtles aen Jerusalem (Amsterdam, 1734); Stichtelyke Gezangen (Amsterdam, 1744); and De Brief aan de Gemeente van Laodicea verklaard en toegepast (13 sermons) (Amsterdam, 1746). G. van Heyningen delivered his funeral sermon, published at Amsterdam in 1759. F.A.E., vdZ.

Biogr. Wb. V, 770-72; Zondagsbode III, No. 43 (Aug. 24, 1890); Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2641; ML II, 686.

Levellers, an important political and religious movement in England (1647-49) at the time of Cromwell, which, obviously influenced by Anabaptism, demanded absolute civil and religious liberty and the complete separation of church and state, but which finally degenerated into a passionate attack on the state and was therefore gradually suppressed. Pieter Cornelisz Plockhoy (q.v.) was associated with the Levellers. Neff.

H. Weingarten, Die Revolutionskirchen Englands (Leipzig, 1868); E. Troeltsch, The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches (N.Y., 1931); D. Robertson, The Religious Foundations of Leveller Democracy (N.Y., 1951); E. Bernstein, Cromwell and Communism (London, 1930); T. C. Pease, The Leveller Movement (Amer. Historical Association, 1916); L. and M. Harder, Plockhoy from Zurik-zee (Newton, 1952); ML II, 644.

Levina, an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake at Gent, Belgium, on Feb. 14, 1554, together with David (David van der Leyen, q.v.). These martyrs are celebrated in two hymns, one found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (No. 7) beginning "Ghy Christen al te samen" (You Christians all together), and one inserted in the Dutch hymnary, Nieu Liedeboeck of 1562, beginning "Och Heere ic moet u claghen" (O Lord, I must complain to Thee). The information in later Dutch martyrbooks, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, is a prose version of the first hymn. Levina said that she would rather die and leave her six children than to fail Christ; so she died steadfast. The scarce information from the hymns and the martyrbooks has been amplified by A. L. E. Verheyden with a number of particulars from the official records. Here this martyr's name was Lievine Ghyselins; she was the widow of Willem van Leuven (q.v.), a shoemaker, who was executed at Gent because of Anabaptism on Feb. 17, 1553. When he was put to death, Lievine was already in prison. Her execution was apparently postponed because she was pregnant. Lievine was the mother of Frans (Franchoys) van Leuven, who suffered martyrdom at Gent on July 28, 1573. The crowd attending the execution of David and Levina is said to have been greatly affected by their cruel death. vdZ.

Offer, 531-35; Mart. Mir. D 160, E. 549; Verheyden, Gent, 20, No. 40; Wackernagel, Lieder, 132, Wolkan, Lieder, 61; ML II, 646.

Lewär: see Velké Levary.

Lewellen (Neb.) United Missionary Church, located eight miles north of Lewellen, was founded in 1928, and its building erected in 1929. It had 33 members in 1955 with J. P. Tschetter as pastor. J.P.T.

Lewis County (N.Y.) is located in the north central part of New York State bordering the Adirondack Mountains on the east. The Mennonites are found in the central part of the county in and around the villages of Lowville and Croghan. There are approximately 800 Mennonites in Lewis County and about 50 members living near Woodville in Jefferson County, an adjoining county. The First Mennonite Church (MC), organized in 1941, is located at New Bremen (q.v.) and had 193 members in 1954. The two older Conservative Amish Mennonite churches with a combined membership of about 600 are located near Croghan and Lowville. The first Amish Mennonite settlers came to Lewis County from Alsace-Lorraine in June 1833. One of the first to arrive was Michael Zehr. Among the families who arrived soon after were Martin, Moser, Steria, Nafziger, Lehman, Farney, Virkler, and Kennel. For a history of the Amish Mennonite community, see Lowville Conservative Mennonite Church. B.F.Z.

Lewis County, Tenn., Old Order Amish settlement was founded in the spring of 1946 when the Amish families of P. M. Bontreger, Jacob Mast, and Alvin Mast of Jay Co., Ind., moved to near Hohenwald, Lewis Co. A congregation of 20 members meets regularly for worship in homes. The minister in charge is Jacob D. Mast, the deacon P. M. Bontreger, and the bishop Christ M. Bontreger of Buchanan Co., Iowa. S.E.Y.

Lexington Mennonite Church (MC), located at Line Lexington, Bucks Co., Pa., in the Delaware Valley, 25 miles north of Philadelphia, a member of the Franconia Mennonite Conference, dates back to colonial times. There is a record of land purchased by four trustees in 1752, with a log meetinghouse as the first church building. The first known minister and bishop was David Ruth, 1796. The church was incorporated in 1836-37. It has gradually changed from a rural to an urban status. The membership in 1956 was 194; the bishop was Arthur D. Ruth, and Claude B. Meyers and Merle R. Ruth the ministers. A.D.R.

Lexmond, a small town in the Dutch province of South Holland, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized eleven persons. There is no information that a congregation ever existed here. The newly baptized may have joined the congregation of Vianen (q.v.). vdZ.

Ley, Evert Jacobs, a Mennonite preacher of Emden, East Friesland, Germany, where he delivered a funeral sermon, Lykreden op Wytse de Vries (published Amsterdam, 1727). This shows that he was a preacher, though his name is not found in the Emden list of preachers. In 1730-ca. 37 he was a preacher at Kampen, Dutch province of Overijssel (DB 1881, 90). Further information was not available. vdZ.

Ley, van der, a Dutch Mennonite family, formerly at Zaandam and Koog aan de Zaan. Symon Aarjans van der Ley (Simon Adriaansz) was a preacher of the Koog-Zaandijk Waterlander congregation (year of calling unknown) and from 1680 of the United Flemish and Waterlander congregation of Koog-Zaandijk. He lived at Zaandijk, and died before 1700. His cousin Jan Pietersz van der Ley (1671-1750) married to Mary Claesd. Kaaskooper, and their son Aris (Jans) van der Ley (1708-1800), both of Zaandijk, were noted manufacturers of paper, operating the de Bonsem, de Wever, and 't Fortuyn mills. The van der Ley family has now died out. vdZ.

Leydecker, Jacobus, a Dutch Reformed minister of Middelburg, province of Zeeland, who wrote a treatise against the Mennonites, accusing Adriaen van Eeghem (q.v.), Mennonite preacher of Middelburg, of Arianism (Unitarianism). The (shortened) title of Leydecker's book reads: De Sake van den Sone Gods verdedigd (Middelburg, 1701). vdZ.

Leyden, and Leydse Synode: see Leiden and Leidsche Synode.

Leyen, van der, a Mennonite family in Flanders, Belgium. In 1534 Lievin van der Leyen was tried at Gent for heresy; in 1551 he was arrested again, this time at Merelbeke near Gent; though he was convicted of heresy and his property confiscated, he was not executed but released, as was (his brother?) Jan van der Leyen, after both had abjured their heretical opinions. David van der Leyden (q.v.) of Gent was burned at the stake there on Feb. 14, 1554. Tanneken van der Leyen (q.v.), an unmarried woman of Gent, was drowned in 1555 and Laurens (Laureys) van der Leyen (q.v.) was beheaded at Antwerp in 1559. Frans (Franchoys) van der Leyen (q.v.) suffered martyrdom at Gent in 1558. Tanneken, Laurens, David, and Frans were children of Mennonites. Their father, whose name is not mentioned, is said to have also been a Mennonite who escaped martyrdom because he was seriously ill (Verheyden, Gent, 21). vdZ.

Leyen, von der, a Mennonite family of Crefeld, Germany. To this enterprising family Crefeld owes its rise to prosperity. Adolf von der Leyen from Rade vorm Walde in the duchy of Berg in Germany acquired citizenship in Crefeld in 1679.

Adolf began the manufacture of silk thread and velvet ribbon and on the side sold silk ribbon and embroidery silk, imported foods, Nürnberg trinkets, Bibles, calendars, etc. After his death in 1698 his son Wilhelm became the soul of the business; he manufactured silk ribbon and velvet yard goods, selling most of his products at the fair at Frankfurt. He purchased the raw silk from Zürich and had it spun and twisted in Milan and Turin. Later the East India Company delivered the Asiatic raw silk direct to Crefeld. In spite of unfavorable conditions of transportation von der Leyen's business increased in his own sales outlets in Frankfurt, Cologne, Strasbourg, Zürich, and Geneva. In 1724 he established a dyeing plant. Soon his business was limited to the manufacture and sale of his own silk and velvet wares.

Although in competition with Lyons, the Netherlands, and Cologne the von der Leyens achieved an unusual prosperity, so that in the span of a century Crefeld had to extend its walls five times. The four sons of Wilhelm von der Leyen added three supplementary firms. But the firm of the Brüder Friedrich and Heinrich von der Leyen, established in 1731 with a capital of only 18,900 Reichsthaler, soon overtook it, creating a world business of hitherto unheard of dimensions in silk goods, which increased from year to year (by 1740 the turnover was 206,000 Rt., and by 1756, 520,000 Rt.).

In 1738 King Frederick William I visited Crefeld, inspected the factories and warehouses, having previously ordered the exemption of the von der Leyen workmen from military duty. The introduction of machinery from the Netherlands hastened the growth. The old silk center of Cologne, with its tradition- and guild-bound silk industry, now sought to prevent the importation of the cheaper and better wares from Crefeld, but the royal council declared that if that was done, a duty would be placed on Cologne wines passing down the Rhine. The prohibition was therefore abandoned.

Although with the commission system prevalent at that time thousands of hand weavers living as far away as Cleve earned their living by working for the Crefeld firm, and subsidiaries were established in Geldern, Xanten, and Aldekerk, the city itself continued to grow through the influx of master weavers from Italy, France, and the Netherlands. In the course of a century the population increased twentyfold; it grew from 1,499 in 1722 to 4,576 in 1740, 6,082 in 1763 (2,700 of whom were directly employed by the firm), and 7,896 in 1787.

In 1755 Frederick the Great bestowed on Friedrich and Heinrich von der Leyen the title of Kommerzienrat for their great service to their workers, and later also upon their three nephews Conrad, Friedrich, and Johann. This title released the bearer from the jurisdiction of the city, making him subject directly to the king. But in spite of this the Crefeld products were barred from many places "east of the Weser." Even the wares destined for Poland and Russia by way of the Frankfurt a.d.O. fair were charged duty for crossing the country. On this point King Frederick was adamant, in order not to threaten his favorite Brandenburg silk industry. Nevertheless the Crefeld industry continued to grow, employing 3,400 workers in 1786, the year of King Frederick's death. Since this industry had grown to maturity without help from the state, the government avoided interfering with its internal affairs. In 1751 and 1763 the king was in Crefeld and made his headquarters with the von der Leyens. His expressions of satisfaction are found in the Acta Borussica. In 1763 he notified the government of Cleve that the Crefeld firm was not to suffer competition from small industries which would be unable to maintain themselves, by the luring away of workers, and by having their machinery, invented by themselves, copied.

In their wills the brothers Friedrich (d. 1778) and Heinrich (d. 1782) erected a modest monument for themselves (ML II, 572). By this time the firm was exporting goods to all parts of Europe and to America. The three nephews, Friedrich (d. 1787), Conrad (d. 1797), and Johann (d. 1795), continued to increase it. The new king, Frederick William II, recognizing at once the importance of Crefeld, bestowed on the three men a title of hereditary nobility. Johann built the magnificent house on Friedrichstrasse, which later became a bank, and Conrad built as his residence the "castle," which became the city hall.

The confusions of 20 years of war 1794-1814 caused the firm to decline. Johann von der Leyen purchased for his residence the Kieckhorst estate in the Moers district. Conrad's son Friedrich Heinrich (b. 1765) was still a manufacturer from tradition, but his interests lay in intellectual and aesthetic pursuits. As a friend of Fr. Ad. Krummacher, noted as a preacher and writer of parables, he and his highly educated mother lived in the intellectual world of Rousseau and Kant. Friedrich Heinrich von Conrad von der Leyen exercised his Kantian sense of duty in his interest in the industry and the people of Crefeld. Selflessly he devoted himself to the interests of the city, while the generals of the French army were comfortably quartered in his home. Later he exchanged friendly letters with the prince who became Frederick William IV. His cousin Friedrich Heinrich, a son of Friedrich von der Leyen, united with the Reformed Church and turning to rural life purchased the Moers feudal estate and Bloemersheim castle, as well as the monastery land of Meer (Neuss district).

Difficulties increased during this period, the most severe being the continental blockade and the change from rococo fashions to English fashions. The period 1797-1805 brought serious losses, some of which were regained in 1810. Competition with the Berg industry was too severe to permit further expansion. Nevertheless the firm of Friedrich and Heinrich von der Leyen continued until its dissolution to be the greatest industrial undertaking of the Rhineland and probably the greatest silk industry of the entire western world in its period.

The owners of the firm always regarded their position and their wealth as entailing responsibility to the people. They considered their income only as the just reward of their management of property belonging to God, to whom they must give account. Benevolent works were the necessary outcome of their faith, which was turned not to comfortable mysticism and contemplation, but to adventurous action. Their business was conducted as a large family affair. Workers employed in good times were not discharged in bad times. Even in 1780, when there was already a great surplus of manufactured goods, no workers lost their jobs, whereas in Lyons and Rouen 17,000 silk weavers were discharged. In 1794, 200 workers were given a sort of old-age retirement pension.

As Mennonites the von der Leyens were tolerant. Frederick William I in 1738 praised their tolerance when he learned that people of all creeds were employed by them. As the house of Orange had in 1695 permitted the Mennonites to build a church, Frederick the Great now allowed the Catholics to build one. The von der Leyens then built the "Siebenhäuser," the income of which was to be used for the poor, and provided a considerable fund for the employment of well-educated Mennonite ministers. The spirit of the von der Leyens, which considers wealth as an obligation, still prevails in Crefeld. K.R.

W. Kurschat, Das Haus Friedrich & Heinrich von der Leyen in Krefeld (Frankfurt, 1933); W. Niepoth, "Zur Frühgeschichte der Familie von der Leyen," in Die Heimat XXI (1950) 156-58; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1380; Gerhard von Beckerath, "Die wirtschaftliche Bedeutung der Krefelder Mennoniten und ihrer Vorfahren im 17. und 18. Jahrhundert" (dissertation, Bonn, 1951); Walther Risler, "Mennonites of Krefeld," Menn. Life VI (April 1951) 26; ML II, 645-48.

Leytner, Hans, a martyr: see Leitner.

Lezius, Friedrich (b. 1859), a Protestant theologian, lecturer at the University of Greifswalde, Germany, then (1901) professor of church history at the University of Königsberg, Prussia, retired in 1925. In his book, Der Toleranzgedanke Lockes und Pufendorfs (1900), he discusses at length the part of the Anabaptists in the spread of religious toleration. (Menn. Bl., 1907, 88; ML II, 648.)

Liberalism in the Dutch Mennonite Church. Liberalism is a concept found both in politics and theology. In politics Liberalism is the opposite of all kinds of totalitarianism; on the one hand it rejects absolutism and conservatism, on the other hand socialism and communism. Religious liberalism is the antithesis of fundamentalism and orthodoxy. What has been the attitude of the Mennonites toward Liberalism?

(a) Political Liberalism. Before the end of the 18th century Mennonites hardly had any opportunity to influence political life of the countries in which they lived. In most countries they lived more or less as closed groups, which were merely tolerated and were completely dependent on the favor of the rulers. Only in the Netherlands and in some German cities like Hamburg and Crefeld conditions were somewhat better, but even here political freedom and equality with the members of the state church was not acquired until about 1800. Even at the present time Mennonites are in many countries still only tolerated groups; in others, like America, they take little interest in politics. Only in the Netherlands and the North German cities like Emden, Hamburg, and Danzig have the Mennonites been engaged in the political life since the early 19th century. As to the Netherlands, in the course of the 19th century there were a striking number of Mennonites holding office as city councillors, provincial councillors, members of both the first and the second chambers of the legislature, and ministers of state. With one or two exceptions they were all (political) liberals, opposed to too much state interference, upholders of religious and political tolerance, and in many ways opposing the Calvinistic political parties. Though at present many Dutch Mennonites are attached to or vote for the Labor Party and occasionally also for some Christian political parties, many Mennonites in politics are still adherents of liberal principles.

(b) Religious Liberalism. On the whole the Mennonites in the past and present have been attached to orthodoxy and even to fundamentalism, though there have been exceptions from the very beginning of Anabaptism; e.g., Hans Denk (q.v.) and Jacob Kautz (q.v.) in Germany in some respects differed from their coreligionists as to the orthodox Biblical doctrines. In the Netherlands the martyr Herman van Vlekwijk (q.v.) was an anti-Trinitarian; the elder Adam Pastor (q.v.) denied the deity of Christ and the doctrine of satisfaction and was excommunicated because of it; a number of early Dutch leaders, especially among the Waterlanders, such as Hans de Ries (q.v.) were less orthodox than most other Mennonites. But in general Mennonitism was orthodox until about 1860, when most of the Dutch Mennonites and many in the city congregations of North Germany turned to Liberalism. It should be emphatically pointed out that in Holland and Germany Liberalism has a somewhat different meaning from the usual meaning of this term in America. In America Liberalism usually means free thinking and even atheism or agnosticism, i.e., a complete rejection of faith, while in Western Europe Liberalism means a critical conception of the Bible. Although there have been and still are great differences within liberal theology and between its adherents, it may be asserted that all liberals are unanimous in the following views: (1) the Bible is not the word of God in a strict sense, but contains the word of God; (2) Jesus Christ is not the son of God, but a son of God in the sense that all men are; His birth was not supernatural, but natural, His death was not expiatory, but exemplary; (3) man on earth is not a victim of Adam's sin and fall in Paradise, to be justified only by the atoning blood of Christ, but a natural creature, gifted with free will and the possibility of serving God in following Christ's example; (4) doctrines like the inspiration of the Scriptures, satisfaction, trinity, and hell are denied.

When Liberalism, then mostly called Modernism, arose about the middle of the 19th century, most Dutch Mennonites were soon won over to its ideas. It was largely due to the influence of S. Hoekstra Bzn (q.v.), then professor of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, that Liberalism among the Mennonites did not assume as radical a form as it took elsewhere. The turn of the Dutch Mennonites to Liberalism was not unexpected nor accidental; it was in a sense rather self-evident, being the consequence of Dutch Mennonite piety of especially the 17th and 18th centuries. During these centuries and even before gradually more stress had been laid upon personal (individual) conviction and practical Christianity than upon church doctrines, which, though accepted in a traditional way, became more and more "dead capital" (Hoekstra). Besides this the spiritualistic tendency, found already in the early Dutch Anabaptist martyrs (see Spiritualism) and in the 17th century among the Waterlanders and the Lamist Mennonites, created a type of individualistic piety, which though it does not necessarily lead to Liberalism (neither Hans de Ries nor Galenus Abrahamsz was liberal), easily opens the door to Liberalism by its conception that the inspiration of man by the Holy Spirit is more basic than the "written word of God." Moreover influences from outside, like the strong contacts of the Mennonites with Collegiantism (q.v.) and the teachings of Socinianism (q.v.) in which Liberalism is already found as in nuce, made them receptive to Modernism. Foecke Floris (q.v.) and particularly Jan Klaasz (q.v.) van Grouw (De leer der Doopsgezinden, 1702) in their time were almost complete liberals. Doctrines such as original sin, satisfaction by the atoning suffering and death of Christ, were even in the 17th century a tradition for the Mennonites, rather than a part of their real faith, and the doctrine of the Trinity never was part of their essential creed. These doctrines were easily lost after new views came into prominence. But this came not only because Liberalism in the Mennonite congregations produced the new trend of criticizing the Scriptures by rationalistic human understanding; it was particularly the religious pathos of Moralism in Liberalism that appealed to the Mennonites, who by their preference for practical Christianity always had laid much stress upon "Christian ethics."

Liberalism not only changed the type of faith, but being opposed to galling bonds also criticized church practices, leading to the practice not only of admitting members of other denominations to the Lord's Supper, but even heartily welcoming unbaptized persons to the communion services. It is also due to Liberalism that in a few congregations baptism was abolished, or that at least some persons were admitted into the church without adult baptism. Only in one congregation (Franeker) was the Lord's Supper abolished (but has since been restored). The background of these measures is the radical liberal idea that a Christian church is in fact like other human organizations, being a union of people for the sake of religion, and not a church of God strictly speaking. This radicalism, however, was far from being generally adopted in Dutch Mennonite congregations. Thus, for example, in 1867, when the preachers Straatman and Corver of Groningen suggested that church services be modernized by abolishing prayers and Scripture readings and by speaking "on general actual cultural problems," the church board and the majority of the members did not consent, and both preachers retired.

Since its rise, about 1860, Liberalism in Holland has undergone great changes. The words "Liberalism" and "Modernism" have nearly all dropped out of use. At present liberals call themselves vrijzinnigen. This vrijzinnigheid has grown less self-confident, leaning less on the results of modern science (e.g., the theory of evolution), and subjective philosophy; less optimistic too as to a gradual development of God's kingdom from within by the natural goodness of man; Liberalism now is undoubtedly more religious and more Biblical than a century ago, open for the mystery of God's mercy to man, not natural to man's own mind. And though it maintains its critical conception of the Bible, it is more disposed to accept the exceptional signification of the Scriptures and the particular essence of Jesus Christ.

The rise of Liberalism in Holland and its adoption by most Mennonites brought about the co-operation of the Mennonites with liberals from other churches; e.g., with some of the Reformed Church and the Remonstrants. An interchurch organization for the promotion of liberal Christianity was the Nederlandse Protestantenbond (q.v.), founded in 1880, in which a large number of Mennonites have been active until the present. Its hymnals have been used in many Mennonite congregations. Dutch Mennonites also co-operate in the "Central Committee of Liberal Protestantism" and are largely interested in the VPRO (liberal Protestant broadcasting organization).

In the foregoing exposition it has been repeatedly said that most Dutch Mennonites have embraced liberal ideas. There have, however, always been a number of Mennonites who did not accept Liberalism. The congregations of Ouddorp and Blokzijl never tolerated liberal preaching. Against the growing influence of Liberalism some members of the Amsterdam Mennonite congregation in 1892 founded a union "for the maintaining of God's infallible Word in the Mennonite Church of Amsterdam."

This group supported its own preacher (C. P. van Eeghen, Jr.) and its own Sunday school for children until 1912. In 1892, when Hoekstra retired from his professorship at the Amsterdam seminary, a number of representatives in the A.D.S. made a strong attempt to have an orthodox professor appointed. Some Mennonites, unhappy with Liberalism, joined the Reformed, or sometimes the Baptists. Orthodoxy at present, though still in the minority, is more influential than it was half a century ago. This is partly due to the Vereniging voor Doopsgezind Broederschapswerk (see Broederschapswerk), founded in 1917, in which, especially in its first two decades, orthodox Mennonites found an opportunity to assert themselves. The orthodox views of such professors of the Amsterdam seminary as W. Leendertz and W. F. Golterman have also influenced a number of younger Dutch Mennonite ministers. Some of them co-operate in the "Ecclesiologische werkgroep" (ecclesiological unit), publishing their views in 1954 in Doopsgezind Belijden Nu.

Notwithstanding these differences, orthodox and liberal members of the Dutch Mennonite brotherhood wholeheartedly live together aand co-operate in church activities. vdZ.

Liberty of Conscience: see Religious Liberty.

Liberty Mennonite Church (MC), located in Liberty Mills, eleven miles south of Jackson, Mich., on U.S. 127. The meetinghouse is a former Methodist church built in 1867 with a seating capacity of about 150. It was closed in 1936, but was opened in 1946 under the direction of the Indiana-Michigan Mission Board. The congregation was organized in March 1950 with 13 charter members under the leadership of T. E. Schrock, bishop, and Oscar Leinbach, minister. In 1956 the membership was 21, mostly rural. O.L.

Liberty Mennonite Church (MC), located near South English, Keokuk Co., Iowa, a member of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference, was organized in 1898 by L. J. Heatwole and Daniel Driver with nine members. The membership in 1954 was 84. S. B. Wenger was one of the charter members and a chief promoter of the work at this place. Services were held in a schoolhouse until the autumn of 1900, when a new meetinghouse was dedicated. The first resident minister was S. G. Lapp, later ordained bishop. Serving with him was P. J. Blosser as minister from 1907, serving as bishop since 1929. Silas J. Horst was assistant pastor in 1955. S.J.H.

M. Gingerich, Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939).

Libraries: see Historical Libraries.

Licht den Indianern (Light to the Indians), a missionary association organized on Sept. 17, 1935, in the Fernheim Colony, Chaco, Paraguay, by 48 members of the various Mennonite groups. It took up work at once among the Lengua Indians (q.v.) with G. B. Giesbrecht as the missionary, who was assisted in the course of the years by others. Later work among the Chulupies was added. The association, feeling itself inadequate to carry the growing program alone, finally requested the Mennonite Brethren Mission Board of Hillsboro, Kan., to take over the work, which it did in November 1945. However, the association has continued in existence, representing the participation of the Chaco Mennonites in the Lengua Mission and contributing financial and other support to the work. H.S.B.

Licht im Osten, a missionary association for the spread of the Gospel among the people of the East, was founded Feb. 6, 1920, with its seat in Wernigerode am Harz (Germany). Its leaders for many years were Jakob Kroeker (q.v., d. 1948) and Walter Jack (d. 1939). As a matter of principle, the association has established no new congregations, nor sent out or ordained missionaries and preachers. It has always promoted and supported spiritual life in existing churches, congregations, and fellowship centers through the education of ministers, distribution of Bibles, and relief work in times of need. The association is based on the principle of the unity of all of God's children (John 17:21). Wherever its service is desired it serves the people and brotherhoods of East Europe, in all churches and races. It was initially principally connected with "Evangeliums-Christen" of the revival in Russia, but it has also aided Baptists, Mennonites, Reformed, Lutherans, and Greek Orthodox in many different ways. The work of the association has had to adapt itself to the changing religious policies of Soviet Russia. In 1927 it closed its Bible school, and only until the end of 1928 was it possible to send Bibles and concordances to Russia. Since 1930 its services have been largely caritative.

Of the literature published by the association in the Russian language, the new Bible concordance (1,277 pp., 10,000 terms) must be mentioned, of which 10,000 copies were printed in 1925. Of these, 1,500 were sent to Russia, and the rest to various countries of Europe, America, and Asia. More and more the association turned its attention to the countries on the fringes of Russia and to Russian emigrants (promotion of the Ukrainian translation of the Bible by Ohienko, support of preachers, orphanages, etc., in Europe, Asia, and America). After World War II the work was reorganized as the Missionsbund zur Ausbreitung des Evangeliums (Missionary Association for the Spread of the Gospel) in Stuttgart-Mühlhausen, with extensive distribution of Bibles and Christian literature in the language of displaced persons and German refugees from the East, as well as the sending of relief parcels to sufferers in East and West Germany. This distribution of relief was made possible by friendly organizations in America (including Mennonites) and in Europe (Sweden, Switzerland, and Holland; in Sweden the organization is called "Slaviska Missionen"). The work of the association is supported by voluntary contributions from friends in many lands. The organ of the association, Dein Reich komme, appears bimonthly and is sent free of charge to friends as a means of giving information. JA.D.

Lichtenau, a Mennonite village name of the Molotschna settlement, Russia, transplanted to the East Reserve, Man., and Neuland, Paraguay. C.K.

Lichtenau Mennonite Church (GCM), located near St. Elizabeth, Man., was organized in 1925, and is composed almost entirely of immigrants from Russia of 1924-26. Services were held in a rented church until 1930, when a new meetinghouse was built. In 1956 the membership was 118, with N. H. Unruh as leading minister, assisted by Heinrich Friesen and Arndt Lehn. N.H.U.

Lichtenau-Petershagen Mennonite Church, situated in the Molotschna settlement, Taurida, South Russia, and known as the "Reinflämische Gemeinde," originated as the result of a division in 1824 in the Ohrloff-Petershagen (q.v.) congregation, which was the first and only congregation at the beginning of the Molotschna settlement except for the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.) which separated in 1812. It was also called "Grosse Gemeinde," since about three quarters of the population of the Molotschna belonged to it, 430 families in contrast to the 142 which remained at Ohrloff. Its first elder was Jakob Warkentin, who served from 1824 to 1842, when because of differences with the colonial administration (Johann Cornies) he was deposed from his duty as elder by the Fürsorgekomitee (q.v.) in Odessa on the charge of unauthorized interference in civil affairs. After this event the large Lichtenau congregation was divided into three smaller ones: Lichtenau-Petershagen, Margenau-Schönsee (q.v.), and Pordenau (q.v.), each with its own elder. This was also an order from Odessa.

After the division of 1842 the greater part of the population of the following villages belonged to the Lichtenau-Petershagen congregation: Altonau, Münsterberg, Blumstein, Lichtenau, Lindenau, Fischau, Schönau, Tiegenhagen, Petershagen, Ladekopp, some from Ohrloff and Tiege, making a total of approximately 5,000. The first meetinghouse at Lichtenau was built in 1826, a second and larger one, of brick, in 1860. In later years it was surrounded by mighty chestnut trees. There were also meetinghouses at Petershagen (built in 1831), Schönfeld, Rosenhof, and Blumenfeld. After Jakob Warkentin the following elders served the Lichtenau-Petershagen congregation: Dirk Warkentin 1842-69, Jakob Töws 1869-1908, Bernhard Epp 1908-22, David Epp 1922-26, and Peter Nickel 1926-31. In 1887 the total baptized membership numbered 2,388, and 2,496 children.

In former times only Sunday morning services were held, but in later years, before and after World War I, church life became more varied. Song festivals and Bible conferences attracted many visitors, especially under the last two elders, D. H. Epp and P. Nickel. Sunday school was also introduced, as religious instruction had been banished from the schools. As in most other Mennonite churches in Russia there was no instrument to accompany the singing. Services were conducted in German. Church discipline was limited to temporary expulsion for moral misconduct.

In the early 1920's the church building and everything in the church became property of the state, but services still continued although they became more and more difficult because of ever-increasing church taxes. In 1931 Elder P. Nickel was compelled to leave and the church was closed.

In 1905 the total membership, including children, was about 4,000, and in 1926 it was 5,000. The General Mennonite Conference (Allgemeine Mennonitische Bundeskonferenz) met three times in the Lichtenau church: 1889, 1899, and 1918. On Oct. 31, 1926, the congregation observed its centennial.
D.H.E., H.G.

D. H. Epp, "Hundertjahresfeier der Lichtenauer Gemeinde," Unser Blatt II, 75, 79; H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1951); Friesen, Brüderschaft; Mannhardt, Jahrbuch 1888, 70 f.; ML II, 648 f.

Lichtenstein, Ludwig, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded in 1530 at Esslingen (q.v.), Württemberg, Germany.

Lichtfelde, Molotschna, Ukraine, the village in which the Molotschna Evangelische Mennonitenbruderschaft (q.v.) (Evangelical Mennonite Brotherhood) originated. On May 16, 1905, a church was founded with the above name, advocating the spiritual nurture of all believers, participation in the Lord's Supper by all baptized believers, irrespective of the form of baptism, and refusal of fellowship at communion with unbelievers. No one was compelled to be baptized by immersion, but by 1935 few remained who had not been baptized by immersion. (See also Evangelische Mennoniten-Gemeinden).

Organizationally the church had a council of elders, with one man as leader. In order of their terms they were A. Nachtigal (died in Canada), A. A. Toews (residing in British Columbia), and J. Becker (exiled under Soviet rule in 1935).

The early antagonism of the Mennonite Brethren Church gradually changed to mutual understanding and respect, and the church spread to outlying villages and churches in many areas of Russia. Church membership stood at 450 in 1935. H.P.T.

H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1951).

Lichtfelde (Lichterfelde), a Mennonite village name of Prussian origin, transplanted from the Molotschna settlement to Barnaul, Siberia; West Reserve, Man.; Cuauhtemoc, Mexico; and Fernheim, Paraguay.
C.K.

Lichti (Liechty, Lichdi, Lichty, Leichty, Leighty, Leichti, Liechti), a Mennonite name, likely deriving from Lichtgut, a farm that gets much sun located at the end of a valley near Signau, in the Emmental, canton of Bern, Switzerland. The first known home of the family was near Landiswil in the Bowil district of the canton of Bern. The name appears in the earliest records of the area, dating back to the latter part of the 14th century. The earliest known Anabaptist in the family was Jacob Liechti, who was born about 1540 near Landiswil, where he was a farmer.

Georg Liechti (q.v.) was one of the leaders of the Swiss Brethren who left Switzerland for the Palatinate in 1671. He settled at Grossbockenheim. There was also an Ulrich Liechti (b. 1640), who settled on the Ibersheimerhof in 1676. These families have numerous descendants in Bavaria and the Palatinate. Branchweilerhof, near Neustadt a.d.W., Palatinate, is the home of a large family, the minister of the congregation being Adolf Lichti. Kurt Lichdi, owner of a large retail grocery chain in South Germany, is a minister in the Heilbronn (Württemberg) Mennonite Church. Steffen Lichti also came to the Palatinate from Switzerland soon after 1670.

Each migration of Mennonites from Switzerland has had representatives of the Liechti family in it. The Ulrich Liechti family settled in Montbéliard about 1710. Many of their descendants have found their way to America, settling especially in Wayne and Fulton counties, Ohio, near Berne, Ind., eastern Iowa, and Ontario. The first of the family who found their home in America arrived about 1750 from France, settling in Lancaster Co., Pa. A church named Lichty's is in the Weaverland District of the Lancaster Conference (MC). Early in the 18th century some Liechtis found their way from the Emmental to the Jura, where they established homes for a century, many migrating to the Ohio and Indiana Swiss Mennonite settlements in 1830-75. Today the family is especially numerous around Berne, Ind. Abraham Lichti (Lichty), b. 1793 on the Branchweilerhof, near Neustadt, Palatinate, married to Elisabeth Möllinger, a farmer at Friedelsheim (q.v.), immigrated to the United States in 1883 and died at Cleveland, Ohio, in the same year.

Among the American church leaders bearing the name have been John C. Lichti (1869-1951), a longtime minister in the G.C.M. Church (serving 1894-1948), long pastor of the Deer Creek (GCM) and Medford (GCM) churches in Oklahoma, and longtime member of the Emergency Relief Board, also secretary, and chairman; J. A. Liechty (1864-1947), minister of the Beech Mennonite (MC) Church at Louisville, Ohio; Willard Leichty (1906-), minister in the Sugar Creek (MC) Mennonite Church at Wayland, Iowa.

In 1940 Lichti was the seventh most numerous Mennonite family name in South Germany, with 94 representatives, 28 of them in the Branchweilerhof congregation, the rest scattered among Adelsheim, Heilbronn, Sinsheim, Augsburg, Durlach, Munich, and Weierhof.

In the early 18th century some members of the Lichti family emigrated from Switzerland to the Netherlands; their descendants are still found there, spelling their name Leegte. About 1900 Izaak Leegte, of Hoogkerg, was a member of the church board of the congregation at Den Horn, Dutch province of Groningen. D.L.G.

Malinda Liechty and Delbert Gratz, Liechty Family History (1955) (in preparation); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1248; Müller, Berner Täufer, 200-4; Fritz Braun, "Nineteenth Century Emigrants from the Mennonite Congregation of Friedelsheim in the Palatinate," MQR XXX (April 1956) 133-54, especially 145.

Lichti, Georg, one of the leading Swiss Brethren preachers who, expelled from Switzerland, settled in the Palatinate, Germany, in 1671. With Valentin Hüthwohl he visited all the localities where the refugees had found shelter and set up a register of names which he sent to the Dutch Mennonites. He stayed for a time in Kriegsheim (q.v.), and then settled in Grossbockenheim. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1248, 1409; ML II, 649.)

Lichti Old Order Amish congregation, located in Wellesley Twp., Waterloo Co., Ont. About 1911 Bishop Jacob F. Lichti, ordained minister in 1898 and bishop in 1901, and John Gascho, ordained minister in 1913, separated from the Mapleview Amish Mennonite congregation. There was no doctrinal dispute. The group led by Jacob F. Lichti was inclined to be more liberal than the Old Order, but more conservative than the Mapleview congregation. About 1912 they built a new meetinghouse one-half mile east of the other church. Jacob F. Lichti continued as bishop and John Gascho was ordained minister in 1913. Their membership has increased from an earlier probable 150 to a present membership of 236 with 82 families and 360 worshipers. They use the German language entirely and continue to use the Ausbund. They have no Sunday school and are not affiliated with any conference. Services are held every Sunday. The present ministers are Samuel Roth, Samuel Lichti, and Noah Gerber. Since the death of Jacob F. Lichti in 1944 they have called upon Bishop Moses Nafziger of Mornington to perform the bishop's functions. J.C.F.

Lichty (or Smoketown) Mennonite Church (MC), a congregation of the Weaverland circuit, Lancaster Conference, first worshiped in the farm homes of Christian Lichty and Peter Shirk, until the meetinghouse was built in 1849 a mile southeast of the present site. In 1889 the present frame meetinghouse was erected. (This was the church where the introduction of a pulpit aided the Old Order Mennonite schism.) This was earlier also called Zimmerman, and the cemetery in a field a half mile southwest of the present sector still carries the name. The bishop Christian Zimmerman lived hereabouts. This was also Preacher John W. Weaver's home church. J. Paul Graybill is bishop and the Weaverland ministers are in charge. The membership in 1956 was 92. I.D.L.

Lick Creek Mennonite Church (MC), affiliated with the South Central Conference and located in Camden Co., Mo., was organized on Jan. 10, 1939, with 20 members. The present (1955) membership is 18. Summer Bible schools have been conducted each year since 1936. The first and present pastor is J. P. Brubaker. The work was started just before World War I under the direction of J. R. Shank and H. A. Diener. The first bishop was J. C. Driver; at present J. R. Shank is in charge. Services are held occasionally in adjoining communities. J.P.Br.

Liebe, Christian, a Mennonite preacher in the Palatinate, Germany, who made a trip to Switzerland in 1714 to visit the brethren there, to comfort them in their persecution, and, if necessary, to baptize. But he was seized and condemned to galley service. A letter he wrote in Palermo with two surviving companions in suffering, dated Sept. 16, 1715, describes their sad situation. His mother in the Palatinate presented a petition to the authorities at Bern for his release. Finally, on Jan. 10, 1716, he was set free and at once returned to his home in the Palatinate. NEFF.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1375, 1377 f.; Müller, Berner Täufer, 226 ff.; DB 1908, 121 f.; ML II, 649.

Liebich (Lübich, Liebig), Jörg, was one of the group of Anabaptists in Tirol, Austria, who caused the government at Innsbruck great difficulties. Some strange stories are recorded about him. Liebich was sent by the brotherhood in Moravia to Tirol in 1538. Captured in the Inn Valley, he was put into the Vellenburg (near Innsbruck) "into a bad tower." Hans Mändl (q.v.), who was imprisoned there in 1560, describes it thus: "It is very deep. I have heard of six fathoms. But it has a little window at the top, and the sun shines in awhile, so that it is light. The tower is of course full of vermin. The bats fly about the prisoner with a rustle, and the mice eat his food."

It seems the prisoner suffered hallucinations. Liebich thought he was being tempted by the devil. Some of the current stories of his hallucinations were collected in Ein kurze History, was sich verlaufen mit unserem lieben Bruder Georg Liebich in seiner Gefängnis. The fiend tempted him in various forms, as a virgin, or as a youth, or perhaps as an armed soldier, and told Liebich all kinds of tales of happenings in the brotherhood, and the evil committed by one or the other. When he was not successful in turning the prisoner's mind he flew out, leaving a stupefying stench behind. And since the devil had not been successful he sent his assistants.

One of these was Dr. Weber, the pseudonym of the noted Dr. Gallus Müller (q.v.), to whom the government had assigned the task of converting the Anabaptist prisoners. Müller also related to Liebich that the brotherhood in Moravia was dispersed, so that no brother knew where another was. In this Liebich recognized the tempter, accused him of deception, and rejected him with earnest reproof. To complete the temptation the "children of Satan" chained a beautiful maiden named Ursula Hellriegel to his foot. What the devil would have liked to see is easily imagined, say the chronicles. But the prisoner did not fall.

Liebich's trial brought the judges a reproof from the king. After Liebich had been in prison for two years without being affected by Müller's persuasion, the authorities asked King Ferdinand whether the prisoner should not be sent to the galleys of Andrea Doria. The king gave his consent; but because of the expense of transporting a single prisoner, he was not sent.

After two more years Liebich was placed before the jurors. The judges of the district of Sonnenburg realized that Liebich should be expelled from the country. He was, to be sure, an Anabaptist, but neither a backslider nor a preacher, had misled only a few, and had furthermore been converted. To their inquiry as to what further steps should be taken, the king replied that they should send Liebich to Vienna to be taken to the galleys to fight against the infidels.

But Liebich stayed in the Vellenburg until April 24, 1544, when he was banished. "Liebich made several songs in prison, which the brotherhood still has and sings," say the chronicles. Beck comments that they cannot be found under his name; but the above account of his imprisonment is found in Codex 234 of the Pressburg cathedral chapter. LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 155-57; Loserth, Anabaptismus, 53 f.; Mart. Mir. D 64 (where he is called Juriaen Libich, his prison Filleburg, and the year of his imprisonment is given as 1544), E 466; ML II, 649 f.

Liebig, August, Baptist preacher of Hamburg, Germany, who gave valuable assistance in the Mennonite Brethren movement in Russia. He went to Chortitza in the spring of 1866, was arrested by the district court (Gebietsamt) after a brief period spent in organizing the group, was taken to Ekaterinoslav and Odessa, and deported as an undesirable person. In June 1871 he returned in response to an urgent appeal by the Russian Mennonite Brethren and settled in Andreasfeld. He succeeded in leading the group into a quiet and orderly status. Among other things he arranged for annual Bible courses for preachers to continue a month. He did not touch the Mennonite confession of faith, and always advocated the parallel existence of Mennonites and Baptists. In 1875 he accepted the pastorate of the Baptist Church in Odessa, and later emigrated to America, keeping up his Mennonite contacts. (Friesen, Brüderschaft; ML II, 650.) NEFF.

Liebur (Liebersche Gemeinde), a congregation in the Lower Rhine area, Germany, was one of the Mennonite congregations which favored the Concept of Cologne (q.v.) in 1591. Hendrick Frinch-Winckel (?) signed the Concept in the name of this congregation. vdZ.

Liechtenstein, a tiny sovereign principality bounded by Switzerland and Tirol (area 62 sq. miles, pop. 11,218). In the Vaduz area a Hutterite Bruderhof was formed in 1934, modeled on those of the Hutterian Brethren in the 16th century. It was an offshoot of the Rhönbruderhof near Neuhof (Fulda district), was set up near Triesenberg above Vaduz (elevation 5,170 ft.) and was called the Almbruderhof (q.v.) Silum, which was moved to England in 1938. (ML II, 650.) HEGE.

Liechtenstein, John VI (Hans) (1500-52). In religious matters Hans Liechtenstein's position was identical with that of his uncle Leonhard (see Liechtenstein, Leonhard von). At the death of his father Wolfgang he was only 20. In 1535 he married Anna, daughter of George VI of Liechtenstein; after her death he married Esther von Dietrichstein; he had seven children. Hans entered early into the service of Ferdinand I in the Turkish wars and on diplomatic missions. Politically he sided with the Moravian nobles for Ferdinand, in opposition to the majority of the Bohemian estates, when they prepared their revolt against the emperor and Ferdinand in the Schmalkaldian war. In consequence he occupied a respected position in public affairs.

Like his uncle Leonhard he was a Protestant. Hubmaier (q.v.) dedicated his book on infant baptism to John and Leonhard. It may therefore be inferred that they were friendly to the Anabaptists. There is no indication in the Hutterite chronicles that he was baptized. John died in 1552 as an imperial councilor and chief syndic of Moravia, and was buried at Eisgrab. (ML II, 650.)

LOSERTH.

Liechtenstein, Leonhard von, lord of Nikolsburg (1482-1534), a member of the Anabaptist brotherhood in southern Moravia, the son of Christoph III, who founded the Nikolsburg line of this famous Moravian noble house, and his wife Amalia von Starhemberg. On July 25 Leonhard took part in a tournament in Vienna. He was married to Katharina von Boskovitz. Like most of the Moravian nobility he was an avowed champion of the Reformation.

When Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) fled from his home it was on Leonhard's estates that he found asylum; in his own words, he found the light of evangelical clearness burning more brightly here than anywhere else on earth. There was a Lutheran congregation here in 1524; its preacher was Hans Spittelmaier (q.v.) of Bavaria, assisted by Oswald Glait (q.v.), also of Bavaria, and supported by Martin Göschl, provost of Kanitz. Under the protection of the house of Liechtenstein Hubmaier carried on an active propaganda for the Anabaptist cause, which attracted his brethren from all sides to this haven. His extensive polemic writings were printed by Froschauer (q.v.).

There can be no doubt that Leonhard von Liechtenstein was baptized in Nikolsburg "besides much people." Two of Hubmaier's polemic booklets carry Leonhard's name. The very first of them, Ein Gesprech Balthasar Hubmörs von Fridberg, doctors, auff Mayster Ulrichs Zwinglens zu Zürich Taufbüchlein von dem kindertauff, and also Ein einfeltiger unnderricht auf die wort: Das ist mein Leib in dem Nachtmahl Christi, are dedicated to him. In the preface to the latter Hubmaier says of Leonhard: "I marvel not a little that such high and powerful names are collected in one person." Leonhard was, the preface continues, a manifestation of the strength, truth, and resistance of mankind, so that even the fierce lion of this world could not terrify him; and Liechtenstein said the light had come into the world which the good love and the wicked hate. The "Stein" is the rock upon which the wise man in the Bible built his house. Nikolsburg was Nicopolis, which the cosmographers called Emmaus. This should remind the reader how Christ met the two disciples on the road to Emmaus as it became evening.

The thronging of the Anabaptists into southern Moravia and the adjacent parts of Austria evoked the sternest countermeasures on the part of Ferdinand I, especially since after the battle of Mohacs Moravia fell to the house of Hapsburg. His failure to eradicate the Anabaptists completely was due to the protection given them by the nobles. But even Liechtenstein, who had tried to mediate between Hubmaier and Hut, was unable to save Hubmaier. Ferdinand summoned Leonhard to Vienna, and Balthasar Hubmaier and his wife were at once seized and put into Kreuzenstein (q.v.) castle. It is probably a fact that Hubmaier's arrest in 1527 and his subsequent execution were the result of his political agitation in Waldshut, rather than his Anabaptist faith; for the persecution in Moravia did not take place until the following year (1528).

Hubmaier's death was a severe blow to the Anabaptists in Moravia, as was also the severity of the persecution that followed in Moravia and Austria. Nevertheless they were not wiped out, but rather grew, because the growing threat of Turkish invasion occupied the populace and the police. In Nikolsburg the hostility between the followers of Hut and Hubmaier on the "sword and war" and on "tax and communal living" grew more and more divisive.

Leonhard von Liechtenstein held to the party of the "Schwertler" (q.v.) as opposed to the "Stäbler" (q.v.). The Schwertler were the group who were later generally called the Swiss Brethren, and lived in several villages around Nikolsburg. The Stäbler were those who held that a Christian could not with a good conscience bear arms. Leonhard von Liechtenstein made several futile attempts to unite the brethren, and finally expelled the Stäbler from the country. To the very last he befriended them, however; when they were about to go he told them they might have stayed in Nikolsburg. They replied that their consciences had testified against his preachers. He accompanied them to Unterwisternitz, "furnished them a drink and took no toll." In Austerlitz they were received by the lords of Kaunitz.

It is assumed that Leonhard died in 1534. He was survived by two minor sons, Christoph IV and Leonhard II.

LOSERTH.

Jakob von Falke, Gesch. der fürstl. Häuser Liechtenstein II (Vienna, 1877); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; ML II, 650-52.

Liechty: see Lichti.

Liedeken, Een, van XII vrienden van Gent, Dutch Anabaptist hymn: see Gent, Een Liedeken.

Liedeken, Een, van ses vrouwen binnen Antwerpen gedoot . . . in't jaer 1559. This hymn of 25 stanzas begins with the words "Babels Raets mandementen worden aldus volbracht" (the orders of Babel [the Catholic Church] are thus executed); it celebrates the death of six Mennonite women, who died for their faith at Antwerp in Belgium. Their names are not found in this song. As can be concluded from the official records they are Maeyken Cadts (de Catte), Magdaleentgen Andriesdochter, Aechtken van Zierikzee (see Aechtken Joris Adriaensdochter), all three executed on July 18 or 19, 1559, and Oude Maeyken (Maeyken Sprincen), Margriete van Halle (Grietgen Bonaventuers), and Maeyken de Corte, executed on Oct. 11 or 12, 1559. The author of this hymn, which is the most beautiful of all the hymns of the Offer des Heeren, had known these martyrs personally, visiting them in prison, as the second stanza indicates. In this hymn he tells how they were betrayed by a "Judas" into the hands of the margrave, and were arrested in a house outside Antwerp, where the Mennonites used to hold their meetings. In this raid the leaders of the congregation and most members escaped, only the six women being taken to prison. They were tried and tortured, but "the Lord well preserved their mouths" and they did not reveal the names of their fellow members. After much tribulation and suffering they were put to death; they died valiantly for their Lord.

This hymn was composed only one year after the death of these martyrs. It is found in the Dutch hymnals, Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562, Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1563 and following editions, and Tweede Liedeboeck of 1583. (Offer, 581-86.) vdZ.

Liedeken, Een, van LXXII vrienden, is a Dutch Mennonite hymn of 25 stanzas by an unknown poet written to celebrate 72 martyrs who were executed at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1555-60. It begins with the words "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader, ons clagen in deser tijt" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father, our lamentation in this time). The martyrs mentioned here are all found in the publications by Génard (q.v.) in the Antwerpsch Archievenblad, but while Génard usually gives the names of the victims according to the records with their place of birth, the hymn mostly names them after their trades. The first of the 72 martyrs is Tanneken van der Leyen, executed on Oct. 5, 1555, and the last one is Maeyken van Aken (Maeyken de Hont), who suffered death on April 4, 1560. The hymn, which has proved to be very accurate, was composed before Aug. 9, 1560, for Jan de Tasmaker, who is obviously identical with Jan Cleeren (executed on this date), was still in prison—as the author expressly mentions—when the hymn was written. The hymn is found in the Dutch hymnbooks, Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562, Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1563 and following editions, Tweede Liedeboeck of 1583. (Offer, 563-68.) vdZ.

Liedekens and Liedboeck (Liedenboeck, Liedtboeck, Lietboeck): see Hymnology.

Liedekens, 42, a collection of 42 Dutch Mennonite hymns, published together with Een Vermaen-Boeckjen by Jan Gerritsz (q.v.). Only the third edition (Amsterdam, 1655) is extant. The hymns are without notes. vdZ.

Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, Die (Scottdale, Pa., 1914, 894 pages, large size). Until the publication of this big hymnal, the Hutterites had nothing that would compare with the Ausbund, the hymnal of the Swiss Brethren, in fact no printed hymnal of any sort. It is true that prior to the 18th century the Hutterites had a great number of manuscript hymnals in which their innumerable Lieder were collected. Rudolf Wolkan (Lieder, 165-69) describes 21 such codices in European libraries, to which he adds three more which he could not reach. In America the Brethren have a few such codices too, some of which have become extremely difficult to read with the passing of time. But no hymnal was ever declared "official" and nothing had ever been printed. It must be assumed that in former centuries most of the hymns sung at Hutterite services were learned by rote and handed on to the next generation by word of mouth. It was therefore almost a daring enterprise when Elder Elias Walter (1862-1938), then of South Dakota but later of Standoff Colony, near Macleod, Alberta, decided to prepare a printed hymnal. When he received the approval of the brotherhood the publication became a semiofficial undertaking.

In his preface Elias Walter reports briefly about the sources from which he compiled the book: (1) a codex with 165 hymns, written sometime before 1600 (275 leaves, well preserved, title page missing); (2) another codex with 140 hymns, written about 1650 in Slovakia (400 leaves, again title page missing); (3) a third codex of 390 leaves, of which the first 60 are missing, containing 80 hymns (the time is that of Ehrenpreis, 1650-60, the writing good but the paper slowly falling apart). Many of these hymns are incomplete, although a century earlier they were said to have been known in full to the Brethren. Most likely even today many more codices are available than these three, but they are hidden in some of the 120 Bruderhofs in America and not easily found. Elias Walter arranged his book chronologically, though he did not always keep this plan, and the order is often quite confusing. The book begins with a hymn by Felix Manz (martyred in Zürich in 1527), Mit Lust so will ich singen, present in two of the sources named. Next follow hymns by Jörg Wagner (martyred 1527), Michael Sattler (1527) (a hymn of 50 stanzas), Leonhard Schiemer (1528), Hans Schlaffer (1528), Balthasar Hubmaier (1528), of whom one hymn is printed, a supposed second was not available; two hymns go back to Jörg Blaurock (whom Walter reports as martyred in 1529, although the Geschicht-Buch gives 1527 as the date of his martydom); five hymns come from Ludwig Haetzer (d. 1529). Of special interest is the discovery that the hymn, Sollst du bei Gott dein Wohnung han, which was customarily ascribed to Haetzer, is here (28-9) printed as deriving from Schiemer. It is this hymn whose fifth stanza was often quoted, Ja, spricht die Welt, es ist ohn Not dass ich mit Christo leide . . . . We may trust the manuscript and assume that the tradition was incorrect (see ML II, 230). Of Hans Hut's known four hymns two are printed here.

And so the volume proceeds through the hymn collections of the early times year by year. Elias Walter wrote a brief biographical sketch for each hymn writer, sometimes also listing his other works. Many of these hymns are extremely long (over 100 stanzas). Some of the Brethren were very productive, writing 30, 40, and even 50 hymns. Many of these hymns are anonymous; they could be identified only by reading the acrostic (where the initials of each stanza put in order reveal a name or message, a technique used mainly by brethren in prison). Walter points to this device whenever he decodes it. Three fourths of all hymns could thus be ascribed to individual authors; the rest may be assumed to have been composed collectively by groups of Brethren.

Rather famous among these hymns is the Väterlied, describing the work of the forefathers, the Vorstehers of the brotherhood. It was begun by Georg Pruckmaier (d. 1585), who wrote 75 stanzas, and then continued by others until 1639, with a total of 105 stanzas. On page 877 it is still later continued by other loyal writers up to the year 1734, with a total of 18 more stanzas. At the year 1605 the Botschkai Lieder attract our attention (author unknown), describing all the horror of the attack of Turks, Magyars, and Tatars on the South Moravian colonies (158 stanzas, 804-12). The last part of the hymnal contains a number of hymns by the last great bishop of the brotherhood, Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v., d. 1662); one hymn is about his death. Close to 100 hymns are versifications of Biblical stories, which, however, are not quite as popular as the more personal hymns.

Not all these hymns are strictly of Hutterite origin. In fact A. J. F. Zieglschmid discovered that at least one is of Jesuit origin. But the Brethren are used to all of them, accept them, and are loath to change anything.

The Lieder has become "the" hymnal of the brethren. It is used daily at the prayer hour, and at all services on Sundays, holidays, and other occasions. One is amazed that these stanzas, often quite unwieldy, can actually be sung. Often they bear little connection with the worship service as such, and even their original meaning of three or four centuries ago is not always understood. But they are sung in many cases simply out of deference to tradition. The preacher "lines" the hymns, that is, he reads one line at a time, then the congregation sings it according to melodies familiar to all. (There is no notation.) Only the preacher has a hymnal at the service, but most brethren know the texts by rote.

The singing of these hymns also deserves a few remarks. All hymns are sung in unison, not in parts, and they are overloud, almost shrill, with strained vocal chords. Zieglschmid, who discusses this kind of communal singing in a footnote in the Klein-Geschichtsbuch (580, n. 3), points out that according to an old report the Mennonites in the Molotschna also used to sing "über alle Massen grell und laut aus der Kehle gepresst." It is possible that this (not too appealing) method has its origin in 16th-century conditions when Brethren imprisoned for their faith wanted to communicate with other brethren in the same place but in different rooms. At least some sources mention such overloud singing at a quite early date (1536). A reference is also made to Isa. 58:1, "Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet" (Lasst uns schreien, dass uns der Hals kracht, in the Denk-Haetzer translation).

In recent years some brethren expressed dissatisfaction with some parts of the Lieder book, and a new edition was brought out in 1953, in which 75 hymns were omitted, mainly those which contained versifications of Bibles stories. There is some grumbling, however, by others, since many liked the book as it was composed originally.

In the meantime, the late A. J. F. Zieglschmid (q.v.) began a thorough study and revision of this book. He found a great number of mistakes, inaccuracies, and false readings. Many hymns had been "zersungen," i.e., the words were changed and the meaning was lost, often even a whole line was omitted, and so forth. Moreover, he distinguished between genuine Anabaptist hymns and others which were adopted from outside, as was mentioned above (a Jesuit hymn). Thus he compiled a new, revised, purified and corrected edition, to which he added a number of Hutterite songs unknown at the time of Elias Walter, for instance, the versification of the entire Psalter by Wolf Seiler (d. 1550). The Lieder contains 48 of his hymns (see Wolkan's note 1 in Geschicht-Buch, 257). The result of this scholarly work is a manuscript of nearly 4,500 sheets, still unpublished and deposed at the Mennonite Historical Library of Goshen College. It is yet uncertain whether the Hutterian Brethren will accept this "revision" or not, when a need for a new edition arises.

Elias Walter edited a smaller hymnal, the Gesangbüchlein, Lieder, besonders zum Auswendiglernen für die Jugend in der Schule geeignet, meistens aus alten Handschriften gesammelt und herausgegeben von Elias Walter (n.p., 1919, 525 pp., octavo). In 1930 a second edition of this hymnal was produced, printed in Macleod, Alberta, with 480 pages. In 1940, after Elias Walter's death (1938), a third edition was brought out under the title, Gesangbüchlein, Lieder für Schule und häuslichen Gebrauch, herausgegeben von den Hutterischen Brüdern in Kanada (n.p., 1940, 591 pp., octavo). In neither of these editions is any reference made to sources, authors, or historic backgrounds. Thus the Gesangbüchlein has become more a popular hymnbook for school and family singing, and as such is a real favorite. Among other hymns it contains also the old (most likely not Hutterite) song, "Das goldene A-B-C." It contains Lutheran and pietistic hymns, but no old Hutterite hymns. (See also Hymnology.) R.F.

Wolkan, Lieder; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch; ML II, 89.

Liederen bij de Doopsgezinden in gebruik (Hymns used by the Dutch Mennonites) is a small hymnary, published at Amsterdam in 1791, which was a reprint of the Oude Liederen (q.v.) of 1684, but which was much altered in this new edition. vdZ.

Liederen, Christelijke, a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook in two volumes, published at Amsterdam in 1870 by the church board of Amsterdam, and for this reason usually called "Amsterdamsche Bundel." These two volumes of hymns were introduced to replace the "Groote Bundel" (q.v.) of 1796 and the "Kleine Bundel" (q.v.) of 1791. The Christelijke Liederen were also used in a number of other Mennonite congregations besides Amsterdam. The first volume contains 153 hymns, taken from the Groote Bundel, the Kleine Bundel, and the Uitgezogte Liederen (q.v.). The second volume has 132 hymns, borrowed from the Reformed Evangelische Gezangen, the Vervolgbundel, and the hymnary of the Lutherans. In 1916 an appendix of another 48 hymns was added, being numbered 133-81. This appendix, published at Amsterdam, contains 18 Psalms from the Dutch Reformed hymnary and 30 classical Christian hymns by Luther, Gustaf Adolf, Paul Gerhard, and Tersteegen. vdZ.

Liederen en Gezangen, or Opwekkende Gezangen, a small volume of hymns published at Haarlem, Holland (n.d., 2d ed. Haarlem, 1763). There is also an edition of Amsterdam 1793 (and a much altered version of 1791) (see Liederen bij de Doopsgezinden in gebruik). This hymnary is a reprint of the Oude Liederen (q.v.), consisting of 12 hymns of the Lamist-Toren congregation of Amsterdam from 1684. vdZ.

Liederenbundel ten dienste van de Doopsgezinde Broederschap: see Doopsgezinde Bundel.

Liedtboecxken genaamt het Otterken, a Dutch Mennonite hymnary compiled by Maeryn den Brauwer. As far as known no copy is extant. According to M. Schagen (q.v.) there were two editions, 1616 and 1642, both at Haarlem. vdZ.

Liedtjes, Christelijcke: see Jan Stevens.

Liefde, Jan de, b. Dec. 25, 1814, at Amsterdam, d. there Dec. 6, 1869, "author, preacher, poet, composer, humorist, and theologian," entered the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary in 1832, attended the lectures of Muller, who considered him an excellent student, and of Koopmans, was called to preach at Woudsend in 1837, and two years later at Zutphen. He was converted in the revival movement "Réveil," and became one of its ardent advocates. He stirred up animosity by his polemic, Gevaar, gevaar en geen vreede (1844), which exposed and attacked the weaknesses of the Mennonite Church. His position became untenable, and he resigned on Oct. 26, 1845, leaving the brotherhood and joining a group of apostolic Separatists. A year later, on the advice of van der Brugghen, he entered the normal school at Mörs in Germany with the intention of preparing himself for the teaching profession. Before the completion of the course, however, he served for a short time as director of the Rhine missionary association at Barmen, and in 1848 returned to Holland. He worked at a collection of "folk writings." Poverty caused him to decide to go to America. Wealthy friends of the Réveil movement held him back and gave him an evangelistic position in Amsterdam, and built him the church "Eben-Ezer." He had a seminary of his own to train evangelists. He took an especial interest in the poor and initiated an organization called "For the welfare of the People," the object of which was to raise the social and economic level of the very destitute.

De Liefde's hostility to the (Reformed) church at the conference of the "Friends of the Truth" at Amsterdam in 1854 obliged him to resign this position. He founded a free brotherhood, which after a brief growth disintegrated. This unhappy experience consumed his vitality and put an early end to a life of great blessing. He lived temporarily in Utrecht and Amersfoort. To acquire the necessary funds he made frequent trips to England. For some years he had his home there. His brother-in-law, Johannes Molenaar (q.v.), pastor at Monsheim, translated some of his folk writings: "Der Schiffbrüchige aus dem fernen Lande," "Die Diligence oder die Reise nach der Stadt der Erbschaft," "Des Christen Einnahme und Ausgabe," "Der Sträfling," and "Allgemeine Geschichte für das Volk" (Menn. Bl., 1865, 63). They were read in Mennonite circles in South Germany. In 1857 a few Mennonites at Hollum, Ameland (q.v.), who were followers of de Liefde, left the Mennonite congregation to found a "Free Evangelical Congregation." NEFF.

F. J. de Holl, "Jan de Liefde, zijn denkbeelden over de gemeente en zijne vroomheid," in DB 1901, 133-95; S. Coolsma, J. de Liefde in zijn leven en werken geschetst (Nijkerk, 1917); Biogr. Wb. VI, 1-14; DJ 1840, 19, 22; 1850, 37; DB 1861, 37, 146; 1881, 55-61; 1896, 27, 35; ML II, 653 f.

Liefdepredikers (German, Liebesprediger), a term designating those ministers in Dutch and German Mennonite congregations who did not receive special training (see Lay Preachers), and who preached for "love's" sake, i.e., without remuneration. vdZ.

Liége (Dutch, Luik), a city in Belgium (1949 pop. 156,200), where some Anabaptists were found in the 16th century. Wilhelm Stupman (Mottencop) from Aachen, Germany, is said to have founded an Anabaptist congregation here in 1533. Of this congregation, however, almost nothing is known. Two "Lutheran" (i.e., heretical) women, who in 1541 were thrown from Pont des Arches (arched Bridge) into the Meuse River, were apparently Anabaptists. Their names are unknown. In 1570 a Mennonite woman, Lyntgen Kemels (q.v.), suffered martyrdom at Liége, but there is no evidence of a congregation there at that time. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 74, 163; II (1941) 313; H. E. Halkin, Le Réforme en Belgique sous Charles-Quint (Brussels, n.d.-1957) 53, 81, 83, 84 f.

Lienz, a city (pop. 10,000) in eastern Tirol, Austria, in the Drau Valley, where there were Anabaptists especially around 1530, so that the magistrate was ordered by the government in 1533 to pursue them with all diligence, to offer rewards of 60 to 100 florins for information leading to the capture of their leaders, and to spare no effort or money in their extermination. Two years later orders came from Innsbruck to block the migrations to Moravia in Lienz. In 1576 the bishop of Salzburg called the attention of the Innsbruck government to the increase of the Anabaptists in Lienz; thereupon the government sent the Lienz authorities orders to act aggressively. The Hutterite Jakob Platzer fell into the hands of the authorities here in 1585, who had him and four companions instructed in the Catholic faith for four weeks in prison. In order to win his release Platzer recanted at a public service in the church of St. Andrew, but immediately returned to the brotherhood, was seized again in near-by Sillian in 1591, and beheaded after a long imprisonment. In 1588, the magistrate passed new measures against the Anabaptists. P.DE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Loserth, Anabaptismus; Loesche, Tirolensia; ML II, 654.

Lier (Lierre), a city (1950 pop. 29,136) in the Belgian province of Antwerp (formerly Brabant), not far from the city of Antwerp, important in the 15th and 16th centuries for its many looms. It served as a refuge to the exiled Danish King Christian II and his wife who espoused the Lutheran faith. Christian was suspected of connections with the Lutherans at Antwerp. His servants held Protestant meetings and made proselytes. His quartermaster Willem van Zwolle refused to recant his evangelical faith and was executed by burning at Mechelen on Oct. 20, 1529.

For a long time nothing is heard of the innovations in Lier. In January 1550 or 1551 (BRN II, 246, 569) four persons were taken prisoner on the charge of holding conventicles. They were Govert Mertens (q.v.), a street-maker of Maastricht, about 33 years of age; Marie Vlaminx of St. Truijen, 75 years old; Anneken (Tanneken) van Roosbroecke (q.v.), about 34 years old; and Gielis (q.v.) van Aerde, a weaver, 32 years old. Anneken and Gielis were born at Lier. On Jan. 30 they were examined. They freely and valiantly confessed that they had been baptized on their faith, and rejected the offer of mercy. They spent their last night in prison singing psalms. In the morning they were burned on the market square. Among the spectators Govert discovered some brethren and encouraged them with a few words. The executioner of Antwerp had been called to put them to death. A song in commemoration of their death was written by Hans van Overdam, and is found in Het Offer des Heeren. The other Anabaptists evidently fled after these executions. Some were betrayed and seized at Gent—Joris, Wouter, Grietken, and Naentken, all of Lier—and burned in 1551. vdZ.

A. Bergmann, Gesch. der Stad Lier (Lier, 1873) 174-78, 200-4, 216-33; Offer, 568-77; ML II, 654.

Lier, een liedeken van IIIJ vrienden van, is a hymn composed by Hans van Overdam (q.v.) to commemorate four martyrs executed at Lier (q.v.) in 1551. It begins "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert, en daartoe nog vijftich Jaer." It is found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1565 and 1569, and was included in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (q.v.) and some later hymnbooks. (Wackernagel, Lieder, 126; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 78.) vdZ.

Liesveldt, Jacob van, a printer at Antwerp, boosted the Reformation by printing Testaments and Bibles in the Dutch language; in 1522 the Gospels according to the Vulgate, in 1526 the complete Bible, following Luther's as far as it went, and the rest after the Vulgate. In the sixth reprint (1542) there are several pictures: for Matt. 4:3 a picture of Satan in the form of a monk; with I John 5 the note, "Salvation comes alone through Jesus Christ." In 1536 the executioner of Antwerp was summoned to burn "the Bible and other (!) heretical books" printed by van Liesveldt. A second charge was brought against him in 1542 because he had published "Troostinge der Goddelycker Scryft" (Consolation from the Holy Scriptures), but this time he was acquitted. Van Liesveldt was noted for printing heretical books. Because of this he was executed on Nov. 27, 1545. Although it cannot be proved, it may be assumed that the first Anabaptist martyrs used the Liesveldt Bible before their own translation, the Biestkens Bible (q.v.), was published. Many Bible quotations in the old Anabaptist writings have the wording of the van Liesveldt version. vdZ.

Antw. Arch.-Blad. VII, 428, 457, 460, 463-66; VIII, 347-53; XIV, 14 f., No. 155; BRN V, 587; DJ 1837, 54; DB 1890, 61, 64; ML II, 655.

Lietboeck, inhoudende Schriftuerlijcke Vermaen Liederen, Claech Liederen, Gebeden, Danck Liederen, Lofsanghen, Psalmen ende ander stichtelijcke Liederen, de welcke gheoeffent ende ghesongen worden onder de medeleden der Ghemeenten Christi, with notes (Rotterdam, 1582), is a Dutch Mennonite hymnal composed by Hans de Ries (q.v.). It contains a preface by de Ries, an introduction on how to sing hymns, and the hymns in six parts: (1) "Leerachtige Vermaen-Liederen" (20 hymns), (2) "Claech-Liederen ende Gebeden" (22), (3) "Danck-Liederen ende Lof-Sanghen" (10), (4) "Sommighe Cruys-Liederen" (10), (5) "Verscheyden Schriftuerlijcke Liedekens" (11), (6) "Veerthien van des Heyligen Propheets Davids Psalmen" (14 Psalms).

The second edition (Alkmaar, 1604) has the same title and shows only a few slight alterations. A number of hymns were added, the first part now numbering 24; second part 32; the third part 30; the fourth part 10; the fifth part 14. In this edition the hymns and psalms are followed by some "schriftuerlijcke spreucken" (verses from the Scriptures).

The third edition (De Rijp, 1624) is entitled Het Boeck der Ghesangen. It contains the introduction and parts 2, 3, and 5 of the first and second editions, and besides these all of the 150 Psalms in the rhymed version of Dathenus (q.v.). Moreover it has the confession of faith of 1610 by Hans de Ries and Lubbert Gerritsz.

In the fourth edition (De Rijp, 1648) the introduction is omitted; otherwise the fourth edition is nearly the same as the third; a few hymns have been added, and the title of this edition reads Gesanghboeck. The fifth and the sixth editions (1658 and 1681, both at De Rijp) are exact reprints of the fourth edition under the same title, except that in the fifth edition the psalms are not found. There was an edition of 1643 at Hoorn, of which there is no complete copy extant.

These hymnals, used by the Dutch Waterlander congregations until the end of the 18th century and very popular, from which a number of hymns were adopted in the later Dutch Mennonite songbooks, were commonly called " 't Gesangboek van de Ries." The hymnbook Het Boek der Gesangen (Hoorn, 1619) is a shortened version of the 1604 edition, augmented with the complete collection of psalms. vdZ.

Lietboecxken, Een, tracterende van den Offer des Heeren, int welke oude en nieuwe Liedekens, wt verscheyden copien vergadert zijn, om by het Offerboeck geuoecht te worden, is a collection of 25 hymns; the oldest known edition is dated 1563. These songs, some of which have genuine poetic feeling and merit, commemorate the men and women who died as martyrs to their faith; many were written by eyewitnesses. Some were printed on loose leaves and distributed soon after the execution had taken place. The influence of these hymns was enormous. They acquainted the populace with the faith and courage of the martyrs, and also gave strength to the imprisoned Anabaptists. How often we read that they sang a hymn on their way to the execution. The songs were adopted into hymnals.

The Lietboecxken was always published with the old martyrbook Offer des Heeren; only the year of the first edition of the Offer is 1562, that of the first Lietboecxken 1563. This first edition apparently was printed at Emden by Nicolaes Biestkens (q.v.). There are eleven editions known of the (Offer and) Lietboecxken: (1) 1562-63; (2) 1566, n.p.; (3) 1567, n.p. (apparently printed by Biestkens); (4) 1570, n.p., probably also a Biestkens publication; (5) 1578, n.p., probably also by Biestkens; (6) 1578, n.p. (same year as edition 5), probably printed at Delft by Aelbrecht Heyndricksz; (7) 1580, n.p., probably by Biestkens; (8) 1590, published by Willem Jansz Buys at Amsterdam; (9) 1592, n.p. (printer unknown); (10) 1595 at Amsterdam by Willem Jansz Buys; (11) 1599 at Harlingen by Peter Sebastiaenszoon. Editions 1, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 are found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library; Nos. 4, 5, 7, and 10 in the Goshen College Library; Nos. 2 and 6 in the Library of the University of Gent; Nos. 5 and 6 in the Library of the University of Utrecht. Editions 1-4 and 7 contain 25 hymns; No. 5 has 26; Nos. 8, 10, and 11 have 28; the only existing copy of No. 9 is incomplete. Fourteen of the hymns published in the Lietboecxken had been published before in Dutch hymnbooks. Three of these hymns are also found in the Ausbund. A new edition of the Lietboecxken and the Offer was published in 1904 at The Hague, with introduction and notes by S. Cramer in BRN II. (ML II, 652.) vdZ.

Lieven Claus (Claes), beheaded on Sept. 27, 1549, at Gent, Belgium. He was the father of the Anabaptist martyrs Cathalijne and Suzanneke Claes (q.v.), executed on Dec. 3, 1573, at Gent. It is not clear whether Lieven was a Calvinist or a Mennonite. (Verheyden, Gent, 65, 12, No. 19.) vdZ.

Lieven (Lievijn) Jansz (Liefken de Keyser, or Liefken van Gent), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Aug. 6, 1552, at Amsterdam together with five co-martyrs. Lieven Jansz, who was a native of Gent, Belgium, and a weaver by trade, had been baptized by Gillis van Aken. (Mart. Mir. D 142, E 535; Grosheide, Bijdragen, 309.) vdZ.

Lieven van de Walle, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded on June 5, 1536, in front of the Gravensteen castle at Gent, Belgium. In the records of the bailiff he is called a "Lutheran," but this is merely the general indication of heresy. In fact he was an Anabaptist, having received (re)baptism on his faith. By trade he was a barber. Willem van de Walle (a brother of Lieven?) had already on Aug. 4, 1535, been banished from Gent because of his Anabaptist opinions. Many members of the van de Walle (q.v.) family were Mennonites, some of whom died as martyrs. (Verheyden, Gent, 2, No. 5.) vdZ.

Lievens, Antonette, a Dutch Anabaptist poet who composed the hymn "Aensiet o Heer onsen strijt groot" (Regard, O Lord, our great struggle), found in Het Tweede Liedeboeck (1583). The name of the composer can be read from the first letters of the 16 stanzas. Nothing is known of her life. (Wolkan, Lieder, 70; ML II, 655.) vdZ.

Lievijn van Gent, an Anabaptist martyr: see Lieven Jansz.

Lievin Verreken, a fish-hawker at Gent, Belgium, who was burned at the stake on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent on Sept. 15, 1553, was probably a Mennonite. (Verheyden, Gent, 19, No. 38; idem, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.) vdZ.

Life Insurance (or Assurance), commonly a contract insuring the payment upon the death of a person of certain benefits to a surviving relative or friend. In modern times it has taken on other forms beyond simple death benefit, including endowments and annuities, but in any case the contingencies requiring payment of benefits are always in some way dependent upon human life. Such benefits are in no way related to need, as is the case in other forms of insurance, such as fire, theft, or accident, but only to the amount of money paid in by the policyholder. True life insurance began first in England in 1720, although scientific life insurance did not begin until 1764 with the foundation of the Equitable society in England in that year. On the European continent and in America life insurance developed much later, e.g., the first successful company in France in 1819, in Germany in 1828, and in the United States in 1843 (a few small and short-lived companies had begun earlier, the first in 1812). The Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York was the first permanent large modern company. Life insurance has had its greatest development in the United States and several British dominions, certain of the great companies of the United States constituting the largest aggregates of capital in the world, with tremendous financial power.

At first practically all American Mennonites were radically opposed to life insurance, as were many other Christian denominations. The more conservative Mennonite groups, including the Mennonite Church (MC), forbade their members all forms of life insurance from the beginning, usually making excommunication the penalty. Applicants for membership were required to surrender their insurance policies before being received. At first there was similar opposition to all forms of insurance. By the beginning of the 20th century, however, opposition to fire and auto accident insurance had greatly diminished. The introduction of compulsory workmen's compensation insurance about this time by the several states created serious problems for conservative Mennonites at first, but ultimately this was generally accepted. Gradually the opposition to life insurance diminished, so that by the middle of the 20th century in the Mennonite Church (MC) the absolute prohibition of holding life insurance was being modified in many areas, although a considerable block of opposition remains where it is still prohibited. In the General Conference Mennonite Church, the Mennonite Brethren Church, and certain related groups, whatever minor opposition there may once have been has completely disappeared, although such opposition apparently never was very strong.

Many weighty arguments have been offered against life insurance, among them the following: it reflects trust in man rather than in God; it means becoming "unequally yoked together with unbelievers"; it is equivalent to merchandising in human life; it is putting a monetary price on human life, which is considered unscriptural since man is the "temple of the Holy Ghost." These objections to insurance were bolstered by a powerful practical argument, namely, that the commercial insurance companies did not really help the needy, but sought only to protect the healthy and rejected as poor risks the weak and the ill who really needed protection. Many Mennonites also objected to taking out life insurance because it was contrary to the spirit of genuine mutual aid and brotherhood. Finally the corrupt practices of many earlier life insurance companies were often cited as objections to all life insurance; and truly the history of life insurance has been marked by many and large scandals, so much so that rigid legislative control was necessary to curb the greed and the fraudulent practices which appeared. The first such law was the Life Assurance Act of 1774 in England, commonly called the Gambling Act since speculation in the lives of other people, particularly public men, had become a public scandal. Numerous American life insurance companies went bankrupt in the 19th century, and frequently policies were so drafted as to trap the unwary and deprive them of their equities. Penalties for nonpayment of premiums were harshly enforced. The evil repute of commercial life insurance among Mennonites was fostered by these indubitable facts, which greatly fortified the theological arguments.

A form of mutual brotherly aid insurance has developed among Mennonites in North America in recent decades in the form of death and burial benefit associations, which are in effect life insurance arrangements. They differ substantially from commercial life insurance, however, in several respects: (1) the benefit payments are small, intended to cover only the cost of burial, or also medical bills attendant upon the last illness; (2) the system is entirely and truly mutual; (3) salary payments to officials are nonexistent or very low; (4) no agents' premiums are paid; (5) membership is limited to church members.

The earliest of these burial aid organizations was the Mennonite Aid Society of Mountain Lake, Minn., founded in 1897, followed by the Menno-Friendly Beneficial Association of Philadelphia, Pa., in 1908, and the Mennonite Burial Aid Association of Altona, Man., in 1910. Ten other similar societies were organized in 1934-52 as follows: Niagara Mutual Funeral Society, Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ont., 1934; Vineland Beerdigungskasse, Vineland, Ont., 1934; the Mennonite Mutual Supporting Society of Arnaud-St. Elizabeth, St. Elizabeth, Man., 1934; Beerdigungs-Verein zu Leamington, Ont., 1935; Mennonite Burial Aid, Halbstadt, Man., 1940; Mutual Burial Fund, Montezuma, Kan., 1940; Pacific Mennonite Aid Society, Reedley, Cal., 1941; Mennonite Aid, Inc., Goshen, Ind., 1949 (the only such society operating under a conference [MC] authorization); West Abbotsford and Clearbrook Mennonite Church, Funeral Aid, Abbotsford, B.C., 1952; and Alberta Mennonite Relief Society, Coaldale, Alberta. H.S.B.

Light's Meetinghouse was built in Lebanon, Pa., in 1817, when Felix Light was one of the ministers of the local Mennonite congregation. His grandfather, Johannes, an immigrant of 1718 (d. 1759), was also a preacher. Felix' home was the meeting place for the Mennonites from the first until this church was built. This home, with a stockade around it, served also as a shelter for the community during the French and Indian Wars, harboring as many as 30 families at one time. This was the Light Fort, still partially intact. About 1830 Felix Light defected to the United Brethren and claimed the meetinghouse. The Mennonites went to country churches thereafter. Not until the present decade, when a mission was opened, has there been a Mennonite church in Lebanon. The meetinghouse erected at Shirksville in 1775, seven miles north of Lebanon near Fredericksburg, was formerly called "Light's," but has long gone by the name Shirksville. I.D.L.

Ligny (Meuse), the name of a French Mennonite congregation in the general area of the Departement of the Meuse, before 1933 called Vaucouleurs, and appearing in the Gemeinde-Kalender beginning with 1951 as Meuse (Ligny). In the 1941 Gemeinde-Kalender it was still called Ligny; no issues of the Gemeinde-Kalender appeared 1942-50. The Gemeinde-Kalender notes in 1933-41 that it was not a member of the French conference. The membership is listed as follows: ca. 75 souls in 1926, 50 souls in 1933, ca. 40 souls in 1951, and ca. 70 souls in 1955. Elders were J. Kennel 1927-35, P. Kennel 1938-55. H.S.B.

Liiske(n), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Aug. 10, 1550, at Montfort, in the territory of Upper Gelre, now Dutch province of Limburg. Her trial of July 21, 1550, at Arnhem, Dutch province of Gelderland, gives many interesting particulars. Liisken was the wife of Aerken Snyder (tailor); she was born about 1520 at Groote Spawe near Maastricht and had been (re)baptized about 1545 by Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.) in the house of Jan Neulen (which was therefore demolished). Lemken (q.v.) and the martyr Metken (q.v.) were present at the baptism. After a sermon by Theunis, he baptized her with water which had been drawn from a well. During the trial she also confessed that she had heard Gillis van Aken (q.v.) preach and once on an evening Menno Simons, when he was preaching in a meadow. She further gave interesting information about the greeting used by the Mennonites by which they recognized one another. Liisken, being examined concerning her faith, was accused of agreeing with Menno Simons and his followers. vdZ.

Ned. Archief v. Kerkgeschiedenis X, issue 3 (The Hague, 1913) 252-57; DB 1890, 60; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 86, 241.

Lijnken and Lijntgen: see Lynken and Lyntgen.

Lijnslager, Floris Jacobsz (1721-78), was an aristocratic merchant at Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, much renowned for his important collection of drawings. He was a good friend of Elder Doornbos (q.v.) of Wormerveer and a member of the Frisian Mennonite congregation at Alkmaar, which he served as a deacon 1765-78. His father, Jacob Florisz (d. 1743), had been a deacon of the same congregation 1731-43, and his grandson Abraham Lijnslager Moeriaen 1815-25 of the united congregations of Alkmaar. (N.N.B.Wb. II, 860.) vdZ.

Lijntgens (Lijns, Lijntjes), a Mennonite family at Zaandam, Dutch province of North Holland, members of the Oude Huys or Frisian Mennonite congregation. Hendrik and Cornelis Lijntgens in 1628 contributed liberally to a new meetinghouse at Zaandam. Pieter Lijntgens (q.v.) may also have been a member of this family. vdZ.

S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 80.

Lijntgens, Pieter, d. after 1605, a Mennonite, the leader of an important trading house at Amsterdam. Lijntgens had invested more than 100,000 guilders in the East India Company, founded in 1602, but since this trading company dealt with privateers, Lijntgens sold his shares as most Mennonites did, because such illegal profits did not agree with their moral principles. Lijntgens intended to found a new company for the trade with the Dutch East Indies, whose ships would be unarmed, but the Dutch States-General, fearing the competition and wishing to support the monopoly, decided that only ships of the old East India Company would be allowed to trade with the East Indies. Thereupon a Compagnie-Lijntgens was founded, which tried to obtain a license from France to carry on trade from France to the Indies. This plan, however, was never carried out, probably because of the death of Lijntgens. vdZ.

R. Fruin, Verspreide Geschriften II (The Hague) 400-2; N.N.B.Wb. VII, 819 f.

Lijsabeth, wife of Claes de Vries, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1571. She died steadfast with a tongue-screw in her mouth, preventing her from speaking to the crowd gathered around the execution place. The identification of Lijsabeth and the exact date of her execution is not clear, since this martyr is not found in the official records of the Antwerp executions. (Mart. Mir. D 536, E 871.) vdZ.

Lijsbeth and Lijsken: see Lysbeth and Lysken.

Lijsken, wife of Jeronimus Segersz: see Lysken Dirks.

Lileva Mennonite Church, Ostrog district in the province of Volhynia, is listed by Heinrich Dirks, with Johann Janz as leading minister, Johann Nachtigall as cominister, and Johann Dekkert as deacon. No particulars are given about membership, etc. P. M. Friesen also lists the congregation without any additional information. Both sources state that this congregation was a branch of the Alexanderwohl (q.v.) Mennonite Church of Russia. This fact indicates that these two congregations had a common background. (Dirks, Statistik, 1905, p. 39; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 719.) C.K.

Liliencron, Rochus von (1820-1912), a theologian, scholar in Germanics and composer of music, a native of Plön, Holstein, Germany, was introduced into Old German literature and research in folk music by Karl Simrock. His opus magnus, Die historischen Volkslieder der Deutschen vom 13. bis 16. Jahrhundert (five volumes), appeared in 1865-69. In his study of the sources he chanced upon the manuscript copies of the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia in the library at Wolfenbüttel, and published a number of them under the title "Zur Liederdichtung der Wiedertäufer" in Mitteilungen aus dem Gebiet der öffentlichen Meinung in Deutschland während der zweiten Hälfte des 16. Jahrhunderts (Abhandlungen der k. bayer. Akademie der W. III. Cl., vol. 13, section I). In it he briefly characterizes the Anabaptist martyr hymns, in which the sanctification of men and its preservation in life and death is nearly the sole subject and content. "Love is the great and inexhaustible theme of these songs; for love alone is the distinguishing mark of the children of God" (p. 124). In conclusion he asserts: "The total of the songs reproduced here amounts to 65, a gruesome total of bloody inhumanity and religious aberration" (p. 140). This result of his research awakened his interest in Anabaptist history, which led to further publications. The great reference work, Allgemeine Deutsche Biographie, 45 volumes of which appeared under his editorship with 23,273 biographical sketches, included sketches of outstanding personalities in Mennonitism, as Georg Blaurock, Matthias Servaes, Hans Denk, Conrad Grebel, Georg Grünwald, Melchior Hofmann, Balthasar Hubmaier, Hans Hut, Jakob Hutter, Thomas von Imbroich, David Joris, Jakob Kautz, Eitelhans Langenmantel, Felix Manz, Pilgram Marpeck, Michael Sattler, Menno Simons, Hans Raiffer, Hermann von Beckerath, Balthasar Denner, Wilhelm Mannhardt, etc. Individual articles contain a few errors, since the author used material which has been outdated by recent research. But the fact that Liliencron made an attempt to present objective pictures is shown by his co-operation with men who were recognized authorities on Anabaptist history. A considerable number of articles were furnished by Ludwig Keller (q.v.). (ML II, 655.) HEGE.

Lille (Ryssel), a city (pop. 179,778) of France. In the 16th century it belonged to Flanders. At least 17 Calvinists and 16 Anabaptists died here as martyrs. A surgeon of Lille was drowned in the Moselle at Metz in 1538.

In 1563 a large number of Anabaptists were arrested, of whom at least 13 suffered a martyr's death, including Jan de Swarte of Nijpkerken (Nieppe) with his wife Klaesken and four sons, Klaes, Christiaen, Hans, and Mathieu. Jan was a deacon and preacher. He practiced his weaver's trade at various localities in Flanders, finally at Halewijn (Halluin). In his house Perceval van den Berge of Swevegem and Jan Maes of Hondschooten were caught. Through betrayal by the pastor of Halluin, N. van den Kasteelen, the inquisitor Pieter Titelman van Ronse, accompanied by many policemen from Lille, took them prisoner in addition to Pieter Schoenmaker and his wife Jacomijntje (who, however, recanted), Hendrik Aerts, a hatmaker, his wife Janneken Cabeljaus, and a sister Calleken Steens, married to a brother Augustijn, who was not captured. The two younger sons of Jan de Swarte could have escaped, but they refused to forsake their parents. Several brethren tried to comfort the prisoners by shouting to them; Jan lay in a hole called "paradise." One of them, Herman, was caught and imprisoned. These 13 were burned in three groups.

In 1567 five wealthy merchants of Lille were seized at Antwerp. The wealthiest was Christiaen Jansens Langedul (q.v.). They were caught at a meeting. Several managed to escape when Christiaen began a conversation in French with the captain. His wife was Mayken Raets, perhaps a sister of the mathematician Wilhelm Raets at Maastricht. His letters record his terrible tortures and his disputes with a "thin little Jesuit." He was burned on Sept. 15, 1567, with Cornelis Claes, Mattheeuws de Vick, and the preacher Hans Symons, who was one of the delegates sent to smooth over the friction in Friesland in 1556 (Vos, 52 f.).

In 1570 Maerten Karettier of Bousbecque was put to death. In 1571 Adriaen Jans Hoedemaker (q.v.) and Jelis de Backer (q.v.) died at the stake. Frossard mentions 1556 as the first year in which Anabaptist martyrs were executed at Lille, but their names have not been transmitted. The total number of martyrs who died at Lille is 95, 31 of whom are found in the martyrbooks. K.V.

Ch. I. Frossard, l'Eglise sous la croix pendant la domination espagnole (Paris, 1857); Mart. Mir., passim, see Index; K. Vos, "De Doopsgezinden te Antwerpen in de Zestiende Eeuw," in Bulletin de la Commission Royale de Belgique LXXXIV (Brussels, 1920) 52 f.; ML II, 655 f.

Lima First Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Lima, Allen Co., Ohio, was organized Oct. 1, 1935, as a mission, and as such is functioning today. It is a member of the Middle District Conference. The present meetinghouse, erected in 1936, is a brick structure with a seating capacity of 125. The membership in 1955 is 76; the pastor is Sylvan Lehman. S.Le.

Lima Mission (MC) was organized in the southeastern part of the city of Lima, Ohio, in January 1910 as a result of mission interest at the Pike and Salem congregations (q.v.). E. E. Troyer and C. D. Brenneman were the first superintendents. Later in the year Preacher B. B. Stoltzfus and family of West Liberty were invited to locate at the mission. Several years later Mennonites were invited to assist in a Sunday school conducted on North Jefferson Street by the Presbyterian Board. The brotherhood in Allen, Logan, Champaign, and Fulton counties assisted B. B. Stoltzfus and his family in remodeling the church and building a home for the workers, completed in 1917. As part of the building fund Stoltzfus donated his share of an oats crop which he had raised in North Dakota. The congregation was organized in 1922 by the Eastern A.M. and Ohio Mennonite conferences. The two conferences had ordained Henry Müller, a mission convert, as deacon the year before. After Stoltzfus' health declined in 1924, the Board appointed Earl Miller and his wife Fern as workers, who left in 1926 to take charge of the Peoria, Ill., mission (q.v.). In 1926 Maurice O'Connell and his wife Geneva, converts of the Ft. Wayne, Ind., mission (q.v.), were appointed superintendent and matron. O'Connell served as licensed preacher until 1928, when he was ordained to the ministry. S. E. Allgyer ordained him bishop in 1940. After his death in 1946 he was succeeded by Glenn Martin of North Dakota. Since 1953 Darwin O'Connell, assistant pastor, is serving as pastor. The membership in 1954 was 73. J.S.U.

Limborgh (Limborg, Limborch, Limburg), van, a former Dutch Mennonite family found both at Leiden and Amsterdam, where a number of them served the congregations as deacons in the 17th and 18th centuries. This family may have originated from the Dutch province of Limburg or adjacent parts of Germany. Isaac van Limburgh published Vrede presentatie aan G. Abrahamsz en zyne Medestemmers (Amsterdam, 1664). Pieter van Limburg, who at the end of the 17h century was a preacher of the Mennonite congregation at Burtscheid-Maastricht, had a quarrel with a Pieter Frenken, and published Noodig verhaal, dienende tot waerschouwinge van den onbehoorlijken handel van zekeren Pieter Frenken (Amsterdam, 1703). vdZ.

M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijveren (Amsterdam, 1745) 62; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2074; II, 2, Nos. 259, 646.

Limborch, Philippus van, b. at Amsterdam in 1633, d. there in 1712, was a Remonstrant (q.v.) minister at Gouda (1657-67) and Amsterdam (1667-68) and from 1668 until his death professor at the Remonstrant Theological Seminary at Amsterdam. Van Limborch, who published a large number of theological books in Latin, is of interest for Mennonite history because of the fact that after the death of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) in 1706 he trained a number of Mennonite preachers and also because of the influence of his books and his theological ideas, such as rejection of predestination, emphasizing practical Christianity, and his aversion to infant baptism. vdZ.

B. Glasius, Godgeleerd Nederland II ('s Hertogenbosch, 1853) 376-80; Biogr. Wb. VI, 41-47; DJ 1850, 105; DB 1882, 78; 1918, 70.

Limburg, a province of the Netherlands. In the 16th century the northern part belonged to Gelderland, the middle part to the duchy of Jülich (q.v.), whereas the southern part together with Maastricht (q.v.) was subject to the prince-bishop of Liége as well as to the emperor.

Even before 1530 there are indications of the spread of "heretical books." In Hoengen near Sittard the priest Dionys Vinne preached evangelical sermons in April 1530. In 1534 a group of Maastricht people went to Susteren, to hear the sermons of a "suspicious and infamous preacher." Hoengen as well as Susteren are in Jülich territory, where Duke John III (q.v.) paid little attention to the work of the reformers. It is not certain whether the preachers in these cases were Sacramentists or Anabaptists. Others who preached Protestant doctrine were Dionys Vinne of Diest, Gillis von Rothem (whom Vos confused with Gillis of Aachen, ML I, 2), Johann Klopreis (q.v.), Hendrik Slachtscaep (of Tongeren), Gottfried Stralen, and Hendrik Rol (see also Wassenberg Preachers), who were very influential, but went to Münster one after the other (Gillis von Rothem was captured before he reached Münster).

In the following years, probably through the influence of these men, the Münster movement increased in Limburg; Rol or Slachtscaep wrote an epistle to them; there must have been a congregation in Maastricht of more than a hundred members, in which there was some trend to revolutionary ideas in 1534. Forty Limburg Anabaptists led by Jacob van Ossenbrugge started out for Münster but were stopped at Düsseldorf on Feb. 20, 1534. Henric Rol (q.v.), who was active in Maastricht (q.v.) for some time until he was arrested there on Sept. 2, 1534, and executed shortly after, had a beneficent influence upon the congregation, which, however, was nearly wiped out by persecution in January 1535. There were also Anabaptists in other places, e.g., in Venlo and near Roermond; in the villages Visschersweert and Illikhoven they were numerous. Menno Simons preached in the vicinity of Roermond in 1545. Also Elder Theunis van Hastenrath worked here with great success. Van Braght named several nonresistant blood witnesses of Maastricht, two in 1559 and four in 1570.

On Nov. 30, 1652, Wolfgang Wilhelm of Pfalz-Neuburg put up a notice announcing that the Anabaptists who would not join the Catholic Church would be expelled from the duchy of Jülich. Many went away and settled in Nijmegen and Maastricht. From this time there was a congregation in Maastricht, which existed until 1823. In Vaals on the German border there was a church which was used by the Mennonites of Aachen until 1785.

Now there is only one congregation in the province of Limburg, called Zuid-Limburg or Heerlen (q.v.), where Mennonites living in this coal-mining district founded a circle in 1926 and an independent congregation in 1936. The meetinghouse and parsonage are located at Heerlen. To this congregation also belong the Mennonites living at Maastricht, Geleen, Sittard, etc. The few Mennonites scattered through the northern part of the province are regularly visited by Mennonite ministers sent out by the committee for the Mennonites in the diaspora (see Verstrooiing). The total number of Mennonites in the province of Limburg in 1859 was 16; 1889, 69; and 1947, 285. (See also Lower Rhine.) vdZ.

Jos. Habets, De Wederdoopers in Maastricht tijdens de regeering van Keizer Karel V (Roermond, 1877); Gedenkboek der Hervormde Gemeente van Maastricht (Maastricht, 1932); W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik en vooral te Maastricht (The Hague, I, 1937; II, 1941); K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 85-87; DB 1894, 89; 1902, 135; 1909, 120-26; K. Vos, "Anabaptisten in Limburg," Zondagsbode XXII (1908-9) No. 21; ML II, 656.

Limburg, a town in the Belgian province of Limburg, near the German border, where a number of Anabaptists were found shortly after 1530, followers of Melchior Hofmann (q.v.). On March 7, 1536, five Anabaptists from the villages of Montenaken and Heukelom in the duchy of Vroenhoven were arrested and brought to Limburg, where after trial and torture they were burned at the stake about March 17, 1536. They were Johan Bevers, Heine Krokarts (called Vastarz), and the wife of Sevrin Raermakers with her son and daughter. All these martyrs had been baptized by Jan Smeitgen (q.v.) of Maastricht. A congregation founded here in the course of time had to endure persecution several times. In 1566 it numbered about 30 members. It held its meetings in a forest near Limburg. Soon after 1566 it may have dissolved either because of persecution or because the members moved elsewhere. vdZ.

F. Lemaire and A. L. E. Verheyden, "Une enquête sur le Protéstantisme au duché de Limbourg en 1569," in Bulletin d'Histoire LXVIII (1953) 139, 147 f.; et passim; L. E. Halkin and F. Lemaire, "Un procés d'anabaptistes à Limbourg en 1536," in Bulletin d'histoire CXXI (1956) reprint.

Limmen, a hamlet south of Alkmaar in the Dutch province of North Holland, about 1534 a center of Anabaptism, mostly of revolutionary character. A meeting held in February 1534 was attended by 20 persons. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 11; Mellink, Wederdopers, 170 f.) vdZ.

Limon (Col.) Mennonite (MC) Church, a member of the South Central Conference, was organized on Sept. 10, 1922, with 19 charter members, and grew in nine years to 118 members (1931). Thereafter the membership declined, due in part to drouth conditions, until in 1954 the membership was only 36, with Valentin Swartzendruber serving as pastor. Until 1925 the congregation met in a schoolhouse eight miles southwest of Limon. In that year a new church was dedicated a mile north of the schoolhouse, but more recently (ca. 1947) the building was moved into the town of Limon. L.C.M.

Linck (Link), Wenzeslaus (b. 1483), one of the leading German theologians of the Reformation period. He was born at Colditz, Saxony, took his doctorate in theology in 1511, in 1520 he succeeded Johann von Staupitz as vicar general of the Augustinian order in Germany; on Jan. 28, 1523, he became a Protestant preacher in Altenburg, in 1525 became chaplain at the abbey of St. Catherine at Nürnberg. He was one of the first Lutheran clergymen called by the council of Nürnberg to introduce the Reformation there.

In Nürnberg Linck opposed the Anabaptists. In connection with the orders previously issued by the mayor and the council he published a pamphlet without stating the year or his name with the title, Grundtliche Unterrichtung eines erbarn Rats der Statt Nürmberg, in which he gives warning of the seductive doctrine of the Anabaptists and also instructs the pastors in the town and in the country how they "shall most faithfully admonish and instruct the people in their sermons from the Holy Scriptures." Since this pamphlet mentions the death of Hans Hut, which took place on Dec. 6, 1527, it was probably printed early in 1528; it contained 40 pages. A revised and enlarged edition followed. In it the author tries to defend infant baptism and several other doctrines of his church against the objections of the Anabaptists. His method of proof is often quite naive. The booklet is a graphic example of the nature of the struggle the theologians of the 16th century waged against the Anabaptists.

On the question of punishment of the Anabaptists Linck was uncertain when his colleague Andreas Osiander advocated their execution to the council of Nürnberg. He therefore turned to Luther, who advised against capital punishment on July 14, 1528, "even if the punishment was well-deserved." He was frightened by the conclusion which might be drawn from the application of such procedure. The Protestants would also be hit by it, "as we see before our eyes, that the papists in abuse of their spiritual right have shed innocent blood which they called guilty." But Luther considered exile from the country as an appropriate punishment. HEGE.

H. Rotermund, Fortsetzung und Ergänzung zu Chr. Gottl. Jöchers allgem. Gelehrten-Lexikon III (1810) Col. 1854; a reprint is found in G. A. Will's Beiträge zur fränkischen Kirchen-Historie (Nürnberg, 1770, pp. 229-320), as well as in the stereotype edition of this book in 1773, with the title, Beyträge zur Geschichte des Anabaptismus in Deutschland; ML II, 656 f.

Lincki, Martin: see Lingg.

Lincoln, a town in England, the seat of a Separatist congregation which called itself "Anabaptist" but was apparently Baptist, which in 1626 joined the "Anabaptist" congregations of London, Sarum, Coventry, and Tyverton in writing a letter to the Dutch Mennonites with the idea of joining the Waterlander Mennonites. This union, however, did not come into being (see Coventry). On Sept. 5, 1630, the Lincoln congregation wrote a letter to the Waterlanders in Amsterdam defending the strict maintenance of church discipline, which was neglected by the Waterlanders. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1372-77.) vdZ.

Lincoln, Neb., the location of two Mennonite-operated Civilian Public Service camps during World War II. The first was the Lincoln Experiment Station Camp No. 106, under the state College of Agriculture. The camp was approved in May 1943, and closed in October 1946. The men worked in the dairy division, agronomy department, horticulture, animal husbandry, and poultry departments. A farm and community school, with evening classes and lectures, was operated by the MCC for the men in the unit during a two-year period beginning in October 1944.

In September 1944 CPS Camp No. 138 was established at Lincoln, with two units, one of which was located on an MCC-owned farm 1½ miles east of College View, a suburb southeast of Lincoln. Unit 2 was located 10 miles northwest of Lincoln, on a farm owned by the Peace Problems Committee of the Mennonite Church (MC). Both of these units did work for the U.S. Soil Conservation Service. Both conducted farm and community schools similar to that in camp No. 106, although each of the three schools had its own educational director. In November 1944, the MCC sponsored a two-day conference at Lincoln of all their farm and community school leaders. Camp No. 138 was closed in October 1946. Since Lincoln is a center of a number of Mennonite communities and the state university is located here, numerous Mennonites reside in the city. However, no fellowship or congregation has thus far been organized. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 181-86; J. E. Lehman, editor, Mennonite Farmunity; 1st Anniversary (Malcolm, Neb., 1946).

Lincoln Avenue Gospel Mission (KMB), located at 2812 Lincoln Ave., Chicago, Ill., was officially opened Oct. 24, 1915, with David M. Hofer as superintendent and Joseph W. Tschetter as associate superintendent. The first meetinghouse, a two-story brick structure with a seating capacity of about 125, full basement for Sunday school, and living quarters for the workers on second floor, is still used for regular services. John S. Mendel succeeded David M. Hofer and is the present (1954) superintendent. J.S.M.

Lincoln (Neb.) United Missionary Church was organized with 19 charter members in 1952. The church now (1955) has an attendance of 100. The new meetinghouse is known widely in Lincoln as "the church with the lighted steeple." The pastor is Walter Stump. M.G.

Lind (Lint), Esaias Arentsz de, was the son of Arent de Lind of Brielle and his wife Anneken Jans, the well-known martyr, who was drowned at Rotterdam, Netherlands, on Jan. 24, 1539. After the sentence was passed, Anneken in prison wrote a "Testament" (farewell letter) to her little son Esaias, then nearly six years old. This testament is found in Offer des Heeren, 70-75. The Martyrs' Mirror relates that Anneken, on the way to the place of execution with the little boy on her arm, asked the bystanders to take pity on the child; thereupon Lenert Jansz, a baker of Rotterdam, took up the boy (see the engraving in Dutch Mart. Mir.). Esaias de Lind, who later belonged to the Reformed Church, became a wealthy man, who occupied high offices; he was burgomaster of Rotterdam 1580-81 and 1589-90. He was a good friend of the Dutch statesman Johan van Oldenbarnevelt. In later years his business failed and de Lind was reduced to poverty. He died in 1602 or shortly after. Esaias' son Michiel (d. 1645) also went into the magistracy at Rotterdam; another son Pieter Esaiasz, who apparently died before 1618, went into the navy. It was Esaias, the son of Michiel de Lind, who gave the information on Anneken and Esaias Arentsz to van Braght, which is found in the Martyrs' Mirror. vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. II, 823; DB 1905, 170; Mart. Mir. D 143; the English edition omits pp. 143-45 of the Dutch.

Lind, Thijs (Tijs) van, an Anabaptist martyr: see Matthijs van Lind.

Lindal Mennonite Brethren Mission, located near Morden, Man., began as a result of work done by students of the Winkler (Man.) Bible School. In 1935 H. S. Voth baptized 32 persons and in 1938, 10. Soon after this a mission church was organized under the M.B. conference of Manitoba. J. P. Braun supervised this church for six years in addition to his ministry at the Morden M.B. Church. A small church building was erected in 1939. The church membership represents various nationalities —Polish, English, German, etc. J. Kehler served as minister for five years. A number of the members have moved to other places so that at present (1954) the membership is nine; Wilmer Kornelsen is the pastor. The church is located 7 miles west and 8 miles south of Morden. H.H.R.

Lindale Mennonite Church (MC), located one mile north of Edom, Linville, Rockingham Co., Va., is a member of the Virginia Conference. Largely because of a shift of the membership of the Brenneman (q.v.) church, it was decided in 1898 to build a church one mile north of Edom on land adjoining the original Brenneman cemetery. This church soon absorbed the membership of the old Brenneman congregation and in 1919 the Brenneman meetinghouse was sold and the proceeds placed to the credit of the Lindale church. In 1900 George R. Brunk conducted in this church the first series of meetings held in the Northern District of the Virginia Conference. At this time 16 were added to the church. Three years later A. D. Wenger held another series of meetings, when 22 were received. The church, being centrally located, has served as a gathering place for teachers' meetings, and more recently a weekly prayer meeting for the district.

The large influx of members from other places to the vicinity of the Eastern Mennonite College has in the last few years largely increased the membership, so that it became necessary in 1948 to enlarge the meetinghouse. The membership in 1954 was 178, with J. R. Mumaw serving as pastor and Moses Slabaugh as assistant pastor. T.S.

Lindanus, Wilhelmus (Willem Damasz van Lindt), b. 1523 at Dordrecht, Dutch province of South Holland, Dutch inquisitor and bishop, was educated at the University of Leuven (Louvain), Belgium, received a doctorate in theology and was made dean at The Hague. As vicar of the Bishop of Utrecht he was made spiritual commissar (geestelijk commissaris), charged with the control of heresy in Holland, Friesland, and Zeeland. Although he was energetic and thorough in the assigned task, his calmness distinguished him favorably from his colleague Tapper and others. "He listens well and is not easily angered" (Mart. Mir. D 222, E 600). In 1556 he went to Friesland. Victims of his activity were the high-ranking Jacques d'Auchy (q.v.), Claesken, and her husband Hendrik Eeuwesz, all of whom were executed at Leeuwarden in 1559. When the new bishoprics were established in 1561 Lindanus was made bishop at Roermond, then at Gent, where he died on Nov. 2, 1588. He also wrote numerous books admonishing the Catholic Church to improve the life of its members; e.g., Oprecht Tryakel teghen 'tvenijn alder dolinghen onses tijdts . . . (Antwerp, 1567). vdZ.

Glasius, Godgeleerd Nederland II ('s Hertogenbosch, 1853) 380-83; J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 94-106; DB 1872, 32, 91-94; 1899, 45, 52; 1906, 68, 84-86; ML II, 657.

Lindbrook (Alberta) Mennonite Brethren Church was organized in 1928 with 14 members. Its first presiding minister was A. Froese. The meetings were held in the homes of members until 1940, when the first church building was erected. In 1944, when the membership had grown to 70, the building was enlarged. At present (1954) the church has a membership of 55. The pastor is Peter J. Warkentin, assistant pastor Peter Goertz. P.J.Wa.

Linde, Antonius van der, b. 1833 at Haarlem, Holland, d. 1893 at Heidelberg, Germany, was educated at the expense of the Haarlem Mennonite congregation, of which his parents were members. While he was a schoolteacher he started to study philosophy. At first he was a rationalist, then a follower of Hegel. About 1855 he left the Mennonite Church and joined a strictly orthodox Reformed group who had separated from the main Reformed Church, and served for a short period as a preacher. He soon had left it, and studied philosophy at the University of Göttingen, Germany, obtaining his Ph.D. degree in 1862. Later he was employed in the Royal Prussian Library in Berlin. He wrote a large number of books and papers on very different subjects; for Mennonite history his bibliographical study on David Joris (q.v.), published at The Hague in 1867, is of interest. (Biogr. Wb. VI, 51-56.) vdZ.

Linden, Friedrich Otto zur (1857-1927), a Protestant pastor at Neuwied, Germany, and church historian. His biography of Melchior Hofmann (q.v.), Melchior Hofmann, ein Prophet der Wiedertäufer (Haarlem, 1885), 477 pp., inspired by Friedrich Nippold (q.v.), which was accepted in 1882 as a prize-winning treatise by Teylers Godgeleerd Genootschap, is of great importance for the history of Anabaptism. This work—to use zur Linden's own words—"is in that class of presentations which show Anabaptism in an essentially more favorable light than has been customary on the part of traditional historiography. It strives to do justice to Anabaptism without at the same time overrating this important movement at the expense of the Reformation" (op. cit., p. XVI). Zur Linden considers Mysticism the determining feature of Anabaptism in general and of Melchior Hofmann in particular. It is not quite clear whether he means to indicate that this is a difference in principle from the reformers. This treatise is a veritable mine of historical and statistical material for the study of Anabaptist history. (ML II, 657 f.) D.C.

Linden, Hendrik Antonieszoon van der: see Antonides, Henricus.

Linden, Jan Willem van der (b. 1846 at The Hague, Holland, d. there 1923), was a Dutch Mennonite pastor, serving the following congregations: Krommenie 1870-73, Barsingerhorn 1873-83, Hoorn 1883-84, and Harlingen 1884-1912. He published a large number of philosophical-dogmatical writings, including Beknopte godsdienstleer (Groningen, 1902), in which he presents a liberal dogmatics, and a number of sermons. (Biogr. Wb. VI, 77 f.) vdZ.

Linden Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located west of Swalwell, Alberta, began in 1902 when Samuel Boese, a preacher from Oregon, took up one of the first homesteads in the district. In 1904 he was joined by Preacher Peter Baerg from Manitoba, under whose leadership the congregation prospered greatly. The members have come from Oregon, North Dakota, Manitoba, and Kansas. The first church building was built in 1904, enlarged twice, and replaced by new buildings in 1920 and 1951. Samuel Boese in 1944 deeded to the church some land and a large house, now called the "Linden Home." Since 1922 seven preachers and four deacons have been ordained. The church has the regular services, Christian Endeavor programs, a sewing circle, etc. The membership in 1955 was 368. (See Swalwell.) J.W.T.

Linden (Alberta) Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church (now M.B.), formerly called Swalwell, was organized in 1930 out of members of the E.M.B., M.B., Allianz-Mennonite, G.C.M., and C.G.C. groups which had settled in this district as follows: three C.G.C. families from Oregon in 1902-3, a number of families from Manitoba in 1903 ff., and 15-18 families from Russia 1923-25, many of these from what was in Russia known as the "Allianz" group. Since there was no congregation of any of these groups in this region, the Mennonites of the various branches met together occasionally for worship in private homes and schoolhouses. One of the leaders, N. A. Rempel, was later ordained as an M.B. minister. In 1926 J. R. Barkman, E.M.B., a schoolteacher, came into the community and influenced the group toward the E.M.B. (then called Bruderthaler) Conference. This trend was helped by successful revival meetings held in 1926 by G. P. Schultz of Chicago, an E.M.B. evangelist. In 1930 the group unanimously applied for membership in the E.M.B. Conference, but when the E.M.B. representative came, only about half of the group actually joined the E.M.B.; the rest, mostly M.B., refused to go along, although they continued to worship with the E.M.B. congregation. In 1933 a meetinghouse was erected at Linden, and also one at Namaka, where the members were chiefly Allianz (q.v.) from Russia, and this group joined the E.M.B. in 1934, with A. A. Toews as leader. (In 1942 Namaka withdrew from the E.M.B. Conference and joined the M.B. Conference.) In 1934 the M.B. members fully joined the Linden E.M.B. Church. In 1947-48 finally the Linden congregation also joined the M.B. Conference, with Sam Ratzlaff as leader. C.W.T.

Linden Mennonite Brethren Church, located about eight miles north of Acme, Alberta, formerly affiliated with the E.M.B. Conference, but since 1948 a member of the Canadian M.B. District Conference, began when Mennonite immigrants from Russia settled in this area. The meetings were at first held in a public school, but later a church building was erected near Linden. N. A. Rempel has been the presiding minister of the church nearly 20 years. The membership in 1954 was 93; Peter J. Doerksen was the pastor, and J. A. Froese assistant pastor. A.A.T.

Lindenau, a Mennonite village name transplanted from Prussia to the Molotschna and Trakt Mennonite settlements of Russia; West Reserve, Man.; and Menno and Chaco, Paraguay. C.K.

Lindenau, a village of the Molotschna settlement, eight miles from Halbstadt, Ukraine, South Russia, was established on July 15, 1804, by eleven Mennonite families from West Prussia. Before World War I there were 350 Mennonite inhabitants. The next railroad station was Svelodolinskaya, three miles away. The occupation of the village was mostly agriculture, principally small grains. Before the Revolution the village had 21 farms of 173 acres each, later 75 farms of 87 acres each. Before the Revolution about half of the population were craftsmen, such as carriage makers, upholsterers, smiths, and dyers.

During and after the Revolution the village suffered severely. The collectivization was accomplished in 1929. Many of the farmers were sent to Siberia as kulaks. This continued till the outbreak of World War II. In 1941, when the Germans approached, most of the male population was sent to Siberia. The remaining families continued farming in groups of four to five until they were evacuated westward when the Germans retreated in 1943. Some of them reached Canada, but most of them were returned to Russia. (ML II, 658.) C.K.

Lindenhofje, a former Mennonite home for aged women at Amsterdam, which was founded in 1614 by the Waterlander congregation for its poor members. In 1801 it was closed and the inmates were moved to other homes of the Amsterdam Mennonite congregation. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 427-30.) vdZ.

Lindental, a small Mennonite settlement in South Russia near the railway station Sinelnikovo, the inhabitants of which joined the Kronsweide Church after the confusions of World War I. In Lindental there were once splendid buildings and parks. Before the war there was no lack of motorized machinery on any farm; there were shops on a large scale, such as iron works and factories for the production of farm machinery. In the postwar period the thriving village decayed, in the destruction that met so many other settlements. The inhabitants fled, returned, and had to flee again. One front after another passed over small Lindental, one band of robbers followed another, and so the inhabitants were robbed of all their possessions. It can be gratefully stated that no one died a violent death. But typhus claimed a number of victims here. (ML II, 658.) D.H.E.

Lingg (Lincki), Martin, an Anabaptist leader of Schaffhausen, Switzerland, who is identical with "Marti Weniger called Lincki" and is called one of the "principal baptizers and ringleaders of the sect." In the difficult struggles of the beginning Anabaptist movement in Zürich until he was banished from the country after the disputation in Zürich on Nov. 6-9, 1525, together with Ulrich Teck of Waldshut and Michael Sattler (q.v.), he was an active leader.

But this zealous Swiss Brethren preacher was not intimidated in his successful work. We find his traces in Lostorf, canton of Basel, and in the cantons of Solothurn and Bern. An Anabaptist named Flückinger confessed before the court in Bern in July 1531 that he had been baptized on the past Easter Day by the Anabaptist leader Lincki of Schaffhausen.

Lincki played the chief role in the disputation at Zofingen (q.v.) in July 1532 as spokesman for the Anabaptists. Bern had demanded that the authorities of Solothurn should see to it that at least the Anabaptist preacher Lincki, who preached openly, take part in the disputation. Lincki defended the Anabaptist principles at Zofingen with skill. According to the court records he was again preaching in the canton of Zürich at Andelfingen and Ossingen in October 1532. But his period of activity as an Anabaptist preacher did not last much longer. Having returned home, this zealous advocate of Anabaptism gave up the struggle and made a public recantation at Schaffhausen. "God be thanked," said the lords of Bern, that this "outstanding leader" has recanted. S.G.

Müller, Berner Täufer; P. Burckhardt, Die Basler Täufer (Basel, 1898) 44; E. Egli, Aktensammlung, Nos. 863 and 1887; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden Karlsruhe, 1931) 139, 173, 175, 179, 343; C. A. Bächtold, Die Schaffhäuser Wiedertäufer in der Reformationszeit in Beiträge zur Vaterländischen Geschichte, (Schaffhausen, 1900) 71-118, especially 97-115; ML II, 658.

Linggenscher, Peter, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Geneva, Switzerland, lived in destitute circumstances at Rümlingen, supported by the wealthy brother Ulrich Madlinger; he had been expelled from the canton, but returned and was probably threatened with drowning and expelled the second time. When he appeared again and took part in the meetings of the Swiss Brethren at Lostorf or Ettingen, he was drowned in a brook near the Homburg castle together with Hans Madlinger (q.v.) on Feb. 11, 1531. NEFF.

P. Burckhardt, Die Basler Täufer (Basel, 1898) 41; ML II, 658.

Link, Johannes (d. 1545), a Franciscan monk, was born at Nürnberg, Bavaria, Germany, died at Bamberg, where he was ordained to the priesthood in 1525 and zealously opposed the Anabaptists. Several of his sermons in manuscript form have been preserved in the Munich state library (cod. germ. 4264). They come from the Franciscan monastery at Freising and were copied in 1532 in the Franciscan monastery at Bamberg by Jacob Angst. The original has been lost. The arguments seem to have served as a basis for Franciscan sermons to combat the Anabaptists. Copies of Link's sermons have also been found among the court records of the Würzburg state archives.

One sermon has the heading, "Eine tröstlich Unterweisung wider die neue Ketzerei auferweckt von den verkehrten Wiedertäufern im Anfang des 1524. Jahres bis hier-her." It was written in 1531 and from the Catholic point of view it condemns 15 articles of the Anabaptist faith as false doctrine. Another copy, also of 1531, ends with the challenge that heretical doctrines must be combated with sermons and sword; he gives ten reasons. Then he gives directions for winning backsliders back into the Catholic Church if they are approachable to indoctrination by learned men while they are in prison. But he has learned that this is usually not the case with the Anabaptists, wherefore he advises against the "instruction of that kind of obstinate persons."

The hopeless conditions in the Catholic Church which gave occasion to falling away are admitted by Johannes Link. He enumerates no less than 100 abuses, which he deplores. HEGE.

P. Minges, "Johannes Link, Franziskanerprediger († 1545)," in Beitr. z. Gesch. d. Renaissance und Reformation, Joseph Schlecht zum sechzigsten Geburtstag (Freising, 1917) 250-54; D. Clauss, "Der Bamberger Franciscaner-Prediger Hans Link," in Ztscht f. bayer. Kirchengesch. VIII (1933) 159-69; ML II, 659.

Linken, Mattheus van, an Anabaptist martyr: see Mattheus Bernaerts.

Linn Township Amish Mennonite Church, unaffiliated, located seven miles northwest of Roanoke, Ill., was organized about 1910 with 45 members under the leadership of Peter Zimmerman, who had earlier been a minister in the Roanoke Mennonite (MC) Church. The present meetinghouse was built in 1916. Former ministers include Peter Zimmerman, John W. Kennell, and Joseph J. Kennell (bishop). The membership in 1954 was 169, with D. M. Hostetler serving as bishop, John E. Hostetler as minister, and S. E. Unzicker as deacon.

The congregation is sometimes locally called the "Kennell" church, after Bishop J. J. Kennell. It does not belong to the Conservative Mennonite Conference, but remains unaffiliated. Its origin goes back to 1904, when Peter Zimmerman and 40 members withdrew from the Roanoke (MC) congregation because they wished to adhere to the rigid Amish practice of "shunning," which Roanoke refused to do. Zimmerman later came under the influence of John D. Kauffman (q.v.) of the "Sleeping Preacher" group at Shelbyville, Ill. (Mt. Hermon congregation), which had been begun there about 1907, and was ordained bishop by Bishop John R. Zook of New Wilmington, Pa. D.M.H.

Linnigh (Linnich), a Mennonite family, apparently originally from Linnich on the Ruhr, duchy of Jülich, Germany, where Mennonites were found as early as 1551. The Linnigh family lived at Amsterdam from the early 17th century, engaged in business, and were members and sometimes deacons of the Waterlander congregation. Jacob Linnigh was a preacher of the Amsterdam Waterlander, later of the united Waterlander and Lamist congregation from 1661 until he resigned in 1684.

A branch of this family is found in Eiderstedt and Hamburg, Germany. Andreas Linnich was a brewer at Eiderstadt about 1650 (ME I, 41). He may have been identical with Andreas Linnich, who about 1640 moved from Rade (q.v.) near Düsseldorf, Germany, to Friedrichstadt. Jacob Linnich, probably a son of Andreas, was a merchant at Hamburg, where he and his descendants served the Mennonite congregation as deacons. vdZ.

Linsenbuch, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, a subject of the lords of Hacke zu Brücken on the Helme in North Thuringia, Germany, made some derisive comments on infant baptism and was therefore arrested and compelled to recant. But he again joined the Anabaptists and after a long imprisonment was sentenced to death by fire by verdict of a court at Leipzig, and was beheaded on Dec. 4, 1537, at Brücken. Neff.

Wappler, Thüringen, 165; E. Jacobs, "Die Wiedertäufer am Harz," 1899, 492; ML II, 659.

Linz on the Danube. The extent of the Anabaptist movement in Upper Austria in the late 1520's can be learned from the records of the cross-examinations given the imprisoned Anabaptists in 1527-28 in several cities in Germany, and also from the reports sent to the government by various authorities. We learn that after the dispersal of the congregation founded at Steyr by Hans Hut, Linz became a center for the Upper Austrian Anabaptists "ob der Ens."

According to the court records of Passau, Kasper Weinberger, a linen weaver, had moved to Linz from Freistadt, where he was baptized by Jakob Portner, the chaplain of the baron von Roggendorf, and with him a cobbler named Wolfgang and his sister. Hans Stieglitz and his brother Leonhard were baptized in an inn at Linz at Michaelmas in 1527.

Ambrosius Spittelmaier, a relative of Hans Spittelmaier of Nikolsburg in Moravia, made some significant statements. Ambrosius "stemmed from Linz where his father lived." "His name which he received in baptism as an infant he was keeping, but not the baptism." Expelled from Linz he had gone to Augsburg. Then he was arrested in Kadolzburg and tried in Erlangen. His principal teacher he said was Hut. In addition there was also the German secretary Leonhard Freisleben (q.v.), also known as the schoolmaster of Wels, and his brother Christoph, and also Hans Kirchner of Wels.

The Anabaptist group at Linz included also Jakob of Meissen, who was serving as an "apostle" near Freistadt, and especially Wolfgang Brandhuber (q.v.), "the preacher of Linz," and Hans Schlaffer (q.v.) also "sometimes called the parson of Linz," Hans Fischer former secretary of the baron of Stahremberg, also Thomas of Grein, usually called Waldhauser, who was burned at the stake at Brno two days before Easter 1538.

The Linz Anabaptists also include Johannes Bünderlin (q.v.), of whom the Vergichtbuch of Strasbourg makes the comment for the year 1529: "was baptized in Augsburg, spiritually akin to Denk" (q.v.). Little is known about his life. It is not even known whether he died a natural death or was burned as a sacrifice to his convictions.

Brandhuber was condemned to death in 1529 "as a preacher and a ringleader of the seducing sect," together with the preacher Hans Niedermaier and 70 others. According to the account in the chronicles of the Hutterian Brethren, Brandhuber faithfully taught Christian brotherhood above all, one of the main principles of this group of Anabaptists, "that one should have all things in common which serve to the glory of God."

But the stern orders of Ferdinand I against the Anabaptists had not accomplished what he expected of them. On May 11, 1532, he wrote to the magistrate of Upper Austria: in spite of serious mandates the sect keeps on increasing in our principality under your jurisdiction. The best way to conclude the affair with the Anabaptists imprisoned in Linz, Wels, Garsten, and other places would be by instruction. For that purpose four honorable, clever men, two clergymen, and two secular, should be commissioned to indoctrinate them. Those who are penitent shall receive mercy; ringleaders, preachers, and backsliders shall be treated according to the regulations which have been issued.

In consquence of this decree several of the Anabaptists in Linz offered to abstain from their doctrine. The government then passed suitable measures. After that time there was a rapid decline of the Anabaptist movement in Upper Austria. Loserth.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; J. Jäkel, "Zur Frage über die Entstehung der Täufergemeinden in Oberösterreich," 25. Jahresbericht des Staatsgymnasiums in Freistadt, 1895; idem, "Zur Gesch. d. Wiedert. in Oberösterreich und speziell in Freistadt," 47. Bericht über das Museum Francisco Carolinum (in Linz) (Linz, 1889); idem, "Kirchliche und religiöse Zustände in Freistadt während des Reformationszeitalters," 19. und 20. Jahresbericht des Staatsgymnasiums in Freistadt, 1889-90; A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin von Linz und die oberösterreichischen Täufergemeinden in den Jahren 1525-1531 (Berlin, 1890); idem, "Johannes Bünderlin von Linz und seine Stellung zu den Wiedertäufern," 46. Bericht des Museums Francisco Carolinum, 1888; J. E. Jörg, Deutschland in der Revolutionsperiode (Freiburg, 1851); ML II, 659 f.

Lioren, Pieter Jans, son of the noted Elder Jan Willems (q.v.), born at Hoorn and a member of the Frisian Mennonite congregation, was made magistrate at Hoorn in 1597, a member of the admiralty in 1612, and mayor 1614-16. In the coup d'etat of Prince Maurice against Oldenbarnevelt in 1618 he was thrown out of the senate. In 1595 he designed a new model for a sailboat on the proportions of Noah's Ark—the "Hoornsche gaings" or "fleutschepen" (120 ft. long, 20 ft. wide, 12 ft. deep). In a short time quite a number of these boats were in use. Half a century later the boats in the fleet were modeled on different proportions. (DB 1867, 65-70; ML II, 660.) K.V.

Lippenhuizen, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, where there is said to have been a Mennonite church in the early days. By 1686 it had already been incorporated into the neighboring congregation of Gorredijk (q.v.), which is still known as Gorredijk-Lippenhuizen. The Lippenhuizen meetinghouse, built in 1802 and rebuilt in 1875 (DB 1876, 128), was used until Sept. 14, 1947, and then sold. (ML II, 660.) vdZ.

Lippijntgen (Lippinkin) Roetsaert (Roetzaerts), an Anabaptist martyr, a daughter of Jan Roetsaert, living at Bellem near Gent, Flanders, was beheaded on July 19, 1576, inside the Gravensteen castle at Gent with Barbele Pieters and Kreupel Sijntgen (Sijntgen Bornaige), while on the same day Michiel Willems was burned at the stake. Lippijntgen had been (re)baptized in 1565. This martyr is not found in van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, but is apparently identical with Lippijntgen Stayaerts (q.v.), who van Braght says was executed in 1569; this must be an error. (Verheyden, Gent, 67, No. 240.) vdZ.

Lippijntgen Staeyaerts (Stayerts), found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror as an Anabaptist martyr. This martyr is included twice by van Braght; once (Mart. Mir. D 388, E 740) as Lippijntgen Stayerts, wife of Pieter Stayert, executed at Gent, Belgium, in 1569; again (D 648, E 968) as Lippijntgen Stayaerts, executed at Gent in 1573, together with Kreupel Sijntgen. These statements by van Braght are not exact; no Lippijntgen Staeyaerts (Stayerts) has been found in the official documents and Kreupel Sijntgen (q.v.) did not die in 1573 but in 1576. Verheyden (Gent, 67) solved the problem by assuming that Lippijntgen Stayaerts (Stayert) is identical with Lippijntgen Roetsaert (q.v.), executed at Gent in 1576. vdZ.

Lissner (Lisner), Christian (Christl), a Hutterite who was seized at Sterzing in Tirol, Austria (now Italy), with Matthias Legeder (q.v.), but who returned "uninjured" to the brotherhood after a long confinement in chains. He and Legeder together wrote two songs: "Nun hört, ich will euch singen, die frommen miessen leiden viel," and "Nun hert, was ich euch singen will." Nothing else is known about him. Neff.

Wolkan, Lieder, 229; idem, Geschicht-Buch, 178; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 227; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 303; ML II, 660.

Literary Societies, community organizations for the cultural, literary, and social development of their members, were a common feature of the American cultural scene in the 19th century and after. They have, however, practically died out and been replaced by other community clubs, such as women's clubs, men's fellowship groups of various kinds, etc. They were introduced into American Mennonite life primarily as young people's clubs, first in academies and colleges and then in local congregations. Elkhart Institute (q.v.) founded in 1894, and its successor Goshen College, have always had such societies, which for a long time played a major role in student life, although they have now become relatively minor factors on the campus. Eastern Mennonite College and Hesston College have also always had such societies.

Literary societies were common in Mennonite (MC) communities from about 1920 on. One of the first was organized in the Yellow Creek-Holdeman congregation near Wakarusa, Ind., about 1900, but it soon died out. The first permanent society was organized in the Forks Mennonite Church near Middlebury, Ind., in 1910, followed by one in the Middlebury congregation in 1912, and three more in 1913 at Elkhart, Nappanee, and Clinton Frame near Goshen. By 1924 a state convention of literary societies within the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference district was organized which met annually thereafter. The development in Ohio and Illinois was similar, state conventions also being organized. Later, with the organization of Mennonite (MC) Youth Fellowship on a national scale, with its emphasis on religious activity, the role of the literaries declined somewhat, and they were often displaced by local MYF organizations. State MYF conventions also tend to displace the state literary conventions. Some literary societies have, however, continued.

The literary societies furnished avenues for expression and social fellowship which often contributed much to personal growth and development through their monthly meetings in the homes of members. At times they lost some of their literary character and became largely social gatherings. In order to promote high quality of work and experience the Young People's Problems Committee of the Mennonite General Conference (MC) arranged the publication of the Young People's Literary Society Manual (Scottdale, 1934, 148 pp.), written by C. F. Yake. The Illinois state organization, the Mennonite Literary Society of Illinois, in 1925 began the publication of the The Literary Helper (Vol. I, Sterling, Ill., 17 pp.), designed to aid local societies in their work of organization and programs; only one number appeared. In 1937 (?) Raymond Yoder, traveling secretary for the Indiana-Michigan Literary Convention, published a history of all Indiana literary societies under the title Indiana Literaries (pp. 184). Literary societies were apparently chiefly characteristic of the midwestern Mennonite (MC) Church. Few similar organizations developed elsewhere in this group, and apparently none at all in other Mennonite branches, except in their schools and colleges.

The Philo Club of Goshen is a unique women's literary club, founded ca. 1915, whose members are taken chiefly from the Eighth St. (GCM) and the College (MC) congregations. H.S.B.

General Conference Mennonites and Mennonite Brethren. Literary societies in these groups found their chief support and field of activity in connection with the schools, particularly the colleges, Bethel College, Tabor College, Freeman College, Gretna Collegiate Institute, Rosthern Junior College, Mennonite Brethren Bible College, and Canadian Mennonite Bible College. Similar societies were found at Bluffton College in the early days. Later on the societies specialized in debating.

At Bethel College there were in the earliest days a German Schiller-Verein and an English Platonian Society. During the seventh school year they were replaced by the Belles Letters Society, Germania Verein, the Juvenile Society, and the Parliamentary Law Club. The emphasis was placed on reading, writing of essays, and music. In the college papers many of the results of the societies were published. Tabor College and Freeman College had similar organizations. The old type of literary society has now been replaced by modern clubs, such as the Deutscher Verein in Canada and similar organizations. In general, modern forms of entertainment have made the old literary society obsolete. C.K.

H. P. Peters, History and Development of Education Among the Mennonites of Kansas (Hillsboro, 1925).

Literature, Mennonites in. The following series of seven articles presents a survey of the Anabaptist-Mennonite theme in the belletristic literature of the Netherlands, Germany, France, Russia and Russo-German emigrés, and North America, in that order. At the same time the surveys include belletristic literature produced by Mennonites on whatever theme. Literature of less than high quality is also included. Only in the literature produced by Mennonites outside of Holland is an attempt made to be somewhat exhaustive, including even material of slight quality. The bibliography of the major article on Germany lists a number of titles which are not treated in the text of the discussion. For additional material on literature by Mennonites, see Catechisms, Confessions of Faith, Devotional Literature, Historiography, Hymnology, Religious Literature, and Sermons.

I. Netherlands. The role which the Mennonites and other groups spiritually related to them have filled in Dutch literature has been a dual one, on the one hand active and on the other hand passive. On the one hand numerous poets and writers of varying significance have come from their circles, and on the other hand the group has constituted on the passive side an object of discussion in literature, a discussion which has consisted chiefly of contumely and derision.

1. Writings by Mennonites. The creative literary activity of Dutch Mennonites begins with the very earliest Anabaptist documents from the times of persecution and martyrdom in the 16th century. In these stirring, at times deeply moving, and always very personal testimonies of human suffering, of devotion to husband and wife and children, of the torturing concern of the future of loved ones, and of the calm and unshakable devotion to faith and readiness to suffer which rises high above all suffering and thinking, we often come suddenly upon a childlike-pure, ingenuous beauty which the writer did not consciously strive for and of which he very likely was wholly unconscious. Consider for instance the letters of Hendrik Verstralen (1571) and Maeyken Wens (1573), or the little song by the former, or the warlike, somewhat heavy, trumpet song of Anneken Jans (q.v.), the impetuous, passionate pupil of David Joris, or the song by Margriet and Janneken, who were cast into the Scheldt River after they had been brought secretly to Antwerp and condemned to death, or many of the martyr stories and martyr hyms. The ancient documents produced by these martyrs (letters, testaments, farewells, confessions of faith, etc.) were collected and published in a volume called Het Offer des Heeren (q.v.) which appeared in 1562 for the first time, and to which a Lietboecxken (q.v.) was added beginning with the edition of 1563. The entire volume was reprinted in 1904 by Samuel Cramer (q.v.) as the second part of Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica. The Offer des Heeren is not only a collection of valuable historical material, not only a worthy and precious monument to the suffering of the first Anabaptists; it also contains a treasury of literary beauty, concerning which literary historians such as Kalff and Prinsen and the severe critic Busken Huet, as well as the theologians de Hoop Scheffer, Cramer, Kühler, and Knappert, are quite agreed. The large Martelaers-Spiegel (Martyrs' Mirror) by T. J. van Braght, which appeared in 1660, was a continuation and expansion of the older martyr book.

Of the multitude of songbooks the following should be mentioned as the most significant and best known: the Geestelijck Liedt-Boecxken by David Joris which contains songs of 1529-36 and in particular the song, already mentioned, by Anneken Jans (the only extant copy is in the royal library in The Hague); the Lietboeck (1582) by Hans de Ries (q.v.), the Waterlander preacher of Alkmaar, in which appeared a translation of "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott" which is praised by Kalff; Een nieu Liedenboeck (1560, 1562) and Veelderhande Liedekens (1560, 1569), both thoroughly discussed by Kalff.

The songbooks which were intended for use in specific congregations are one or more levels lower in literary quality. Such are 't Groot Hoorns Liedtboeck and 't Kleyn Hoorns Liedtboeck (both of 1644) and Het Rijper Liedt Boecxken (1669), the Middelieër Liedboeck (1651), 't Gheestelijck Bloem-Hofken (Haarlem, 1637), 't Gheestelijck Kruydt-Hofken (Amsterdam, 1637), Claes Stapel's Lusthof der Zielen (Harlingen, 1681, 1686), and Alle Derks' Lusthof des Gemoets (Groningen, 1732) and Agter-Hofje (Groningen, 1736).

The first Mennonite in the field of belles-lettres proper was Carel van Mander (q.v., 1548-1606). Having fled for conscience' sake from the southern Netherlands to Holland, he settled in Haarlem in 1583, where as a painter he became the close friend of the noted artists Cornelis Corneliszn van Haarlem, Hendrick Czn. Vroom, and Hendrick Goltzius, and where he is also supposed to have been the instructor of Frans Hals. In 1604 he moved to Amsterdam, where he died and was buried in the "Old Church." His famous work, the Schilder-Boeck (1603, 1604, new ed. 1946), in which he fused psychological and novelistic matter with biographical and historical data after the fashion of Vasari, still has value in the field of the history of art, especially for the history of the Dutch and German schools. As a poet he participated zealously in the movement to transplant the Italian Renaissance to Dutch soil. In 1597 he published translations of Virgil's Bucolica and Georgica with a sonnet to Goltzius as an introduction. Later he published a commentary on Ovid's Metamorphoses with an abundance of mythological detail, afterwards published as an appendix to the Schilder-Boeck. As a Christian poet he wrote "Gheestelycke Liedekens" as a booklet entitled De Gulden Harpe (1605, 1613; the first edition, 1599, bore the title De Harpe oft des Herten Snarenspel attached to the Hooghe Liedt Salomo); he also wrote the hymns in the booklet entitled Bethlehem, dat is het Broodhuys, inhoudende den Kerstnacht . . . Liedekens of Leysen, die de Herderen . . . 's nachts, hun vee wakende, singen met verlangen na de comste Christi (1613). Among his writings is an attempt at an epic poem entitled Olijf-Bergh ofte Poema van den laetsten Dagh, which likewise did not appear until after his death (1609). Several of his poems also appeared in the Nederduytsche Helicon (1610).

Another writer belonging to the same literary period of the rhetoricians (Rederijkers) who has often been classed as a Mennonite was Roemer Visscher (1547-1620), the author of Brabbelingh and Sinnepoppen (both 1614), which are neither poetic nor ingenious, but are only moralistic pieces in prose to accompany a series of symbolical copper etchings by Claes Jzn. Visscher. There is, however, no adequate ground for his classification as a Mennonite. Some consider him to have been a liberal Catholic while others hold that he was a Calvinist with a tendency toward libertinism.

Pieter Pietersz (q.v., 1574-1651), a Mennonite minister at De Rijp and later at Zaandam, was the author of a noteworthy book, Wegh na Vredenstadt (Road to the City of Peace). Among the "travels to eternity" of which Bonaventura's De Septem Itineribus Aeternitatis may have been the archetype, Pietersz' book is an interesting specimen. This book, published first ca. 1625 and followed by seven other Dutch editions, has also been translated into German. Gerrit Honig and Robert Friedmann are of the opinion that John Bunyan's famous Pilgrim's Progress (1678) was largely influenced by Wegh na Vredenstadt. David Joris and Hendrick Niclaes (q.v.), Dat geestlicke Landt der Beloften, dealt with the same theme.

Joost van den Vondel (1587-1679), the great master of the Golden Age of Dutch literature, was of Mennonite ancestry, both from his father's side and his mother's side. His father, a milliner (hoedstoffeerder) by trade, had been persecuted in Antwerp because of his Mennonite faith, like the parents of Vondel's mother, and had fled to Cologne, where the poet was born. Later the father with his family migrated by way of Bremen to Holland, settling in Amsterdam in 1597 as a hosiery merchant. His gifted son, at first a faithful Mennonite and even in 1616-20 a deacon in the Waterlander congregation which met in the church "bij den Toren" (tower), and a close friend of many of its preachers, united with the Catholic Church in 1641. The grounds for this spiritual migration are to be sought perhaps first of all in the very human longing for a religion with compelling and unshakable authority, but also in the desire of the poet for mystical experience, and probably as well in the deep disillusionment which he experienced as the result of the unedifying quarrel between Hans de Ries (q.v.) and Nittert Obbesz (q.v.) which confused the Mennonite church in Amsterdam in 1624-27, and against which he wrote his poem "Antidotum" (1626). Vondel's drama Gijsbreght van Aemstel (1637) was a harbinger of this inner change, for it is already full of Catholic atmosphere. Many of his later works can be considered a literary defense of his new-won faith; for instance, the dramas Maeghden (1639), Peter en Pauwels (1641), Maria Stuart (1646), the poems Brieven van der Heilighe Maeghden (1642) and Eeuwgetij der Heilige Stede te Amsterdam, and an ecclesiastical-didactic, rather prosaic poem in three books, entitled Altaergeheimenissen (both written in 1645), Johannes de Boetgesant (1662, 6 books), and De heerlyckheit der Kercke (1663, 3 books). Vondel wrote two beautiful poems for the dedication of the Remonstrant church in Amsterdam (1630). Unfortunately very little evidence appears in Vondel's writings of his earlier faith, concerning which he says in his poem Toetssteen (1650) that he was bound to it in his youth only because it was an inherited doctrine for him (door erfefleer). A few traces however are found, chiefly in the scattered verses which he composed for the etched portraits of several well-known Mennonite preachers, Hans de Ries, Cornelis Anslo, both of whom he esteemed highly (the latter etching was one by Rembrandt of 1641), Lubbert Gerritsz, and Antonius Roscius, to whom he dedicated two poems.

Another Mennonite literary figure who, like Vondel, became a Catholic, was Reiner (or Reyer) Anslo (1626-69), a poet of average ability with some outstanding moments, and a nephew of the above-named preacher Cornelis Anslo. He lived for many years in Italy and died in Perugia. Roomsche Lier is the title of his collected poems, in which Vondel's influence is very evident. When the poet Pieter Czn Hooft died, Anslo wrote a long poem as an introduction to the 1671 edition of Hooft's works. Pastor Dirk Rafaelsz Camphuysen (q.v., 1586-1626), although not a Mennonite but rather inclined to the Remonstrants, should be mentioned in passing as a meritorious pious poet who was highly esteemed by the Collegiants, and whose version of the Psalms was sung by them for many years, even as late as the closing of the Collegium at Rotterdam on Jan. 11, 1788. Joachim Oudaen (q.v., 1628-92) was of a similar type in religious as well as in literary respects. He also, like his father, joined the Collegiants, and he also composed a version of the Psalms entitled Uytbreiding der Psalmen (1680-81). He had for a time been a deacon in the Waterlander Mennonite Church in Rotterdam. He composed a short poem for the portrait of Menno Simons (DB 1916). He cultivated in his lyric poems a type which was seldom used in the Dutch poetry of that day, namely, the description of landscape paintings.

Among the numerous Mennonite composers of hymns, whose songs, usually of little literary value, are found in several Dutch Mennonite hymnbooks, are (besides de Ries, Vondel, and Oudaen, mentioned before) Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, Leenaert Clock, Jan Jacobsz, Claes Ganglofs, Pieter Jans Twisck, Marijn den Brauwer, Abraham van Gherwen, Jan Jansz Deutel, Jan Claesz Schaap, Alle Derks, H. A. Hoejewilt, Bernardus de Bosch, Anthony Hartsen, Galenus Abrahamsz, Jan Luyken, Adriaan Spinniker, Reinier Rooleeuw, Aagje Deken, Adriaan Loosjes Pz., A. H. van Gelder, J. Lugt Dz., Assuerus Doyer, Klaas Sybrandi, Jan de Liefde, Herman Boetje, A. A. Sepp.

Anthoni Janssen (van der Goes) published several volumes of poetry: Christelyck Vermaeck, Bestaende in Verscheyden Stichtelycke Rymen en Gesangen (1645), Zederymen (1656), and 't Doolhof te Versailles, met Vaerzen verrykt (n.d., repr. 1733); his son Joannes Antonides (q.v.) van der Goes (1647-84), in his time a famous poet, admired and eulogized by no less a person than Vondel, wrote a number of poems and tragedies, e.g., Trazil of Overrompelt Sina, and particularly De Ystroom, 1671. Some of his poems were posthumously edited and published by his father (Gedigten, 1685, repr. 1704, 1715). Tieleman Jansz van Braght (q.v.) wrote Anghstig Swanen-Gesangh of Troostelooze Vreede (1647), and Jan Philipsz Schabaelje (q.v.) wrote Lusthof des Gemoeds, the most popular Mennonite book ever published, from 1645 on in numerous Dutch, German (Die wandelnde Seele), and English (The Wandering Soul) editions.

The physician and theologian, Pieter Langedult (q.v., 1640-77), a member of the Flemish Mennonite congregation in Haarlem, composed several Christian dramas, including what might be called a passion play.

The gifted poet and etcher Jan Luyken (q.v., 1649-1712), the son of an educated schoolteacher and an independent thinker who had connections with both the Remonstrants and the Mennonites as well as later with the Collegiants, and who finally joined the Mennonite group in Amsterdam of which Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan was the leader, was the creator of the best Dutch lyric poetry after Vondel, Bredero, and Hooft, particularly in his youthful poems which were published in 1671 under the title De Duytse Lier. His very effective love poems, often filled with the most fervent love of nature, are among the best of such poetry of the 17th century. However, here and there among these poems there is evidence of a certain melancholy which forecast a later spiritual change. After a silence of seven years he published a work called Jezus en de Ziel (1678), which reveals the influence of Jacob Böhme. This fine poetic work portrays the heaven which may be found in the human spirit when the light of God shines in and when the voice of God is heard. His work entitled Voncken der Liefde Jesu (1687) is likewise full of the same quiet bliss, the same mystical submergence in God, the same fellowship with the Lord. Other of his religious poetry was published later in Spiegel van het menselijk bedrijf (1694) containing poetic comments on trades and professions of all kinds, which are represented in a long series of etchings by his own hand. On the other hand Zedelijke en Stichtelijke Gezangen (1704), Beschouwing der Wereld (1708), De Onwaardige Wereld (1710), Het leerzaam huisraad (1711), and Des menschen Begin, midden en einde (1712) are chiefly of didactic character. Luyken's etchings which accompany his poems, and probably still more those which appeared in van Braght's Martelaers-Spiegel (1685) and his great series of etchings called Icones Biblicae of Afbeeldingen der merkwaardigste geschiedenissen van het Oude en Nieuwe Testament (1708, 1729), contributed much to his unusual popularity among Dutch Protestants of the most varying views, which lasted more than two centuries. Under the impression of the great and often entrancing beauty of Luyken's best religious poetry, even the most strictly orthodox forgot that the poet had gradually withdrawn from all external forms of the church in religion. In 1673 he joined the Mennonite church in Beverwijk, where he lived for some time after his marriage, and in the following year he transferred to the Mennonite church in Amsterdam, after his settlement in that city. He seems earlier to have had strong leanings toward the Collegiants, like his father and his brother Christoffel. For a short time in 1699 he withdrew from the city and from the world of men to a quiet country place near Haarlem. Later (1703) he went to Schellinkhout, not far from Hoorn, but soon thereafter he was living again in Amsterdam. There he lost his wife and his three children (his son and pupil Caspar, the etcher, died in 1705) by death and in 1712 he followed them to the land which he had long since sought in his pious Christian faith.

The good Claas Bruin (q.v., 1670-1732), an honorable bookkeeper in Amsterdam, is a part of the comfortable, somewhat commonplace literary provincialism of the time. He was the diligent author of several minor moralistic and historical dramas and poems and moreover of Kleefsche en Zuid-Hollandsche Arcadia (1716), Noordhollandsche Arcadia (1732), and Speelreis langs de Vechtstroom op de uitgegeevene Gezichten van de Zeegepraalende Vecht (1719), in which he endeavored to praise the beauty of the landscape in certain districts in a pastoral, erotic, and materialistic style.

Elisabeth Koolaert—Hoofman (1664-1734) was one of the first Dutch women to write poetry. Some of her verse was published by Willem Kops in 1774.

Achior van den Abeele (q.v.), a Mennonite preacher at Haarlem from 1712, published besides theological books Eens Jongelings pelgrimagie, of wandelweg, Bepland met Gedichten en Gezangen . . . (1718) and Den Uyterlyken Boogaard, bestaande in Hof- en Landgezigten, Overgebracht op de inwendige Gestalten des Gemoeds (1730). Abraham Heems, a well-to-do silk merchant at Haarlem, wrote Antipater, of de Dood van Alexander (1723), Bybelpoëzy (1729), and Absolon, of de gestrafte Heerszucht (n.d.); his daughter Femina Hugaart-Heems (1724-81) also published a number of poems. Roelant van Leuve published Mengelwerken (3 vv., 1723) and Doorluchte te Voorbeelden der Ouden, Zinnebeelden . . . en Gedigten (1725). Herman van Logchem, a Mennonite merchant, was the author of a few comedies and tragedies, including Krispijn . . . of Erfgenaam door List (1725) and Sirena, veldheer der Parthen (1738). T. J. van Braght, probably a relative of the author of the Martyrs' Mirror, published De Gewiekte Kruiwagen, ter opvoering der onoverwonnen keizerlijke Stad Dordrecht (1717). These publications are all mediocre and have passed into complete oblivion.

Hendrik Rintjes, a Mennonite preacher and bookseller at Leeuwarden, published Gedachten op den Jongsten dag (1681, repr. 1684) and De Morgenstond in haar Somersche Vermakelijkheden vertoont (1684, repr. 1690).

The wealthy merchant Sybrand Feitama (1694-1758), likewise an Amsterdam Mennonite, actually undertook to climb to the summit of Parnassus. However, after the publication of his first and only tragedy, entitled Fabricius (1720), he limited himself to translations of French dramas. His teacher in grammar was the Mennonite Lambert Hermansz ten Kate (q.v., 1674-1731), a grain dealer in Amsterdam, a many-sided and gifted dilettante in art and learning of all sorts, the author of Gemeenschap tussen de Gottische sprake en de Nederduytsche (1710), later of Aenleiding tot de kennisse van het verhevene deel der Nederduytse sprake (1723) and of Oeffen-Schets over het vereisch der Dichtkunst (1724). He was in this period a versatile connoisseur of languages, and his learned studies are still a subject of scholarly study. The Aenleiding contains a study of the development of sounds and the voice, and a method of phonics and prosody. He had earlier (ms. dated 1699) written Verhandeling over de Klankkunde in connection with a study of versification. He was a deacon in the Haarlem Mennonite Church.

Pieter Langendijk (q.v., 1683-1756), the ingenious and prolific composer of several comedies which often approach the farcical, came from a Mennonite family although he did not actually join the brotherhood until his deathbed. His best-known works are those in which he portrays and satirizes the weaknesses of rich, speculating, self-satisfied merchants and their relatives. These works are 't Wederzijds huwelijksbedrog (1712), De Zwetser (1712), Krelis Louwen (1715), De Wiskunstenaars (1715), and De Spiegel der vaderlandsche Kooplieden (1756). From 1722 to his death he lived in Haarlem.

Another literary figure of the 18th century was Christina Leonora de Neufville (1713-81), who composed moralistic-theological observations in metrical form. The two brothers Cornelis and Petrus Loosjes (1723-92 and 1735-1813), both pastors of Mennonite churches with final pastorates in Haarlem, founded the rationalistic periodical De Vaderlandsche Letteroefeningen in 1761 (ceased publication December 1876). Other Mennonites were connected with this periodical such as Jeronimo de Vries, Sr. (1776-1853), who was a literary historian and critic and also a member of the A.D.S. (Mennonite General Conference) and a curator of the Seminary in Amsterdam, and the bookseller Jacob Wybrand Yntema (1779-1858), also of Amsterdam, who was for a time publisher and editor of the periodical. Adriaan Loosjes (1761-1818), a son of Petrus Loosjes, a bookseller and publisher of Haarlem after the completion of his theological studies, a friend of the Enlightenment and a poet of moderate ability, is known as the author of a historical novel Maurits Lijnslager (1808), which was widely read both then and later, and which like his earlier work, De Historie van Mejuffrouw Suzanna Bronkhorst, reveals the influence of the novels of Elisabeth Wolff-Bekker. The latter writer, who was a much more gifted, clever, and productive author (1738-1804), preferred, although she was of the Reformed faith and the widow of a pastor of this church, to attend the Mennonite churches with her Mennonite friend and co-worker Agatha (Aagje) Deken (q.v., 1741-1804), who had been reared in the Collegiant orphanage in Amsterdam. Aagje Deken, a faithful Mennonite, composed several hymns for the Haarlem Mennonite Church. After 1777 the two women lived together for a time in De Rijp and Beverwijk, then several years in France, and finally in The Hague.

Govert Klinkhamer (1704-74), of Amsterdam, a moderately gifted poet, published De Kruisgesant, of het Leeven van den Apostel Paulus in 1725. Willem Kops (1724-76), a textile merchant at Haarlem, wrote a number of poems; he was the anonymous author of Leeven van Pieter Langendijk (q.v.). He also published a study on the Dutch rhetoricians, Schets eener geschiedenis der Rederijkeren, and a linguistic study, Oude woorden en spreekwijzen. He also edited some of the poems of Elizabeth Koolaert-Hoofman. Bastiaan Klinkert (1794-1854), a wealthy ship broker of Amsterdam, published a number of epoch-making studies on Shakespeare.

Another writer who should be mentioned was Simon Stijl (1731-1804), a physician in Harlingen, who is noted for the clear and powerful prose style of his historical work, De opkomst en bloei der Vereenigde Nederlanden (1774), and who treats the state of the dramatic arts and literature of his time in his biography of an actor, Leven van Jan Punt (1781). Because of his distaste for all churchly connections and his urge toward unconditional independence, he never joined a church, although he belonged to a Mennonite family. Further there is the Amsterdam merchant and city historian Jan Wagenaar (1709-73). The Harlingen pastor Johannes Stinstra (1708-90), who was deposed from his office for many years because of his Socinian views, devoted himself to the translation of Richardson's novels. A number of other well-known Mennonites had connections with the literature of the time either as linguists or as critics, such as the philologist Matthys Siegenbeek (q.v., 1774-1854), pastor in Dokkum where he brought about the union of Mennonites and Remonstrants, after 1797 professor of the Dutch language and literature at the University of Leiden. Siegenbeek's successor, Matthias de Vries (1820-92), was also a Mennonite. Siegenbeek and de Vries were the creators of a new Dutch orthography. Anthony Winkler Prins (q.v., 1817-1908), a Mennonite pastor in Tjalleberd and Veendam, a Freemason and widely known as the editor of a widely used Dutch encyclopedia, was a co-worker on the magazine Braga with the Reformed pastor and poet J. J. L. ten Kate, which in 1842-44 published exclusively a sharp and often satirical versified critique of contemporary romantic literature. Also to be named are J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, professor at the University and Mennonite Seminary of Amsterdam (1819-93), P. Leendertz Wzn. (1817-80), pastor in Medemblik, and D. Harting, pastor in Enkhuizen.

In concluding the first part of this survey mention should be made of Simon Gorter (1838-71), a friend of de Hoop Scheffer, pastor in Aalsmeer and Wormerveer, journalist and author of excellent literary essays (Letterkundige Studien, 1871) and novels; Christiaan Nicolaas Wybrands, pastor in Enschedé, author of a history of the Amsterdam stage from 1617 to 1772 (1873), Tooneelstudien (1889), and of a valuable and richly documented study entitled Het Menniste Zusje (Zondagsbode, 1902-3, 1914, second edition); the latter's gifted brother Aemilius Willem Wybrands (1838-86), pastor at Edam, Hoorn, and Leiden and church historian, noted for his research in the ecclesiastical drama of the Middle Ages (1861); the Haarlem pastor and religious poet, Jeronimo de Vries Jr. (q.v. 1838-1915), highly esteemed for his gifts as a preacher; the pastor and author Johannes Dyserinck (1835-1912), who published numerous articles and several books dealing primarily with Dutch writers and artists of the 18th and 19th centuries (Wolff and Deken, Bellamy, Beets, Bosboom-Toussaint, Pierson, Winkler Prins), G. J. Boekenoogen (1870-1930), the author of a study of the portraits of Menno Simons (DB 1916).

Among recent Mennonite authors of short stories, all dealing with Mennonite history, are to be mentioned Pastor Hermanus Schuurmans (1867-1942), author of Van de Oude Garde (1907), Leendert Hansma (q.v., 1861-1940), who published a number of sketches in several issues of the Doopsgezind

Jaarboekje, W. J. Kühler (q.v., 1874-1946), whose fine tales, "Gesprek met Menno" and "Het vrouwtje van Gouda," are found in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen of 1905 and 1907, Herman Bakels (q.v., 1871-1952), who in four papers published in the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen of 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1904, later collected in book form, Het Volk van Menno (1908), well mingled history and fiction, and Pastor R. Schuursma (b. 1870), author of Van Elisabeth, die een bagijntje was (1921). David Tomkins (pen name of J. W. N. le Heux, q.v.) wrote sketches and poems for Dutch periodicals. Some Mennonite pastors, e.g., J. D. van Calcar and Miss W. C. Jolles, published a number of Biblical plays; J. E. Tuininga is the author of a Christmas play. Miss J. E. Kuiper's Bijbel voor de Jeugd (3rd ed., Amsterdam, 1951) is an outstanding work giving the essential Bible content in paraphrasing adapted to adolescents. Note also her Van Gods Geslacht, Karakters uit den Bijbel (Amsterdam, 1926, in collaboration with Prof. Ph. Kohnstamm). Her De Zangers van den Prins (Amsterdam, 1951) is a story for youth from the time of the beginning of the Eighty Years' War.

Pastor Lykele Bonga (1892-1952) published a volume of poems Als Glas in Lood (1938) and Pastor Andries Lucas Broer (b. 1900) three collections: Open Vensters (1929), Langs Uwe wegen (1936), and Er Staat een Ploeg (1942).

2. The Mennonite Theme in Literature. Allusions to the Mennonites and related groups are numerous in the older Dutch literature. They are quite naturally found for the most part in authors of other faiths, and in so far as they were written at the time of the beginnings and first progress of the Anabaptist movement are filled with a great earnestness and seriousness. Among the writers of this type we must mention first of all Dirk Volkertsz Coornhert (q.v., 1522-90), the writer and poet, philosopher and theologian, the socratic-platonic Christian who, although he belonged to the Catholic Church, sought quite independently his own way to the highest truth, and who was the courageous defender of absolute freedom of conscience, whom Kühler calls "the friend and at the same time the enemy of the Anabaptists," and to whom he attaches the title of "the Dutch Sebastian Franck" (Geschiedenis I, 359). In addition to his theological and polemic writings dealing with the new teachings, such as Van de bejaerden Doope, Uytroedinghe van des Verderfs plantinghe (dedicated to Hans de Ries), Van de sendingh der Lutheranen, Swinglianen en Mennonieten (1583), Opperste Goedts nasporinghe, in which he has de Ries appear in a conversation, and his Kleijn-Munster (1590), written against David Joris, he produced also an altogether different type, a satirical dialogue ("samenspraak") entitled Aertzney der sielen (1570), in which the pope, Luther, Calvin, as well as Menno Simons, "de duysterlingh," are subjected to bitter mockery. His friend, the faithful Catholic Hendrick L.zn. Spieghel (1549-1612), mentions Jan van Leiden and Melchior Hofmann in his Kerktwistsjaarlied of 1601. Carel van Mander portrays with deep sympathy the industry, the strict and quiet manner of life, the peacefulness and piety of the Anabaptists, in his Olijf-Bergh. Vondel's verses attached to the pictures of Mennonite preachers have already been mentioned. The very meritorious poet Jan Jansz Starter (1594-1626), whose parents belonged to the little group of Brownists who had fled from England and joined the Waterlander Mennonite church in Amsterdam in 1615, wrote among other lyrical and comic poems (Friesche Lusthof, 1621) the well-known and fetching parody entitled Menniste Vrijagie (courtship), which, however, as A. E. H. Swaen has shown, is an almost literal translation of an English parody on the prudishness of the young Puritan woman (Tijdschr. Mij. v. Ned. Letterk., nr. 16). Jan Zoet (1614-74), the rhyming innkeeper, Collegiant, pietist, chiliast, and later Labadist and polygamist, is more pungent and uncouth in his digs at the Old Frisian Mennonites, whose painful soberness in clothing he attempted to ridicule, perhaps confusing the clothing of the Mennonites with that of the Quakers. In his satire Het groote Vischnet the Mennonites as well as all other ecclesiastical bodies of the time were subjected to attack (zoo quaad te grijpen als een aal).

The highly talented lyric poet Gerbrand Adr.zn. Bredero (1585-1618) refers to the uprising of the Anabaptists in Amsterdam in 1535 in his notable drama Het Moortje (1616), which is characterized by vivid action, ingenious portraiture, and a free use of the vernacular with a rich spicing of all sorts of humorous expressions. The same drama also refers to the supposed weakness of Mennonites for rich food and drink. One of the characters, a young man, mentions among other fine food "een benistekoeck" (Mennonite cake), and at another place a drunken fellow tells of a drinking bout in which he emptied glass after glass of a "beniste boortje," i.e. (according to F. A. Stoett), glasses filled to the brim. These two expressions as well as similar ones are also found in several farces of the same period such as those by Pers, Breughel, and Fokkens. Other farcical pieces mention "Menniste streken," "treken," and "knepen" (tricks and dodges) and "schijnheiligheid" (sanctimoniousness), while Quakers and Labadists suffer the same contumely (Noseman, H. v. Halmael, P. de la Croix). The collected writings of Jeroense (1684), C. Tuinman (1726), and P. J. Harrebomee (1858) contain expressions, phrases, ironical verses, and the like, which attempt to paint pictures of Mennonites in the same unpleasant colors. However, out of the midst of this gay company of authors, for the most part without gifts and often without name, the brilliant Thomas Asselijn (1620-1701) with his well-known trilogy, Jan Klaaz of De gewaande Dienstmaagd (1682), 't Kraambedt of Kandeelmaal van Saartje Jansz (1684), and De Echtscheiding van Jan Klaaz en Saartje Jansz (1685), stands out. The presentation of the first drama with its bubbling humor, its powerful realism, and its living local color was a tremendous success. Great agitation however was occasioned by the abundance of references to Mennonites of various groups, to Collegiants, Socinians, and Quakers, to occurrences in their eventful history, and to all kinds of peculiarities in their faith, their clothing, their manner of life, their speech, and their style of speaking. Trouble was stirred up, particularly by the pointed allusions; which were easily understood by the public, as they were meant to be, to noted persons, families, and business concerns. These persons attacked were so highly indignant and agitated that the magistrate was drawn into the matter and forbade further presentation of the play. The outcome was a bitter battle of pamphleteers. The second and third play in Asselijn's trilogy also contained a multitude of obvious allusions to Mennonite and related themes. On "Thomas Asselijn en De Doopsgezinden" H. W. Meihuizen wrote four papers in Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad IX (1955).

The Amsterdam Anabaptist uprising of 1535 was also the subject of a tragedy by Pieter Adriaensz Codde, Herdopers Anslagh op Amsterdam (1641), which was often performed in the Amsterdam theatre "with great approval."

None of the comedies of Pieter Langendijk (q.v., 1683-1756), who was mentioned above, treats the Mennonites in this fashion, but a poem of his does. It bears the title "Zwitsersche eenvoudigheid, klaagende over de bedorven zeden veeler Doopsgezinden of Weerlooze Christenen," and deals with simple Swiss Mennonite farmers who emigrated from their homeland to the Netherlands in 1711 because of persecution. The Swiss Mennonites are represented as being highly astonished at the great luxury which they found among the rich Mennonite merchants of Amsterdam where they spent a few weeks, particularly the luxury which they observed in their stately homes on the canals.

Similar comments on the same theme, although in a quieter and more sensible tone, are to be found by Justus van Effen in the Hollandsche Spectator (1731-35), a weekly journal treating of various subjects, which was patterned after the English Spectator, also in the later Nederlandsche Spectator (which had Mennonites among its contributors), as well as in other similar periodicals. Of course not all the accusations and condemnations found in the above-mentioned works are to be taken at face value, although not everything dare be assumed to be fiction. All types of life, certainly of churchly and sectarian life, develop ridiculous and obnoxious perversions. However, the various groups were often confused with one another, much to the disadvantage of the better types. Furthermore it must not be forgotten that it was easy for those who were critical to mock and condemn the Mennonites who had always manifested somewhat singular behavior in society because of their semi-isolation, particularly as they gradually came to greater and greater prosperity in the course of the 17th and 18th centuries and gradually at the same time surrendered much of their traditional Mennonite simplicity. But the more the Mennonites mingled with the rest of the population, and the more they secured the same legal privileges and rights, the more they dropped out of the eye of the outside world and the more they lost their attractiveness for literary writers, at least as an object for criticism and satire. In the letters and novels of Elisabeth Wolff and Aagje Deken, particularly in Willem Leevend and Cornelia Wildschut, which reflect the spirit of a later age, the Mennonites are treated in quite a different fashion. Good-natured jokes are made at their expense, or their human weaknesses and foibles are held up in an objective and kindly, often comical, frankness, but at the same time praise and recognition are given for their good qualities. And soon after the death of these two authors who were so kindly disposed toward the Mennonites, the Mennonites disappear out of Dutch literature as an easy prey for the critics.

Although the Dutch Mennonites had been granted equality with the Reformed, partly in 1796 and completely by the constitution of 1848, even in the second half of the 19th century something of the former disrespect for the Mennonites occasionally echoes in the literature, as in the novel Klaasje Zevenster by Jacob van Lennep (1st ed., 1865, IV, p. 74) and in Camera Obscura by Hildebrand (1839).

In the Dutch literature of the 20th century certain periods or persons, particularly of the oldest and preferably of revolutionary Anabaptism, have been treated by Dutch authors. In 1920 P. H. van Moerkerken (1877-1951) wrote his novel Het nieuwe Jeruzalem; Jef Last published Het eerste schip op de Newa (1945); Muus Jacobse (pseudonym of K. H. Heeroma, b. 1909) composed the poems Het Offer des Heeren (ca. 1930) and De drie Kooien (1946); J. de Jonge wrote Anna Holmer (1949); Jan Mens wrote a novel on Wendelmoet Claesdochter (q.v.) entitled De witte Vrouw (1952); Ypk fan der Fear (pseudonym of L. Post-Beuckens) published a novel in the Frisian language, De Breugeman komt (Drachten, 1953), of which a translation in Dutch is De bruidegom komt (Baarn, 1956); the book by Paul Dietz, Sterrenzaaisel van Brahma, contains a chapter on Jan van Geelen (q.v.); B. Stroman wrote Obbe Philips, oudste der Dopers (1953); G. J. Hoogwerf wrote De profeet and De zwaardgeesten; and Marja Roc wrote Een koning verleid (The Hague, n.d., 1954). The writers Theun de Vries (b. at Veenwouden, Friesland, 1907) and Jef (Josephus C. F.) Last (b. at The Hague, 1898), both well-known Dutch novelists, are of Mennonite descent, but in their numerous novels they only incidentally deal with Mennonite subjects. H. A. Lunshof wrote a novel on the Mennonite preacher Antony Winkler Prins (q.v.), entitled Leven zonder Demon (Amsterdam, 1950).

Dirk Coster in Verzameld Proza (1927), 182 f., paid attention to the Mennonites in Dutch literature, while the Reformed K. H. Heeroma, now professor of Dutch literature at the University of Groningen, published thorough studies on Mennonite poets.

In 1915 H. P. G. Quack, a noted professor of Amsterdam University, wrote in his engrossing Herinneringen (1915) about the highly esteemed Mennonite family of Jelle Hingst, formerly at Harlingen, later at Amsterdam, whose son Sybrand Jan Hingst (q.v.) was his close friend. H.F.W.J., VDZ.

G. Kalff, Geschiedenis der Nederlandsche Letterkunde (1906-12); J. Prinsen: J. Lzn., Handboek tot de Nederlandsche letterkundige geschiedenis (1916); J. te Winkel, Ontwikkelingsgang der Nederlandsche Letterkunde (1903); Cd. Busken Huet, Het Land van Rembrand (2nd ed., 1886); Kühler, Geschiedenis I, II, and III; Robert Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949); J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, "Onze Martelaarsboeken," in DB 1870; L. Knappert, Van der vaderen lijdensmoed (Geschriftjes t. beh. v. d. Doopsgez. i. d. verstrooiing, No. 23, 1906); K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914); G. J. Boekenoogen, "De portretten van Menno Simons," in DB 1916; S. Cramer, "Bijdrage tot de geschiedenis van ons kerklied," in DB 1900, 1902; idem, "Het eigenhandig laatst adieu van Maeyken Wens aan haar kind," in DB 1904; P. Leendertz, Jr., Het leven van Vondel (1910); G. Kalff, "Vondel's leven," in De Gids, 1896, II; F. A. Stoett, Nederlandsche spreekwoorden, spreekwijzen, uitdrukkingen en gezegden (1901); P. J. Haarebomee, Spreekwoordenboek der Nederlandsche Taal (1858, 1861, 1870); C. Tuinman, De oorsprong en uitlegging van dagelijks gebruikte Nederduitsche spreekwoorden (1726); J. A. Worp, Geschiedenis van het drama en van het tooneel in Nederland (1904); L. A. Rademaker, D. Camphuysen (1898); D. Rzn. Kamphuyzen, Uitgelezen stichtelijke rijmen, met eene inleiding . . . door Dr. J. van Vloten (1861), Klassiek Letterk. Pantheon; D. Rzn. Camphuysen, Bloemlezing uit zijn gedichten, met inleiding door Dr. J. C. van der Does (1934); Th. Asselijn, Jan Klaaz of Gewaande Dienstmaagd, ed. by F. Buitenrust Hettema, N. A. Cramer and K. Poll (1900) (Zwolsche Herdrukken); Algemeen Doopsg. Weekblad, IX (1955), Nos. 18-20, 22; P. van Eeghen and J. Ph. van der Kellen, Het werk van Jan en Caspar Luyken (1905); Jan Luiken, Duitsche Lier, ed. M. Sabbe (Klass. Letterk. Pantheon); Stichtelijke verzen van Jan Luyken, collected and with an introduction by C. B. Hylkema (1904); C. B. Hylkema, "De nieuwlichter Jan Luyken," in De Gids IV, 1904; idem, Reformateurs (1900-2); J. C. van Slee, De Rijnsburger Collegianten (1895); Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan, Verdediging der Doopsgezinden (1699); J. Hartog, "Iets van de publieke openie over de Doopsgezinden in het midden der 18de eeuw," in DB 1867; idem, "Uit het leven van een tijdschrift," in De Gids (1877); idem, De spectatoriale geschriften van 1741-1800 (2nd ed., 1890); L. Knappert, "De Doopsgezinden in den Franschen Tijd," in DB 1912; A. van der Hoeven, Lambert ten Kate (1896); W. Brom-Struick, "Stemonderzoek door Nederlanders," in Tijdschr. der Vereen. v. Nederl. Muziekgeschiedenis XIII, No. 4; P. Langendijk, De Spiegel der Vaderlandsche kooplieden, new edition with notes and introduction (with biography) by C. H. Ph. Meyer, 1929 (Klass. Letterk. Pantheon); M. G. de Boer, "De uitwijking van Zwitsersche Doopsgezinden naar Nederland," in De Zondagsbode, May 29 and October 2, 1932; Jan ten Brink, De roman in brieven (1889); J. Dyserinck, Brieven van Betje Wolff en Aagtje Deken (1904); idem, Hulde aan Betje Wolff (1884); idem, "Van en over Betje Wolff," in De Gids III, 1884; idem, "Wolff en Deken," in De Gids IV 1892; idem, "In de Beemster pastorie," in De Gids I, 1903; H. P. G. Quack, Herinneringen (1915); W. A. P. Smit, "Vondel en zijn Bekering," in Nieuwe Tallgids XXIX (1935); D. Coster, Verzameld Proza (1927); N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (1952); idem, "Wolff en Deken in de kerkelijke situatie van hun tijd," in Boeket voor Betje en Aagje (1954); K. H. Heeroma, Poëzie van de 16de en 17de eeuw (Bibl. der Nederl. Letteren, 1940 and 1950); idem, "Dopers Dichterschap," in Tijdschrift Ned. Taal en Letteren LXVIII, 1 (1950) and Maandblad v. Socialism en Democratie for February 1953; H. F. W. Jeltes, "Mennonites in Dutch Literature," MQR XI (1937) 142-55; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954); T. A. Rompelman, "Lambert ten Kate als Germanist," Mededelingen Kon. Ned. Akad. van Wetensch; 1952, section Letterkunde; ML II, 669-72.

II. Germany, Austria, and Switzerland to 1937. The actual literary discovery of Anabaptism was made in the second half of the 19th century, when research was stirring up a more general interest in Anabaptist problems. The literature dealing with the Mennonites in the first half of the 19th century, whether in the nature of biography or monograph, has the character of personal reaction of the author rather than a general interest in the history and principles of Anabaptism as such. Nevertheless there were earlier literary depositions, though rare.

Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. The oldest literary mention concerns the Anabaptists in Moravia and stems from the pen of one no less important than the author of Simplicius Simplicissimus, Johann Christoph Grimmelshausen (q.v.), and occurs in 1669. In Book V, Chapter 19, Grimmelshausen describes as if he had seen them in person the institutions and the peaceful life of the Hutterian Brethren (q.v). Their puritanical and pious living makes a deep impression on the hero of the novel, but he finally rejects the Hutterite pattern as the solution of his life-problem, especially since he must view these people as heretics. The question arises here, from what source the author derived his knowledge of the Anabaptists. He was never, as far as is known, in Moravia, nor is it possible, as some have suggested, that he became acquainted with them "in the valleys of the Black Forest"; his whole manner of presentation indicates that he must have read about them. The chapter on the Anabaptists in Moravia is a unit in itself, as well as a purely descriptive essay, making the assumption that it is a reproduction, perhaps from memory, appear a fact. For the structural development of the novel the Anabaptist chapter is significant in that it supplies the motivation for the hero's return to religion.

The pleasure in travel incipient in the 18th century, the century of realism; the eye for detail schooled by the great journeys of discovery; and on the other hand, toleration of the Mennonites and their becoming settled—all these factors helped to place their cultural and religious life before a more objective lens than in the Reformation and post-Reformation periods.

Timidly the distinction between the Münsterites and the Mennonites was winning its way to the fore. The chapter "In Reimen kurtz gefasste Ketzer-Geschichte" in Der Alten und Neuen Schwärmer Widdertäufferischer Geist is evidence of this; it presents Menno Simons as a gentle but positive Reformer.

The travel journals of the time offer many references to the Mennonites. The widely read Uffenbach, in Merkwürdige Reisen durch Niedersachsen, Holland und Engelland (1780), mentions the churches of the Amsterdam "Mennists," stressing their simplicity, and (so early) states his opinion that there is no observable difference between their worship and that of the Reformed, "except that they, as is well known, baptize no infants. . . ." With respect he describes the character of the Mennonites as "very clean and inwardly excellent." In Philipp Wilhelm Gercken's Reisen durch Schwaben, Bayern, Parts III and IV, covering the years 1786 and 1788, there is a description of the farm of the hereditary Mennonite leaseholder of the Donnersbergerhof in the Palatinate. Mention must also be made of the Reise nach Danzig by the painter and engraver Chodowiecki (q.v.), although it was originally written in French. It has fixed in word and picture the nature of the Danzig Mennonites as somewhat parsimonious but honest.

We are taken into an altogether different world by the Pietist Jung-Stilling (q.v.) in his Heimweh (1794). Jung-Stilling knows and respects the South German Mennonites. With affection he sketches the life of a Mennonite family in the Palatinate, the cleanliness and industry, and above all the unemotional and unsentimental piety. This Mennonite family the author uses allegorically for the place where the soul is prepared for the struggle of life, and he has thereby correctly caught the significance of the Mennonite character.

Nineteenth Century. The first author who was a personal friend of the Mennonites was the Prussian official and educator Ludwig von Baczko (q.v.). In his Familiengemälde in drei Aufzügen: Die Mennoniten (Königsberg, 1809) he becomes the champion of a small group of people upon whom the verdict still lies which permits certain "liberties" toward them. In opposition to this idea Baczko presents reality, which will shatter all defamation and will bring to victory the selflessness of the Mennonite to aid a thoughtless landowner and his daughter back to the right way. Baczko was the first to write an independent work about the Mennonites. Franz Sonnenfeld published Der Wiedertäufer von Weisskirch (1818), one of his beautiful stories of the people. Weisskirch is an estate in Alsace in the Sundgau, near the French border.

In the case of Jens Jakob Eschels also it was personal contact with Mennonites that produced a living picture. In his Lebensbeschreibung eines alten Seemannes (1835) he catches the commercially correct, but humanly warm tone of the Mennonite mercantile houses in his characterization of the van der Smissens, fathers and sons. Johanna Schopenhauer, the mother of the philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer, in her memoirs makes an entry, brief but objective, of her acquaintance with the Mennonites of Danzig (1842). Julian Heins' Menno Simonis, Ein dramatisches Gedicht (1844) is a slight poetic production (46 pp.) of no literary value, though sympathetic. Agnes von Möller (d. 1879), a teacher in Königsberg, published in 1851 Die Mennoniten, a popular story whose hero was a young Danzig Mennonite who had joined the Prussian army in 1813, the same person as Wildenbruck's Menonit.

It is not until the second half of the 19th century that literary material on the Mennonites grows out of historical reflection. At its beginning stands Achim von Arnim's fragment, Die Kronenwächter (1817), with its romantic historico-philosophic interpretation of the events in Münster as a stage in the purification of the German spirit and the idea of empire. Münster is bound up with the fate of the Empire. The crown is in Münster! Thus the Kronenwächter, had it been completed, would have been the first attempt to emerge from a purely sectarian and polemic judgment of Münster. It was written in anticipation of the results of the work of individual scholars, and produces its fruit intuitively, as literature frequently does.

The invigorating air of a more realistic period, which is beginning to move in Arnim's work, we inhale deeply in the Novelle by Adolf Stern (q.v.), written nine years later, Die Wiedertäufer (1866). Stern stands within the problems of history. The degree of dependence of Anabaptism upon, and its independence from, Münster becomes evident. Stern's work presupposes that of the historian Cornelius (q.v.), whose scholarly presentation of the course of events in Münster in his works is given a psychological and artistic interpretation in the figure of the penitent Bernt Rothmann. The contrast between Rothmann and the other leading figure is used to clarify inherent possibilities in the Münster development, but at the same time to lead in the definite direction of the verdict that Münster and "the other Anabaptists" belong in two different categories. In the penitent Anabaptist Rothmann, Stern has created a unique character.

Between Stern's Novelle and Keller's Ursula (q.v.) not much was published; it consists only of the popular tales of the Alsatian Margarethe Spörlin and a poem by Johann Gabriel von Seidl, Der Wiedertäufer (1876), both historically true to reality. The motif of Seidl's poem is supported by the Martyrs' Mirror. Spörlin knows the Alsatian Mennonites at first hand and pictures their practical charity and moral strength, and has the tolerant reformers of Strasbourg do them justice, decrying the intolerant attitude which entered the city later. The three tales of her Elsässische Lebensbilder (1875), "Das Waldhaus," "Mein Kuckuck," and "Der Heimgang," deal with Anabaptists or Mennonites.

With Gottfried Keller's Ursula (1878) we are taken for the first time into the period of the origin of Anabaptism on Swiss soil. An unlucky star seems to have hovered over the literary interpretation of this part of Anabaptist history; the old biased polemic sources, Bullinger and Kessler, and the overpowering patriotic warrior characteristics of Zwingli control the field. Keller in particular uses as the background of his story only the excrescences occurring in the "fringe areas" of Anabaptism. His heroine Ursula becomes entangled in these aberrations, and demands that her lover, just returned from the Italian wars, also become an Anabaptist. He refuses. At this point reality and fantasy become strangely confused. In this dubious light the incident of the escape from the "Wellenberg" is portrayed. Ursula is finally brought to her senses by the events of the war in which her lover is fighting. She follows him to the battlefield and finds him seriously wounded in the evening after the battle. From now on they live "as worthy members of society." In this Novelle Keller was trying to portray not history, but an idea. Anabaptism, he means to convey, passed away, as it had to, like any transitional phase in any human evolution finding its true nature. This judgment of Anabaptism is meant to represent a judgment on the Christian religion, and not Anabaptism alone. Behind it is the atheistic humanism of Feuerbach. It is a matter of removing the husks from the real character of religion and thus cleansing it of its aberrations (Meumann).

Wilhelm Heinrich Riehl (q.v.) views Anabaptism with more historical truth. In his Novelle Mein Recht (1875) he treats the problem of nonresistance with special understanding; the idea of nonvengeance wins. The author reveals the weight of this problem not only for the historical situation in which it was set, but for the entire wretched world. It can cause one to lose his mind. Very clearly the springs are brought to light from which the moral content of Anabaptism and of non-Anabaptism are built up; Anabaptism lives from the Bible; non-Anabaptism, in spite of its attachment to the church, finds its moral norms in the folk mores. Riehl has left no doubt but that society needs the Bible.

The Mennonites were cited before the forum of a saber-rattling theatrical world by the dramatist Ernst von Wildenbruch (q.v.). His "tragedy" Der Menonit (1882) is a sad play, from the point of view of artistry as well as of content. The deep conviction of nonresistance in the old sense has been turned by Wildenbruch into a theatrical affair of honor, and the Mennonites branded as cowardly traitors. Wildenbruch had no inkling of the meaning of nonresistance; he did not take the pains to examine his characters, or he would not have permitted himself to be swept into such an insult. The "hero" of the drama, who abandons his Mennonitism, staking all on his honor, forgets to save his "honor" as soon as he can exchange it for a petticoat. The author has rendered a poor service both to the concept of honor and to the Mennonites. Gysbert von Vincke (Ein kleines Sündenregister, 1882) has severely criticized the dramatic qualities of the tragedy and has shown that it did not contribute a page of honor to the history of German literature.

The third work of higher quality and a new type on the basis of research is Taylor's Klytia (1883). Klytia is the work of a theologian, and Taylor the pseudonym of Adolf Hausrath (q.v.). His portraiture of Anabaptist character is on the main based on contemporary research, chiefly that of Ludwig Keller, and by his own thought on the philosophy of history creates a peculiar view of Anabaptism, which does not, however, do justice to historical fact. To be sure, his Anabaptist Werner is a religious and moral personality, in pleasant contrast to the theologians involved in disputes, a man of unselfish charity. But in the first place his personality is not developed in the story, but plays the role of an "apparition" in moments of danger; he is the good spirit or bad conscience according to the need. From the literary point of view he is merely a motive. In the second place, he lacks historical effectiveness. He remains an isolated figure. Besides, his aversion to dogma does not, like that of the real Anabaptists, stem from a sound Biblicism, but from the modern antithesis between religion and faith, between dogma and life. He has neither church nor brotherhood behind him. He is therefore seen from the modern point of view of "progressive" Protestantism as opposed to the reactionary forces. The Anabaptist Werner is the handyman of enlightened Deism of the 19th century. Hausrath did not create an ideal historical figure, but rather a historical ideal. Interestingly, Klytia was reprinted at Newton, Kan., in 1929 by the Herald Publishing Co., called the sixth edition, having been run as a serial in Der Herold.

Judging from the literary products, the battle for genuine Anabaptism fluctuates, with more turbulence and indecision than in the research itself. Since Wildenbruch there is no historical thread to follow. Sympathy alternates with antipathy. An exception is found in the presentations that know something of the questions posed by history. Marie Loeper-Hoesella's Der Mattenbauer (1890) follows not long after Wildenbruch; of this story Mannhardt could say it was a vindication of the Mennonites.

A year later Theodor Fontane (q.v.) places the American Mennonites in a rather dubious light in Quitt (1891). The picture, though friendly, is a mixture of truth and fiction. Fontane was never in America. But although the name of the Mennonite settlement, Nogat-Ehre, is his invention, the story is based upon an actual Mennonite community at Darlington, Okla., as Zieglschmid has shown. The Mennonite Hornbostel, who in some respects resembles a Biblical patriarch, through the course into which Fontane has forced the story for the sake of artistic unity, falls into the schism between love and justice when he receives Lehnert, a murderer who has fled to America, into his home, sees through him, finally accepts him into the church, but still refuses him the hand of his daughter. Fontane's moral strength was not adequate to the task of finding a solution. This inadequacy is shared by the Mennonite. At the end Lehnert loses his life in the same manner as the man whom he has killed; then all is "quits." In the novel there are, in confusion, an element of Calvinistic predestination, the idea of justice, and a general sentimentally Christian background. What caused Fontane to intertwine the Mennonites into this "machinery" of fate?

Family recollections and other oral reports must be the source of Bernhardine Schulze-Smidt's acquaintance with the Mennonites; for her knowledge is on the one hand too definite to have been invented, and on the other too inexact to be the result of her own observation. In both stories, Weltkind (1896) and Eiserne Zeit (1898), the protagonist is a physician, so that an inner connection may be safely assumed. The problem, clearly presented, is Mennonitism versus the world or culture, and it cannot be said that the presentation is wrong. For such students really exist, who, having viewed a completely different world, have outgrown the tradition-bound and narrow circles of the paternal homestead, or even become estranged from it. The author does not describe his physician-hero as an apostate, but shows that the Mennonite heritage can retain its effectiveness even under new circumstances. In the deeds of the selfless doctor, who at the same time understands human nature, the moral strength of Mennonitism lives on. Even though the historical basis for the motif of the repudiation in Eiserne Zeit may not be demonstrable, yet there is a great deal of truth in the way the repudiated one finds his church in the end, and may serve another dying man as a priest.

Twentieth Century before World War I. The period 1900-14 produced a series of literary works of the greatest variety. In 1904 a Protestant minister of Württemberg, Wilhelm Stähle, under the pseudonym of Philipp Spiess, wrote a historical novel on the early Anabaptist period of his own country, basing it on the person of the provost Aichelin (q.v.), and titling it Der Reichsprofos. Spiess knows the history and the sources, and in a large measure he does justice to the earnestness of the Anabaptist concept of life. He has an Anabaptist exercise Christian love to his enemy, the monster Aichelin (q.v.). To this extent Spiess considers Anabaptism a legitimate branch of the Reformation. But by having his Anabaptist gradually develop "a quiet attachment to Protestant doctrine," he makes the purely historical effect in this one Anabaptist a principle of negative judgment on Anabaptism in general and fails to recognize the independence of the Anabaptist type.

In Hungerjahr (1907) Heinrich Bechtolsheimer presents a graphic picture of the well-ordered Mennonite farm in the Palatinate or Hesse and of the people who operate a farm of this kind. As Baczko had done long ago, Bechtolsheimer shows how the Mennonite interprets brotherly love—as the act of assistance.

Written from the viewpoint of the established Protestant church, though with an understanding of Anabaptism, are the two books, Die drei Brüder vom Brockhof (1908?) by Peter Cürlis, and Zwei Häuser, zwei Welten (1911) by Ernst Marti. Cürlis takes a portion of the history of the Reformation in the Rhineland and describes the struggle between the creeds as it determines the fate of the three brothers of the Brockhof. The Reformed Church is finally the victor. Anabaptism and Menno Simons are also involved in this conflict. Menno is presented as a congenial person. He, of course, stands somewhat aside; this is stylistically shown by not weaving him into the narrative in person, but by excerpts from his writings as if he were giving a historical report. This stylistic defect is at once also a defect in the inner critique. For according to Cürlis the Reformed Church became the heir of Anabaptism by the adoption of church discipline and in the fate of martyrdom it shared with Anabaptism. Thereby two points of view of the decline of Anabaptism in the Rhineland are stated. But there are still enough other differences remaining between the Reformed and the Anabaptist faith, precisely the decisive ones, which do not fit into this sort of explanation.

Ernst Marti, with his story of Swiss Anabaptists in the Emmental about 1700, treats the inner structure of the two groups, those belonging to the state church and the Anabaptists. He understands both. Not only the socially rooted church-consciousness of the peasant belonging to the large church, but also the brotherhood-consciousness, deriving from the opposition between the kingdom of God and the world of the Mennonite weaver, has its recognized strong points. But they are "two worlds," which can never be united: when the Anabaptist maiden finally receives the ring of her lover from the Sonnenhalde, it is the greeting of one who has died.

Lotte Gubalke's Das Marienbild der Nonne Zeitlose (1911) is a product of phantasy. It presents a modern caricature of Hans Denk. A supernatural libertinism is falsely ascribed to him, of which there is no trace in history. The entire terminology of Denk's language is a clumsy distortion of his deep thoughts into decadent sentimentality.

Ferdinand von Wahlberg's Mennoniten (1912) places the Russian Mennonites near to Tolstoy. It must be called a novel of propaganda even though some of the description is accurate. Out of the problematics of the concept of nonresistance Wahlberg evolves great future tasks for the Mennonites, which become the tasks in behalf of a new humanity. In it "humanity is the mature fruit for which the Mennonites have been the seeds." However flattering it sounds, in this analysis of the problems the future task of the Mennonites is misunderstood. The concept of nonresistance, which with the Anabaptists is obedience to the Scripture, is here harnessed to the secularized idea of pacifism after the model of Tolstoy: an economic utopia.

Taking up the idea of nonresistance and coupling it with the discipline of the ban, Lu Volbehr in Kathrin (1916) treats the spiritual problems of a soul on an unhistorical—and historically impossible—background (the Mennonites had unceremoniously seized possession of some vacant lands!), in which the "laws" of the Mennonites are played against the spiritual attitude, heightened to tragic proportions, of a woman who becomes a Mennonite through marriage. It is at once ridiculous and dangerous, since, written during the war as it was, it might have caused the peculiarities of the Mennonites to create a cleft between them and society—if the sentimentality were not so obvious. It is a counterpart to Wildenbruch's Menonit, where the victim of Mennonite "doctrine" is the man; with Volbehr it is the woman.

After World War II, personal and therefore historical memoirs or sometimes narrative presentation on the basis of personal acquaintance are given in the following works: Herman Sudermann, Bilderbuch meiner Jugend (1922); Elisabeth Bartels, Doch hängt mein ganzes Herz an dir, du kleine Stadt! (1920); Ferdinand Pont, Wir wollten (1921); Agnes Miegel, Geschichten aus Alt-Preussen (1926); Paul Fechter, Das wartende Land (1931); Marie Gallison-Reuter, Aus meinem Leben in zwei Welten (1927).

Sudermann, of Mennonite descent, offers a slightly ironically tinted description of the "sectarians from whom I stem," the religious services in the Elbing-Ellerwald Mennonite church, the somewhat narrow spirit, which, for instance, prohibited the wearing of "white blouses." Sudermann is glad to have outgrown Mennonitism.

The congregation at Friedrichstadt furnishes the subject matter for the books of Elisabeth Bartels and Pont. In the one by Bartels the congregational life is restored by Pastor Neufeld. Impressions of the activities in the city, instruction from the pastor and the stern sisters, the joys of a trip to Hanerau, the estate acquired by the Mannhardt family through marriage with the van der Smissens are recounted. Ferdinand Pont goes back into the history of Friedrichstadt. He shows the hopelessness of the attempts to develop the city. The Mennonite spirit is an unintentional impediment; its oscillation between love of the world and rejection of the world prevents an energetic course of action. Pont is a rationalist; consequently he does not grasp the seriousness of the problem of harmonizing Christianity and culture. Agnes Miegel mentions Mennonite character only casually, but correctly recognizes its solidity. Paul Fechter's strongly realistic style of description, like Sudermann's, portrays usually the accidental traits of character. His Elbing Mennonites are presented in their domesticity and in their jargon, to be sure; but on the whole they are not very clearly seen.

In his historical novel of propaganda, Albrecht Dürer, ein deutscher Heiland (1924), Hermann Kosel deals with the conflict with the "ungodly painters," and thus also comes to speak of Hans Denk. According to Kosel, Denk is the originator of all evil, a "phantast and inciter." This designation sounds very strange, coming from the mouth of a man whose conception of Christianity is far more "phantastic" than the faithful attainment of faith through self-discipline in Hans Denk.

The Zwingli memorial year, 1931, brought forth several novels about Zwingli. The forerunner of these was Wilhelm Schäfer's Zwingli-Volksbuch (1926). The poet's intention to make Zwingli prominent prevents the artistic utilization of the results of modern research on Anabaptism; the ancient picture of the Anabaptists is instead restored. In his careless simplification of events Schäfer makes use of Anabaptism as a foil for Zwingli's sound sense. The Anabaptists are pictured only in their confused extremes; in Grebel's eyes the fire of fanaticism also glows. The work is based, like Emanuel Stickelberger's Zwingli (1930), on the ancient polemic sources. Stickelberger goes into greater detail, but nevertheless makes Anabaptism into an affair of the beer table and the street rather than an evangelical movement. He assumes a meeting of Grebel and Manz of Zürich with Thomas Müntzer, which has deeply influenced Grebel. This personal contact never existed; the assumed influence of Müntzer is beyond the realm of probability. Stickelberger gives no clue as to the means by which such a planless movement could have had the strength to form a brotherhood and to create an exemplary manner of life.

A peculiar mixture of the deepest sympathetic comprehension of the problem and the worst selection of material is found in Ludwig Huna's Kampf um Gott, ein Roman aus der Zeit der Wiedertäufer (1923). Huna takes the reader into the midst of the ferment in Reformation times, into the process of the rise of the creeds. The scene is chiefly Hesse and Münster; the leading characters are Philip of Hesse on the one hand, and Balser, the disciple of Denk, and his wife Lukardis, on the other. The theme is toleration. Its champions are the Anabaptists and Philip, who is under their influence. The Anabaptist movement is viewed in its historical results. Denk's line of thought is on the whole repeated correctly; the readiness of the Anabaptists to sacrifice is nicely portrayed. The distinction between them and the Münsterites is clearly brought out. Denk's disciple wants to save Münster and makes a strenuous effort to do so. He tells the Münsterites that their sin exceeds all papist and Lutheran sins. But the book has a flaw; Huna completely overlooks the fundamentally Biblicistic character of Anabaptism. Instead he makes Denk the decisive figure. This is unhistorical. There is propaganda in this evaluation. It is clearly expressed in Philip's becoming the forerunner of the concept of a free and democratic state; for so Huna interprets Denk and places him as a statesman into his world. The toleration of these Anabaptists with their freedom of religion and conscience is only a stage on the road of the progressive evolution of the birth of the "real" person, until finally "spirit and faith are mightier than the will of the prince." The book bears the stamp of its time. The state finally enters into the inheritance of the church, as the "amen" at the end of Philip's address is spoken not by the theologians but by the secular chancellor.

A very different spirit permeates Wilhelmus von Nassauen (1932?) by Wilhelm Kotzde-Kottenroth. It is of the people. The Netherlands with inexpressible sacrifice are in the throes of their struggle with Spain. In the enormous sea of blood that flowed there, the fate of the Anabaptists is only a droplet. But even this droplet is a testimonial of evangelical confession. It is thus that the author sees the Mennonites, "whom the Frisian Menno Simons had won with his gentle teaching." As the example of a Mennonite whose father had been burned at the stake is to show, the Dutch abandoned nonresistance in the horror of the age and because of insight into the process of growth as a nation (Volk).

To the extent that Werner Kortwich's Friesennot (1935) applies to the Russian Mennonites at all—the story claims to deal with them—the problem of nonresistance is again unfolded, but is diverted into the special case of obedience to a Bolshevik government. The background of the story is unhistorical; the course of events is unhistorical. With his alternative, "Bible or gun!" the argument is directed against Christianity in general, although it is not intended to be so pointed, for that would mean that Christianity would be shattered by the question of nonresistance. But it is clear that this argumentation is not developed from the idea of nonresistance so much as out of the aggressive Christianity of the opponent to the leader of the settlement. The author's concept of Christianity bears features of bias. The steadfastness of the leader who, as long as he does not have the most valid reason for interfering, controls himself out of obedience, acquires an aura of weakness as over against the attitude of the other. In reality the continuing fanatical challenge is as unnatural as it is unnecessary; for the leader is also capable of action. No Lutheran Christian would have shot down the band at once, but only when it was necessary. And so the fundamental idea, to show that the Christian has no alternative in his attitude toward Bolshevism than to take a gun, is not clearly developed. There is a lack of ability to show Bolshevism as it is; the subject matter of the story is merely an incident of undisciplined soldiery, and the action an episode. Friesennot was also made into a commercial motion picture in Germany.

A different approach to the problem is made by Alexander Schwarz in his book, In Wologdas weissen Wäldern (1934). (Alexander Schwarz is the pseudonym of Hans Harder.) From the lines of this book somewhat suggestive of a diary, we see the true face of Bolshevism, the inhuman systematic brutality, and the satanic hate against all who believe in God. The reader feels as if he were standing on the verge of an abyss. Madness lies beyond. And yet God lives. This is the experience of these Christians, these Mennonites. Only in one respect is its characterization too "literary": in the way the young Mennonite students parry fate with sarcasm.

The Mennonite refugee camp at Mölln (1930) also found its novelist in Ernst Behrends. All the strength of conquering obstacles which he has observed in these people Behrends concentrated in the figure of Beata (1935). To be sure, the conflict which he experiences—a deeply conceived problem of marriage—is a romantic conception, but it is kept within the framework of faith and is a real problem and thus becomes an experience of reality. This same genuineness characterizes also those aspects of the story which the author had not himself personally observed, especially the Mennonite settlements in Russia. In no previous work have the Mennonite principles, as they deviate from the Lutheran creed, been presented so impartially and with so little distortion as here. In this respect Beata is a modest foundation stone in the understanding of the una sancta.

The migrations of the Mennonites from Russia have also revealed some significance for the Germans in other countries. This is a new point of view. It was used the first time by Maria Veronika Rubatscher in her novel Das lutherische Joggele (1936), significantly called in the subtitle "a novel out of the martyrbook of the German soul." One might think that the Anabaptism of Tirol, that most unfortunate of all Anabaptist groups, has found its singer. With loyalty to the sources their fate is related, historically attested characters appear; in the sparse strokes with which the life of the brotherhood is fixed, a sure historical line has been drawn and the effect of the life of the Anabaptists upon the people receives due consideration. But in the epic flow of the narrative there are cliffs. The standpoint of the author as representing "Auslandsdeutschtum" makes her treat Anabaptism first as a German popular movement and only secondly an evangelical movement. The Anabaptists are the religious reaction against the estrangement of the German populace from church politics. Therefore the reason for the existence of Anabaptism is not given full consideration. The reasons for the terrible persecution by the church remain completely unclarified. Like the burning of witches the persecution of Anabaptists is a part of the tragedy of the life of the German spirit. This is an evasion of the bare facts. In the second place, the Anabaptist heritage in Tirol is won by the "Old Church, eternally victorious." The hero of the novel finally joins the saints as a saint in the popular faith. The historical process of the disappearance of Anabaptism from Tirol is only apparently given. The silence on the actual reason for the extermination as a fault of the church, in connection with the other idea of the popular character of the movement, makes room for a clever interpretation: the church had managed to create a substitute for the specific religious needs which were met in Anabaptism, and thus has in the end incorporated this "popular movement." In a similar manner the church also absorbs the nationality of the people with their customs and powers; the natural piety of the heart with the "paganism still in its blood" which is portrayed here is no compliment for the Deutschgläubige," but only a requisition of the anima naturaliter christiana for the church (Roman Catholic). The book is the product of a Catholic who loves Germany. But in spite of good foundations Anabaptism does not receive due justice. O.S.

Johann Christoph Grimmelshausen, Der abenteuerliche Simplicissimus (Montbéliard, 1669); Anabaptisticum et enthusiasticum Pantheon (1712); Daniel Chodowiecki, Reise nach Danzig 1773 (first ed. French, German ed. in 1923); Zacharias Conrad von Uffenbach, Merkwürdige Reisen durch Niedersachsen, Holland und Engelland III (1780) tells of Balthasar Denner; Philipp Wilhelm Gercken, Reisen durch Schwaben, Bayern III, IV (1786-88) tells of the Donnersberghof; Johann Heinrich Jung-Stilling, Das Heimweh (Marburg, 1794); Ludwig v. Baczko, Die Mennoniten: Ein Familiengemälde in 3 Aufzügen (Königsberg, 1809); Franz Sonnenfeld, Der Wiedertäufer von Weisskirch (1818); Achim von Arnim, Die Kronenwächter (Berlin, 1817), dramatized in 1844; Jens Jacob Eschels, Lebensbeschreibung eines alten Seemannes (Altona, 1835); Johanna Schopenhauer, Jugendleben und Wanderbilder (Braunschweig, 1842); Julian Heins, Menno Simonis (Danzig, 1844); K. J. Clementi, Reise durch Friesland, Holland, . . . (Kiel, 1847); Adolf Stern, Die Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1866); Margarethe Spörlin, Elsässische Lebensbilder (Basel, 1875); Johann Gabriel von Seidl, Der Wiedertäufer (Vienna, 1876 ff.); Gottfried Keller, Urusla (Zürich, 1878); Wilhelm Heinrich Riehl, Mein Recht (1875) (Stuttgart, 1880); Ernst v. Wildenbruch, Der Menonit (Berlin, 1882); George Taylor (Adolf Hausrath), Klytia (Leipzig, 1883); Gisbert Vincke, Ein kleines Sünden-Register (Freiburg, 1883); Natalie von Stackelberg, Aus Carmen Sylvas Leben (Heidelberg, 1886), tells of Karl Harder; Die alte Lehmann, Phantasien einer alten Danzigerin (Danzig, 1886); Samuel Keller, Sein Erbe (Meiringen and Leipzig, 1889); Marie Loeper-Hoesella, Der Mattenbauer (Gera, 1890); Theodor Fontane, Quitt (Berlin, 1891); Bernhardine Schulze-Smidt, Weltkind, eine Idylle aus dem Rheingau (Bielefeld, 1896); Berend Goos, Erinnerungen aus meiner Jugend (Hamburg, 1896-97); Bernhardine Schulze-Smidt, Eiserne Zeit, Familiengeschichte aus den Befreiungskriegen (Bielefeld, 1898); Emma Dina Hertz, Die Urgrosseltern Beets (Hamburg, 1899); Philipp Spiess (Wilhelm Stähle), Der Reichsprofos (Heilbronn, 1904); H. S. Burrage, Getreu bis in den Tod (translated from the English) (Kassel, 1905); Berend Goos, Erinnerungen aus meiner Jugend, Auswahl (Hamburg, 1907); Heinrich Bechtolsheimer, Das Hungerjahr (Wiesbaden, 1907); Peter Cürlis, Die drei Brüder vom Brockhof (Neukirchen, n.d., ca. 1908); Carmen Sylva, Mein Penatenwinkel I (Stuttgart, 1908); Lotte Gubalke, Das Marienbild der Nonne Zeitlose (Stuttgart, 1911); Ernst Marti, Zwei Häuser, zwei Welten (Frauenfeld, 1911); Ferdinand v. Wahlberg, Mennoniten (Vienna, 1912); Lu Volbehr, Kathrin (n.p., 1916); Rudolf Stratz, Du reichst mir deine Hand (Stuttgart, 1920), treats Russian Mennonites; Elisabeth Bartels, Doch hängt mein ganzes Herz an dir, du kleine Stadt (Hermannsburg, 1920); Ferdinand Pont, Wir wollten (Erlangen, 1921); Hermann Sudermann, Bilderbuch meiner Jugend (Stuttgart, 1922); Agnes Miegel, Geschichten aus Alt-Preussen (Jena, 1926); idem, Kinderland (Leipzig, n.d.); Hermann C. Kosel, Albrecht Dürer, ein deutscher Heiland (Stuttgart, 1923-24); Wilhelm Schäfer, Huldreich Zwingli (Munich, 1926); Marie Gallison-Reuter, Aus meinem Leben in zwei Welten (Kaiserswerth, 1927); Anita Iden-Zeller, Wo ich in Kanada Romantik fand (in Reclams Universum); Mathilde Jung, "Rund um den Donnersberg" in Die Pfalz am Rhein (ca. 1930); August Becker, Die Pfalz und die Pfälzer; Friedrich Blaul, Träume und Schäume vom Rhein, aus den Papieren eines Müden (reprinted, Kaiserslautern, 1923); Emanuel Stickelberger, Zwingli (Stuttgart, 1930); Ernst Müller, Sonne über dem See (1931); Paul Fechter, Das wartende Land (Stuttgart and Berlin, 1931); Ludwig Huna, Der Kampf um Gott (Leipzig, 1931); Wilhelm Kotzde-Kottenrodt, Wilhelmus von Nassauen (Stuttgart, ca. 1932), tells of Dutch Anabaptists under Alba; Werner Kortwich, Friesennot (Leipzig, 1935); Ernst Behrends, Beata (Heilbronn, 1935); Alexander Schwarz (Hans Harder), In Wologdas weissen Wäldern, ein Buch aus dem bolschewistischen Bann (Altona n.d.-1935); Marie Gerbrandt, "Die alte Liese," in Ostdeutsche Monatshefte, 1935; Maria Veronika Rubatscher, Das lutherische Joggele (Heilbronn, 1936); J. Ellenberger, Bilder aus dem Pilgerleben, 3 vv. (1878-83); David Krehbiel, Religiöse Gedichte (Landau, n.d.); Jakob Landes, Licht im Fensterlein, Gedichte und Lieder (Karlsruhe, 1925); Elsa Löwenberg, Gedichte.

Critical discussions: Hedwig Meumann, Entstehung und Aufbau von Gottfried Kellers Ursula (Bonn, 1916, dissertation); Harry Maync, "Theodor Fontane," in Deutsche Dichter (Frauenfeld, 1928); E. Petzet, Briefwechsel zwischen Theodor Fontane und Paul Heyse (Berlin, 1929); Albert Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit (20th ed., Berlin, 1928); F. Ostarhild on F. v. Wahlberg in Die evangelische Diaspora, 1936; E. Ermatinger, Weltdeutung in Grimmelshausens Simplizissimus (Leipzig, 1925); H. G. Mannhardt, "Die Mennoniten in der dramatischen Literatur," in Jahrbuch der Mennoniten-Gemeinden für West- und Ostpreussen (Danzig, 1883); Chr. Neff, "Die Mennoniten in der Literatur," in Mennonitisches Gemeindeblatt für Oesterreich, 1913 (Lemberg, 1913); Otto Schowalter, "Die Mennoniten in der allgemeinen deutschen Literatur. Bibliographie," in Beiträge zur Geschichte der Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1938) 83-88; Elizabeth Horsch Bender, "Mennonites in German Literature" (unpublished master's thesis, University of Minnesota, 1944); the following articles by Mrs. Bender in MQR: "The Portrayal of the Swiss Anabaptists in Gottfried Keller's Ursula" (XVII, 1943, 136-50); "Ernst von Wildenbruch's Drama, Der Menonit" (XVIII, 1944, 22-35); "The Anabaptist Novellettes of Adolf Stern and Wilhelm Heinrich Riehl" (XVIII, 1944, 174-85); "Jung-Stilling and the Mennonites" (XX, 1946, 91-97); Ernst Correll, "Theodor Fontane's Quitt," MQR XVI (1942) 221 f.; A. J. F. Ziegler, "Truth and Fiction and Mennonites in the Second Part of Theodore Fontane's Novel Quitt: The Indian Territory," MQR XVI (1942) 223-46; ML II, 667-69.

III. Germany, Austria, and Switzerland, 1937-57. Since 1936, the date of the last work in the previous article, the Anabaptist theme has been used in numerous works, including several by major authors. In 1937 Ricarda Huch, a gifted and versatile author, included an unusually understanding treatment of the Anabaptists in her belletristic history, Das Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung. In the same year E. G. Kolbenheyer's three volume fictionized biography of Paracelsus was published in which he also discussed the Anabaptists with understanding. In 1939 Lulu von Strauss und Torney, a writer of high quality, whose work springs to a large extent from a love for her native Westphalia and its history, wrote a novel entitled Der jüngste Tag, which is generally considered her best work. In it one of the major characters is a mentally ill Westphalian weaver, inspired to prophecy by the Münsterites, who is accused of setting fire to a village when the millennium does not come on the date he has predicted, and is stoned to death. It is a fine character study.

David Joris is the subject of one novel, written by Rudolph Stickelberger, editor of the Lucerne (Switzerland) Neue Nachrichten. Stickelberger entitled his story "Schwarmgeister," and published it with a biography of Bernhardin von Ochino in a volume called Narren Gottes (1945). The only purpose of the book appears to be entertainment, and Stickelberger distorts the facts of Joris' life to increase its entertainment value. He considers the followers of Joris to be Anabaptists per se, and all Anabaptists to be unbalanced "Schwarmgeister."

One novel and one Novelle having as their theme the Dutch-North German Anabaptists have appeared since World War II. Neither has much literary value. The novel, Heinrich Specht's Heil'ge Feuer (n.d.), was written during the war. Based on the Reformation legend of Anna Holmer, which Arnold Fokke put into writing in Dutch in 1876, it treats Münster, the North German Anabaptists, and political conflict on the Frisian-German border. The Novelle is "Die Geburt der Liebe," a romanticized story of Menno Simons by the popular former Swiss author and Hollywood director Hans Müller-Einigen, which makes Menno out to be a champion of 19th-century religious liberalism. It is published with two other historical Novellen in a volume entitled Die Menschen sind alle gleich (1946).

The Swiss-South German Anabaptists appear in fiction more frequently than does the Dutch-North German group. In his biography of Sebastian Franck, entitled Sebastian (1952), Hans Franck, a good writer, treats Hans Denk and the Nürnberg Anabaptists associated with the "gottlose Maler" ("the ungodly artists"). His work is based on inaccurate sources, such as Will-Erich Peuckert, and although he is sympathetic with the Anabaptists and portrays them as redeeming some weaknesses of the state church, he dismisses them ultimately as "Schwärmer." He gives no indication of understanding that there is an Anabaptism different from the mystic fanaticism which he pictures in Nürnberg.

A large proportion of the writers interested in Anabaptism at the present time are Swiss. In 1945 Erich Diebold, a Swiss journalist, wrote a novel on the Anabaptists of the canton of Zürich entitled Folge dem Licht. It is a poorly written book, lacking as much in historical understanding as in depth of character portrayal and convincing plot development. The author's thesis seems to be that the Anabaptists had excellent ideas, of which he mentions "conversion to righteousness and brotherly love, self-denial, and discipleship to Christ" (Foreword, 8), but that they were wrong in trying to overthrow the existing government (as he maintains they did) in order to introduce those ideas by force into a society not yet ready for them.

Two Swiss dramas of unequal value, Caesar von Arx's Brüder in Christo (1947), and Heinrich Künzi's Barbara (1948), were published almost simultaneously. Barbara, a Bernese dialect drama produced by the Berner Heimatschutz Theater, portrays an Anabaptist girl who clings firmly to her faith in the face of persecution by church and state. It is pro-Anabaptist; the love and strength of Barbara put her accusers to shame. The play has dramatic weaknesses and errors in historical interpretation, especially in the final act, in which the Anabaptists escape en masse to the Jura Mountains. The drama by von Arx, on the contrary, is a tragedy strong from the standpoints of both idea and execution. Its hero, Zürich city councillor Falk, a friend of Zwingli, becomes convinced of the correctness of the Anabaptist position, but because of a chain of tragic circumstances considers himself unworthy of becoming an Anabaptist and thus remains in the state church, his sensitive spirit broken because he does so. Von Arx treats this genuinely tragic motif not only with penetrating understanding of the human problem involved, but also with astounding insight into the nature of Anabaptism as well as of the Reformed tradition, and he portrays the essential conflict between the two with magnificent clarity. His knowledge of the historical setting is also exceptionally good. Von Arx, whose works are primarily historical tragedies of the nature of Brüder in Christo, is generally considered to be Switzerland's leading modern dramatist, and Brüder in Christo is probably his best. It is also possibly the best literary production ever written with an Anabaptist or Mennonite theme.

Willi Schäferdiek's Rebell in Christo (1953), which has Thomas Müntzer as its hero, incidentally brings the Zürich Anabaptists (Grebel and Manz) into contact with Müntzer, erroneously of course, since the movement had no connection with Müntzer or the Peasants Revolt. The representation of the Anabaptists is sympathetic, apparently based largely on Grebel's letter to Müntzer. He also brings Hans Denk into his story. Schäferdiek was for some time dramatic director of the Berlin radio, and is a leading German author.

Only five works appearing after 1935 use the later Mennonite theme. They are all novels. Walther Laedrach's Passion in Bern (1938) is a sympathetic and historically accurate novel based on the persecution of the Bernese Anabaptists in the first two decades of the 18th century. Der Frondeur (1945), an excellent novel in the Bernese dialect by Rudolf van Tavel, an outstanding Swiss novelist, discusses incidentally the Mennonites of the Emmental after the Thirty Years' War. The last of the major novels on the Mennonites is Eva Caskel's Marguerite Valmore (1948), the story of a French emigré's entrance into the Mennonite community at Danzig during the time of the French Revolution. One of Ilse Schreiber's novels on Canada, Vielerlei Heimat unter dem Himmel (1949), has as its main theme the Russian Mennonite emigrants to Canada. A second, Canada, Welt des Weizens (1951), mentions them incidentally.

Among the South German Mennonites several short story writers have appeared, whose tales have been published chiefly in the Christlicher (Mennonitischer) Gemeinde-Kalender, particularly Mathias Pohl (1860-1934), long pastor in Sembach (Palatinate), who also published religious verse, Martha Händiges, the wife of Pastor E. Händiges, now at Enkenbach (Palatinate), and Charlotte Hofmann-Hege. The Gemeinde-Kalender has also carried some religious verse by Pastor Gerhard Hein of Sembach. M.E.B.

Ricarda Huch, Das Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung (Berlin, 1937); E. G. Kolbenheyer, Paracelsus, 3 vv. (Munich, 1937); Walter Laedrach, Passion in Bern; ein Täuferroman um den Schultheissen Johann Friedrich Willading (Zürich, 1938); Lulu von Strauss und Torney, Der jüngste Tag (Jena, 1939); Erich Diebold, Folge dem Licht (Zürich, 1945); Rudolf Stickelberger, Narren Gottes (Zürich, 1945); Rudolf von Tavel, Der Frondeur (Bern, 1945); Hans Müller-Einigen, Die Menschen sind alle gleich (Bern, 1946); Friedrich Reck-Malleczewen, Bockelson; Geschichte eines Massenwahns (Berlin, 1946); Caesar von Arx, Brüder in Christo (Zürich, 1947); Friedrich Dürrenmatt, Es steht geschrieben (Basel, 1947); Heinrich Specht, Heil'ge Feuer (Nordhorn, n.d.); Eva Caskel, Marguerite Valmore (Hamburg, 1948); Heinrich Künzi, Barbara (Bern, 1948); Erich Müller-Gangloff, Vorläufer des Anti-Christ (Berlin, 1948); Ilse Schreiber, Vielerlei Heimat unter dem Himmel (Hamburg, 1949); idem, Canada, Welt des Weizens (Munich, 1951); Hans Franck, Sebastian (Gütersloh, 1952); Willi Schäferdiek, Rebell in Christo (Hattingen; 1953); Helmut Paulus, Die tönernen Füsse (Antwerp, 1954); Franz Theodor Csokor, Der Schlüssel zum Abgrund (Hamburg, 1955).

IV. Germany: The Münster Theme. Until the late 18th century the only significant mention of the Anabaptists occurs in some contemporary didactic and satirical poems. Understandably, the period of storm and stress found the Münster theme attractive, and in the last 25 years of the 18th century three dramas on the Münster rebellion, all of poor quality, appeared in Germany. In 1777 Christoph Bernhard Schücking, an uncle of the noted Levin Schücking and himself a citizen of Münster, wrote a drama on Elizabeth Wandscherer, Bockelson's wife, entitled Elisabeth (Münster). Although the drama is freighted with excesses, which are explained not only by the period in which it was written but also by the youth of the author, and although it lacks any finished artistry, it foreshadows the presentation of personality conflict in Jan of Leyden as tragedy which is more fully developed in later works. In his Jan von Laiden (Münster, 1786) Baron von Nesselrode senses the dramatic possibilities in the Münster episode, although his characters behave with too much flattering dramatic nobility to be in good taste. A drama by Christian August Vulpius (Goethe's brother-in-law), Johann von Leiden (Leipzig, 1793), portrays von Leyden as a titan.

In 19th-century Germany the Münsterites appear as a literary theme with relative frequency, and their treatment is adapted to the century's changing moods. The only work of literary value to mention them, however, is Achim von Arnim's romantic novel Die Kronenwächter (Berlin, 1817). Arnim places the imperial crown in Münster, and considers the Münster episode a positive step in the development of the German concept of empire. Despite his fantastic main theme, Arnim strives for historical accuracy of detail and may well have set the trend, growing especially in the second half of the century, toward greater historical objectivity regarding the Anabaptists.

As a result of the 19th-century interest in historical fiction, five historical novels on the Münsterites, all distinctly inferior from a literary point of view, appeared in the first half of the century. Van der Velde's Die Wiedertäufer (1821; Leipzig, 1851) is a superficial bit of entertainment literature. Under the influence of the English Romanticist Walter Scott, Karl Spindler, in Der König von Zion (1834; Stuttgart, 1854), the novel which more than any other awakened the interest of the Germans in the Münster episode, attempts to view the characters of his story in the light of their historical situation. He does not really succeed, however, since he considers all Münsterites to be either evil or insane and has no insight into the tensions of the Reformation reflected in Münster. Adolf Görling, in Die Wiedertäufer, attempts to give a picture of the entire Reformation. The fifth work is J. D. Mallmann's Johann von Leyden, Eine Geschichte fürs Volk (1844). Meyerbeer's opera, Le Prophète (1845), in which Jan of Leyden, the hero, is praised and his failure blamed on "the times," strongly affected the German attitude toward the Münsterites in its German translation (1846). The text of the opera was by Scribe.

Five works on Münster appeared in the third quarter of the 19th century. In 1854 Adolf Mützelburg published (at Berlin) Der Prophet, a novel of 1,100 pages based to a large extent on Spindler's work. Johann von Leyden (Münster, 1855) by Heinrich Brinckmann is a meaningless drama in blank verse. In his long and once popular poem, Der König von Zion (Hamburg, 1868), Robert Hamerling, an active promoter of German democracy, makes Leyden a representative of modern social problems, a champion of freedom. The influence of Hebbel is shown in Ernst Mevert's drama, Der König von Münster (Hamburg, 1869), in that Leyden's downfall is attributed to the fact that he is not in line with the "general laws of events in the world." Mevert is the first to exploit to any real extent the tragic potential in Münster, and Hugo Hermsen considers his to be the best of the 19th-century dramas on the Anabaptists. Ludwig Schneegans, in Jan Bockhold (Munich, 1877), sees Leyden as an emotionally sick man. Also in 1877 (Bielefeld and Leipzig) Rudolf Weber published an exceedingly poor historical novel, Die Wiedertäufer von Münster, borrowed mostly from Mützelburg.

During the last quarter of the century, the Münsterites receive only programmatic treatment. Herman Tiemann's novel, Die Wiedertäufer in Münster (Braunschweig, 1892), is a Victorian warning to the German people not to abandon the traditional virtues. Tiemann tried to interpret Jan of Leyden psychologically, but he could not comprehend the spirit of the Reformation and succeeded only in comparing him with enthusiasts of his own time. The politically fraught atmosphere of the era in which he wrote is evident in his attempt to make the naive Münsterites represent sophisticated political ideas, an attempt which of course fails. Victor Hardung's drama, Die Wiedertäufer in Münster (Glarus, 1895), is a naturalistic picture of "the baseness of the great human rabble" (die Niederträchtigkeit des grossen menschlichen Gesindels), paradoxically in verse, which is completely unsuccessful in its attempt to create in Jan a tragic hero. Hardung calls his characters "cattle" (Viecher). Two equally unsuccessful works were written by A. J. Cüppers: a drama, Der König von Sion (Berlin, 1900), so weak from both dramatic and psychological standpoints that it was never performed, and a historical novel, Im Banne der Wiedertäufer (Berlin, 1892).

The 20th century produced a remarkable number of works, both novels and dramas, using the Münster theme. The first was Hans Hartmann's drama, Von Krone und Ehre (Strasbourg, n.d.—1914). In 1915 Wilhelm Schmidtbonn, depressed because of the war, wrote his rather raw drama on Münster, entitled Die Stadt der Besessenen. Jan Freimark's novel, Johann von Leiden (Berlin, 1919), is worthy only of mention. Das Tausendjährige Reich by Hermann Rehm (Rothenfelde, 1925) is a revision of Spindler's novel. In 1935 Bernhard Kellermann wrote a drama on Münster, Die Wiedertäufer (Berlin), which is fairly similar to Schmidtbonn's. His interest in the Anabaptists, however, comes from a rather romantic fascination with the long ago and the far way, coupled with an interest in social problems. Der König im Käfig by Ludwig Webmann (Münster, 1935) is a short novel of no consequence. Although it was published with the help of societies interested in Westphalian history and culture, it exploits the sensational, is designed to paint the Münster episode in the darkest colors possible, and is little more than an adventure story. The following lesser novels should also be noted: Hugo Strauch, Die tolle Stadt 1926; Eugen von Sass, Johann von Leiden (Dresden, 1930); Josef von Lauff, Elisabeth Wandscherer, die Königin, Scherenschnitt aus der Geschichte der Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1931); Anna von Krane, Die Verfehmten. Roman aus der Wiedertäuferzeit (Köln, 1935); and Käthe Lübbert-Griese, Der Teufel in Münster (Berlin, 1937). Gerhard Hauptmann's intended novel, Die Wiedertäufer, begun in February 1916, remained a fragment of 25 pages, which was published in the Gerhard Hauptmann Jahrbuch I (Breslau, 1936).

Since World War II, three noted contemporary authors, Friedrich Dürrenmatt (Swiss), Franz Theodor Csokor (Austrian), and Helmut Paulus (German), have written major works on the Münsterites. Dürrenmatt, a young Zürich dramatist, has won much acclaim, especially among students, for his experimental dramatic techniques. At its premiere in Zürich Es steht geschrieben (1947), his drama on Münster, which is quite daring technically, was greeted with excitement mingled with catcalls. It combines admiration for the firm faith of the Münsterites and their obedience to it under stress with the realization that this faith was also immeasurably dangerous to its adherents. Dürrenmatt's drama is original in idea as well as in technique. The Austrian Franz Theodor Csokor has gained recognition both as a novelist and as a dramatist. His novel on the Münsterites, Der Schlüssel zum Abgrund (1955), is a serious effort to see the Münster episode as an expression of the turmoil of the Reformation and thus to understand the Reformation itself more fully. However, in spite of moments of insight and artistic power, it is disturbing in its unconvincing exploitation of some of the more sensational tales that have grown up concerning Münster. Helmut Paulus, although not strikingly original in technique or idea, is a master storyteller and a popular author. The motif of his work is didactic; his most common theme is that only a life for others is fruitful. This is the import of Die tönernen Füsse (1954), his novel on the tragic disillusionment caused by the selfishness of Jan of Leyden.

In 1937 Friedrich Reck-Malleczewen, a physician who was a member of the East Prussian aristocracy and who suffered spiritually under the Nazi regime, published a biography of Jan of Leyden which he entitled Bockelson—Geschichte eines Massenwahns (Berlin), and which was intended as a warning to the Germans against the mass hysteria under Hitler. During the war his book was passed from hand to hand in the underground. Reck-Malleczewen himself was executed at Dachau in 1945. His book was republished in 1946, with additional material including a biography by his wife and an introduction by Paul Zöckler. In 1948 Erich Müller-Gangloff, a friend of Reck-Malleczewen, now the director of one of the institutes known as Evangelische Academien in Germany, published a series of sketches of tyrants under the title, Vorläufer des Anti-Christ, which he dedicated to his martyred friend. He includes members of the violent wing of the Anabaptists, especially Bockelson, whose portrait he bases on that of Malleczewen; and he calls the Anabaptists the "Rattenfänger der Reformation." His attempt to find a recurring pattern among tyrants which might aid in an understanding of Hitler is interesting, but his treatment of the Anabaptists is seriously in error. He is unable to distinguish between genuine and spurious Anabaptism, and he maintains that Jan of Leyden denied his position under torture at the end. Following is a typical sentence from his book: "Die Täuferbewegung war ja von vornherein eine weit über die Stadt Münster hinaus verbreitete Erscheinung, die in vielen Landschaften des damaligen Reiches unter der Oberfläche gärte, und explosionsartige Ausbrüche ähnlich dem des Bauernkrieges erwarten liess" (96). M.E.B.

Wilhelm Rauch, Johann van Leyden, der König von Sion, in der deutschen Dichtung (Borna-Leipzig, 1912, 129 pp.); Hugo Hermsen, Die Wiedertäufer zu Münster in der deutschen Dichtung (Stuttgart, 1913, 161 pp.), containing a complete list of all titles published, with bibliographical data.

V. France. In France the Mennonites were practically unknown; hence they are rarely mentioned in French literature, and then only as Anabaptists. In addition to Marquis de Pezay, Michiels, and Grandidier, who are discussed in the article Alsace, Emile Erckmann (d. 1889) and Alexandre Chatrian (d. 1890) used Mennonite subjects. In several novels which they wrote conjointly, especially in L'Ami Fritz, the Mennonites receive mention, though of a superficial kind. They are presented as honest people whose word is reliable; their farms are described as exemplary; there is occasional reference to peculiarity in dress and doctrine.

There are also some essays in travel literature, almanacs, and yearbooks which mention them very favorably. Some of these are Une excursion dans les vosges by A. Benoit (Nancy, 1860) and Turquestein by H. Lepage (Nancy, 1886). Benoit writes of the Mennonites in the White Saar, "They are traditions rather than people. Their meetings held in this house or that in the valley show the severity of their principles. Listen to these psalms and songs in the German language, these sermons, as long as they are monotonous; look at these attentive faces, these serious rites, in which the body of Christ is represented by a loaf of bread which is broken into small strips, and the blood by wine in a plain pitcher; observe the complete absence of church decoration, of all religious show, and tell me whether there is not something great and noble in such a religion, whose adherents have been so hard hit by fate, but who have preserved their old principles as a precious possession in their unshakable entirety."

Voltaire (d. 1778) in his novel Candide (1759) takes his hero through all sorts of incredible adventures around the world. In Holland he meets an Anabaptist, "a man who has not been baptized, a good Anabaptist named Jacques." This "best man in the world" is interested in all the unfortunate and is positively opposed to all violence. He comes to a sudden end in trying to save the life of a man who has previously without any cause given him a terrible beating.

G. Meyerbeer's opera Le Prophète, using the Münster theme, appeared in Paris in 1845.

J. B. Muller, a preacher in the Mennonite congregation at Toul, has been publishing numerous short stories of religious character in Christ Seul, the French Mennonite organ. P.So., H.S.B.

VI. Russia and Russo-German Emigrés. This section treats the literature in the German language by or about the Mennonites living in Russia or as emigrés in Germany, United States, and Canada. With the improvement of education among the Mennonites of Russia a greater interest in literature became noticeable during the second half of the 19th century. Small home and school libraries were started by the turn of the 20th century. Some Mennonite teachers took up writing. Bernhard Harder (q.v.), a well-known minister and evangelist of Russia, wrote many poems for practically every occasion, which were collected and edited by Heinrich Franz, Sr., and published in 1888 under the title Geistliche Lieder und Gelegenheitsgedichte. J. H. Janzen says that Bernhard Harder was "our first significant poet," whose songs breathe "a warm, lifelike piety of the heart out of which joy radiates, many of them having the essence of folk songs." Peter B. Harder (q.v.), a son of Bernhard Harder, also a teacher, was one of the pioneer novelists of the Mennonites of Russia. Best known is the novel Die Lutherische Cousine. In Lose Blätter, a collection of short stories and poems which appeared in 1910 in Aufwärts (q.v.), he portrays Mennonite life in Russia with great ability and power of observation. J. H. Janzen says that because of his writing about Mennonites he "was regarded almost as an outsider," in spite of his being a very good teacher and the son of the widely known and recognized Bernhard Harder. About Lose Blätter Janzen says that they "enjoyed kind reception" although they caused the author much criticism from those who felt exposed.

Heinrich J. Janzen (q.v.), the father of J. H. Janzen, wrote poetry under the title "Erzeugnisse schlafloser Nächte," of which several appeared in H. Dirks' Mennonitisches Jahrbuch (Halbstadt, 1905-13) and some were taken into the Gesangbuch. J. H. Janzen says about his father's poems that he fears "they will never become real folksongs." They have depth and thought but lack elasticity.

J. H. Janzen (q.v.) published his first fiction in the form of short stories under the pseudonym J. Zenian and the title Denn meine Augen haben Deinen Heiland gesehen, Erzählungen von J. Zenian (Halbstadt, n.d., 1910). Two parts of this book were reprinted in Canada in 1925 and 1927 as Du hast Dich meiner Seele herzlich angenommen and Dein Blut. The author states that his book "was reviewed favorably in most German papers of Russia, America, and also Germany." Arnold Dyck, another Mennonite writer, describes vividly in "Jacob H. Janzen—Writer" (Menn. Life, July 1951, 33) what an overwhelming impression this book made on him and others when at last a gifted Mennonite writer wrote about Mennonite life in the form of fiction. J. H. Janzen himself states that he, Martin Fast, and Gerhard Loewen formed a "league of young poets" at that time. Although they could not meet because of distance they sent each other poems and encouraged and criticized each other in chain letters. Gerhard Loewen (q.v.), also a teacher and minister, published a collection of poems under the title

Feldblumen. Arnold Dyck, who republished this volume in North Kildonan, Man., in 1940, says, "His poems are flawless in form and diction. In this category they belong to the best that the pen of our writers has left us." He quotes Linde, the German literary critic, who speaks of his poems as "not being overwhelmingly beautiful but very lovely" (Menn. Life, January 1948, 23). Martin Fast of Muravyevka, Samara, also wrote poems. Unfortunately, little information is available about his life and writings. These were the pioneers of Mennonite fiction and poetry in Russia. Those of the younger generation who were inspired by them produced their writings primarily in Canada.

The Russian Revolution interrupted a phase of cultural development and brought it to a sudden halt. It can be expected that some literature and poetry was produced under Communism but it is too early to make a study of it. Jacob Sudermann, an artist and poet, died in a concentration camp. Signs of literary efforts are found in Unser Blatt published in Russia in 1925-27.

Germany: The sufferings and experiences of 1914 and later produced an unusual crop of young Mennonite writers, most of whom left Russia to settle, at least temporarily, in Germany. Theodor Block published Hungerlieder (Bad Homburg, 1922); A. B. Enns, a book of poems, Die Hütte (Emden, 1924); Dietrich Neufeld, Ein Tagebuch aus dem Reiche des Totentanzes (Emden, 1921; also printed in the United States in English 1930 at Claremont as Russian Dance of Death with the author's pen name Dirk Gora); also by Neufeld are Mennonitentum in der Ukraine (Emden, 1922), and Zu Pferd 1000 km durch die Ukraine (Emden, 1922). His writings reveal literary qualities. Later in Canada he continued along these lines by writing, under the name Novokampus, Kanadische Mennoniten (Winnipeg, 1925). Gerhard Fast's Im Schatten des Todes, Erlebnisbericht aus Sowjetrussland (Wernigerode, 1935) is a moving report, historical in fact, but powerfully and imaginatively written and of high literary quality.

More recently Hans Harder, a teacher in the pedagogical school at Wuppertal, Germany, has devoted a number of novels to the Mennonites of Russia. His In Wologdas weissen Wäldern (Altona, 1934) describes the suffering of the Mennonites of Russia sent to the concentration camps of northern Russia. In Das Dorf an der Wolga (Stuttgart, 1937) he portrays in fiction the beginning, flowering, and decline of a Mennonite village of the Volga area. In his novel Das sibirische Tor (Stuttgart, 1938) he treats the Orenburg Mennonites, portraying the German Mennonite culture in the Russian environment. Die Hungerbrüder (Heilbronn, 1938) is the account of a family of German settlers in Russia, possibly Mennonites, who in the horrors of famine and starvation make their way to the East to escape from Russia. When they cross the river into China only the two boys are left, penniless, and are found by a relief organization, obviously the MCC, and sent to South America. These are the major novels in which he treats Mennonites. Of the many Mennonite writers who have written on the Mennonites of Russia no other has found as much recognition in the German press as Harder, and he is probably the best writer of fiction produced as yet by the Mennonites anywhere. He hopes to complete a cycle of Mennonite novels, which would include the American aspect. Harder's writings rarely mention Mennonites, presenting his characters as Germans, but those who know their background can readily identify it as Mennonite. Other novels by Harder, all with non-Mennonite but Russian themes, are Wie Lukas Holl seine Heimat suchte (1938), Der deutsche Doktor von Moskau (1940), Klim: ein russisches Bauernleben (1940), and Die vier Leiden des Adam Kling (1942).

United States: Among the Mennonite writers who were educated in Russia and came to the United States after World War I and have made significant contributions using the German language is Peter G. Epp (q.v.), whose outstanding novel is Eine Mutter (Bluffton, 1932). He also published Das Wunder (Newton, 1926), Die Erlösung (Bluffton, 1930), Johanna, and Das Geisslein. Several chapters of his large manuscript "An der Molotschna" were published in Der Bote (Rosthern). Epp had an unusual gift for portraying Mennonite culture.

Canada: The Mennonites of Canada who had come from Russia after World War I have been much more productive in the field of literature than the earlier immigrants, whose only significant product was Isaac Friesen's two volumes of religious verse, Im Dienste des Meisters (Constance, Germany, ca. 1910). J. H. Janzen, who came to Canada in 1924, continued his writing and became one of the most productive authors. Of his approximately forty books and booklets published in Canada many are short stories and plays (complete list in Menn. Life, July 1951, p. 42). Well known are his Low German one-act plays, De Bildung (Blumenort, 1912; Waterloo, 1945), De Enbildung (n.p., 1913), Daut Schultebott (n.p., 1913), Utwaundere (n.p., 1931), and his collection of poems Durch Wind und Wellen (Waterloo, 1928). In Wanderndes Volk (3 vols., n.p., 1945-49) the author relates incidents from his family history in fictional form. Tales from Ancient and Recent Mennonite History (1948), his only writing in English, is a popularized and fictionized narrative, a translation of his Erzählungen aus der Mennoniten-Geschichte (1943). Unfortunately in his later years Janzen had to depend on his own mimeograph to spread his writings. The limited editions of his writings, the sale being largely limited to the Mennonite market, made it impossible to have them printed without financial loss.

One of the most significant Canadian writers has been Arnold Dyck, who has written High German as well as Low German fiction and plays. He introduced himself to the Mennonite reading public as the editor of the Mennonitische Warte (1935-38) and of a series of booklets on Russian Mennonite history published by the Echo Verlag (q.v.). During the war he wrote the novel Verloren in der Steppe, which he illustrated himself, and which was published in five volumes (Steinbach, 1944-48). In this story he relates the experiences of Hänschen who was "lost" in the steppes of the Ukraine. Like Peter Epp in Eine Mutter, Dyck succeeds in depicting Mennonite village life and the culture in general in a masterful way. In Meine Deutschlandfahrt (North Kildonan, 1950) the author relates his experiences during a revisit in Germany after World War II, where he finally settled in 1954. However, Dyck will probably remain best remembered for his Low German writings. His two-volume Koop enn Bua op Reise (Steinbach, 1943) has been reprinted repeatedly. This was followed by Dee Millionäa von Kosefeld (Steinbach, 1946) and the two-volume Koop enn Bua faore nao Toronto (North Kildonan, 1948 f.). In Dee Fria (Steinbach, 1947) Dyck presents a Low German one-act play, of which he soon published a new edition with an added twenty-fifth scene. This was followed by two one-act plays dealing with the forestry service program among the Mennonites of Russia, entitled Wellkaom op'e Forstei (North Kildonan, 1950) and De Opnaom (1951). Onse Lied en ola Tiet (Steinbach, 1952) contains a collection of humorous Low German stories and skits. The Low German plays by Dyck have been presented in many Mennonite communities and schools of Canada and the United States and always find a receptive audience.

G. A. Peters wrote a number of books and other prose dealing with the experiences of the Mennonites of the Ukraine during and after the Revolution which are of some literary significance. Among them are Menschenlos in schwerer Zeit (Scottdale, 1924?), and Wehrlos? (Scottdale, 1924?). He also published two volumes of his poems, entitled Gedichte I, II (Scottdale, 1924?). G. H. Peters published a collection of his poems entitled Blumen am Wegrand (North Kildonan, 1946).

One of the most productive writers was Peter J. Klassen who presented his experiences among the Mennonites of Russia and Canada in numerous volumes of which the following should be mentioned: Grossmutters Schatz (Superb, 1939), Die Geschichte des Ohm Klaas (Yarrow, n.d.), Heimat einmal (two volumes, Yarrow, n.d.), Die Heimfahrt (Superb, 1943), Der Peet (four volumes, Superb, 1943-49), Verlorene Söhne (Winnipeg, 1952), Als die Heimat zur Fremde geworden, and Fünfunddreissig Fabeln (Superb, 1944), the last largely a translation of the Russian Krylov.

Johann P. Klassen wrote many poems, of which J. H. Janzen, who calls him "the most productive and most natural of our poets," says, "An inexhaustible and an unconquerable joy speaks out of all his poems." Some of his poems were published in the following volumes: Wegeblumen (Scottdale, 1924?), Dunkle Tage (Scottdale, 1924?), Krümlein (Scottdale, 1924), Brocken (Winnipeg, 1932), Meine Garbe (Vancouver, 1946), Der Zwillingsbruder von "Meine Garbe" (Vancouver, n.d.), Nohoaksel (Yarrow, 1946), Roggenbrot (Vancouver, 1946), and Aehrenlese (Winnipeg, n.d.).

Gerhard Toews (Georg de Brecht) wrote Heimat in Trümmern (Steinbach, 1936) and Die Heimat in Flammen (Regina, ca. 1922). Gerhard Johann Friesen (Fritz Senn) published, like most of the Canadian writers, many of his poems and other contributions in the Mennonitische Warte (1935-38). This was also the case with G. G. Wiens, who wrote very unhappy reminiscences about the American Mennonites under the name "Jan Friesen" (Mennonitische Warte, 1938).

Heinrich Görz published a collection of poems, Gedichte (North Kildonan, n.d.). Abram Johann Friesen wrote a short story Prost Mahlzeit (Grünthal, 1949) and a drama, Gott grüsse Dich! (Grünthal, 1952). Karl Fast in Gebet der Wahrheit die Ehre (three volumes, North Kildonan, 1950-52) relates in an autobiographical narrative the last years of his experience in Russia before World War II and after the war as a prisoner of war. He is the only Canadian Mennonite writer thus far who has described these experiences in fiction.

These are only representative of the writers among the Mennonites of Canada originally from Russia who wrote fiction, poetry, and drama dealing with their own heritage and experiences, among which the catastrophic years of the Russian Revolution and Communism are outstanding. Not all writers and writings could be mentioned here. Many of the writers will be forgotten but some will survive. Much fiction and poetry can be found in the German Mennonite papers published between World Wars I and II, particularly in Die Mennonitische Welt (Winnipeg, 1948-52), Der Bote (Rosthern, Sask., 1924-), Der Herold (Newton, Kan.), and Mennonitische Rundschau (Winnipeg, Man.). Many of the writers wrote under pseudonyms.

One question that involuntarily arises in reviewing these many writers is why the Russian Mennonites as a rule produced so few literary and artistic works and what caused the sudden emergence of so many writers at one time. The preliminary answer could be that the Mennonites of Russia had reached an economic, religious, and educational level by about 1910 in which reflection and literary production could be anticipated. The terrible experiences during the Russian Revolution and under the Communistic regime brought about a fruition along these lines in a way unprecedented except possibly in the Netherlands during the Golden Age after the period of martyrdom. This Russo-German Mennonite literary output is at times fully conscious of the religious background and mission of the Mennonites, but above all in most cases it is representative of a German culture of which the educated Mennonites of Russia became more fully aware at the turn of the 20th century. The climax of this literary movement seems to have now been reached and passed. Because of the gradual adjustment of the Mennonites to the Canadian environment the future is not hard to predict; the prospects for a continuation of the Russo-German literary tradition in Canada are not bright, particularly with the inevitable transition to the English language. The writings in the High German language will remain a monument of a literary achievement, but increasingly less read. On the other hand, the Low German fiction and particularly the dramas by Arnold Dyck will probably be enjoyed for years to come. C.K.

Elizabeth Horsch Bender, "Mennonites in German Literature" (unpublished master's thesis, University of Minnesota, 1944); Elmer F. Suderman, "The Russo-German Mennonite Theme in the American Novel" (unpublished master's thesis, University of Kansas, 1948); Cornelius J. Dyck, "How Literary Critics Have Evaluated Mennonite Writers of the Twentieth Century" (unpublished paper, Bethel College, 1953); Bertha Fast, "Low German Literature for Children" (unpublished collection, 1948, BeCL); J. H. Janzen, "The Literature of the Russo-Canadian Mennonites," Menn. Life I (January 1946) 22-25; "Books by J. H. Janzen," Menn. Life VI (July 1951) 42; Arnold Dyck, "Jacob H. Janzen—Writer," Menn. Life VI (July 1951) 33; Horst Quiring and Cornelius Krahn, "Mennonites in German Literature—1940-1950," Menn. Life VII (April 1952) 85; Cornelius Krahn, "Hans Harder—A Mennonite Novelist," Menn. Life VIII (April 1953) 78; Wilhelm Schneider, Die auslanddeutsche Dichtung unserer Zeit (Berlin, 1936); H. Langenbucher, Volkhafte Dichtung der Zeit (Berlin, 1937); K. K. Klein, Literaturgeschichte des Deutschtums im Ausland (Leipzig, 1939); Albert Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit (Leipzig, 1928).

VII. United States and Canada (in English). Little of the literature about the Mennonites written in America comes to grips with any doctrinal or ethical questions inherent in the Mennonite faith. In fact, even in regard to entertainment, which is the obvious objective of much of it, it is not on a high plane. Only recently have attempts been made, usually by the Mennonites themselves, to deal with such problems; they have produced a number of good stories, but most of them are on an adolescent level as literature in its narrower sense.

The earliest fiction written in America on the Anabaptists-Mennonites concerns the Swiss Brethren of the Reformation period. It is True to the End (Philadelphia, ca. 1895) by Henry S. Burrage, a Baptist church historian. It follows history closely—perhaps too closely to result in good fiction. It is, however, a sympathetic treatment. The only liberty the author has taken with the facts of history is to have the first Swiss Brethren have themselves rebaptized by immersion upon discovering from further study of the Bible that their first baptism as adults, namely by pouring, was invalid. It was published in a German translation as Getreu bis ans Ende (Cassel, Germany, 1905 and 1920).

A less sympathetic, but prolific writer was Helen R. Martin, whose favorite subject was ridicule of the Pennsylvania Dutch. Among her novels are several dealing with the Mennonites and Amish of Pennsylvania. Tillie, a Mennonite Maid (N.Y., 1904), Sabina, a Story of the Amish (N.Y., 1905), and The Betrothal of Elypholate (N.Y., 1907; a collection of short stories) have Mennonites or Amish as their principal characters; in The Schoolmaster of Hessville (N.Y., 1920) the Mennonites play a minor role. In all of these works Mrs. Martin treats the stricter branches of the Mennonite family, viz., the Amish and the "New" Mennonites (Herrites). In Mrs. Martin's writings the Mennonite faith, indeed whatever savors of Pennsylvania Dutch, is something to be sloughed off in the process of personal growth and development. Some of her books are sheer melodrama.

Two early serialized attempts at fiction appeared in Mennonite periodicals. One was Jake, a Story of Plain People, by S. M. Grubb (q.v.), published in the Mennonite in 1911, which deals with the Mennonites of Eastern Pennsylvania, though not very happily. In 1922-24 the Christian Monitor published The Clemen Family by John Horsch (q.v.), which is a fictional narrative of events among the early Swiss Brethren. It is, however, not a literary success, since the characters are lost in the mass of historical facts.

The novels by B. Mabel Dunham, of Kitchener, Ont., herself a descendant of Mennonites, are highly sympathetic and effective treatments of the early Mennonite settlers of that area. The Trail of the Conestoga (Toronto, 1924) deals with the immigrants to Waterloo County, Ontario, from Pennsylvania, and their early settlement in Canada. Toward Sodom (Toronto, 1927) gives a picture of the religious problems created later in the same settlement by isolation from and nonconformity to the "world" and the consequent loss of many young people to other creeds and faiths. Her point that the trend toward the city ("Sodom") is fatal to Mennonitism is debatable. Kristli's Trees (Toronto, 1948) is a charming novel for adolescents, also dealing with the Mennonites of Ontario. Miss Dunham's Grand River (Toronto, 1945) is a wider descriptive and historical account of the settlement of this section of Ontario, and includes the Mennonite contribution to the total development of the province.

In 1925 Elsie Singmaster's volume of short stories Bred in the Bone (N.Y.) appeared, with an Eastern Pennsylvania locale. Many of these stories deal with the stricter branches of the Mennonites and Amish, but in a very different way from Mrs. Martin. Miss Singmaster is one of America's great short story writers, hence her stories have an artistic finish. Furthermore her interpretation, though often amused, is never derisive, and always gentle. Her "juvenile" novel, I Heard of a River (Phila., 1948) dealing with the Palatine German immigrants to Pennsylvania, including the Mennonites, touches on Mennonite nonresistance.

A most unfriendly interpretation of the Amish of Northern Indiana is given by Ruth Lininger Dobson in her novel Straw in the Wind (N.Y., 1937). Even from a stylistic point of view this novel is far inferior to Miss Dunham's works. J. W. Yoder, himself a Mennonite of Amish descent, has presented an idyllic account of the Amish in Pennsylvania in his two semifictional books, Rosanna of the Amish (Huntingdon, 1940) and Rosanna's Boys (Huntingdon, 1948). Though adults also find pleasure in the freshness and charm of the picture, the books must be classified as juveniles because of the absence of any serious problems.

The Mennonite immigrants from Russia, specifically the Gnadenau (KMB) Mennonite settlement in Kansas, are the subject of two novels in the second quarter of the 20th century. The Flamethrowers (Caldwell, 1936) by Gordon Friesen, a son of the settlement, is highly inimical, and written from a "leftist" point of view; its characters are not typical. On the other hand, The Locusts (N.Y. and London, 1943), by Otto Schrag, is an important novel; the sections dealing with the Mennonites are sympathetic to them, although some of the author's interpretations of their way of life may be questioned. It was also published later in German as Die Heuschrecken (Munich, 1948). Helen Clark Fernald's treatment of the same community in Plow the Dew Under (N.Y., 1952), and Catherine Nickel's Seed from the Ukraine (N.Y., 1952) are not on an adult plane as literature.

Elizabeth A. Schroeter's slightly fictionized autobiography, From Here to the Pinnacles, Memories of Mennonite Life in the Ukraine and America

(N.Y., 1956), is an interesting account of the experiences and problems of a Mennonite Brethren immigrant of 1913 from the Ukraine to California, which includes not only episodes "as nearly as possible as they took place," but also "the ceremonies exactly as they were practiced." It is based upon a diary begun at the age of seven. All but the last 60 pages deal with Russia.

Travelogues and semi-autobiographical writings have been produced by a considerable number of American Mennonites. H. J. Krehbiel's A Trip Through Europe (Newton, 1926), Frieda Kauffman's Auf Wanderwegen, Plaudereien über eine Europareise (Newton, 1935), and Arnold Dyck's Meine Deutschlandfahrt, Eine Reiseplauderei (North Kildonan, 1950) tell about trips to Europe. S. C. Yoder's Down South America Way (Scottdale, 1943) and Eastward to the Sun (Scottdale, 1953) tell of a journey to Europe and India visiting Mennonites and their missions, and of one to the Mennonite missions and colonies in lower South America. Three MCC relief workers, Willard and Verna Smith in Paraguayan Interlude, Observations and Impressions (Scottdale, 1950) and Samuel A. Yoder in Middle-East Sojourn (Scottdale, 1951), relate experiences and observations, the former in Paraguay, Argentina, and Brazil, and the latter in Egypt, Ethiopia, and Palestine. Autobiographical reminiscences are related by Hillegonda van der Smissen in Bilder aus meinem Leben (Newton, *ca.*1935, English as Sketches from My Life, Newton, ca. 1935), S. C. Yoder in Horse Trails Along the Desert (Scottdale, 1954), and Dorothy McCammon, We Tried to Stay (Scottdale, 1953). The last of these, a moving account of the experiences of a missionary couple in Communistic China, was rated as one of the ten best religious books of the year by the Saturday Review.

In Canada Frederick Philip Grove, who was a teacher at Winkler, Man., and married Katherine Wiens, a Mennonite, touches on Manitoba Mennonite life in his novels Our Daily Bread (Toronto, 1929) and In Search of Myself (Toronto, 1946). Paul Hiebert's novel Sarah Binks (Toronto, 1947) deals with pioneer conditions in Western Canada and is a satire on self-important literary criticism.

The scene of High Bright Buggy Wheels (N.Y., 1951), by Luella Creighton, is in Ontario among some of the stricter Mennonites, possibly Brethren in Christ. Miss Creighton shows an appreciation of the idyllic aspects of their rural religious life, but little understanding for their faith.

In recent years a number of young Mennonite (MC) women have been writing Christian fiction for young people, several of their works dealing with Mennonite life or doctrine. Not Regina (Scottdale, 1954) by Christmas Carol Kauffman, is a novel on Swiss Anabaptist beginnings and persecutions. Eunice Shellenberger's Wings of Decision (Scottdale, 1951) has nonresistance as its theme. Helen Brenneman's But Not Forsaken (Scottdale, 1955) is an interpretation of refugee experiences based on the author's experiences as an MCC relief worker in the refugee camp at Gronau, Germany, after World War II, and is of superior quality, probably the best fiction produced as yet by an American Mennonite writer. In addition to her historical novel, Mrs. Kauffman has written a number of religious novels for adolescents, not specifically on Mennonite themes, including Lucy Winchester (Scottdale, 1945), Light from Heaven (Scottdale, 1948), Dannie of Cedar Cliffs (Scottdale, 1950), and Life with Life (Scottdale, 1952). Edna Beiler has written many good juvenile stories which have been published in the Youth's Christian Companion and Words of Cheer. Ten of the Words of Cheer stories were reprinted as Ten of a Kind (Scottdale, 1953). She also writes stories in Christian Living. Esther Eby Glass has many good stories for adolescents to her credit appearing in the Youth's Christian Companion since about 1947.

Other books on a late adolescent level are Marcus Bach's Dream Gate (Indianapolis, 1949), which gives insight into the life of a boy in a Hutterite settlement in North Dakota, and Blue Hills and Shoofly Pie (Philadelphia, 1952) by Ann Hark, which contains some valuable descriptions of Amish life.

Some of the most delightful books on the Amish are those written for children; usually they have charming illustrations. Among these are Henner's Lydia (N.Y., 1937), Skippack School (N.Y., 1939), and Yoni Wondernose (N.Y., 1942) by Marguerite de Angeli; Little Amish Schoolhouse (N.Y., 1939) and Amish Moving Day (N.Y., 1942) by Ella Maie Seyfert; and Lovina, A Story of the Amish (N.Y., 1940) and Appolonia's Valentine (N.Y., 1954) by Katherine Milhous. Plain Girl (N.Y., 1955) by Virginia Sorensen is the pleasant story of an Amish girl in a public school, intended for older children.

Barbara (Mrs. Don.) Smucker, a Mennonite author, wrote the thoughtful and impressive Henry's Red Sea (Scottdale, 1955), relating the escape of a group of Russian Mennonite refugees from Berlin in 1948 on their way to final settlement in Paraguay. It is meant for children. Elizabeth (Mrs. Harold) Bauman's Coals of Fire (Scottdale, 1954) contains eighteen fictionized true stories for youth illustrating nonresistance, six of them Mennonite.

The recent American stage has had one play with a Mennonite theme and two musical comedies based on Amish life and customs. Papa Is All (N.Y., 1942) by Patterson Greene makes an average comedy of the universal theme of the overly strict father, using a conservative Mennonite group to carry it. It has no value beyond entertainment. Plain and Fancy (N.Y., 1955), by Joseph Stein and Will Glickman, was a very successful musical comedy on the stage, and gives a sympathetic interpretation of the Amish. By Hex (1956), written by John Rengier, was little more than a weak reworking of some of the ideas in Plain and Fancy.

A number of American Mennonites have written successful religious lyric poetry. Jacob Sudermann, Joanna (Mrs. Herman) Andres, and Miriam (Mrs. Millard) Lind have published poetry in various Mennonite periodicals. Mrs. Lind has to her credit a volume, Such Thoughts of Thee (Scottdale, 1952), containing excellent poems, most of which are on religious subjects.

Leo Beachy (1874-1927), of Grantsville, Md., wrote familiar essays on nature and people from his vantage point on Mount Nebo in the Allegheny

Mountains, which were published as a series in the Christian Monitor and then in booklet form as Letters and Pictures for Isabelle (Scottdale, 1915).

E.H.B.

Earl F. Robacker, Pennsylvania German Literature (Philadelphia, 1943); Elizabeth Horsch Bender, "The Mennonite Theme in Contemporary American Fiction," Proceedings of the Fourth Conference on Mennonite Cultural Problems (Newton, 1945) 107-34; idem, "Three Amish Novels," MQR XIX (1945) 273-84; idem, "The Dream Gate," MQR XXIV (1950) 289 f.; Mary Royer, "The Amish and Mennonite Theme in American Literature for Children," MQR XV (1941) 147-49; J. B. Cressman, review of The Trail of the Conestoga and Toward Sodom, MQR V (1930) 68-72; John Umble, review of Rosanna of the Amish, MQR XV (1941) 143-47 and of Rosanna's Boys, MQR XXIII (1949) 115-17; Elmer Suderman, "The Russo-German Mennonite Theme in the American Novel" (master's thesis, University of Kansas, 1948, unpublished); G. Berg, "Mennonites in Fiction—Gnadenau," Menn. Life II (October 1927) 23 f., a review of Flamethrowers; Victor Peters, "Frederick Philip Grove," Manitoba School Journal IX (October 1948); J. R. Clemens, "Pennsylvania Mennonites in Print 1940-1950," Menn. Life VII (1952) 83-85; Charles Burkhart, "The Amish Theme in Recent American Theatricals," MQR XXXI (1957) 60-62. Reviews of practically all of the above titles will be found in either MQR or Menn. Life. The complete text of Plain and Fancy was printed in Theatre Arts for July 1956, 33-63. Recordings of the complete performance are also available on disks. The text was also published as a libretto in French's Musical Library as Plain and Fancy. A Musical Comedy. Book by Joseph Stein and Will Glickman, Music by Albert Hague, Lyrics by Arnold B. Horwitt (Samuel French, Inc., New York, 1956).

Lithuania, the name of the district of East Prussia which was called "Gumbinnen" (q.v.) from 1918 on. In its northern part, near Tilsit, Mennonites had been living since 1711, known until 1925 as the Lithuanian congregation, later as Memelniederung. Its varied fate has been sketched in the article Gumbinnen; its inner history shall be considered here.

The Swiss Mennonite families who had been expelled from the canton of Bern and who settled in the village Jedwilleiten in 1711 must have without exception moved away in the following years, for by 1723 there was no trace left of them (contrary to the view expressed in the pertinent literature, W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit, 116; E. Randt, 8 f.). Even the rental contracts made out with the Swiss Brethren have been lost or never existed. Furthermore all the Mennonite settlers of the village of Jedwilleiten about 1723 were of West Prussian origin, as their names clearly show: Tobias Barthel, Jacob Janson, Johann Schröder, Peter and Hans Quapp, Heinrich and Peter Jansen, and Peter Rhod.

The West Prussian Mennonites who settled here after 1713 stem almost exclusively from the congregations of Montau, Schönsee, and Thorn; they suffered very severely in their home country of the plague, war, special taxes, and were compelled to emigrate. On the basis of a guarantee of freedom of conscience and exemption from military service given by the King of Prussia, they traveled by the more comfortable sea route to their new home in the Kukernese area, very close to the supposed (or short-lived) Swiss settlement. They did much toward draining this piece of the countryside.

Their stress upon a moral way of life attracted many persons to them from other creeds. A series of transfers of membership occurred, especially of servants who had moved to Lithuania with the Mennonite farmers and who were repelled by the excessive drinking among the members of their faith. This is the only Mennonite church in East and West Prussia in which a considerable number of such transfers took place.

This thriving congregation was granted only eleven years of peaceful existence. In 1724 the king's recruiting officers forcibly broke into the Mennonite homes. To their protests the king replied with the order that they leave the country. And so the 160 Mennonite families moved back into the Werder. Their homes, some of them newly built, had to be abandoned in haste and sold below their value. For their labor in building dikes and ditches they were remunerated by the government. Though the conditions of the sale were just enough, the loss of their new home was painful. Relatives and brethren in the Werder offered them a place to stay, especially in the Thiensdorf church, where each owner of a "hide" of land obligated himself to take in a family and furnish pasture for two cows; but there were no funds to make a new settlement in Polish Prussia. As in all times of need, the Dutch brethren were appealed to for aid.

The refugees acquired 88 hides of land by sale and lease in several localities: in Dierungshof, two miles from Elbing and two miles from Marienburg; in Rudnerweide opposite Mewe; in Klein-Montau, one and one-half miles from Marienburg; in Kamincke, one mile from Marienburg. About 90 families settled in these places. About 24 well-to-do refugee families had already bought land in the Werders and in Schönsee and Montau. There were about 40 destitute families left. These families were offered a favorable opportunity to return to Lithuania, to settle on the Rautenburg estates of Count von Waldburg. Two Mennonite families were already living there, who called them and soon had a total of 47 families together. Although all of them were without funds, they began to drain the land, dig ditches, build houses, and even erected a mill.

Again a Mennonite colony was taking form—they called themselves the Dannenberg church—when the king's command to leave the land unexpectedly struck them. He preferred the Salzburg refugees who would bear arms. All the objections of the count and of the Ministry of War, pointing out the extraordinary capability of the Mennonites, were of no avail. The Mennonites had to leave at once or be liable to "cart punishment"—to be taken to the fortification in a cart; so they left the country that had for six years again been their home.

This time they did not turn to their friends in Polish Prussia, but sailed to Holland. About half of them, 24 families, went to Holland; the rest probably went to the Werders (e.g., Isaak Sperling) and north to Polish Lithuania. The former group, who were evidently planning to return permanently to the home of their origin, were the families of Hans Smit, Tomas Funk, Giels Ewert, Andries, Simon and Hans Krayer, De Jonge Hans Krayer, Jacob Weedler, Daniel Weedler, Heinrich Voet, Jonas Nachtigael, Willem von Steen, Isaac Abraham, George Grubert, Christoph Block, Jan Geerds, Henrich Gronau, Abraham Geerds, Gillis Voot, Hans and Dirk Janssen, David Unrouw, Jacob Abraham; also later, Georg Pauls, Bartel Kruss from Königsberg, Pieter Tietken from Danzig, and Hendrik Lucht from Lithuania.

The Dutch did not welcome this immigration. Their fears were realized. The Lithuanian families —110 persons arrived at Amsterdam after a stormy voyage of three months' duration—were settled in Wageningen and Walcheren at great expense (the offering amounted to 65,000 florins). But after three years there was trouble. It was probably good for both sides that the colonists of Wageningen betook themselves homeward by sea in 1736. The Walcheren settlers followed the next few years.

At the beginning of the reign of Frederick the Great in 1740, West Prussian Mennonites again went to Lithuania, namely, 60 families from the Elbing region. They were joined by some returning from Holland. Although this settlement had to be abandoned on account of the frequent floods, the "Mennonite dam" is evidence of their colonizing work. They were followed in 1758 by 12 Mennonite families who settled in Plauschwarren (on the right bank of the Memel). Gradually more settled.

By 1776 the Lithuanian church numbered 387 souls, and with some variations maintained this number to World War II. The first Dutch Naamlijst to mention the congregation of Lithuania is that of 1743. The congregation was then said to belong to the Waterlanders, which may also mean Frisians. The elders were Adrian Sievert and Hans Vooth (Foth), and preachers Hendrik Dirksz and Hendrik Casper. Later Naamlijsten name as preachers Salomon Kohnert 1743-*ca.*95, Andries Ewert from at least 1750-*ca.*60, Hendrik Janzen 1754 (elder in 1769-94, Abraham Gerzen 1762-*ca.*75, Jan Rosenfeldt 1762-74, Dirk Jantzen 1769-? (elder 1791), Steffen Baltzer 1771-*ca.*90, Heinrich Roosenvelt 1774-?, Peter Janzen 1787-?, Jacob Evert 1792-?, Franz Janzen 1793-?, and Abraham Rosenfeldt 1799-?. Many of the names on the oldest extant membership list (1774) are those of the settlers of 1713-32, of whom many returned: Ewert, Eckert, Ediger, Gertzen, Ketler, Krause, Kreyger, Lucht, Pauls, Penner, Schmidt, Szepanske, Vodt. Some of the names later disappeared; those who remained to the end are Ewert, Voth, Götzke, Janz, Rosenfeld, Göritz, Hübert, Mertins, Scheffler, Wohlgemuth (the first six names indicate origin in the Graudenz marsh).

This vanishing of names is largely explained by their adherence to nonresistance. The amount of land free of military duty granted to the 64 Mennonites was fixed and could not be exceeded; young people who bought other land obligating them to military service were put out of church. The Mennonites who accepted military service tried unsuccessfully to form an organization of their own in 1855. Thus they were lost to the church. This changed in 1868 when service in the medical and transport corps was permitted, and at the same time the restriction on land ownership was removed. But though the church had always been very strict on nonresistance, during World War I only three or four members took advantage even of the noncombatant service privilege. The government lamented the emigration of so many capable and well-to-do persons. An opinion of the Oberpräsidium of Königsberg in 1842 says, "The outward and moral conduct of the Mennonites . . . is exemplary. Their intellectual training is in general higher than that of the other inhabitants. Their energy and intelligence is conspicuously above that of the other inhabitants . . . . They maintain friendly intercourse with their neighbors, but never take part in the disorders occurring frequently in the lowland. . . . In this way they have had the greatest and most salutary influence directly and by example on the moral and nutritional state as well as on the culture and civilization of their neighbors."

The first little meetinghouse was built in 1767 in Plauschwarren; 120 years later it was completely rebuilt, but in ten years, 1893, it was sold and turned into a dwelling because most of the Mennonites had moved away from Plauschwarren. For most of the members Plauschwarren was too far away, and so they built a chapel on the estate of Grigolienen. It was soon too small, and in 1831 the manor house of Adlig Pokraken was remodeled to serve as a church, and the Gem. Kal. 1926-27 lists the congregation by this name.

As to the membership there is only scarce information: there were 233 members in 1774, 239 in 1788, 287 in 1851, 499 in 1882, and 521 in 1887. In 1940 the baptized membership stood at 326. During the last years of its existence the following elders served: Heinrich Foth 1882-1910, Heinrich Pauls 1910-32, and Bruno Götzke 1932-45. H.Q., vdZ.

Inv. Arch, Amst. I, Nos. 1021, 1070 f., 1080, 1085, 1141, 1163, 1165, 1174, 1180, 1237, 1347, 1571-95, 1921-2243; II, 2, Nos. 704 f., 707-37, 739, 743-49, 752 f., 755-62, 764-75, 778, 782, 784-86, 792; Erich Randt, Die Mennoniten in Ostpreussen und Litauen bis zum Jahre 1772 (Königsberg, 1912); W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); H. Pauls "Geschichte unserer Gemeinde Adlig Pokraken in Ostpreussen," Gem.-Kal., 1921; W. Kühler, "Helfende Bruderliebe in der Vergangenheit seitens der holl. Bruderschaft," in Chr. Neff, Mennonitische Welthilfskonferenz (Weierhof, 1930); A van Gulik, "Een mislukte kolonisatie te Wageningen," in DB 1905, 112-63; 1906, 93-138; G. L. von Reisswitz, Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Mennonitengemeinden II (Breslau, 1829) contains an interesting table of members and the land they owned; ML II, 660-62.

Litigation is a legal process by which claims are brought before a court and a decision is rendered by a judge with or without the aid of a jury. Although there are variations in Mennonite faith and practice with respect to litigation, in a general way it may be said that the historic Mennonite view on this question, as well as the current attitude of those Mennonites holding most consistently to the principle of nonresistance, is substantially as follows: (1) Members of the Christian brotherhood may not settle differences among themselves by means of litigation in the civil courts. (2) It is inconsistent for the Christian to be the aggressive party in a suit at law against another person, even when legal justice is on his side. (3) When a Christian is summoned to court, charged with violation of the law, he may employ the services of an attorney in his behalf. (4) In case a civil suit is brought against a Christian it is not necessarily inconsistent with the principle of nonresistance for him to defend his case before the court by legal means, although every effort should be made in the spirit of love to make settlement out of court even in case of an unjust plaintiff. (5) Purely routine actions, so-called friendly suits, are allowable.

The basic principle at stake in this position is that of Christian love. The Christian is called to a ministry of reconciliation, entering into the work of Christ, reconciling men unto God. Suits at law directed by one individual against the person of another involve an "offense," condemned in Matthew 18:6 because it creates a barrier between the offender and the offended. If the latter is a fellow Christian, the result is a schism in the body of Christ. If he is a non-Christian, the Christian who brings suit renounces his ministry of reconciliation to those outside the body of Christ. I Corinthians 6:1-7 requires Christians to settle disputes among themselves without resorting to courts at law, whereas the spirit and teaching of the entire New Testament is that the Christian should be ready to suffer wrong rather than to offend another by taking vengeful or punitive action against him.

In case of action brought against the Christian by the state for alleged violation of the law, the principles outlined above would indicate that the accused may not use legal procedures for the denial of an act which has been committed. Legal counsel may be employed, however, to establish the truth in the case; to plead one's guilt and to pray for clemency when this is in order; to establish one's innocence when such is the case; and to claim the supremacy of God's higher law when the latter is in conflict with the laws of men. In case of such defense before the court, however, the procedure must be with the spirit of love and reconciliation, the objective being not personal interest but rather obedience to the will of God, as in the case of Paul and others of the apostles before the authorities who were defending not primarily themselves but the cause of Christian liberty. The same spirit of reconciliation is even more important in case of defense in a civil suit where action is brought by another individual, for here personal relationships are involved and offense must be avoided lest the Christian's ministry of reconciliation be made of none effect. Here the minimum requirement would be that the Christian make every possible effort to settle the case in a peaceable manner outside of court.

It is also clear that in the complex economy of the 20th century more details of the life of the individual Christian are affected by the state and the law than was formerly the case. This has had the effect of greatly enlarging the above-mentioned nonlitigious category of routine legal procedures, including so-called friendly suits. This may include such varied procedures as the clearance of title to real estate, the settlement of estates, the determination of tax responsibilities, the settlement of claims before various civil boards such as workmen's compensation boards, rent control boards, and public utility commissions, appeals in the draft procedures of the Selective Service System, land damage cases involving the right of eminent domain, perhaps even the claims of one corporation against another, and many other types of cases. While these need not involve any conflict of personal relationships there may well be cases where there is such involvement. A recent conference sponsored by the Peace Problems Committee of the Mennonite Church (MC) for the study of this question recognized this fact and registered its concern that the brotherhood exercise great care to employ only such legal procedures as in any given case will harmonize with the principles of love, nonresistance, and reconciliation outlined above, and which above all do not involve the element of personal offense. The conference also called attention to such procedures as the making and processing of wills, mechanics' liens, mortgages, and many others which may or may not be used in harmony with this spirit, depending on the attitudes and the purposes of those who employ them.

Because of their attitude on litigation Mennonites historically have seldom entered the legal profession, except in those groups which have changed their position or who no longer hold to the principle of nonresistance. Some of Holland's leading attorneys, for example, have been Mennonites, and the current president of the A.D.S. (Dutch General Conference) is a lawyer. There have been a number of lawyers within the membership of the General Conference Mennonite Church in America and there is one lawyer who is a member of the Mennonite Church (MC) and an active layman in the Lancaster Conference. He as well as certain G.C.M. lawyers serve primarily as counsel in nonlitigious matters as the term has here been defined, having a concern to assist their clients in an understanding of the law as it affects their affairs, as well as to direct their legal and business relationships along lines which harmonize with the way of love, nonresistance, and reconciliation.

A notable case of litigation among the American Mennonites in violation of their own principles, and recognized as such by the court, occurred following the Oberholtzer (q.v.) schism when the Boyertown Mennonite meeting was divided, one group following Oberholtzer and the other remaining in the Franconia Conference. For some years both groups used the same meetinghouse, but when the trustees, who were of the Franconia group, in erecting a new meetinghouse specified certain conditions for its use by the Oberholtzer group, the latter filed suit claiming rights in common with the Franconia group. When their petition was denied (1879) they appealed the case and won a decision in their favor (1882). The Franconia trustees now appealed this decision, whereupon the court reversed itself (1883). The Boyertown groups now built two meetinghouses and the Franconia trustees were disciplined by their Conference for having appealed the case, the appeal being interpreted as an aggressive action, whereas no discipline was administered for having appeared as defendants in the first instance.

The court's clear understanding of the Mennonite position on litigation, and of its violation in the Boyertown case, is seen in the judge's statement following his decision in favor of the plaintiff in 1882. The statement follows: "It is to be regretted that the members of this religious organization should have such differences which they cannot harmonize. The Mennonite Church is world-wide renowned for peace, brotherly love, and good will to all, and for the amicable settlement of all their difficulties among themselves in a Christian spirit. The court is the last place to which they should resort, and indeed never should until all other amicable modes at an honest method of adjustment have failed. Once in court, immaterial how it may terminate, feelings of discord are often engendered, that many years will not allay. Neighbors who before were friends are parted forever." (See Samuel H. Landis, et al. vs. Henry S. Borneman, et al., Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Eastern District, January Term, 1883, Paper Book of Appellants, Reading, 1883, XLVIII, XLIX.)

In the Mennonite Church (MC) and more conservative groups, members are disciplined for violation of the above standards, and may even be excommunicated. In the remaining groups in America lawsuits are forbidden, except in the G.C.M. group, which discourages them; but discipline is not always strictly applied. In the more conservative congregations in Germany, as well as in France and Switzerland, tradition has remained very strong against members being the aggressive parties in lawsuits. In the remainder of European Mennonitism the tradition has long since ceased to function. G.F.H.

Elvin Souder, "Problems of a Conscientious Objector in Legal Practice," Proceedings of the Seventh Annual Conference on Mennonite Cultural Problems (North Newton, 1949) 101-12; Paul Erb, "Nonresistance and Litigation," MQR XIII (1939) 75-82.

Lititz Mennonite Church (MC) is located in the center of a strong Mennonite community in Lancaster Co., Pa. Fifty members of the Hess and Hammer Creek congregations appealed for a meetinghouse in the borough (then Warwick). In 1906 this house was built. Jacob H. Hershey (1862-1947), ordained at Olathe, Kan., but a native son, became the first pastor, but it was still part of the Hess-Hammer Creek District. Ephraim N. Eby (1852-1937) served as deacon, and Noah L. Landis (1857-1940) as bishop from the start. Amos S. Horst and Mahlon Zimmerman are the present (1956) bishops, John S. Hess and Melvin Lauver pastors, and Lester B. Wenger deacon. The membership is 203. The church was remodeled in 1952. I.D.L.

Little Eden Camp, a Mennonite (MC) campground of 10 acres, located on the north shore of Portage Lake 1½ miles west of Onekama, Mich., and 1½ miles east of Lake Michigan, 240 miles almost due north of Goshen, Ind. Some 30 years earlier a lumber camp had been established on the plot, which was later sold to the Church of the Brethren for a recreation camp site, who in turn sold it to a group of Mennonites from Archbold, Ohio, in 1944.

The Mennonite group in 1945 organized a nonprofit corporation known as "Little Eden Camp Ground Association Inc.," with 53 charter members. Association membership in 1955 totaled 84, made up of members of the Mennonite Church (MC) from Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. The association is governed by a board of directors elected annually. Its assets totaled $37,100 in 1955.

Little Eden operates on a summer schedule beginning the last week in June and closing the first week in September, usually set up for nine groups of one week each. The 1955 season included five weeks for children including high-school age. The four weeks for adults included: Church Music and Young People, Christian Business and Professional, Christian Fellowship—Family, Farmers, and the Goshen College faculty retreat of two days. Facilities include a hotel building housing the administrative office, kitchen and dining room, social room, auditorium, second-floor sleeping rooms, and a third-floor dormitory, 17 cabins, a number of which house more than one family. The total capacity of the camp is approximately 125, although at times children's camps have enrolled as many as 200. L.A.B.

Little Visitor, an illustrated eight-page paper for children, published experimentally for the Christmas season of 1878 by H. B. Brenneman, Elkhart, Ind. Brenneman was the "Brother Henry" whose articles appeared frequently in the Children's Department of the Herald of Truth. There were no further issues. N.P.S.

Littlefield (Tex.) Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, now extinct, was organized in the summer of 1917 with 60 members under the leadership of J. K. Esau and C. W. Toews. The first members came from Kansas, North Dakota, and Manitoba in 1915. A meetinghouse was built in 1917. Pioneer hardships and pressure of World War I drove many of these to their former localities. The remaining six or seven families continued worship and Sunday school in their homes after the church building was sold and moved. Visiting ministers from various places in Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas came occasionally to give pastoral care. Ben T. Koehn moved here in 1938 to assume the pastorate for several years. The congregation was dissolved on Feb. 3, 1942, its members having moved to various congregations in Kansas and California. A.R.T.

Littlefield (Tex.) Mennonite Brethren Church was organized in 1915. The church building was erected in 1916. The first permanent pastor was J. J. Wiebe, followed by A. L. Schellenberg. When Schellenberg was called to lead the M.B. Publishing House in Hillsboro, Kan., the congregation was without a minister and gradually disintegrated, the members moving to other M.B. communities. The highest membership was 100. P.C.H.

Liturgy: see Order of Service.

Litwiller (Litwiler), a Mennonite family mentioned in the Palatinate Mennonite census lists in 1685, where the name of Hans Leutweyler appears. Peter Litwiller (1809-78) of Alsace migrated to Ontario in 1829, where he became a bishop in the Wilmot Amish Mennonite Church. His son Christian (1848-1924) and his grandson Peter (1869-1930) were ministers in the Ontario A.M. Church. A great-grandson Nelson (1898-) and the latter's son John are Mennonite (MC) missionaries in Uruguay. Between 1834 and 1850 the Litwiller family came to central Illinois near Metamora. Later the family also settled near Hopedale and Gridley, Ill. Among the ministers in Illinois have been Joseph Litwiller (1836-1914) of the Hopedale Church (MC), Jonas

Litwiller (1865-1944) of the Pleasant Grove (MC) Church, and John W. Litwiller (1874-1955) of the Boynton Central Conference Mennonite Church. Simon Litwiller (1880-1956) was the bishop of the Hopedale (q.v.) Mennonite Church (MC) since 1925. John W. and Simon were grandsons of Joseph Litwiller. The Illinois Litwillers have their background in Butler Co., Ohio. Several Litwillers are preachers in the Church of God in Christ Mennonite congregation at Ithaca, Mich. M.G.

Livermore, Cal., the location of Mennonite Civilian Public Service unit No. 150, which served in the United States Veterans' Hospital at that place, an institution for tubercular patients. On Dec. 1, 1945, a total of 117 CPS men arrived at the hospital, but the number declined in the following months because of transfers and demobilization. The unit was closed in December 1946. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 273 f.

Liverpool Mennonite Church: see Manchester.

Livine (Vincken) Verwee, wife of Jan Vervest (q.v.), died in prison at Brugge, Belgium, on Sept. 20, 1558. Probably born at Gent in Flanders, she wandered about with her husband, living for some time in Gent, Amsterdam, Dordrecht, and other towns and from about 1554 on at Brugge. After attending Mennonite meetings for a number of years she was baptized on her faith in 1555 at Brugge by Elder Gillis van Aken (q.v.). In the summer of 1558 a meeting she was attending was surprised and a number of members of the congregation, including Livine and her husband, were arrested. Livine died in prison, her husband having also died in prison about a month before. (Verheyden, Brugge, 44, No. 26.) vdZ.

Livingston County, Ill., Mennonite churches were the result of the expansion movements of the Amish Mennonites beginning about 1860 from the timber-stream areas to the "Gridley Prairie." The Waldo Mennonite (MC) Church was the mother church in the area; the Flanagan (GCM) and Meadows (GCM) and the Salem Defenseless, now Evangelical Mennonite, congregations were formed largely from dissatisfied elements from the Waldo group. The Salem Orphanage and the Meadows Old People's Home were initiated by the Defenseless group, but now receive support from all the Mennonite groups. Today there are approximately 1,000 Mennonites in Livingston County. The Meadows Church and the Meadows Old People's Home, which are part of the Gridley Prairie settlement, are just across the line in McLean County. T.R.S.

Livingston Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located at Livingston, Merced Co., Cal., was organized in 1943 after the Winton church became too crowded. A meetinghouse was built with a seating capacity of 200. In 1953 the church had a membership of 110 with ministers Jesse Koehn, John A. Koehn, and S. A. Nichols. J.A.K.

Livingston (Cal.) Mennonite Brethren Church was organized on June 9, 1922, with A. Z. Sawatzky as temporary leader. In May 1927 the church attendance was around 100. J. M. Ens then became the leader. In the following years the people that had moved to Livingston settled more in the direction of Winton, and the two groups then organized as the Winton M.B. Church (q.v.), discontinuing Livingston. P.C.H.

L. K., author of a Dutch hymnbook (Wolkan, Lieder, 113 ff., 155), is Lenaert Klock or Clock (q.v.).

Lo, Peter (b. 1530), a Protestant theologian, born at Elberfeld, Germany, where his father was a schoolteacher and secretary of the council. In 1552 he was made chaplain in his native town. Charged with "Anabaptism" and threatened with imprisonment, he fled to Francis II, Count of Waldeck at Beyenburg. When he attempted to return to Elberfeld he was arrested. But he managed to escape from prison, and in March 1558 he moved to Beyenburg and entered the service of the count.

In 1565 William, Duke of Jülich-Cleve-Berg, asked Lo to "convert" the Anabaptists held in Blankenberg and Bensberg. Lo disputed with them on June 23-24 in Blankenberg and June 28-July 2 in Bensberg. Not only ducal councilors and other persons of the court, but the duke himself took an active interest in these conversations. In order to induce "poor Martin," an Anabaptist preacher, to recant, the official called his attention to the great interest of His Highness in the salvation of his soul. On the question of the salvation of unbaptized infants Lo agreed with the Anabaptists but he tried to justify infant baptism "in a sort of continuing proof" and stated that those who despise the sacrament are doomed to eternal damnation, "since they made God a liar and mistreated Christ, and destroyed the symbol of the new covenant." But the Anabaptists stood by their position: little children cannot believe, and without faith baptism is an empty form. Martin Wilach declared that the prevailing church was "no longer a church of Christians but a church of heathen," and "matters of faith are not the concern of the temporal ruler." Lo is said to have won some of them over, but most of them remained true to their convictions. In 1650 there were still some Anabaptists the Blankenberg area. W.W.

K. W. Bouterwek, "Die Reformation in Wuppertal und P. Lo's Anteil an derselben," in Ztscht des Berg. Geschichtsvereins IV (1867) 273-336; Nebe, "Drei Briefe über Peter Lo's Verhandlungen mit den Wiedertäufern in Blankenberg 1565," loc. cit. XXXIV (1899) 1-15; Schönneshofer, Geschichte des Bergischen Landes (Elberfeld, 1895) 202; H. Niemöller, Peter Lo (1907); ML II, 674.

Loag's Corner Mennonite Mission (MC), located in a schoolhouse on the Elverson-Honey Brook Road, Chester Co., Pa., was conducted by the Weaverland Missions Committee under the Lancaster Mennonite Conference. It was opened early in July 1922 and continued with some interest until October 1931, when it closed. The Weaverland ministers supplied the preaching mission, and members from the surrounding churches, some of whom lived near by, supplied the workers. I.D.L.

Lobach, Johannes, was arrested on Feb. 26, 1717, with Jacob and Willem Grahe (q.v.) and four other Mennonites in Solingen and taken to Düsseldorf, Germany, where they languished in prison for three years, until they were released at the intervention of Holland (DB 1861, 50-85). The name Lobach was also found in the Mennonite congregation of Kriegsheim (q.v.) in the 17th century. In the 19th century there was in the Crefeld Mennonite Church a respected mercantile family with this name. (ML II, 674.) NEFF.

Lobenbach, a hamlet near Stein on the Kocher River in Baden, Germany, the seat of a Mennonite congregation in the 19th century which met alternately here and in Lautenbach near Neckarsulm. Lobenbacherhof is first mentioned as a congregation in A. Huntzinger's Religions-, Kirchen- und Schulwesen der Mennoniten (Speyer, 1830) as having 3 families with 20 persons. In 1857, according to J. Mannhardt's Namens-Verzeichnis, it had 40 baptized members, with Christian Funk of Kochendorf as preacher. In 1888 Mannhardt's Jahrbuch calls the congregation Lautenbach-Lobenbach with Heinrich Landes as elder (1885-1918) with 52 baptized members. By 1904 it is called Lobenbach-Heilbronn in the Gemeinde-Kalender, and by 1915 Heilbronn (q.v.) alone. (ML II, 674.) H.S.B.

Lober, Julius, a South German Anabaptist preacher; little is known about his work. We have only his statements as given in the records of his trial in 1531, which are however important, because they form the basis for theological and legal opinion concerning the punishment of Lober and his fellow prisoners. They are important for an evaluation of the Anabaptist movement in Franconia, for their examination corrected many false assertions. For example, the Anabaptists of that region had been considered revolutionary and it was thought that they had their women in common; but this was out of the question in view of the strictness of the South German Anabaptist morals. They had been put on a plane with the "Puschenhamern," a small group of misguided people who based their manner of living on the dreams of their leader Hans Schmied, and practiced divorce and remarriage as well as community of goods (Wiswedel, II, 31). They did not baptize persons joining their circle (TA 224-28). Nevertheless they were counted Anabaptists. This furnished a legal basis, in addition to religious separation, for the suppression of the Anabaptist movement. In his cross-examinations Lober was therefore expressly questioned on these points. But there was no evidence of the truth of these charges.

Thanks to Lober an important document has been preserved for Anabaptist history which was taken away from him at the time of his arrest; viz., a list of the places in which Anabaptists had been executed for their faith in 1527-31 along the Rhine and the Danube. It gives the number of martyrs for a series of towns and is one of the few sources which give summarizing information about Anabaptist martyrdoms, though it cannot be considered exhaustive (reprinted in Beck, 310-12; see also Palatinate).

Lober was a tailor in Zürich. In Strasbourg he came in contact with the Anabaptists, when a journeyman reproved his sinful life and instructed him from the Bible. After several years of association with the Brethren he was baptized by Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.). Then he went to Bruchsal (q.v.), an Anabaptist center in the Kraichgau. Here Lober was chosen leader of the congregation of about 500 members. But he led them only a short while. Five members of his congregation had already died as martyrs. Many families were planning to move to Moravia. Lober had been there previously and was sent by his congregation to visit the Brethren in Moravia with a letter in 1531. On the way he visited Anabaptists in Franconia. His wife during this time stayed in the home of Ulrich Hutscher (q.v.) in Tief (Oberntief) and was imprisoned with him at Hoheneck near Windsheim. When Lober learned this he went there on April 8 to find out the reason for the seizure. The bailiff Albrecht Gailing questioned him and arrested him too.

On April 10, 1531, the bailiff reported the case to George, Margrave of Brandenburg, and on April 16 the prisoners were cross-examined by three clergymen, by Andreas Althamer (q.v.), who had already attacked the Anabaptists in several widely distributed pamphlets, by Sigmund Schneeweis, and by Johann Rürer. The main topic of discussion was infant baptism. Lober could not be convinced that it was Scriptural; nor did he accept the statements of the theologians that a child could believe. He declared that he would stay by his conception of baptism which had been administered to him as an adult. Nor could he accept Luther's teaching on communion; the body of Christ had come for his comfort, and through the blood of Christ he had been saved from his sins. Obedience and taxes are due the government. But he could not swear an oath. Of community of women he knew nothing. "If anyone should teach him such a thing he would say that this doctrine was of the devil and not of God." Nor did he advocate community of goods, but he was ready to aid his brother who was in need, without compulsion, from brotherly love. The punishment of the wicked belongs only to God.

After the conclusion of the cross-examination and the attempts to convert them Lober stated that he would not desist from his faith; likewise spoke his fellow prisoner Ulrich Hutscher. An additional attempt by the clergymen to make the prisoners yield their faith was fruitless, whereas the third prisoner, Bernhard Weik of Bruchsal, begged for mercy and declared that he was ready to join the state church (TA 217-29).

Margrave George was undecided as to the further steps to take with these prisoners, and asked advice of Nürnberg. The theologians and jurists of Nürnberg, of whom the council had requested an opinion, were unanimous "that this sect of the Anabaptists is doubtless a public error and a seduction," but they did not agree on the punishment. The lenience of the theologians' opinion is surprising. But as Jörg pointed out it was based on regard for the emperor and the imperial cities. Since it was impossible to punish Catholic error, as Andreas Osiander explained to the council, it would "be unbecoming to punish one part with the sword and the other part not at all; for it is well known and badly spoken of what the papists do in the corners, one knows it and yet will not punish it" (Jörg, 706).

The opinion of the theologians, dated April 29, 1531, advised that error in the Christian faith should be wiped out through indoctrination in the Word of God and not with the sword. The government should not interfere in matters of faith unless there is sedition in addition to false doctrine. Some of the theologians were also of the opinion that the imperial laws and the regulations of the Swabian League against the Anabaptists were in many points contrary to the Word of God and too tyrannical. Community of goods was no reason for inflicting severe punishment on the Anabaptists, since it could be carried out in a Christian spirit and had even been introduced by the apostles for the alleviation of distress. If the Anabaptists act as they say, their words would be blameless. But if they should attempt compulsory sharing of goods, then it would be the duty of the government to interfere. Lober and Hutscher should be banished from the country as obstinate and separated members of the church. Several theologians also favored detaining them for a while longer and giving them opportunity to be converted. But the other theologians did not consider prison a means to compel return to the church; knowledge of the truth must come freely and without terror, alone through the Word. Imprisonment would make these people more obstinate.

The jurists said the imperial law which prohibited Anabaptism on penalty of death was much too sharp for Christians, but the government could decree lifelong exile. If one then returned, he could be punished corporally for transgression of the law. Lober, because he was a priest and practiced community of goods which would certainly give rise to revolt and civil war, and likewise Hutscher, should be asked on the rack who their brethren were, where they lived, what they thought of possessions, whether they should be shared forcibly, and whether they did not believe that the government should be destroyed. If they had that kind of opinions they should be punished accordingly. But if they did not, they should still be branded with some kind of physical sign, either with an iron or by having their ears cut off and be driven out of the country with a lash. Longer imprisonment was not recommended.

The Ansbach (margravate) government was not adverse to the counsel of the Nürnberg lawyers. Lober and Hutscher were questioned again. Religious questions were scarcely touched. An attempt was made to charge them with sedition, and to make them say that it was their goal to lead the people into "a false appearance of a pretended good life, to form a big army, and to destroy all government" (TA 236).

On May 6, 1531, Lober was confronted with ten questions relating to these points. He denied having deviated from the pure teaching of the Gospel. They reproached him with misunderstanding the commandment of Christ to baptize and demanded that he desist from his "error," but he refused. Then the charge was made, that behind the "favorable and hypocritical front" something else lurked, namely, the elimination of all government and the communizing of all goods, which Lober denied. There must be governments, he declared; one must obey the state whether good or bad. He would undertake nothing against the government; only in matters of faith it was better to obey God than man. To the question, who their heads were, he answered that he knew of no head but God in heaven; those who teach them the Word of God they call shepherds, teachers, preachers, and leaders; they are considered no different from other brethren and among them there was no respect of person.

Since Lober refused to recant he "was tortured three times." The records say that he prayed God to give him grace to overcome the torture and to be true to his belief. His tormentors apparently pitied him, for he called out to them that they should continue to carry out their orders; for their superiors did not know what they were doing (TA 239).

On May 12 he was told that Christ had not taught baptism, but repentance; he replied that he had repented, and been baptized upon his faith, adopted a life meet for repentance and now he was in God's mercy. Luther and other Christian preachers did not preach baptism as it had been taught at the time of the apostles; nor did they carry out apostolic discipline, since they did not apply the ban and tolerated the wicked in the church. He would not desist from his faith. He knew that he could stand before God only if he relied on Christ the Lord and not on men (TA 245).

The Ansbach government then asked Nürnberg for another opinion on the punishment of Lober and Hutscher. The theologians taking part in formulating this opinion were Friedrich Pistorius, Georg Pesler, Hektor Pomer, Dominicus Schleuper, Andreas Osiander, Blasius Stöckel, and Sebastian Fürnschilt; and the jurists were Dr. Scheurl, Dr. Hepstein, Dr. Gugel, Dr. Mullner, Christoph Coler, and Hans Rider. The theologians called attention to the wide dissemination of Anabaptism. Therefore they urged caution. The consultations dealt only with questions of faith. If they wanted to act in accord with the Word of God, they must consider the prisoners as persons "who had temporarily erred and had committed no other deeds." They should be instructed kindly, since they neither understood nor interpreted the Bible correctly. They were not guilty of sedition. But if they should not be amenable to instruction, but persisted in their error, they should be expelled from the country, since in that case they would be openly resisting the government. Osiander considered it questionable to punish these poor people whose intentions were of the best; but on the other hand this error could not be tolerated.

The lawyers also dealt only with questions of faith and stated that there could be no talk of sedition or of the suppression of the government. Scheurl declared that the prisoners had "let themselves be baptized against the command of God." Since they persisted in their error, they had also "acted to the offense of the government and of Christian love." One could therefore say with a good conscience that they had forfeited their life. But because this error was greatly on the increase it was necessary to treat these prisoners accordingly. If they could be made to recant, they should be branded on the cheek or forehead because of disregard for the transgression of the law, and then be expelled from the country. Gugel and Mullner concurred in this opinion. As a punishment for rebaptism they recommended branding or cutting off the ears. Mullner states that since Lober did not reject the government nor did the Anabaptists wish to compel anyone to give up his goods, the prisoners should be penalized only as misguided, erroneously baptized persons (TA 259-62). On the same day the mayor and the council of Nürnberg wrote to Ansbach that it was difficult to take action against the Anabaptists. If they were only misguided Nürnberg would, if the case were theirs, punish them by exile.

The Ansbach government was not satisfied with Nürnberg's advice. Now the Schmalkaldian League meeting, which was about to be held at Frankfurt, was to make the decision. The Ansbach emissaries tried to secure a resolution which would forbid the toleration of Anabaptists in the regions under its jurisdiction and which would leave it open to each government to penalize Anabaptists who after instruction by the clergy would not desist from their faith. But the League declared itself on June 9, 1531, not authorized to give advice on the punishment of Anabaptists. Finally the case was taken under advisement by the Landtag committee of Brandenburg. In a decision at Kosten on March 21, 1532, they agreed on exile; "only the very obstinate should be punished" (Schornbaum, Politik, 500, 516).

What the Ansbach government finally did with Lober is not known. Nor do we hear anything more of him. HEGE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; J. E. Jörg, Deutschland in der Revolutions-Periode 1522-1526 (Freiburg, 1851); TA Bayern I; Karl Schornbaum, Zur Politik des Markgrafen Georg von Brandenburg (Munich 1906); W. Wiswedel, Bilder II; Ztscht für die Geschichte des Oberrheins LVIII, 81; ML II, 675-77.

Lochem, van (van Loghem, van Loghum), a Mennonite family of the Netherlands, living at Enschedé, province of Overijssel, since before 1572. Until about 1700 it was also found at Burgsteinfurt, Westphalia, Germany, which apparently was its original residence. Later branches of this family are also found at Almelo, Deventer, Winterswijk, Amsterdam, and other Dutch towns. It could not be ascertained when this family turned from Catholicism to Mennonitism, but at least in 1626 Dries van Lochem of Enschedé was a Mennonite, as were his children and their descendants. They usually were businessmen and textile manufacturers. The sons of Lambert van Lochem, Herman (1695-1782) and Jan van Lochem (1691-1766), were the founders, in 1728, of a large textile plant at Enschedé (half-linen and later cotton). Some members went into the magistracy, e.g., Hendrik van Lochem (1774-1843), who published some volumes of poems, and his son Hendrik van Lochem (1808-81), both of whom served as town clerk of Deventer. Jan van Lochem of Enschedé (1774-1829), a textile manufacturer, was burgomaster of Enschedé 1818-29. Many members of the van Lochem family served the Mennonite Church as deacons. By marriage they became related with a number of well-known Mennonite families, such as Stenfort, Warnaars, Blijdenstein, Willink, Hofkes, Paschen, Naber, ten Cate, Bavink, Nieuwenhuis, Eppenhoff, van Delden, van Dalen. vdZ.

G. Heeringa, et al., Uit het verleden der Doopsgezinden in Twenthe (Borne, n.d.) 32-46; P. Beets, Stamboek der Willingen (Deventer, 1767); J. H. Warnaars, Het geslacht Warnaars (Amsterdam, 1920); N.N.B.Wb. I, 1278; VI, 960.

Locher, Hans, of Munich, Germany, author of the tract, Ein tzeytlang geschwigner christl. Bruder, etc., 1523, who chastises the evils prevalent in the Catholic Church, and also the "traitor" Luther, and who presents views that resemble those of the Anabaptists. Nothing else is known of him. (Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 103; ML II, 677.) NEFF.

Lochmaier, Leonhard, a Hutterite martyr. After the death of Hutter it was clear that Moravia and not Tirol was the center of the Austrian Anabaptist movement. But this does not mean that there were no men of energetic action for the Anabaptist cause left in Tirol. One such man was Leonhard Lochmaier. He stemmed from Freising, had been a Catholic priest eight years, was baptized in 1526 by Jörg Krautschlögel (q.v.), who was burned at the stake in 1527 with his wife; then he served the brotherhood in Moravia, Lower Austria, and the adjoining parts of Slovakian Hungary.

In 1538 he was in the upper valley of the Inn, in the valleys of the Oetz and Pitz at the side of Offrus Griesinger (q.v.), where he gathered a congregation. But in the last days of April he with nine companions, George Übel of Lenbach near Brixen, Hans Nass of Tirdl-Meran, Ruepp Haas, Cyprian, and Veit Kuhn of Hueb, Veronika Klasen, Manhart's wife Ursula Hellriegel, Anna Mark, and Margareta Kofer, fell into the hands of Eitelhans Gienger, magistrate of St. Petersburg. Veit Kuhn declared himself to ready to recant immediately and was pardoned. The rest were taken for trial to Petersburg. Because Lochmaier was a priest, and had been seized in the bishopric of Brixen, he was turned over to the ecclesiastical court.

By this time the cantonal government of Tirol had come to the conclusion that the barbarous methods being used were not producing the desired results, and that more could be done to convert the Anabaptists by persuasion. In Dr. Gallus Müller (q.v.), court preacher in Innsbruck and city pastor in Tirol-Meran, they had a well-qualified person for this task.

The efforts of Gallus Müller and the suffragan Albrecht of Brixen were successful, for on July 18, 1538, the government was asked to pardon Lochmaier. The government, believing that pardon would make the best impression on the populace as well as on the Anabaptists, complied. Indeed the vice-governor and chancellor of Brixen announced that Lochmaier had made his recantation "sincerely and devoutly" in the local church and had given undoubted signs that he meant it, and "if he were pardoned he would do much good for the eradication of this sect." Ferdinand made the request that Lochmaier be detained in Brixen another year, so that the constancy of his character and conduct could be tested. This information was given to the councilors in Brixen with the request that they henceforth use Lochmaier for the conversion of his former companions.

But in the meantime a change had taken place in Lochmaier. When the suffragan and vicar Jörg Stemmler read him the letter from the government he replied that he had not requested Dr. Gallus Müller to trouble himself on his account with the king and would not be in a position to thank him for it. When they showed him his recantation he said "he had done this out of fear and terror foolishly, he himself didn't know how; he had repented twice as often as the number of hairs upon his head." When he was told that he should now go out and convert the Anabaptists, he replied, "he would not only not deflect them from their faith, he would stay with it himself." At the same time he attempted to make contact with Griesinger who was imprisoned there. Perhaps it was the news of the imprisonment of this Anabaptist leader that moved Lochmaier's heart so powerfully.

The government was informed about this incident on Sept. 6, 1538. It was reported that Lochmaier made an attempt to free himself by removing his chains. Dr. Müller immediately sent a report to King Ferdinand; and the king replied that they should halt the pardoning of Lochmaier. The government wrote that since only worse things were to be feared from Griesinger and the other prisoners, they should not hesitate to take the necessary steps. The Brixen authorities wrote to Ferdinand that they knew no other course but to commit them both to the flames.

On Sept. 16 the Brixen council discussed whether Griesinger and Lochmaier should be executed publicly or quietly. They decided that "Griesinger, who is gentle and quiet in speech, would move many of the people. Therefore we are planning to let the law take its course in all secrecy." Dr. Müller remained interested in Lochmaier to the last moment and tried again to persuade him to recant. That displeased the chancellor Han. "Good Dr. Gall is deceived by Lochmaier's hypocrisy and patience, which is not usual with the Anabaptists. In reality he is a malicious preacher, who has for nearly ten years been casting pious folk into misfortune. If he should get out again, he would do worse than Hutter, who did a great deal of damage. If he is let out again nothing else can be believed but that he will return to the Anabaptists where his pregnant wife is." To his wife Bärbel, Lochmaier had Griesinger write a letter thanking her for her love. "God has helped me again; I know that I have sadly grieved you; pardon and forgive me!" And Griesinger wrote, "Leonhard, to be sure, fell in weakness; but God be praised he is confessing the Lord again." In a second letter he said, "We were supposed to have been executed before this but something suddenly interfered."

Griesinger was put to death on Oct. 31, 1538. In his last letter to the brotherhood in Moravia Lochmaier wrote, "Why I am so long imprisoned only God knows. I have consoled myself to die with pious Offerus, but God the Lord has denied it to me; I am waiting every day like a poor lamb. But the preachers must have their arbitrary way and take off my priestly robes and only then deliver me to the hangman."

The conclusion of the degradation was delayed; for only a bishop may perform it. On Oct. 8 the suffragan had died and Prince-bishop Georg was outside the country. Not until Lochmaier's degradation was complete was he put to death with a sword, "several days after Offerus." The principles he defended against Dr. Gall and the other Catholic clergy were those of the Hutterian Brethren.

Lochmaier left two letters written in prison; one to his wife Bärbel, and the other to the brotherhood in Austria and Moravia. These letters reveal the location of the Bruderhofs in Moravia, "where they might serve each other without hindrance." These were at Tischnowitz (leader Brother Oswald), Rohrbach (Brother Matthes), Butschowitz (Brother Ulrich) at Austerlitz, Auspitz, Schackwitz, Rackwitz, Pilgram, Kostel, Znaim, and Popitz; in Lower Austria at Nannsgarten and Walltersdorf.

Two songs written by Lochmaier have been preserved: a devotional hymn of ten stanzas, "Lobt Gott den Herrn, ir fromme Kindt," and "Verlass mich nicht o Herr, mein Gott." LOSERTH.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 137; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 139-42; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Loserth, Anabaptismus; idem, "Zwei biographische Skizzen aus der Zeit der Wiedertäufer in Tirol," in Ztscht der Ferdin. für Tirol und Vorarlberg III, No. 39, pp. 288 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 42, E 448; ML II, 677-79.

Lochy. In many localities in Moravia, especially in the southern part of the country, there are subterranean passages and rooms made by human hands, called "lochy" by the Slavic population. They are, however, by no means peculiar to Moravia; for similar ones are known in western Slovakia, in southern Bohemia, and also in Bavaria and Alsace. They are especially common in Upper and Lower Austria where they are called "earth stalls" or "earth holes."

The interest in these subterranean buildings has continued for more than half a century and the results of investigation to clarify their origin, the time of their creation, and their purpose has been written down in numerous essays and in two separate volumes. The greatest credit in the investigation of these holes in Austria and Moravia is due P. Lambert Karner, a Benedictine monk of Lower Austria, who investigated personally nearly all the more important ones known in his time, and described, measured, and sketched them minutely. More than 25 years of his life he devoted to this strenuous study; he wrote the results in the comprehensive work, Die künstlichen Höhlen aus alter Zeit. For future investigation Karner's work is of special value for its exact and very detailed descriptions.

But this is not the case with the conclusions which Karner deducted from his information and experiences. Scholarship, in this case represented by the noted archaeologist Oswald Menghin, has shown Karner's views on the age and purpose of these passageways to be wrong. In opposition to Karner, who considered the holes as prehistoric or at least very early historical places for a mysterious religious cult, Menghin believes that they are medieval or modern creations, which served the populace as a hiding place in times of war and distress.

This sober view, which is shared by M. Hörnes, R. Much, and the Moravian archaeologist J. L. Cervinka, has since been adopted by nearly all scholarly investigators. Nevertheless the romantic view of these holes has persisted to the present, especially through the efforts of Franz Kiesslinger, who, in his work Ueber das Rätsel der Erdställe, goes even further than Karner. Kiessling thinks them to be the work of a prehistoric race of dwarfs inhabiting Central Europe.

But even the sober view of the subterranean passages can be criticized. Menghin and his followers explain their origin by the assumption that they were built by the people for security in times of war. But it has been shown that the Moravian, Austrian, Bavarian, and Alsatian passages agree in their general layout as well as in typical details, so that one can speak of a unified system. It is hard to assume that people living so far apart would have built hiding places which agree even in measurements. On the other hand some of the holes are by no means primitive creations, but give evidence of greater knowledge, imagination, and skill than can be attributed to the medieval peasants. Contrary to all previous explanations of the rise, origin, and purpose of these passageways it can be said with assurance that at least those in Moravia were made by the Hutterian Brethren, who appeared there as early as the second third of the 16th century, lived here nearly a century, remnants maintaining themselves there until almost the middle of the 17th century. More than any of the religious brotherhoods in Moravia at that time, they were persecuted because of their religious faith. The first great persecution, which was to banish them, indeed to eliminate them from the country, was begun at the command of King Ferdinand, and was so severe that nothing was left for them but to flee into the mountains and forests or in the truest sense of the word to disappear below the earth into the holes they had created as a shelter.

For this idea there are evidences in their chronicles in which I shall cite only several of the more important which can be found in the books by Rudolf Wolkan (Geschicht-Buch), Joseph Beck (Geschichts-Bücher), and Zieglschmid (Chronik). Thus in the description of the persecution of 1548 it is said that the Brethren "made holes and pits in the earth like foxes for their home. However hard it is for a person to endure, they would have accepted it with great thanks if it had only been permitted and granted them. But they could not stay for any length of time, they were spied out and pursued." In Popice (near Auspitz), "where they also stayed below the earth in pits, there came godless persons who made a fire before the hole and wanted to suffocate them with the smoke or smoke them out. But they were driven away and prevented. Especially around the Meyberg (in the Pollau Mountains in south Moravia), they had in many places pits and holes in which they stayed for a while with their children; also in the clefts of the rocks . . . of the Meyberg, and also in other localities in the country where they were able" (Wolkan, 249; Beck, 186 f.). During the persecution of 1550 the lord of Liechtenstein learned that "the Brethren were living in caves and holes on his land" in his Nikolsburg domain. But while he was preparing to get them out they vanished (Wolkan, 251 f.; Beck, 189 f.). Another place in the Hutterian chronicle states that during the six years of the persecution they lived in "holes of the earth" (Beck, 184 and 191), which is confirmed by other chronicles. In later times, when the Hutterites already had many established settlements, even as late as the first decade of the 17th century, thus not long before their exile into Slovakia, enemies attacking their houses discovered their "concealed holes in the earth" (Wolkan, 561, 556, 558, etc.). These references prove that during the persecution in Moravia the Hutterian Brethren built subterranean hiding places which they described as "holes in the earth," pits, and "secret archways" (the holes really are arched).

It would be difficult to deny the great probability that these passageways are identical with the modern "lochy," as the name "Löcher" suggests. But in addition there is a tradition still current among the people which connects these holes with the Anabaptists. The individual volumes of the topographical Moravian geography published in Brno show that the inhabitants of Syrovin assert that the "lochy" were hiding places of the Anabaptists. Also the holes in Lanzhot (Landshut) as well as in Nykolcice (Nikelschütz), where the holes exist precisely at the places where the Hutterites had their Bruderhofs, and also in Tynec (Teinitz) tradition calls the holes Anabaptist. In Tvrdonice (Turnitz), where the people still relate that the persecuted Anabaptists had lived in long cellars, some of which still exist, these cellars are doubtless holes. Hence local tradition completely corroborates the Hutterian chronicles.

If we then assume that the Anabaptists were the originators—this does not mean of all the holes—we can explain much that has hitherto defied explanation. For instance, knowing that the Anabaptists did not meet the enemy with a weapon, not even when their life was threatened, we can more easily understand the complicated and sometimes apparently irrational plan of the holes. Thus when a passage keeps changing its direction and when a pit is interrupted and continues on a higher level which can be reached only by a special tunnel and when the same passage in a great arc returns to its original point of entry, all of this serves to give time to the victim to escape from his pursuers, and obviously to confuse the opponent.

The assumption of an Anabaptist origin for these passages explains a number of particulars of the internal arrangement, such as the various chambers in which the passages always end, the niches for watchmen and lights, and especially the clever foresightedness with which these passages were planned and executed. It is known that there was among the Hutterites a concentration of skilled craftsmen and highly intelligent personalities. Since we know that the Hutterian Brethren had a strongly centralized organization which regulated every activity according to unified lines, we understand the source of the unity of the subterranean passages. And these passages occurring from Alsace to Slovakia are located in precisely those places where the Anabaptists had their settlements for a long time.

These explanations by no means constitute a complete solution of the problem of the subterranean passage called lochy or earth stalls and earth holes, but they bring concrete evidence of Anabaptist origin for at least the Moravian holes, and thereby point to possibilities which may yet lead to the final solution of this interesting question. K.C.

L. Karner, Künstliche Höhlen aus alter Zeit (Vienna, 1903); F. Kiesslinger, Ueber das Rätsel der Erdställe (Vienna, 1923, 2d ed., 1925; discussed by H. Mötefindt in Wiener Prähistorische Ztscht XI, 1924, 154); O. Menghin, "Ueber das Alter der Erdställe und Hausberge," in Wiener Präh. Ztscht III (1916) 101-10; J. L. Cervinka, "Loch," umole, jeskyne na Morave in Casopis morav. musea zemskeho (Periodical of the Museum of Moravia in Brno, V, 1905) 266-78; K. Cernohorsky, "Novokrtensky puvod moravskych lochu" (The Anabaptist Origin of the Moravian Holes) in Lidove noviny (Brno) Sept. 27, 1934; ML II, 679-82.

Lockport Mennonite Church (MC), located three miles north of Stryker, Williams Co., Ohio, a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference, had its beginning in 1834-36, when a group of Amish settlers from Alsace and France settled in the Fulton County area. The most common names were Short, Stuckey, Graber, Beck, and Aschliman. At first, in accord with Amish practice, they met in homes for services. In 1870 the Central meetinghouse was built and served the entire Fulton-Williams County settlement. Even after other meetinghouses were built at Lockport and West Clinton, the group was organized as a single congregation until 1943. The Lockport church was built in 1908 and remodeled in 1930. It is located at the western end of the Mennonite community. In 1955 the membership was 382, with Walter Stuckey as bishop, and Simon Stuckey and Earl Stuckey as ministers. In 1951 the Lockport congregation established the Pinegrove Mennonite Church (q.v.). W.S.

Locle-Bressels, an Amish Mennonite church in the canton of Neuchâtel, Switzerland, on the French border, formerly called the Neuenburg church. The severe persecution of the Mennonites by Bern, continuing into the 18th century, induced many old Bernese peasants in the Jura to seek refuge in the mountains of Neuchâtel. A few may have gone to this canton as early as 1671 and 1693-95, when the Mennonites were compelled to leave with all their possessions. But the principal immigration took place in the first quarter of the 18th century, when several old Bernese families settled in Val de Ruz, Chaux-de-Fonds, and Le Locle. At the demand of the political communities of the Jura, the Prince Bishop of Basel ordered the evacuation of all Mennonites from his domain in the Jura in 1730-31. Though this order was not carried out, a number of families went to Neuchâtel. One of these immigrants was Christian Hummel (Ummel) of Buchholterberg near Thun.

These immigrants, who settled on farms around Le Locle and the hamlet of Bressels (La Sagne), constituted the Locle-Bressels congregation. The earliest information about it states that in 1785 Abraham Kocher, his sister Bäbi Kocher, and Susanna Frutiger, who were on the farm of Abraham Ramseyer, a preacher, were received into the congregation. These brethren were Amish, and kept close contact with the sister congregation at Montbéliard, France.

Services were held on the scattered farms. In the second half of the 19th century many of the members emigrated to America, and the congregation, which was always small (in 1887 only 31 baptized members, 14 males besides 46 children), continued to decline. In 1923 the group merged with Chaux d'Abel (q.v.). Jacob Müller was elder 1881-1911, and Alexander Stähly elder 1902-23 (preacher from 1867). David Geiser appears in the yearbook as preacher 1902-23, 1902 being the first volume containing Swiss congregational reports. (ML II, 682.) S.G.

Locren, Pieter van, was preacher of the Amsterdam Mennonite Lamist congregation 1662- ? . By his radicalism, his Collegiant (q.v.) principles, his Socinianism (q.v.), and his pugnacity he contributed to the schism in the congregation between the Galenists (followers of Galenus Abrahamsz, q.v.) and the Apostoolsen (adherents of Samuel Apostool, q.v.), which became definite in June 1664. vdZ.

H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 80, 84 f., 97, 111; W. J. Kühler, Het Socinianisme in Nederland (Leiden, 1912) 160.

Locust Grove Conservative (Amish) Mennonite Church, located in Union Twp., Mifflin Co., Pa., one-fourth mile west of Belleville, organized in November 1898 under the leadership of Bishop Abraham D. Zook. The congregation worshiped at first on alternate Sundays at the Belleville and Allensville A.M. meetinghouse, and six months later in the home of David Z. Yoder one mile north of Belleville. A new meetinghouse was built in 1899, and enlarged in 1927 and 1948. The congregation is a member of the Conservative Mennonite Conference. Brethren ordained in the congregation include Samuel T. Yoder, John L. Mast, Jonas D. Yoder, Benjamin Glick, John B. Zook, Emanuel B. Peachey, and Louis Peachey. The 1954 ministers include senior Bishop John L. Mast, junior Bishop Emanuel B. Peachey, preachers John B. Zook and Louis Peachey; the 1954 membership was 405. J.J.Y.

Locust Grove Mennonite Church (MC), located five miles northwest of Burr Oak, St. Joseph Co., Mich., a member of the Indiana-Michigan Conference, was started as a mission station by the Shore congregation near Shipshewana, Ind., about 1940. On Nov. 18, 1945, the church was organized with 61 charter members, and Orvin H. Hooley was ordained as pastor. Lee J. Miller, bishop of the Shore congregation, serves as bishop. The 1954 membership was 190. The first meetinghouse was built in 1941 and enlarged in 1950. O.H.H.

Locust Grove Mennonite Church (MC), located five miles southwest of Elkhart, Ind., a member of the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference, developed out of a Sunday-school mission operated by students of Goshen College and was organized with its own pastor (Russell Krabill) in 1945. In 1948 Ralph Stahly was ordained as pastor, and in 1954 as bishop. The membership in 1956 was 54. The meetinghouse was built in 1950. R.St.

Lodenstein, Jodocus van, a Dutch theologian, b. Feb. 6, 1620, at Delft, d. Aug. 3, 1677, at Utrecht, a man of profound influence on the Dutch Reformed Church by his earnestness, sincere piety, and untiring effort. He was an outstanding hymn writer; some of his hymns were adopted into the Mennonite hymnals. NEFF.

N.N.B.Wb. IX, 614-16; G. Kalff, Gesch. der Nederl. Letterkunde IV (Groningen, 1910) 468-73, 505; DB 1900, 90 f.; ML II, 682.

Loder, a Dutch family, some of whose members are Mennonites. Christiaan Lodewijk Loder I.Mz., a merchant at Amsterdam, married to C. W. Cardinaal, was a deacon of the Amsterdam Mennonite church 1840-44 and 1856-60. His son Christiaan Lodewijk Loder (1843-1908), an engineer, was appointed to the State Wharf at Amsterdam in 1863; in 1873-1906 he was managing director of state shipbuilding and as such he designed a number of warships. One of the most prominent Dutch jurists in the Netherlands was Bernard Cornelis Johannes Loder (1849-1935), who was a member of the Mennonite church board at Rotterdam from 1874. At first he was a lawyer, particularly renowned for his knowledge of maritime and international law. He filled important posts and high offices: after World War I he was a Dutch representative in the peace conference of Paris in 1919; in 1908-22 he was a member of the Dutch State Council; he also was the first president of the International Court of Justice. vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. VI, 321 f.; J. Kosters, In Memoriam Mr. B. C. J. Loder (Amsterdam, 1935).

Lodi, Cal., a town (pop. ca. 20,000) in the Central Valley, San Joaquin County, 40 miles south of Sacramento, the state's capital, is one of the Mennonite communities in the valley noted for their fine fruits and diversified farming, located in one of California's fine cherry-growing areas. Nearly all of the 200 Mennonites in and around Lodi are of the Mennonite Brethren group and are employed in cereal processing, the steel industry, and the building trades.

The first Mennonites came to Lodi in 1907 from Harvey, N.D. The Mennonite element grew rapidly and in the early 1920's the Mennonite Brethren church, with a capacity of 350, was overflowing. Optimism ran high and a site was purchased for the possible location of a Mennonite Brethren college on the West Coast. Congregational difficulties, however, gave the Mennonites in Lodi some severe setbacks. At present, the Mennonite Brethren church, the only Mennonite institution in Lodi, has a membership of 110 and shows signs of growth.

The second Mennonite institution in the vicinity is the Victor Community Chapel, located three miles west of Lodi, a project of the Mennonite Brethren Home Mission Board of the Pacific District Conference. This work began in 1946 and attendance today is 75-100. The Victor community was originally owned and planned by Jacob Knoll, a prosperous Mennonite of Lodi. L.R.J.

Lodi (Cal.) Mennonite Brethren Church, a member of the Pacific District Conference, had its beginning in 1907, when Jacob Knoll, George Bechtold, and Ludwig Reimche arrived in Lodi from Harvey, N.D. For three years these families attended the Evangelical Church in Victor, a hamlet four miles east of Lodi. In 1911 they rented a private home in Victor and held regular services there. In 1912 they moved to Lodi locating in another rented house, and organized a congregation under the leadership of John Berg. The first meetinghouse was erected in 1912, the second in 1920 at the corner of Flora and Garfield streets, 40 x 22 ft. in size. In 1955 an additional educational unit was erected, 60 x 30 ft. Many of the people of this congregation as well as of the community in general are of German background. Many have come from the German Lutheran and Baptist villages in Russia. In the early 1920's the church was filled to capacity, but due to internal difficulties and people moving south the church spent a number of years with a small membership. The first pastor was John Berg, followed by John H. Richert, Peter Rempel, Fred Just, F. F. Wall, J. M. Schlichting, George Reimche, George Sattler, Christ Reimche, John S. Dick, George Warkentin, A. A. Smith, H. D. Wiebe, and Henry H. Epp. In 1956 the pastor was Henry H. Dick, with a membership of 118 and an average attendance of 200. HE.H.D.

Lodovicus, martyr, who (Mart. Mir. D 23, E 433) was beheaded in 1529 with two brethren at Costnitz on Lake Constance, Germany. He was a learned man and a Waldensian preacher. vdZ.

Loesche, Georg Karl David (1855-1932), meritorious Austrian church historian, studied at the universities of Bonn, Tübingen, and Berlin, in 1880 became pastor of the German church in Florence, Italy, in 1885 instructor at the University of Berlin, 1887 professor of church history on the Protestant faculty of the University of Vienna. Among his numerous publications his Geschichte des Protestantismus in Oesterreich (3d edition, 1930) deals especially with the Anabaptists, as do also his articles "Zur Geschichte des Protestantismus in Oberösterreich" and "Tirolensia" in Nos. 45 and 47 of the Jahrbuch der Gesellschaft für die Geschichte des Protestantismus im ehemaligen und im neuen Oesterreich. For 40 years he was the editor of this periodical, which became very important for the study of the history of Protestantism in Austria. He also published articles by other authors on the Anabaptists in Austria. He made a lasting contribution to the study of the Austrian Anabaptists. P.DE.

K. Völker, "Georg Loesche, Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Wiener evangelischtheologischen Fakultät," in Jahrb. der Gesellschaft für die Geschichte der Protestanten in Oesterreich LIV (Vienna and Leipzig, 1933); ML II, 682.

Loevenich, a town in the duchy of Jülich, Germany, Lower Rhine area, where there have been a few Mennonites since the 16th century. Elder Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.) baptized someone from Loevenich about 1550. Apparently the von Loevenich family found at Burtscheid near Aachen, Germany, and van Leuvenigh, at Amsterdam, Holland, derived its name from this town. (DB 1909, 121.) vdZ.

Loewen (Löwen, Loewens, Leewen, Leewens, Liewens, Lieuens), a Prussian Mennonite name of Dutch or Flemish background, appeared in the church record of Danzig as early as 1676. This name was found also in Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Fürstenwerder, Heubuden, Elbing, and Königsberg. From Danzig and Prussia the name was transplanted to Russia, the United States, Canada, and South America. Peter Löwen (q.v.) was a missionary from Russia serving in Sumatra. Anton Löwen (Ukraine and Siberia) was an outstanding teacher and minister. Outstanding leaders in Russia and Canada were Daniel J. Loewen (q.v.), Gerhard Loewen (q.v.), and Jacob A. Loewen. Heinrich Loewen and Wilhelm Loewen were leaders in Russia and South America. (Reimer, Familiennamen.) C.K.

Loewen: see also Löwen.

Loewen, Daniel Jakob (1872-1951), an elder of the Mennonite (GCM) Church, was born Sept. 16, 1872, at Yazykovo, South Russia, the son of Jakob and Maria Klassen Löwen. In 1898 he was married to Anna Ketler; they had one son and five daughters.

When Daniel Loewen was 16 years old the family moved to Borissovo in the Bachmut settlement, this being the first of at least six pioneering experiences. About 1905 he was ordained to the ministry. In 1910 the family moved to Davlekanovo in the province of Ufa, where Daniel and two brothers owned a thriving mill. After the Revolution following World War I the family went on to the Omsk settlement in Siberia. In 1924 they came to Canada and settled at first on a farm near Harris, Sask. He served as a minister in the Westheim Mennonite Church at Rosemary, Alberta, and as elder of the Hoffnungsfeld Mennonite Church at Rabbit Lake, Sask., 1936-42, until he was compelled by his health to resign. He, however, continued to serve as assistant elder in the Schönwiese Mennonite Church of Manitoba. On March 14, 1951, he died at North Kildonan, Man. J.H.En.

Loewen, Gerhard (1863-1946), a Mennonite educator, writer, and minister, b. March 19, 1863 (Russian Calendar), Chortitza, South Russia, d. June 2, 1946, Stuartburn, Man. He was the son of Gerhard G. and Sara Wiebe Löwen, attended the Zentralschule, and the normal school of Chortitza, after which he received a certificate for elementary teaching. After some additional training under A. A. Neufeld he received at Ekaterinoslav a private tutor's diploma with German as his major. At the age of 18 he began his teaching career, serving at Einlage (two years), Neuhorst (three years), Neu-Osterwick (eight years), Rosental Ratzyn, Chortitza (1903), again Einlage (nine years), and Arkadak (three years). In 1896 he received a silver medal with a red Alexander ribbon "For outstanding Service." In 1912 he joined the new settlement at Arkadak, Saratov, living in the village of Leonidovka. In 1884 Loewen married Maria Derksen. They had 13 children.

In 1925 Loewen emigrated to Canada, where he taught at the Mennonite Educational Institute at Altona, Man., for two years. In 1927 he joined his children at Stuartburn, Man., devoting his time to the instruction of the children of the community in German and Bible.

In 1896 the Chortitza Mennonite congregation, of which he was a member, elected Loewen as a minister. In addition to his work as teacher and minister, Loewen was a poet and writer. His articles and poems were published in numerous periodicals in Russia, Germany, and Canada. In 1895 he published a collection of poems, entitled Feldblumen (Halbstadt). After this followed in collaboration with M. Fast and Penner a volume Fröhliche Weihnachten (Halbstadt), a collection of plays and poems for use in school Christmas programs. In 1906 he published Eine Ferienreise (H. Lenzmann, Gross-Tokmak) and in 1946 followed a second enlarged edition of Feldblumen (Steinbach, Man., 1946). AR.D.

Arnold Dyck, "The Poet Gerhard Loewen," Menn. Life III (January 1948) 22 f.

Logan County, Ohio, located in west central Ohio, is primarily an agricultural area with rolling terrain. Amish Mennonites, largely from eastern Ohio and Mifflin Co., Pa., settled in the southern part of the county beginning about 1840. West Liberty (1950 pop. 1,397), at the southern border of the county, is central to the present Mennonite settlement which spills over into Champaign County to the south. In 1954 there were three Mennonite (MC) churches in the community, including about 1,000 persons. Two of the churches, Bethel and South Union, and about two thirds of the Mennonite population in the area are located in Logan County. The Mennonite Orphans' Home, established 1898, is located in West Liberty. J.H.KA.

Logan County, Ohio, Mennonite (MC) congregation, now extinct, was founded in 1832 in Union Township several miles northwest of West Liberty by families from Rockingham Co., Va. Henry Kulp brought his family to Union Township in a three-horse wagon in 1831. His brother-in-law Daniel Funk followed in 1832. Daniel Funk was ordained to the ministry about 1840 and sometime later bishop. The congregation never prospered. Some of the first families returned to Fairfield Co., Ohio, and later joined the group that helped found the Salem Mennonite settlement in Allen Co., Ohio. Others moved to Clay and Owen counties (q.v.), Ind., where some of their descendants have become ministers in the Methodist and United Brethren churches. Those who remained in Logan County united with the German Baptist congregation southwest of Bellefontaine. J.S.U.

Logan Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located near Durham, Marion Co., Kan., was organized in the late 1880's. The meetinghouse was built in 1904. The 1955 membership was 71, with Claude Unruh as minister. The congregation is sometimes known as Durham. C.C.W.

Loghem (Loghum, Lochem) van, a former Dutch Mennonite family: see Lochem, van.

Lohrenz, Henry W. (1878-1945), minister, educator, and prominent leader in the Mennonite Brethren Church, was born near Moundridge, Kan., Feb. 2, 1878, the third of the ten children of Heinrich and Elizabeth (Wiens) Lohrenz, who emigrated from the Molotschna Mennonite settlement in South Russia in 1874. Henry was converted and baptized into the M.B. Church in 1896. For two years he taught school in the vicinity of Inman, Kan. In the fall of 1900 he enrolled in the German Department School which the M.B. Church at that time conducted in connection with McPherson College, McPherson, Kan. After completing this course he continued in the college, graduating with the A.B. degree in 1908. He married Anna M. Friesen on Dec. 26, 1906. Of the six children born to them four died in infancy; a daughter and a son survive.

In 1904 the Ebenfeld M.B. Church near Hillsboro, Kan., of which Lohrenz was a member, elected him to the ministry and ordained him three years later. He was a gifted public speaker and for 41 years preached extensively and effectively and was much in demand to speak at conferences, festivals, and at other important occasions.

Lohrenz performed the greater part of his life's service in connection with the educational efforts of the M.B. Church, taking a leading part in the establishing of Tabor College at Hillsboro in 1908, and serving for 23 years as the president of the College. During most of this time he taught natural science and Biblical subjects in addition to the administrative duties. During these years of teaching Lohrenz continued his graduate studies, receiving the M.A. degree from Kansas University in 1911. He also attended Columbia University. When it became apparent that his work would be in the theological college, he prepared himself through further study at Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky., Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, N.J., and Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill. The Northern Baptist Theological Seminary, Chicago, granted him the D.D. degree in 1929. Beginning with September 1932 Lohrenz taught Bible and biology in Bethel College for two years, then Bible in the Corn (Okla.) Bible School and Academy for one year. Beginning in 1935 he served as dean of the Theological College of Tabor College for six years and continued as professor of New Testament four years more.

Lohrenz rendered valuable service in the conference activities of the M.B. Church. In his early years he was much used as secretary. For some time he wrote and edited the M.B. Sunday-school quarterly. The conference found in him an able leader and a useful worker, electing him to various boards and important committees. He was elected moderator of the General Conference for four three-year terms and served the Southern District Conference as moderator nine one-year terms. He served as chairman of the Board of Foreign Missions of the M.B. Church 1919-36 and as executive secretary-treasurer 1936-45. In connection with these duties he traveled extensively, representing the cause of missions at churches and conferences. He edited a number of booklets on missions and wrote many articles for the Zionsbote.

Lohrenz died at Hillsboro on March 16, 1945, and was buried at the local M.B. Cemetery. ("Nachruf" in Zionsbote, May 16, 1945.) J.H.L.

Loisten, followers of Eloy (Loys) Pruystinck (q.v.) in Antwerp, Belgium, and elsewhere. They are mentioned in Luther's letter "An die Christen zu Antorff" (Antwerp) of 1525. Here they are said to embrace the following heresies: every man possesses the Holy Spirit; the Holy Spirit is nothing but man's own mind; hell and reprobation do not exist; the carnal body of man is damned, but every soul has everlasting life. The Loists exerted some influence on the extreme left wing of the large and complicated movement of Anabaptism in the Netherlands. David Joris (q.v.), who lived in 1524 in Antwerp before he joined the Anabaptists (and also later), may have been influenced by them. Rembert calls them "Freigeister." The Loist movement was suppressed before 1545. Eloy Pruystinck himself was executed at Antwerp on Oct. 23, 1544. vdZ.

Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 165-75; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 276; J. Fredericks, De Secte der Loisten of Antwerpsche Libertijnen (Gent, 1891); Mellink, Wederdopers, 413.

Loman Mennonite Church (MC), formerly called the Northern Light Gospel Mission, located about four miles south of Loman, which is on the Canadian border in Koochiching Co., Minn., is a member of the North Central Conference. It has (1954) a membership of 20, all rural people. The mission was started in July 1938, by two couples, the Groffs and the Schantzes, of Pennsylvania. This is a work of faith with no promise of support by any board, church, or individual and with no solicitation. The workers of the area have also started work at White Earth, Menahga, Leader, Cass Lake, and Graceton, with two families at all but the latter two places, Cass Lake having two single workers, and Graceton one family to date. This group of workers conducts services regularly at eleven different places. In 1943 Irwin Schantz was ordained minister for the Loman church. The present minister is William Kurtz. I.S.

Lombard Mennonite Church (MC), located 18 miles west of Chicago in the suburb of Lombard, was organized on Oct. 23, 1954. For over two years previous to this Mennonite families that had moved to the Chicago area for vocational interests had met in homes for Bible study and fellowship. The charter membership, beginning with 14 members, was closed a year later with 51 members. This included associate members from the Evanston and Elgin I-W units and members of the General Conference Mennonite Church living in the area. Services are held at the church parsonage at 1012 Whitmore Lane, Lombard, and the East Lombard Civic Club Building, Westmore and Division, Lombard, until there is a regular church building. The church is affiliated with the Illinois (MC) Mennonite Conference. LeRoy Kennel is the pastor. L.E.K.

London, the capital of Great Britain, was in the early years of the Reformation the scene of Anabaptist activity, especially of the followers of Melchior Hofmann, who came to England in the 1530's from the Netherlands. About 1535 the authorities arrested four Englishmen in London for their part in the distribution of an Anabaptist confession of faith. They had connections with Flemish Anabaptists. At the house of one of them, John Raulinges in London, "many of the sayd faction dyuers tymes assembled," and their "bishop and reder" was a Fleming by the name of Bastian. The foreign Anabaptists in England were the chief victims of persecution under Henry VIII. On May 25, 1535, 25 Dutch Anabaptists were examined at St. Paul's for erroneous views regarding the incarnation, the mass, and baptism, with the result that 14 were condemned. Two of this number were burned at Smithfield on June 8, 1535, and the others sent to various English towns for a similar death. On Oct. 1, 1538, the king appointed an ecclesiastical commission, including Archbishop Cranmer and three other theologians, "to search for and examine Anabaptists . . . and destroy all books of that detestable sect." On Nov. 24 four Dutch Anabaptists recanted by bearing fagots at St. Paul's, while on Nov. 29 three were burned at Smithfield. One of these was Jan Mathijsz van Middelburg (not to be confused with Jan Matthys van Haarlem), the well-known leader at Amsterdam and elsewhere in the Low Countries; the other two were Peter Franke and his wife, a young couple from Brugge in Flanders. On May 3, 1540, three Anabaptists were executed at Southwark, of whom two were foreigners and one an Englishman.

Since about 1535 Anabaptists had been escaping from Holland and Flanders to London. In June 1535 David Joris, intending to go to London to save his life, sailed from Vlissingen (Flushing), Dutch province of Zeeland, but learning that the Anabaptists were also persecuted in London, he gave up his plan when his ship was forced by a storm to return to Vlissingen (Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 199). A. L. E. Verheyden in Mennisme in Vlaanderen gives the following information: On Nov. 22, 1538, "Lambert, alias John Nycolsen, was burned in Smithfield and the same day two Flemings and the wife of one of them were adjudged to death. A third man abjured. They were Anabaptists." (Quoted from Letters and Papers, Foreign and Domestic, of the Reign of Henry VIII, vol. XIII, 2, 1893, p. 374.) On April 10, 1540, a Mennonite named Barnes "has been put in the Tower with his two accomplices, accompanied by 10 or 12 burgesses of this town and 15 or 20 (?) strangers, mostly from Flanders and all Anabaptists." (Quoted from loc. cit., vol. XV, 1896, p. 205 f.)

After the death of Henry VIII in 1547 the Anabaptists in England appeared more in the open. In 1549 John Hooper complained that the Anabaptists flocked to his lectures in London and disputed on the doctrine of the incarnation. One of their leaders, Henry Hart, held a public debate with John Reynolds at St. Margaret's Church in London, likely about 1553. Joan Boucher (see Boucher, Jane) was tried before Archbishop Cranmer and other ecclesiastics on April 12, 1549, and was condemned and burned at the stake May 21, 1550, as an Anabaptist, particularly for holding the Melchiorite view of the incarnation. At her trial she declared "a thousand in London were of her sect." John (Johan) Knel (q.v.) and Anna Cantiana were also martyred in this year by burning at the stake (Mart. Mir. D 99, E 498).

In Elizabeth's reign 20 Dutch Anabaptists were arrested in London at the time of a meeting on Easter, April 3, 1575. Of this group 14 were banished, two escaped from prison, and two, Jan Pieters and Hendrick Terwoort, were burned at Smithfield on July 22 of the same year (Mart. Mir. D 694-712, E 1008-24). These Anabaptists "were Menno's people." The elders of the Austin Friars Church in London, the congregation for foreigners, were severely accused, particularly by Protestants in Antwerp, for their implication in this affair. This was one part of a long chapter of controversy about Anabaptists in London in connection with Austin Friars, which resulted in 1562 in the expulsion and banishment of Adrian van Haemstede, one of the ministers, for holding tolerant views.

London and Norwich were strong separatist centers during Elizabeth's reign, and it was at London that the Barrowist wing of Independency had its rise. The separatist leaders, Henry Barrow, John Greenwood, and John Penry, were executed at London in 1593, and the congregation led by Francis Johnson to Amsterdam in the same year came from London. The first congregation of separatists holding to believers' baptism to be established on English soil, to which the General Baptists owe their origin, was founded at London in 1612 when Thomas Helwys and his followers returned to England from Amsterdam.

In the Mennonite archives at Amsterdam (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 1367-75) are found a few letters of a correspondence in 1624-30 between Elias Tookey (q.v.) of London and the Dutch Mennonites (Hans de Ries and Reinier Wybrantsz) concerning a union to be made between some evangelical congregations in England (London, Lincoln, Sarum, Coventry, and Tyverton), who called themselves Anabaptists, but obviously were Baptists, and the Dutch Waterlander Mennonites, which union, however, did not come to pass. I.B.H.

J. S. Brewer and J. Gairdner, Letters and Papers, Foreign and Domestic, of the Reign of Henry VIII (London, 1920-32, Vol. XIII, Addenda I); D. Wilkins, Concilia Magnae Britanniae et Hiberniae (London, 1737, Vol. IV); Mart. Mir.; J. Hessels, Ecclesiae Londino-Batavae Archivum I-III (Cambridge, 1887-97); C. Burrage, The Early English Dissenters I-II (Cambridge, 1912); B. Krohn, Gesch. der fanatischen und enthusiastischen Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1758); ML II, 687.

Lone Tree Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located 5½ miles north and one mile east of Moundridge, Kan., was organized in 1878, when 70 persons were baptized by John Holdeman, one of the first congregations of the denomination in Kansas. As the congregation increased the original sod meetinghouse was replaced by a larger building in 1880, which was in turn replaced in 1890 and 1906, and enlarged in 1925, with a seating capacity of 900. Benjamin Schmidt and Henry Koehn were the first residing ministers. Other ministers who have served the church previous to the present ministers are Tobias A. Unruh, John Holdeman, and Jesse Johnson. The church has a membership of 540 (1955). Most of the members are of Dutch descent and many still speak Low German at home, but the services are conducted in English. Since this is the largest congregation of the denomination, it has been host to nine conferences. About 1,200 persons have been baptized here since the beginning of the congregation. J.Jo.

Long Bay United Missionary Church, now extinct, on Manitoulin Island, Ont., was organized about 1892. It was called Bethesda. E.R.S.

Long Green, Md. The Amish Mennonite congregation in Baltimore County, Md., began when Moses Miller moved from Lancaster County, Pa., to Long Green valley in 1833. Others from Mifflin County, Pa., and from Lancaster County followed in 1834. By about 1849 the following families had arrived: Christian Hertzler, Isaac Hertzler, Jacob Hertzler, John Kennel, John Mast, Daniel Nafzinger, Peter Nafzinger, Christian Neuhauser, Aaron Smoker, John Smoker, Jacob Waltz, David Warfel, and Solomon Yoder. The first church officers were Daniel Nafzinger, deacon; John Mast, minister; and Solomon Yoder (d. 1880), bishop. Andrew Miller was ordained later, but moved to Union County before 1875. Solomon Yoder's son Lewis was ordained minister in 1880. He died June 16, 1893. Isaac D. Hertzler was ordained in 1894, but moved to Warwick County, Va., in 1897. Following this the congregation was left without a resident pastor until 1909.

In 1894 the congregation was temporarily accepted by the Indiana Amish Mennonite Conference. Membership was transferred to the Ohio and Pennsylvania Amish Mennonite Conference in 1899. Ministers from these areas visited Long Green about once a month. For years Bible study was held in the homes each Sunday afternoon. Though the congregation had dwindled to 20 members, a frame meetinghouse was built and dedicated on Christmas Day of 1898. The first Sunday school was opened about 1895, and soon was held weekly the year round. In 1909 John M. Hartzler moved to Long Green as pastor. For a time the congregation seemed encouraged, and a few members were added to the group. But the meetinghouse burned down in 1915, the Hertzlers moved to Belleville, Pa., and other families moved away. Some of the young people united with other church groups. The last surviving member died in 1953. The cemetery is cared for by a permanent committee of five descendants of former residents, who now live in Pennsylvania and Virginia. (Diary of Isaac D. Hertzler, 1875; Herald of Truth, April 1880, p. 77; December 1880, p. 221; July 1, 1893, p. 214; June 15, 1899, p. 186; Feb. 1, 1899, p. 42; Jan. 6, 1910, p. 649.) Si.H.

Long, Izaak le, b. April 19, 1683, at Frankfurt, Germany, d. in 1762 at Hanau, Germany, lived at Amsterdam 1718-44. He was a collector and translator of books, especially on church history. Le Long was a member of the Reformed Church, but in 1738 he joined the Moravian Brethren. He published a large number of books in the Dutch language, including Boekzaal der Nederduytsche Bijbels (Amsterdam, 1732, 2d ed. Hoorn, 1764), which is of interest because of Mennonite Bibles and New Testaments reviewed in this book. It is, however, not complete; for example, an edition of the Bible in folio, published by the Mennonite Jacques van der Schuere in 1649 at Amsterdam, is not mentioned. vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 1023-28; W. Lütjeharms, Het Philadelphisch-oecumenisch streven der Hernhutters (Zeist, 1935) passim, see Index.

Longdale Mennonite (GCM) Mission Church is located one-half mile southwest of Longdale, Blaine Co., Okla., and seven miles north of Canton. The Cheyennes living in this district formerly attended church at Cantonment. The Cantonment church was taken down, rebuilt near Longdale, and dedicated on Dec. 19, 1926. The work of Longdale has been in charge of the missionaries G. A. Linscheid 1926-38 and Benno Toews 1938-40 from Cantonment, Arthur Friesen 1940-47, Alfred Wiebe 1947- . For church membership see Fonda. A.Wi.

Longenecker's and Kolb's Mennonite (MC) congregations in the northwestern part of Holmes Co., Ohio, were organized in 1830 as one congregation with two meeting places by settlers from Bucks Co., Pa., including such families as the Longeneckers, Kolbs, Freeds, Beidlers, Barkeys, Hauns, Mumaws, Weldys, Moyers, and Shoups. The first meetinghouse, Kolb's, was built of logs in 1833, Longenecker's of hewn logs in 1834. The congregation, originally a member of the Ohio Mennonite Conference (q.v.), is now a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference (q.v.). Paul Lantz is the pastor and the reported membership (1954) 64. The congregation has never had a resident bishop. In the early years overflow crowds met at the church at communion partly to hear the excellent singing. Later, conditions resulted in decline in membership —the moving away of more active families, the unfaithfulness and silencing of three ministers over the years, and proselyting by the German Methodists. Sunday-school workers from the Walnut Creek congregation succeeded in keeping alive the little congregation at Longenecker's. Kolb's meetinghouse has been abandoned and razed, while Longenecker's was recently rebuilt, so that the congregation is now called Longenecker's. Nearly all of the church members in the neighborhood are now members of a thriving Reformed Church. J.S.U.

Longenecker's Reformed Mennonite Church is located in Lancaster Co., Pa. This was the original meeting place when the Reformed Mennonite Church was established in 1812. J.L.K.

Lont, a Mennonite family name found in the Dutch province of North Holland, especially in the congregations of Niedorp and Wieringen, where members of this family have served as deacons. vdZ.

Loon, van, a Dutch Mennonite family, which furnished a number of Mennonite deacons and preachers. Apparently this family lived at Rotterdam, where Herman van Loon, baptized 1695 in the Waterlander congregation, was appointed preacher of the (1700) united congregation in March 1705 but resigned on March 31 because of dissension in the congregation concerning his call. He resumed his ministry on March 11, 1706, served until his death on Nov. 4, 1710. His son Isaac van Loon was a deacon at Rotterdam 1710-14. To this family also belong the preachers Abraham van Loon (q.v.) and his son Petrus van Loon (q.v.). Another Abraham van Loon, a physician at Amsterdam, also of this family, was interested in theology, publishing, besides medical books, Frederik Toger's (q.v.) Samenstel der Godgeleerdheid (Leiden, 1726) and (translated from English) W. Derham's God-geleerde Natuurkunde (Leiden, 1728 and 1739). It is not certain whether also Jochem van Loon (d. 1692), a leather merchant and preacher of the Waterlanders at Dordrecht from 1667 (N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 1071), belonged to this family. vdZ.

Loon, Abraham van (1656-1725), married to Jannetje Tirion of Gouda, was a physician and preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Gouda from about 1690 until his death. He was of some renown for his eloquence and delivered an address at Rotterdam on June 6, 1700, when the Flemish and Waterlander congregations in this town merged. A sermon entitled Christelijke Vredewensch was published at Rotterdam in 1700. Besides this he published De Jongeling onderwesen tot Doop en Avondmaal (Gouda, 1713). Before this he published the exegesis of the Gospel of Matthew by Hugo de Groot (Gouda, 1685). As a member of the progressive Lamist (q.v.) group he combated the conservative Zonist leader Herman Schijn, who had attacked the church board of Rotterdam, accusing it of admitting non-Mennonites to the Lord's Supper, in two booklets—(a) (with W. Suderman and Adriaan van Alkmaar): Verklaring en Verdediging van de Aanspraak voor het Avondmaal bij de Doopsgezinden te Rotterdam, and (b) (with Adriaan van Alkmaar) Twee brieven tegen H. Schijn. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1765 f., 1769.) vdZ.

Loon, Petrus van, b. ca. 1690 at Gouda, d. Oct. 28, 1754, at Veenendaal, a son of Abraham van Loon, was a Mennonite preacher at Veenendaal (or Rijnsche Veen) in the Dutch province of Utrecht, Holland, from 1719 until his death, having previously served the congregation at Schiedam. He had at the same time assumed the care of a settlement of Mennonites who had left East Prussia because they had been deprived of their nonresistant privilege. With aid from the Dutch Mennonites 45 persons arrived in Wageningen at Christmas 1732. His son Isaacus van Loon, who studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary 1742-48, was appointed assistant to his father. Jacobus van Loon, another son of Petrus, served from 1755 for some years as preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Middelharnis. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1953, 1961, 1964, 1971, 1975, 1982, 1984; II, Nos. 2321-36; DB 1905, 124 f., 149 f., 1906, 96; 98, 103 f., 108; 1909, 161; ML II, 687.

Loop (Ohio) United Missionary Church had 71 members in 1954, with J. Sabo, Jr., serving as pastor.

Loos, a Mennonite family, particularly living at Blokzijl, Dutch province of Overijssel. They usually were lumber dealers and some of them were deacons of the Mennonite congregation. One of them was Jacob Loos Bzn (1839-90), who served for 30 years as treasurer of the Blokzijl church board. vdZ.

Loosjes, an old Dutch Mennonite family, whose ancestor, as far as is known, was Aryan (Adriaen) Jacobs Loosjes (1550-1635), living on the Molenbuurt at Zaandam, Dutch province of North Holland. This family has produced a large number of Mennonite preachers, first of whom was Krelis Aryanse (Cornelis Adriaensz Loosjes) (1660-1720), a grandson of Aryan Jacobs, who from 1693 until his death was a preacher of the Frisian congregation at West-Zaandam. His son Adriaan Loosjes, his grandsons Cornelis and Petrus Loosjes, as well as a number of other descendants, are mentioned in the following articles. Some members of the Loosjes family were ardent Collegiants (q.v.), e.g., Herman Loosjes of Zaandam, who in 1706-8 spoke occasionally at the Collegiant center at Rijnsburg. Another outstanding member of the family was Cornelis Overbeek Loosjes (1785-1841) (Naamlijst 1829, 54; DB 1881, 54 f.), a son of Vincent Overbeek, a plumber at Haarlem, and Engeltje Loosjes, a daughter of Cornelis Loosjes (q.v.), who served the congregation of Zutphen 1818-38, resigning because of bad health. (Ned. Patriciaat, XIV, 1924, 180-88; ML II, 687.) vdZ.

Loosjes, Adriaan, b. April 15, 1689, at West-Zaandam, d. there March 24, 1767, was a lumber dealer at Zaandam, who was chosen as preacher of the West-Zaandam Frisian congregation in 1714. He served until 1762. Because this office demanded so much time—Loosjes had not received a special training and gave much time to the study of Latin, Bible, and history—he retired from business to devote himself entirely to the ministry. In 1747, during a visit of the Dutch stadholder William IV of Orange, Loosjes addressed him in the name of all Mennonites of North Holland. Loosjes published a funeral sermon for his colleague Klaas Jacobsz Nen, De gezegende naagedachtenis des Rechtveerdigen (West-Zaandam, 1755). He co-operated with others in producing a translation of the Latin works of Flavius Josephus, which was published at Alkmaar in 1732 and 1736. His son Petrus Loosjes (q.v.) edited his interesting historical notations on the region in which he lived: Beschrijving der Zaanlandsche Dorpen (1794). Loosjes is also said to have published an address on the Acts of the Apostles, and some papers on comets and on Palestine. Adriaan Loosjes was married in 1714 to Guurtje Klaasd. Visser and after her death to Trijntje Louwe in 1725; both were of Zaandam. vdZ.

DJ 1837, 99; S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 57-59, 65-68, 104; M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijveren (Amsterdam, 1745) 64; Inv Arch. Amst. II, No. 3145.

Loosjes, Adriaan, a son of Petrus Loosjes (q.v.) and Sijtje Oudt, b. May 13, 1761, at Den Hoorn on the island of Texel, and d. Feb. 28, 1818, at Haarlem. He studied theology at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, but never went into the ministry; after finishing his studies he prepared himself for the book business, opening a bookstore in Haarlem in 1782 and soon after a publishing house, which still exists under the name of Erven Loosjes. He took a prominent place in the cultural life of his town and his times. Loosjes wrote a large number of novels, of which Het leeven van Maurits Lijnslager (1808) and Hillegonda Buisman (1814) are the best known. Particularly his Maurits Lijnslager, which because of its patriotic spirit was the favorite book of the youth during the life of its author and even after, was highly appreciated. He also published some volumes of poems and a number of plays. Loosjes was president of the Teyler Society (q.v.). In his quality of moderator of the Mennonite church board he held an address in 1809 to commemorate the union of the two Mennonite congregations of Haarlem in 1784; this paper, Bij Gelegenheid van het Vriedenmaal was also published (n.p., n.d.). For a few years he was manager of the Mennonite orphanage at Haarlem.

Loosjes, who about 1790 was an ardent Patriot (q.v.), also held some political offices, being a member of the Haarlem "Weeskamer" (Orphans' court) and the provincial government of Holland in 1796.

He was married to Cornelia Johanna Herdingh (1765-1841) of Leiden. vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. IV, 929-31; M. H. de Haan, Adriaan Loosjes (Utrecht, 1934); G. Kalff, Geschiedenis der Nederl. Letterkunde (Groningen, 1910) VI, 436-41; VII, 131 f.; DJ 1850, 143; ML II, 687.

Loosjes, Adriaan, b. Aug. 4, 1828, at Haarlem, d. June 21, 1902, son of the book dealer Vincent Loosjes. At the age of 17 he wrote the devotional articles for the Christelijk Album (1846), which was widely read. After completing his study at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary 1846-51 he was called as pastor to the congregation at Rottevalle-Witveen. The next year (1852) he moved to Akkrum. In 1854, at the age of 26, he accepted a call to the Mennonite church at Amsterdam and served this congregation for 39 years.

Of Adriaan Loosjes' preaching Feenstra remarked, "His capability bordered on genius." Loosjes himself said, "I know of no higher title of honor than to have been a preacher in the 19th century." His Biblical orthodox point of view did not interfere with his high regard for people who differed with him. His extensive pastoral work was probably the reason for his long literary silence. Not until his later years did he again appear before the public. In addition to treatises in the Stemmen voor waarheid en vrede, another study must be mentioned, De gedachten van Pascal en zijne kleinere geschriften vertaald en toegelicht (Haarlem, 1889). He also published a funeral sermon to his colleague P. van der Goot (q.v.), entitled Jezus Christus altijd dezelfde (Amsterdam, 1877), and Voor ruim een halve eeuw (Haarlem, 1897); his son Vincent Loosjes (q.v.) published a number of his father's sermons, Uit de Prediking van A. Loosjes (Haarlem, 1905).

Adriaan Loosjes' services were recognized by bestowal of membership in the Maatschappij der Nederlandse Letterkunde and the provincial society of Utrecht. He was married twice, 1852-62 to Margaretha van Geuns, and 1864-1902 to E. H. Bavink. On Sept. 24, 1893, he resigned his pastorate and died nine years later at Bloemendaal near Haarlem. He gave his rich library to the Amsterdam Mennonite Church. vdZ.

P. Feenstra Jr., "Levensbericht", in Levensb. My. Ned. Letterk. 1903-4; DB 1904, 66-114; 1902, 242; ML II, 670, 688.

Loosjes, Cornelis, a son of Adriaan Loosjes (q.v.) and Guurtje Klaasd. Visser, was b. Jan. 28, 1723, at West-Zaandam and d. Jan. 5, 1792, at Haarlem. He was trained for the ministry at the Amsterdam Mennonite Lamist Seminary 1742-44 and served as a preacher of the congregations of Gouda 1744-51, Oost-Zaandam 1751-63, and Haarlem, Peuzelaarsteeg 1763-84, and the united Haarlem congregation 1784 until his death. During his Oost-Zaandam period there was some excitement because of his rather liberal ideas. Especially the fact that in 1785 he had baptized and introduced into the ministry at Beverwijk Anthony van der Os (q.v.), a former Reformed minister who was excommunicated from the Reformed Church because of his liberal tendencies, caused quite a stir and resulted in a large number of pamphlets against both van der Os and Loosjes. Loosjes was keenly interested in Dutch literature; he was a good friend of the well-known authors Betje Wolff and Aagje Deken (q.v.), and in 1761 founded the Vaderlandsche Letteroefeningen, a literary periodical which soon became very influential, particularly by its book reviews. Loosjes was married to Fijtje van Wummenum. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1800; DB 1897, note 2, 1909, 101.) vdZ.

Loosjes, Jacob, son of Adriaan Loosjes (q.v.), b. Jan. 17, 1874, at Amsterdam, d. Oct. 17, 1935, in Bussum; studied Dutch language and literature, passed his doctoral examination, then studied law and earned his doctorate with a dissertation, De algemeene waterstaatsreglementen onderling vergeleken.

After serving for several years in the department of "waterstaat," he began his study at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, in 1908 becoming a ministerial candidate. In May 1909 he was called to the Mennonite church in Hollum on Ameland. During his service for the "waterstaat" he wrote a historical treatise, Waterstaatswetgeving voor 1813. Now he turned his attention to church history, especially that of his own brotherhood. In addition to many articles in the Mennonitsches Lexikon, his book De Gereformeerde Kerk van Ameland (1912) is particularly important. Of great interest for Mennonite history is his paper "Jan Jacobsz en de Jan-Jacobsgezinden," published in Nederl. Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis of 1914.

In those days there was little possibility for an orthodox Mennonite preacher to be called to a pulpit, Jacob Loosjes therefore found himself obliged to join the Lutheran Church. In 1914 he accepted the call to Tiel and in 1918 to Bussum. After 1920 he was also a lecturer on history at the Lyceum at Bussum. To the historian a new field of work was opened, the history of the Lutheran Church in the Netherlands. The results of his study are in part found in the Biografisch Woordenboek der Protestantsche Godgeleerden in Nederland, which is published under his coeditorship with J. P. de Bie. In addition Loosjes published his Geschiedenis der Luthersche Kerk in de Nederlanden in 1921; Luthersche weldadigheid in 1924; Naamlijst van predikanten enz. der Luthersche Kerk in Nederland, 1925.

In 1925 Loosjes was called to the professorship at the Lutheran seminary in Amsterdam and in the following year he made his speech of acceptance on the subject, "Lutherschen en remonstranten in den tijd van de Dordtsche Synode," but remained a lecturer at Bussum at the same time. He was an untiring worker. Again and again scholarly works flowed from his pen, as in 1932 the History of the Christ Church (English Episcopal Church). Loosjes was actually not a theologian but a historian, who worked very exactly and sought to fathom the history in his various fields of work, at first in the work of the "waterstaat," then Mennonite history on Ameland, and finally Lutheran history. (ML II, 688 f.) W.Le.

Loosjes, Petrus, a son of Adriaan Loosjes (q.v.) and Trijntje Louwe, half brother of Cornelis Loosjes (q.v.), b. Nov. 20, 1735, at West-Zaandam, d. Jan. 12, 1813, at Haarlem. Having been trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite Lamist Seminary 1754-59, he served as preacher in the congregations of Den Hoorn on the island of Texel 1759-62, Monnikendam 1762, and Haarlem 1762-1811 (congregation of the Klein Heiligland until 1784 and when this congregation merged with that of Peuzelaarssteeg, of the united congregation until he resigned in 1812). Together with his half brother Cornelis, also a preacher of Haarlem, he edited the Vaderlandsche Letteroefeningen, a literary periodical founded by his brother, of which after the death of the latter he was the only editor. He wrote a sequel to the well-known Dutch history of Jan Wagenaar, Vaderlandsche Historie, to which he added 24 volumes, published anonymously 1786-1811.

Petrus Loosjes was married to Sijtje Oudt. Their son Adriaan (q.v.) was a well-known bookseller and founder of the Loosjes publishing house. Their daughter Agatha (b. 1766) was married to François Bohn, a Mennonite of Leiden, who founded at Haarlem a publishing company, which is still in existence. (N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 1072 f.; Naamlijst 1815, 72 f.; DB 1909, 101.) vdZ.

Loosjes, Vincent, only son of Adriaan Loosjes (q.v.) and Cornelia Johanna Herdingh (Haarlem, 1786-1841), succeeded his father in the book and publishing business of Erven Loosjes. Both he and his wife Suzanna van Westerkappel were managers of the Haarlem Mennonite orphanage. In memoration of the second centennial of the founding of the orphanage, Loosjes in 1834 delivered an address which was published: Toespraak aan de kinderen in het Oude Weeshuis (Haarlem, 1834). In 1828 he became a trustee of the A.D.S. (Dutch Mennonite General Conference) and curator of its theological seminary. vdZ.

Loosjes, Vincent, a son of Adriaan Loosjes and Margaretha van Geuns, b. Nov. 24, 1855, at Amsterdam, d. Sept. 19, 1932, at Amersfoort, a preacher and author like his father. After the completion of his study at the University of Groningen and the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary he served as pastor of the Mennonite congregation of St. Hippolytushoef en Stroe on Wieringen 1879-81, Blokzijl 1881-86, Beemster 1886-90, Sneek 1890-1912, and in his last years, 1912-21, the large Amsterdam church. On April 3, 1921, he resigned from the ministry and enjoyed eleven years of rest. He always showed an earnest and sincere piety, also in his sermons, of which he demanded high aesthetic quality. Theologically he was certainly not modernistic, nor was he strictly orthodox. He wished "to hold himself only to the Bible as the authoritative document; the revelation of the sacred love of God to man made perfect in the Gospel and in the life of Jesus demands the love of men in exchange." Vincent Loosjes wrote a great deal; of his five novels, Rinske Sonnema, published in 1896 (a third edition in 1923), is probably the best known. In addition he wrote a number of poems, some of which have been published in collections of folk songs. He was fond of making aphorisms, many of which have been collected in two booklets, Bitter en Zoet (1909) and Prikkels en Pluimen (1919). In his literary works, which rarely surpass mediocrity, we are struck by his keen observation of people and his disturbingly blunt expressions, which also characterized his sermons. His sharp, ruthless honesty repelled some listeners. Nevertheless he was a faithful shepherd and a good friend to many. In addition to his imaginative works he also published a study on Louis Bonaparte, King of Holland (1888). In addition he published a sermon, Des Tempels vergankelijke luister (Sneek, 1892), and Enkele opmerkingen over de zelfstandigheid onzer gemeenten (Haarlem, 1902).

In his Sneek period he took part in social life, but his actual metier was his study. In 1879, shortly before he took on his first preaching position, he married Wilhelmina Willers, who died before he moved to Amsterdam. vdZ.

P. Feenstra Jr., Levensbericht" in Levensber. My Ned. Letterk. (Leiden, 1933); P. B. Westerdijk in Zondagsbode. Sept. 25, 1932; idem, DJ 1934; ML II, 689.

Loosli, Gottlieb (1868-1931), teacher of the school at Moron, Switzerland, in the Jura district, and elder of the Kleintal (q.v.) Mennonite Church, was born Jan. 27, 1868, in Eriswil in the Emmental, Switzerland, the youngest of ten children. Frail from birth, he became seriously sick and spent a half year in the hospital in Basel. A deaconess nurse helped him in his Christian life. In 1888 he entered the normal school at Beuggen. On Nov. 1, 1892, he took over the private school at Bellelay. In the autumn of 1893 teacher and pupils migrated to Moron into the schoolroom on the first floor of the new chapel. In 1895 he married Rosa Frutiger. Until 1919 Mrs. Loosli conducted the class in needlework at Moron.

At Christmas in 1900 the Looslis joined the Mennonite Church in the Moron chapel. In 1911 the Kleintal church put him in charge of the baptismal instruction. In 1917 upon a majority decision of the population of Châtelat the Moron private school was turned into a German language school. In the same year he was chosen preacher of the Kleintal church, and in 1929 he was made elder. In 1927 a son replaced him as a teacher and on March 5, 1931, he died in the circle of his wife and eight children with the words, "I am glad to depart, but am saved only through grace. I am glad that I always stressed this." The school at Moron and its good reputation are his achievement. In the brotherhood he bridged over many a difference, and devoted his whole being to the welfare of the brotherhood. (Berner Schulblatt, 1931, No. 2; Zionspilger, 1931, No. 15; ML II, 689 f.) A.-T.

Looten (Lootens, Loten), a Dutch Mennonite family. A branch of this family emigrated from Flanders, Belgium, in the early 17th century, and is found at Aardenburg (q.v.), Dutch Zealand Flanders. David Looten, a Mennonite, born at Bellem near Brugge, but a citizen of Aardenburg, died at Leiden in 1626. Laurens Looten (d. after 1688), a well-to-do farmer, and his family contributed generously to the building of a new meetinghouse in 1655. His descendants joined the Reformed Church. Other branches of the Looten family are found in Leiden and Amsterdam. Laurens Jansz Looten, a cloth merchant, moved from Leiden to Amsterdam in 1612. His son Jan Looten (b. 1618 at Amsterdam), married to Cathalijntje Harmansdochter, of Jülich, was a painter of landscapes. He lived in England for some time, and probably died there in 1681. Karel Loten in the first decades of the 17th century was a wealthy merchant of Amsterdam, who owned a stately country home in De Beemster (q.v.). By marriage the Amsterdam Lo(o)ten family, which belonged to the Waterlander Mennonite congregation, and after its merger in 1668 to the united Waterlander-Lamist Church, was related to other well-known Mennonite families such as Rutgers, Verhamme, Roeters. Some members of this family served as deacons. The Looten family died out in the 18th century. (N.N.B.Wb. IX, 623; church records of Amsterdam.) vdZ.

Lootsma, Sipke (1888-1940), a schoolteacher and later a professor at the Lyceum at Zaandam, Netherlands, who wrote a number of historical papers. He also published some books, including De Zeildoekweverij te Krommenie (1928) and Bijdrage tot de Geschiedenis der Nederlandsche Walvischvaart, meer speciaal Zaansche (Wormerveer, 1937). Of great interest for Mennonite history is the memorial volume which he wrote on the occasion of the 250th anniversary of the meetinghouse of Zaandam-West (q.v.). This book, entitled Het Nieuwe Huys 1687-1937, Friesch-Doopsgezinde Gemeente West-Zaandam (Zaandam, 1937), was published by the church board. Lootsma was a deacon of this congregation from 1935 until his death. vdZ.

Lopes, Willem Klaasz, published Ontleding der Christelyke Kerken-order ende deszelfs Ampten, waar in het Gebruyk en Misbruyk der zelver wert aangewezen (Amsterdam, 1699). In this book and in his Antwoord op eenige Vragen, die op myn Ontleding zyn voorgekomen (Amsterdam, 1699) he attacked the Reformed views on the church and its offices, as defended by D. Bakkamude and Johannes Smetius, the latter (1636-1704) being a Reformed minister at Amsterdam. Of Lopes there was no further information available. He probably lived at Amsterdam and belonged to the Zonist congregation. The Amsterdam Mennonite Archives possess a manuscript copied by Marten Schagen (q.v.) which contains a philosophical debate between W. Reimarus and Lopes. Lopes also seems to have written a number of pamphlets published in 1664-65 during the Lammerenkrijg (q.v.), in which he took the side of Apostool and the Zonists against Galenus Abrahamsz and the Lamists. vdZ.

M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijveren (Amsterdam, 1745) 64; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 754 g.

Loppersum, a town in the Dutch province of Groningen, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Soon after 1530 Anabaptism is said to have had adherents at Loppersum. In 1557-61 Leenaert Bouwens baptized some persons here (4 or 7, the exact number could not be ascertained). About 1569 the Mennonites living at Loppersum and surrounding towns were severely molested by the district governor Imel van Lotteling, who planned to obtain their property by having it confiscated. Shortly after 1584 they suffered much under de Mepsche, provost of Loppersum, but it seems that no one lost his life. In the 17th century a congregation of Groningen Old Flemish existed here. The names of its preachers have come down from about 1680; they all were untrained and mostly farmers. In 1659 a meeting of Groningen Old Flemish leaders was held at Loppersum, where a statement was drawn up concerning clothing, furniture, etc., which the members of the Old Flemish congregations were allowed to have. (This statement is found in Blaupot ten Cate, Friesland, 307 f.) In the 18th century the congregation became very small: 1710 about 50 members; 1754, 17 members. In 1783 it merged with the congregation of Leermens (q.v.), forming the Leermens-Loppersum congregation. For the history of the united congregation, see Leermens. Of a meetinghouse of Loppersum nothing is known; the members presumably met in private homes. Now the meetinghouse of the congregation of Leermens-Loppersum is at Zeerijp (q.v.). vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 15, 52, 86, 125, 127, 142, 198; DJ 1840, 43; DB 1879, 4, 111; Oud-Archief, Groningen, No. 145.

Lorch on the Rhine, a town in the Wiesbaden district of Hesse, Germany, at the confluence of the Wisper into the Rhine, was at the beginning of the 16th century a thriving village, inhabited by weavers who made use of the abundant water power of the Wisper and carried on trade with their cloth as far as the Netherlands. At that time Lorch was the seat of a strong Anabaptist group, under the leadership of a "bishop," Peter Nyerup of Calcar. On May 10, 1537, fire broke out in the city destroying several houses. Arson was suspected. A maid questioned on the rack threw suspicion on the Anabaptists. Several of them, including the bishop, left the city; their property was confiscated. Many were taken prisoner.

"They confessed on the rack that their doctrines were: Christ is not the true God, His body did not come from Mary but from heaven, only personal piety could accomplish justification, there is no original sin, contacts with non-Anabaptists are prohibited, the oath is forbidden as blasphemy, all goods are common, each one has a free will in spiritual matters, infant baptism is evil, state and government are evil institutions, and service in war a grievous sin." Albrecht, Elector of Mainz, demanded the greatest severity of punishment. By the end of 1537 there were 240 persons under arrest. Eustachius Pohl, Konrad Heftrich, both of Lorch, Sebastian Köhler of Geisenheim, and Wendel Lill of Rüdesheim, were hanged as "heretics, sectarians, perjurers"; Konrad Mohr and Sebastian Röhrig of Lorch were beaten and branded, and many others were banished from the country. Eighty-two citizens of Lorch were punished with a fine of 20 guilders and neck irons. Most of the exiles settled in the area of Katzenellenbogen. The movement was completely suppressed. Most of the Anabaptists became Protestants. (Menn. Bl., 1893, 89-91; ML II, 690.) NEFF.

Lord's Supper, interpretation among Anabaptists. The Anabaptists, being followers neither of Luther nor of Zwingli nor of Rome, had to develop their own understanding of the ordinance of the Lord's Supper and its meaning. That it was a ceremony for the remembrance of the death of Christ brings the Anabaptists somewhat in the neighborhood of Zwingli's interpretation. But beyond that, the Brethren developed quite an original viewpoint elsewhere little appreciated in Protestant circles, which emphasized the idea of fellowship or brotherhood in connection with the Lord's Table or the Supper. It meant to the Anabaptists not only the memory of the Lord's supreme sacrifice, but also a new dedication of the idea of Gemeinschaft, that is, living and, if need be, suffering together as a fellowship of dedicated disciples. This interpretation perhaps goes back to the words of the Apostle Paul in I Cor. 10:17. The eating and drinking together in a solemn meal was to them a symbol of their perfect togetherness in which the individual fuses with the group as a whole, foregoing self-will of any kind.

To illustrate this idea, the Anabaptists revived an old parable of the early church which runs somewhat as follows: "As the grain-kernels are altogether merged and each must give its content or strength (Vermögen) into the one flour and bread, likewise also the wine, where the grapes are crushed under the press, and each grape gives away all its juice and all its strength into one wine. Whichever kernel and whichever grape, however, is not crushed and retains its strength for itself alone, such an one is unworthy and is cast out. This is what Christ wanted to bring home to His companions and guests at the Last Supper as an example of how they should be together in such a fellowship" (Andreas Ehrenpreis, 1652).

The story of this parable is quite interesting. We find it for the first time in the "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" (in Greek called Didaché), of about A.D. 120 when primitive Christian brotherhood was still strong in the churches of the Near East. We find the same parable again in the 63rd Epistle of Cyprian (A.D. 250). How it was handed down to the Reformation period is not known; perhaps it was through Eusebius (q.v.). It is true that of a rather early date even Martin Luther quotes it in his "Sermon about the most venerable sacrament of the Holy Corpus Christi," of 1519; but obviously he could not follow up this idea when he began to develop his own new theology.

Among the Anabaptists, however, we meet it time and again. A random sampling of Hutterite literature yielded at least three references in this area: Claus Felbinger's Confession of Faith of 1560, Peter Walpot's Epistle to the "Swiss" Brethren at Modenbach on the Rhine, 1577, and also Andreas Ehrenpreis in his great Sendbrief of 1652 (printed) quotes this parable in full. In each case the Brethren wanted to emphasize that self-giving or self-denial, renunciation of self-will, for the sake of the brotherhood, is the very essence of discipleship, to which every brother should rededicate himself ever again at the solemn occasion of the Lord's Supper.

However, not only the Hutterites, but also Menno Simons taught the same ideas, perhaps drawing from the same sources as the Hutterites (Eusebius?). This is what Menno Simons had to say about the Lord's Supper: "Gelijck als dan een natuurlijck brood van veel korens in de meulen gebroocken met water gekneet/ van des vyers hittigheydt tot een broodt gebacken wordt/ alsoo wordt oock de gemeynte Christi uyt veel geloovingen/ met de meulen des Godlijcken woordts in have herten gebroken/ met dat water des Heyligen Geests/ en met dat vyer der reynder ongeverweder liefden in een lichaem gedoopt" (Krahn, 142).

It was perhaps from Menno Simons (or from some other, not yet known tradition among the Brethren) that the Amish later borrowed this parable, to be used at their communion services. It is still used as a sermon topic (referring to I Cor. 10:17) on communion Sunday. To be sure, the emphasis with the Amish is slightly different from that of the Hutterites, yet in both cases the parable is to illustrate the meaning of the meal as a symbol of a closely knit brotherhood and as a collective rededication to the path of discipleship. (See Communion.) R.F.

Lydia Müller, Der Kommunismus der mähr. Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1927) 66; C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936) 142; R. Friedmann, "The Epistles of the Hutterian Brethren," MQR XX (1946) 169; "Claus Felbinger's Confession," MQR XXIX (April 1955).

Loreburn Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, located near Loreburn, Sask., was organized in 1927 with 13 members and F. F. Wiens as leader. It belonged to the Herbert District Conference. J.I.R.

Lörrach, a town (pop. 19,294) in Baden, Germany, seven miles northeast of Basel. The castle of Rötteln, formerly the residence of the counts of Hachberg and of the margraves of Baden, was destroyed by the French in 1678 but was rebuilt in 1867.

In the vicinity of Lörrach Anabaptist doctrine coming from Basel early found adherents. For a long time the Anabaptists were able to hide from their persecutors in this border region. They held their meetings usually at night in isolated places in the woods. They also performed some baptisms in Lörrach in the house of Friedrich Ludi. In 1582 the congregation was discovered. Ten members were subjected to cross-examination by the pastors of Lörrach and the neighboring villages in the presence of the magistrate Konrad von Ulm. The record was sent to Durlach and is found in the Generallandesarchiv at Karlsruhe. It affords a good insight into the religious position of the South German Anabaptists. Those being questioned had to explain first their nonattendance at regular church services and then their views on communion, baptism, oath, and government. Most of them had only a few years previously joined the group. The reason given for leaving the state church was that they were dissatisfied with moral conditions within the church.

Their Christian earnestness is expressed especially in their concept of communion. Valentin Roser of Lörrach declared that only he who does the right and abstains from sin is worthy to receive communion. He had intended to go to communion at Easter, but had not done so, because someone had slandered him and he was undecided as to whether he should call him to account. Communion in the big church was participated in by many who did not repent or correct their lives. Hans Ludi of Lörrach, whom the local pastor called an Anabaptist preacher, stated that he did not go to communion in the church because there was no serious attempt made by its members to correct their conduct. A similar answer was given by Friedrich Ludi of Lörrach, a former judge. He pointed out that the partakers of the communion in the Lörrach church lived an offensive life through excessive drinking. He could not therefore attend church and communion. The pastor added in the report to the government, that Ludi desired nothing but to do what pleases God; he would separate himself from the ungodly. None of them wished to hurt anyone and were willing to obey the requirements of the government in all points.

The brotherhood seems to have been rather widespread. Evasive answers were given to questions about their preachers; they gave the name of a dead one, but they would not name the living ones. Clara Kreysin declared that she would betray no one, but finally admitted that their preacher came from Basel and his name was Marx. Leonhard Mayer, whose home town is not named, admitted that one was called Friedle and lived on the other side of the Rhine, and another was from Riehen and others from Stetten.

The magistrate ordered the persons under trial to attend church in Lörrach henceforth or to be subject to a serious command from Durlach. For several Sundays they would be watched to see if they attended the sermon; if they did not come their possessions would be inventoried for later confiscation. A report of the magistrate to the government dated Aug. 23, 1583, reveals that the accused did not attend the sermon, "but appeared disobedient." Their possessions were thereupon listed; but because of the plague prevalent in Lörrach nothing could be done against the Anabaptists. The pastors were instructed to admonish them.

Several men promised to go to church and to take communion. One of them, Germain Bertschin, added that the Anabaptists were pious and God-fearing, that they prayed earnestly, did not swear, and injured no one. But the rest stayed with their opinion and their brotherhood. Of Leonhard Dietrich in Oetlingen the local parson Franz Gut reported that he would pray God to show him the right way to salvation. Pastor Paul Cherber of Binzen reported concerning the widow M. Kreysin of Rümmingen, that "with the exception of disregard for going to church and the holy sacrament he knew nothing about her but love and goodness, uprightness and loyalty toward the poor."

Nonresident Anabaptists were banished from the town; there is no information on the fate of residents. Nor is there any later mention of the movement at Lörrach. The name Ludi (q.v.) (and Ludin) is still found in Lörrach. Hege.

Mühlhäusser, "Die Wiedertäufer in Lörrach im Jahre 1582," in Studien der evangelisch-protestantischen Geistlichen des Grossherzogtums Baden I (1875) 24-33; TA Badenpfalz; ML II, 690 f.

Lorraine. Little is known of an Anabaptist movement in Lorraine. Refugees from Flanders, including a surgeon of Lille, came to Metz in 1538, and judging from a letter Calvin wrote to Farel, they must have won some converts. But their work was of short duration. They were taken prisoner; two were drowned in the Moselle, and one was branded and expelled.

In the 18th century considerable numbers of Mennonites settled in the duchy of Lorraine, whom Louis XIV had expelled from Alsace in 1712. From the Leber Valley (Ste-Marie-aux-Mines) they migrated over the mountains into the Saar Valley, and spread over the Lorraine plateau as far as the duchy of Zweibrücken. In the mountains they formed the Hang and Salm congregations, farther north the Welschland, the German-Lorraine, and the Bitscherland congregations.

When the rest of Lorraine came to France in 1766, Louis XV made inquiries about the Mennonites, but did not disturb them, since the reports were favorable. Some years previously he reprimanded an official who had wanted to compel the Mennonites living in the bishopric of Metz to have their children baptized.

In the 19th century the Mennonites moved westward, forming congregations that gradually adopted French as their language; some of the churches in the German-speaking area in northern Lorraine remained. In the four départements of Lorraine there were in 1935 some 800 Mennonites, in eleven congregations. In 1955 there were only eight congregations with some 750 souls.

The largest number of Mennonites are in the département of Moselle. Here in the German-speaking area there are two congregations: Sarreguemines, formerly Bitscherland, and Diesen, descended from the German-Lorraine congregation. On the linguistic border is Sarrebourg, derived in part from the Welschland and in part from the German-Lorraine congregations.

In the départements Meurthe and Moselle there are three congregations: Baccarat, Lunéville, and Toul, which originated chiefly from the Welschland and Salm congregations, with some additions from German-Lorraine and Zweibrücken.

In the Vosges département the Vosges (Darney) congregation was organized from the above congregations. In the département Meuse is the Meuse (Ligny) congregation, with the same origin as the above. The Salm (now Bénaville) and Hang congregations were made a part of Lower Alsace after the Franco-Prussian War, and are in the French-speaking area. (ML II, 694.) P.So.

Lorraine Avenue Mennonite Church (GCM), located at S. Lorraine and East Gilbert, Wichita, Kan., is a member of the Western District Conference. In June 1928 C. E. Krehbiel gathered some interested people to consider the formation of a General Conference Mennonite church in Wichita. A year later

Arnold Funk was placed here as a worker under the mission committee. In 1932 a house was built and dedicated to serve as a church, and a congregation was organized with 17 charter members. In 1951 a stone and brick church was built, the first building having been converted into a parsonage. In 1954 the church had 311 members. Pastors who have served the church are Arnold Funk, C. E. Krehbiel, Olin Krehbiel, S. M. Musselman, E. D. Schmidt, P. E. Frantz, J. H. Langenwalter, and George S. Stoneback (1954). G.S.S.

Lörsch, a Swiss Mennonite family name: see Latscha and Lötscher.

Los Angeles, Cal., a city (pop. 2,243,910) located in the county by the same name, has eight Mennonite congregations as follows: E.M.B.—The Church of the Bible, 8004 Vineland, Sun Valley, Cal., with 80 members; G.C.M.—Community Mennonite Church (in process of organization) and Immanuel Mennonite Church, 10335 Paramount Boulevard, Downey, with 271 members; Independent—35th Street Mennonite Church, 35th and Normandie, with 35 members; M.B.—City Terrace Mennonite Church, 1441 North Herbert, with 31 members; Hoover Boulevard M.B. Church, with 61 members, and Valley M.B. Church (in process of organizing), 14162 Van Nuys Boulevard, Pacoima, Cal., with 20 members; M.C.—Calvary Mennonite Church, 147 West 73rd St., with 74 members. The total Mennonite membership in the area in 1956 was probably about 700. Mennonites began to settle in Los Angeles about 1902. (See also Upland.) D.D.E.

Los Angeles (Cal.) Mennonite Brethren Church located at 8109 S. Hoover St., a member of the Pacific District Conference, was organized on June 22, 1924, with an initial membership of 41 persons, and met in rented locations until the first meetinghouse was erected, dedicated Feb. 18, 1940. The first leader was A. C. Friesen, followed by P. P. Rempel in September 1924 and a series of other ministers. The membership in 1957 was 41, with Peter Klassen as part-time pastor. There has been a considerable transient membership, with no large permanent M.B. residential group in Los Angeles. P.F.W.

Los Jagueyes, Mexico, Mennonites. Early in 1948 a group of Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.) Mennonites from Manitoba and a smaller group of Old Colony and Sommerfelder Mennonites from Saskatchewan and Manitoba purchased a ranch of 52,700 acres at Los Jagueyes, Chihuahua, Mexico, at $7.00 per acre, for the purpose of settlement. Two thirds of this land was fit for cultivation and one third was mountainous and partly wooded. It is located about 80 miles northwest of Cuauhtemoc and 12 miles southwest of the Sommerfelder Mennonite settlement at Santa Clara. The northern two thirds of the land was set aside for the Kleine Gemeinde and the southern third for the Old Colony Mennonites. The aim of these people was to preserve the German language for their children, and escape the social and religious changes taking place in Canada.

In July 1948 the first seven families of the Kleine Gemeinde arrived at Los Jagueyes, "the place of springs," hired a large caterpillar and put into the virgin soil nearly 1,000 acres of oats. It being a dry late season, only feed was harvested in November, which, however, was of great help to the numerous settlers arriving that fall, most of whom brought their machinery and some stock along from Manitoba. By March 1952 the final group of about 12 families left Manitoba to conclude the movement. This brought the total Kleine Gemeinde group to about 90 families, or over 600 souls, which, however, comprised only 15 per cent of the church in Manitoba. Elder Peter P. Reimer was the spiritual leader of the emigrating group until his death in April 1949. In March 1951 Cornelius R. Reimer was ordained elder of the group, now called the Kleine Gemeinde of Mexico. In 1954 the baptized membership was 323.

Within a radius of about five miles from the center of the settlement, where a large adobe church has been built, six villages have been established: Morgental, Talheim, Grünland, Wiesenheim, Ebenfeld, and Eichenbach. Five of the villages have schools, the teachers being elected from the membership of the church. The language of instruction is German with a little English to assist in keeping contact with the relatives and friends in Manitoba.

There is a planing mill, a cheese factory, a garage, two stores, a hatchery, a sawmill, a machine shop, and a shoemaker's shop. Thus the settlement in four short years (1948-52) established itself as an agricultural, economic, and religious unit, though its members have come from five different congregations and districts in Manitoba. There is almost constant economic contact with Chihuahua, the capital of the state, which is only 100 miles away.

Early in 1949 an MCC emergency health clinic was established 12 miles from the settlement under the directorship of Peter J. B. Reimer, which proved to be of great help, since the nearest hospital was 80 miles away. About two years later this clinic was moved by request of the settlers directly into the center of the settlement.

The southern third of the ranch was settled at the same time by about 30 families of Old Colony Mennonites from Saskatchewan and some Sommerfelder Mennonites from Manitoba. The former were mostly poor and the latter were somewhat better off economically. This factor and probably a different social and religious background led to considerable friction among the group, so that their spiritual leader, Bishop John Leppky, returned to Saskatchewan, where he soon died. A number of other families of this group have also returned to Canada. They have had two other leaders who apparently have also left the settlement. However, the group has established three villages. The ground is higher in this settlement, the soil better, and the countryside more attractive than in the northern area. The Kleine Gemeinde group has lately purchased a part of this land to help the Old Colony group financially, and may possibly have to take over most of it because of the apparent economic and cultural disintegration of the Old Colony group. P.J.B.R.

P. J. B. Reimer, "From Russia to Mexico," Menn. Life IV (1949) 26-33.

Löscher, Kaspar (1836-1718), a German Lutheran divine, educated at the University of Leipzig. He became church superintendent in Sondershausen in 1668, first pastor at Erfurt in 1676, superintendent at Zwickau in 1679, and general superintendent and professor at Wittenberg in 1687. His oldest son was the noted Valentin Löscher. In 1688 the following work was published in Wittenberg: Secta Mennonitarum, quoad ortum, progressum et mataeologiam, elencho, qua potiora religionis capita, notatam, delineata; praeside Dn. Casparo Loescher . . . autor Johannes Vaget, Bremensis. In general in the older dissertations the praeses is considered the author. The list of Kaspar Löscher's works, expressly excluding the Disputationes a respondentibus elaboratae, does not contain this title; and the wording of a foreword of the praeses to the respondens explains why it is sometimes attributed to Löscher, and sometimes to Vaget.

It contains 56 pages quarto with many sources. The booklet first discusses the various names for the Mennonites and then gives a historical sketch. A second section treats Formam sectae huius externam and particularly Hodomoriam mennonianam eiusdemque confutationem; nine phantasmata are presented and rejected. E.C.

G. Wernsdorf, Collegium pietatis Davidicum . . . (Wittenberg, 1718, a funeral sermon with a biographical sketch and a list of his writings, called by Jöcher an independent work of the young Löscher); F. Blanckmeister, Der Prophet von Kursachsen, Valentin Ernst Löscher und seine Zeit (Dresden, 1920); ML II, 691.

Lose, Peter, of Gemünden, Hesse, Germany, Anabaptist, was seized at Wolkersdorf with nine Anabaptists, including Jörg Schnabel (q.v.) and Leonhard Fälber (q.v.), imprisoned at Marburg, and signed the Bekenntnis oder Antwort etlicher Fragestück oder Artikel der gefangenen Täufer und anderer im Lande zu Hessen. On Dec. 10, 1538, he was cross-examined. "He gave Bucer such loose and frivolous answers that the listeners laughed heartily, and therefore, because he answered so mockingly and disrespectfully nothing special was talked with him." Nothing further is known about him. (Ztscht f. d. hist. Theol., 1858, 610 f.; TA Hessen; ML II, 687.) Neff.

Losea, Abraham de (1619-90), a Reformed theologian, born at Murten, Switzerland, stemmed from a family of Arles, Provence, France, whose progenitor, the canon Jean, joined the Reformation and came to Geneva in 1523. Abraham de Losea received his first pastorate in 1641 in Könitz near Bern, and in 1647 he was made third assistant at the cathedral in Bern. This office gave him citizenship in the city. In the following years he rose in ecclesiastic position. In 1662 he was made the second pastor at the cathedral. Above him there was only one position, that of first pastor, which was usually associated with the deanship of the Bernese clergy.

In January 1659 de Losea was appointed by the government to the newly constituted Anabaptist committee (Täuferkommission), and conducted many examinations of Anabaptists confined in the orphanage and penitentiary. As a member of the Kirchenkonvent (q.v.) he helped to formulate several opinions on the Anabaptists. In them he always advised tolerance and a more lenient and just judgment, and opposed measures of violence. Evidence of this attitude is found in the opinion of the Kirchenkonvent ("first opinion") of 1670 (reprinted in Müller, 140-43), in which only five of the clergymen of the city advocated lenience. The majority ("second opinion") favored intolerance, increasing the government mania for persecution. De Losea died in 1690 as pastor in Thun. S.G.

"Bernische Pfarrer 16.-19. Jahrhundert," ms., Archives of the Canton of Bern; "Kirchenwesen" II D. 85, E. 86, and F. 87, Archives of Bern; "Miss. Hist. Helv." III 272, in City Library of Bern; Historisch-Biographisches Lexikon der Schweiz II, "Delosea" (Neuenburg, 1924); Müller, Berner Täufer; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); ML II, 691 f.

Losenegger, Moritz, an Anabaptist martyr of Bern, Switzerland, a native of Thun, was banished from the canton on Dec. 20, 1532, but returned and was arrested. He was sentenced to die for breaking the exile, but was pardoned on Jan. 8, 1533, and was then banished again under threat of death if he should return once more. He nevertheless came back. In the autumn of 1535 it was learned that he was staying at Trachselwald; on Oct. 28 the government ordered his arrest, but he was not seized until May 2, 1536. He was then executed at Bern. No particulars are known concerning his work, except that he was a zealous preacher. In van Braght's list of martyrs in the Martyrs' Mirror Losenegger was the eleventh Anabaptist martyr in Bern. Hege.

Th. de Quervain, Kirchliche und soziale Zustände in Bern, 1528-1536 (Bern, 1906); Mart. Mir. E 1,129; ML II, 692.

Loserth, Johann (1846-1936), Austrian historian, was born Sept. 1, 1846, at Fulnek in Moravia, whither his ancestors had fled as refugees from Silesia in the 17th century. They were weavers. Since machinery encroached upon their industry, his father opened a cereal business, the proceeds of which, however, did not cover the expenses of long illness in the family. Under such circumstances there could be no thought of university training for the six sons.

Johann was then to learn cabinetmaking. A kindly relative made it possible for him to attend the gymnasium in Troppau and Kremsier. Because of inadequate support these were years of bitter privation. By private teaching he earned the necessary money for study. In the autumn of 1866 he went to the University of Vienna. The professors to whom he owed most were Ottokar Lorenz and Theodor Sickel; the latter admitted him in 1869 into the Institute for Research in Austrian History. After the completion of his study he taught at a realgymnasium in Vienna. He received his doctor's degree at Tübingen (1871), and later also in Vienna (1874) for his work on the sources for the history of Kremsmünster. This publication led to a scholarly dispute with the famed historian Georg Waitz, which ended in victory for Loserth.

In 1875 Loserth was called as professor to the newly founded University of Czernowitz in Bukowina. In 1893 he was called to the University of Graz, Austria, and in 1917 he retired. In 1896 he became a member of the Academy of Vienna. He continued his writing with studies on the sources of Königsaal history, which led him into research on Cosmas of Prague and other old Bohemian sources. In this connection he published a series of critical works on the older history of Bohemia. His studies on the spiritual roots of Hussite doctrine were determinative. As a fruit of this research he published the book Huss und Wiclif (1884, second edition 1925), which proves the complete independence of the Hussite doctrines from Wycliffe's writings. These studies brought Loserth into contact with the Wycliffe Society, which began the publication of Wycliffe's Latin works in 1883. Of the 40 volumes which were published by 1922, 14, all of them first editions, were edited by Loserth. These publications are all accompanied by many critical individual inquiries, most of which were published in the writings of the Vienna Academy.

Studies in Moravian archives directed Loserth's attention to the Anabaptists, who had spread over Nikolsburg, southern Moravia, and Austria, and had carried on a live correspondence with their brethren in neighboring countries. These studies brought Loserth into connections with Joseph von Beck (q.v.), whose literary legacy he took over and completed with additional archival work. Works on the history of Anabaptism in Moravia, Lower Austria, Styria, Salzburg, Tirol, and Switzerland followed; also a biography of Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.), biographical sketches of Georg Blaurock (q.v.), Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.), and others. At an advanced age Loserth published other important works on the history of the Anabaptist movement. Among them was Pilgram Marbeck's Verantwortung (1929), a book replying to Schwenckfeld.

What Loserth discovered on the history of Anabaptism in Styria was also significant. It was shown that there were not only isolated Anabaptists there, as had previously been supposed, but that until 1530 the country was literally flooded with them. This information we owe to Dingauer, a Jesuit who was an official and father confessor in the Dietrichstein (q.v.) family and wrote a history of the house of Dietrichstein. He used the archives of Sigmund von Dietrichstein, who was for his part not a severe opponent of the Anabaptists, but incurred the reproach of Ferdinand for his lenience.

Finally Loserth uncovered a very valuable source on the decline of the Anabaptists in Moravia and Hungary and their restoration by the Carinthian emigrants, who were expelled to Transylvania in 1755, there became acquainted with the last remnants of the Hutterites, and finally accepted their teaching. Since they could not remain in Transylvania, they migrated to Wallachia and then to Russia; in the middle of the 19th century they went to North America (see Kuhr, Joseph).

Loserth's call to Graz opened further fields of study in the history of the Reformation and the Counter Reformation in Inner Austria with sources and thorough treatment. This resulted in inspiration for other historical studies of the country, of history of the noble families, of economics, and of Austrian history in general. His familiarity with the intellectual currents of the 13th and 14th centuries qualified him to write the history of the late Middle Ages for the Handbuch der mittelalterlichen und neueren Geschichte von Below-Meinecke.

Loserth died in Graz on Aug. 30, 1936, two days before the completion of his ninetieth year.

In the Zeitschrift des Historischen Vereins für Steiermark, vol. XXII (1926) appeared: W. Erben and A. Kern, "Johann Loserth als Geschichtsforscher. Eine Uebersicht seiner wissenschaftlichen Werke." The table of contents lists 286 articles, omitting book reviews and articles in current papers; for the history of Bohemia 65 titles, for the Wycliffite and Hussite movements 63 titles, for the history of the Anabaptists 25 titles, for the history of the Reformation and Counter Reformation in Austria and adjacent countries 68 titles, miscellaneous 62 titles.

For the history of the Anabaptists the following should be named: "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Mähren, in Zeitscht für allgemeine Geschichte, Kultur-, Literatur- und Kunstgeschichte I (1884) 438-57; "Die Stadt Waldshut und die vorderösterreichische Regierung in den Jahren 1523-26," in Archiv f. österr. Geschichte LXXVII (Vienna, 1891); "Deutschböhmische Wiedertäufer," in Mitt. d. Vereins f. Gesch. d. Deutschen in Böhmen XXX (1892); "Der Anabaptismus in Tirol von seinen Anfängen bis zum Tode Jakob Huters (1526-36). Aus den hinterlassenen Papieren des Josef R. von Beck," in Archiv f. österr. Geschichte LVIII (1892); "Der Anabaptismus in Tirol vom Jahre 1536 bis zu seinem Erlöschen," loc. cit. LXXIX (1893); Doctor Balthasar Hubmaier und die Anfänge der Wiedertaufe in Mähren (Brno, 1893) VIII, 217; "Wiedertäufer in Steiermark," in Mitt. d. Hist. Ver. f. Steiermark XLII (1894) 118-45; "Der Kommunismus der Huterischen Brüder in Mähren im 16. und 17. Jahrhundert," in Ztscht f. Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte III (1895) 61-92; "Der Communismus der mährischen Wiedertäufer im 16. und 17. Jahrhundert. Beiträge zu ihrer Geschichte, Lehre und Verfassung," in Archiv f. österr. Geschichte LXXXI (1895) 135-322; "Die Wiedertaufe in Niederösterreich von ihren Anfängen bis zum Tode Balthasar Hubmaiers, 1525-28," in Blätter des Ver. f. Landeskunde von Niederösterreich XXXIII (1899) 417-35; "Georg Blaurock und die Anfänge des Anabaptismus in Graubünden und Tirol," in Vorträge und Aufsätze aus der Comenius-Gesellschaft VII (1899); "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Steiermark," in Mitt. des Hist. Ver. f. Steiermark I (1903) 177 ff. and Ztscht des Hist. Vereins f. Steiermark X (1912) 267 ff.; "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Salzburg," in Mitt. d. Gesellschaft f. Salzburger Landeskunde LII (1912) 35-60; "Studien zu Pilgram Marbeck," in Gedenkschrift zum 400-jährigen Jubiläum der Mennoniten oder Taufgesinnten, 1525 bis 1925, 134-78; Pilgram Marbecks Antwort auf Kaspar Schwenkfelds Beurteilung des Buches der Bundesbezeugung von 1542, Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte der Oberdeutschen Taufgesinnten im 16. Jh., J. Loserth, ed. (Vienna and Leipzig, 1929) XII, 592 pp. In the Mennonitisches Lexikon he published over 100 articles, which also appear in the Mennonite Encyclopedia.

See also Akten und Korrespondenzen zur Geschichte der Gegenreformation in Innerösterreich unter Erzherzog Karl II. und Ferdinand II. (Vienna, 1898-1907) (Font. rer. Austr., 2. Abt., vols. 50, 58, 60); Die Reformation und Gegenreformation in den innerösterr. Ländern im 16. Jh. (Stuttgart, 1898) VIII, 614 pp. A.KE.

M. Uhlirz, "Johann Loserth zum 80. Geburtstage, 1. Sept. 1926," in Ztscht des dt. Vereins f. d. Geschichte Mährens u. Schlesiens XXVIII (1926) 1-8; Karl Völker, "Der Historiker des innerösterreichischen Protestantismus," in Christliche Welt, 1936, No. 16; Paul Dedic, "Johann Loserth zum Gedächtnis," in Der Säemann, No. 10; Christian Hege, "Johann Loserth," in Menn. Gesch.-Bl. I (1936) 36-40; ML II, 692-94.

Lost River Mennonite Church (GCM), located near Bethany in northeastern Saskatchewan, is a member of the Canadian District. Lost River is a small stream that disappears underground. The Lost River community is about 30 miles distant from the Carrot River and Petaigon areas, each of which also has a congregation. The first settler at Lost River was probably Cornelius Ens, who came from Manitoba in 1912. The first pastor was Cornelius Ens, who retired after 25 years of service, and was succeeded by Jacob H. Ens, the present (1956) pastor. The membership, at one time 300, was 150 in 1954, and is not given in the 1956 Yearbook. J.G.R.

Lostadt, Elsa van, wife of Gysbrecht van Baeck, Lord of Varik, bailiff of the town of IJsselstein, Dutch province of Utrecht, was much in sympathy with the Anabaptists, whom she soon after 1530 largely favored. Later she joined the Anabaptist-Münsterite sect of the Batenburgers (q.v.). In August 1544 she was imprisoned at The Hague, but was released without trial, probably in February 1545, against a security of 1,000 caroli-guilders; on Oct. 3, 1548, she was acquitted by the Court of Holland, which had ordered the imprisonment in 1544. This favorable arrangement concerning a notorious heretic was due to the fact that Elsa van Lostadt was a noble lady of high rank and especially because the influential Maximiliaan van Egmond, Count of Buren, had appealed to the Emperor Charles V. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 283 f., 311, 314, 325, 350; DB 1917, 142; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 99, 175, 208; Mellink, Wederdopers, 234, 241, 341, 415.

Lot, a method for the selection of church officials. Although there is no documentary evidence of the use of the lot by Anabaptists in the selection of church officials (elders, bishops, preachers, deacons), and although the lot is not mentioned in any Mennonite confessions of faith, there is inferential evidence that it came into use fairly early among the Swiss Mennonites and was generally in use among them and their descendants in France, South Germany, Galicia, Volhynia, and North America throughout the 17th-19th centuries. It has been uniformly used in the following groups in North America since the beginning of settlement here: Mennonite Church (MC), Old Order Mennonite, Old Order Amish, and Conservative Mennonite, but by no other North American groups. Although the practice is rapidly fading out in many districts of the Mennonite Church (MC), it is still almost universally used in the Franconia, Lancaster, and Washington-Franklin conferences. It remains in unchanging use in the remaining three above-mentioned groups. Apparently the lot was never used in any of the Dutch, North and East German, and Russian Mennonite groups in Europe, or in any of their descendant groups anywhere else in the world. The Hutterian Brethren have long used the lot in the selection of preachers, but not in the selection of Vorsteher and other officials. In the General Conference Mennonite Church the lot was used only in the congregations of Swiss background (not much after the 1870's) and the Eastern District. W. S. Gottschall claims that he was the last to be ordained by this method (1904).

N. van der Zijpp reports that although there is probably no direct evidence that the lot was used for the selection of ministers by the Dutch Anabaptists and Mennonites, there is reason to believe that it was used on occasion. The pamphlet Lammerenkrigh (1655) contains the following: "Then three preachers and three deacons had to be chosen, which among us is always done by a majority of votes of the entire brotherhood." Cornelius Krahn quotes Menno as saying, "Servants of the holy Word shall be duly called either by the Lord Himself, or by means of the pious" (Writings, 665). "Others, born of the unblamable church of Christ, were chosen by lot as was Matthias" (Writings, 443).

The lot is customarily used in the following manner in the selection of men to be ordained. The vote of the congregation or district is first taken for candidates, one or more votes being required for admission to candidacy, the number of required votes being determined from time to time by conference rules or tradition, or local congregational decision. Thereupon the bishop in charge, usually assisted by one or more visiting bishops, places on a table in the sight of the congregation a number of hymnbooks or Bibles equal to the number of candidates, in one of which he or an assistant has hidden a thin slip on which is written the following verse from Proverbs 16:33: "The lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord." A special prayer for divine action is then offered. Each candidate in succession now takes one of the books, which the bishop then opens in turn until he finds the lot slip. It is assumed that the one in whose book the slip is found is the one whom God has chosen. The chosen one is then usually immediately ordained. In the Franconia Conference (MC) each book contains a slip, all being blank but the one "bearing the lot."

The practice of the use of the lot is grounded primarily on the example of the choice of Matthias to take the place of Judas in the company of the twelve apostles as recorded in Acts 1:23-26. There the apostles prayed, "Thou, Lord, . . . shew whether of these two thou hast chosen." Those who use the lot believe that God operates through it to select the right person for the vacant office. The use of the lot usually goes with a high concept of the ministerial office as one conferred by God and not by men. It accordingly serves to elevate the chosen person above the congregation and gives him considerable prestige and authority. It also usually effectively eliminates factionalism and partisanship in the selection and later relationship of the chosen one to the congregation, since the choice is clearly not by vote. It also gives the chosen one a strong sense of direct call by God. In the older times one vote was enough to place a man in the lot for any office, although in more recent times some groups have required at least two or more votes for minister, one for bishop, or at least five from the entire bishop district.

Ordination by lot usually is a dramatic experience for a congregation. The service is loaded with tension, expectancy, and uncertainty. It is one of the few times when direct divine action can be visibly experienced, at least for those who sincerely believe that God acts through the lot, and it therefore intensifies the religious experience of the group practicing it. It is to be distinguished sharply from a mere drawing of straws or lots to break a tie.

The history of the use of the lot among Mennonites has as yet not been thoroughly studied. It was used in 1711 in Lancaster (Conestoga) to determine who should go to Europe to report to the brotherhood about the new colony. It was used in 1805 to determine the assignment of individual farm tracts to the purchasers of the Waterloo Township Mennonite settlement tract. It has been used in other Christian groups, among them in the Moravian Church in colonial Pennsylvania. In the first period of Moravian history at Bethlehem and other early settlements the lot was used for various decisions, among them the choice of marriage partners. In Lititz it was used for this purpose down into the 19th century. H.S.B.

H. S. Bender, "The Historical Background of Our Present Ministerial Offices," Gospel Herald XLII (1949) 1051, 1061.; W. S. Gottschall, "The Lot," The Mennonite, 1928, p. 3.

Lötscher is the name of a widely ramified Mennonite family stemming from the Simmental in the Bernese Oberland of Switzerland. The progenitor was Hans Lötscher (see Leutscher and Latscha) of Latterbach near Erlenbach, born 1601, a pious man, author of the song, "Schön new Geistlich Lied" (41 stanzas), in which he gives examples from the Bible to warn his descendants and contemporaries of the spirit and confusion of the world. On Jan. 21, 1633, he married Anna Kammerer of Latterbach. The three oldest of his five children, Hans, Melchior, and Anna Lötscher, were taken to the Anabaptist prison in Bern in 1666. The clergy on the Anabaptist Commission, including Abraham de Losea (q.v.), were instructed to visit them diligently, teach them, and take away "their whims." Considering their youth, there was hope that "they might be led on the right way." But they persisted steadfastly in their faith.

Hans and Melchior escaped from prison in August 1667, but were soon recaptured and put into the orphanage in Bern. After four years of imprisonment they were put in irons and taken to Venice on March 16, 1671, with four other Mennonites as galley-slaves. Then they were lost sight of, except that in 1673 they were again in the canton of Bern to take over the inheritance from their father. They were refused.

In 1711 members of the family of the youngest brother Abraham were among the Mennonites emigrating to Holland, where the name was soon spelled "Leutscher." Several of his descendants became Mennonite preachers in Holland. One of them, Jan Isaak Lotscher, who died in September 1866 at the age of 94 years, had carefully kept the Swiss costume of his fathers. S.G.

A. Fluri, "Die Lötscher von Latterbach," in Blätter für bern. Gesch., Kunst und Altertumskunde (Bern, 1912); Müller, Berner Täufer; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); ML II, 694 f.

Lotzer (Loytzer), Sebastian (1490-?), a writer of the Reformation era, the son of a church official in Horb, Württemberg, Germany. He was a furrier, a trade which brought him into contact with the educated and wealthy. His brother Johann was the personal physician of Bishop Wilhelm of Strasbourg and of Elector Louis V (q.v.) of the Palatinate and a friend of Erasmus (q.v.). On his journeys Sebastian came to Memmingen, became a citizen, married, and took over his father-in-law's business; hence he was also called Weyenlin Bamer. He early became a Protestant, and the intimate friend of the learned preacher Christoph Schappeler. He was most deeply influenced by Eberlin's Fünfzehn Bundesgenossen.

It is very likely that Lotzer formulated the petition of the Memmingen peasants to the council on Feb. 24, 1525, which became the basis for the famous Twelve Articles of the Peasant Revolt (q.v.), which are not the work of an individual, as A. Götze assumes, but which constitute the official program of the peasants agreed upon by the peasants at a meeting on Feb. 27, which was initiated by Lotzer. Lotzer was appointed "field secretary" or chancellor by Ulrich Schmid, the leader of the Baltringen peasants. The articles (which appeared in print on March 19, 1525) epitomized what had been current in Upper Swabia, basing the peasant demands on "divine law," and combining the social revolution with the religious problem; but on the whole they were quite moderate. Lotzer was also the author of the beautiful, courteous, and altogether irenic letter of the peasants' committee to the Swabian League which had refused peaceable negotiations (Vogt, Correspondenz des Ulrich Arzt, Nos. 115 and 137).

The greater the peasant host grew, the less were Schmid and Lotzer able to assert their peaceful intentions. A rebellion took place against Schmid (April 12-17). The Battle of Wurzach was a complete defeat for the peasants. Schmid and Lotzer fled to St. Gall, Switzerland, Schappeler's home town, where Lotzer met Kessler, who gives a very valuable report on him in his Sabbata. The Swabian League ordered the Memmingen council to arrest Lotzer, but he was safely concealed and no longer heard of. His brother Johann presumably aided him under an assumed name. G.Bo.

G. Bossert, "Seb. Lotzer und seine Schriften," in Blätter für württembergische Kirchengeschichte, 1887, 25-78 (reprint Memmingen, 1906); Günther Franz, Der deutsche Bauernkrieg (Munich, 1933) 196 ff.; Alfred Götze, Seb. Lotzers Schriften (1902); idem, "Die Artikel der Bauern," Hist. Vierteljahresschrift, 1901, 1-12; idem, "Die zwölf Artikel der Bauern," op. cit., 1902, 1-32; Fr. L. Baumann, Die zwölf Artikel der Bauern (1896); ML II, 695.

Loucks, Aaron (1864-1945), for many years a prominent leader in the Mennonite Church (MC), was born at Scottdale, Pa., Nov. 20, 1864, where he lived all his life with the exception of 13 months' residence in Riverside, Cal. He died at Scottdale Aug. 20, 1945. Interment in Alverton cemetery. He was the son of Jacob Stauffer and Mary Saylor Loucks of Somerset Co., Pa., who were the parents of eleven children. The progenitor of the American branch of the Loucks family was Peter Loucks, who was born in Germany in 1706 and came to America in 1738, settling in Bucks Co., Pa. Aaron Loucks was twice married. His first wife was Amelia Medsgar, and to this marriage his three children were born. His second wife was Sadie Saylor, who preceded him in death about a year. He became a member of the Mennonite Church (MC) in the spring of 1887, and was a charter member of the Scottdale congregation when it was incorporated in January 1898. He was ordained to the ministry at Stonerville (now Alverton), Pa., and as bishop at Scottdale in 1893.

As one of a number of men who were active in the Mennonite Church in its "great awakening" in the years previous to and following the beginning of the 20th century, he was active in establishing various organizations which grew up in that time. He was the founder of the Mennonite Publishing House and largely instrumental in beginning the publication of the Gospel Witness in 1905, which in 1908 was merged with the Herald of Truth, published in Elkhart, Ind., to become the Gospel Herald. He helped to organize the Mennonite Publication Board in 1907. When this organization took over the Publishing House and all its publications in 1908, Scottdale became the official publication headquarters of the Mennonite Church (MC).

Aaron Loucks was also interested in the other organizations of the church and was active in the work of the Mennonite General Conference, the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, and the Mennonite Board of Education, of which he was treasurer for a number of years. As chairman of the Mennonite Relief Commission for War Sufferers he made a trip to the Near East in 1918. He was a leader in the peace work of the church during World War I and was especially active in contacting government officials and in visiting brethren detained in camps.

Loucks was active in the Southwestern Pennsylvania (now Allegheny) Conference and the Sunday-school conference of the same district, which he helped to organize in 1895. He was also in part the originator of the Bible conference movement which for a number of decades was widely used as a means of giving Bible instruction to the rank and file of the Mennonites. Through his leadership, the first Bible conference held in a Mennonite congregation was conducted at the Scottdale church for two weeks, beginning Dec. 28, 1896. P.E.

Louis XIV (1638-1715), king of France 1643-1715, intended to make France an absolute monarchy. Although he was strictly Catholic, he did not permit the pope to interfere in any political affairs. Very energetically he defended Catholic customs and usage, which were called freedoms of the Gallic church. He was also a zealous promoter of religious unity in France. There were in the kingdom many Protestants, to whom Henry IV had guaranteed freedom of conscience and certain political rights in the Edict of Nantes (1598). Richelieu, the minister of Louis XIII, had withdrawn these political rights. Now Louis XIV proceeded to restrict their freedom of conscience. What was not expressly promised in the Edict was prohibited. All means were used to convert the Protestants. The most terrible of these was the compulsory quartering of troops, who were guilty of all sorts of violence, upon the unfortunate ones, until they declared themselves ready to recant. The large numbers of conversions were announced and celebrated with great rejoicing. Finally the Jesuits persuaded the king that there were practically no Protestants left in France and that the Edict was therefore meaningless. It was repealed in 1685. The remaining Protestants were forbidden to leave the country on threat of being sentenced to the galleys. Nevertheless hundreds and thousands of them fled over the borders and brought their fund of knowledge, particularly in industry, to their new home.

Although Alsace had been French since 1648, it was not affected by the Edict of Nantes, since the Peace of Westphalia had assured it freedom of conscience. But there were many Mennonites in Alsace. Against them the king was particularly prejudiced. In France the name Anabaptists had the effect of a bogey; it suggested only the Peasant Revolt and the revolt of Münster. But the Alsatian Mennonites were quiet, and the government of the newly acquired province was so complicated that they escaped notice for many years. The attention of the king was directed to the Mennonites when he came into conflict with the Dutch States-General. But here he heard only favorable reports about them. Sometime previously General Turenne had met with the Dutch Ambassador M. van Beuningen. Turenne censured the States-General for tolerating so many sects, especially the Anabaptists. The statesman replied: "Why should we not tolerate the Anabaptists? They are such good people and so easy to get along with. They do not seek honor and regard, so they are in nobody's way. We do not fear revolt from a sect which has as one of the articles of its faith a prohibition against carrying arms. The Mennonites pay their share of all public taxes, and that suffices us. With their taxes we pay mercenaries who are more useful to us in the army than they could be. They build us up by the purity of their morals. They carry on agriculture, industry, and trade without wasting what they earn in luxury or gluttony. People of other creeds frequently do not act thus but by their excesses are a public offense and a great injury to the state. To be sure they refuse to render an oath, but that is of no significance, for their promise to speak the truth binds them like an oath" (Michiels, 104 f.).

In 1672, when the French army marched into Holland, Louis XIV sent Raymond Formantyn (q.v.) to get information about the Mennonites and make a report. The learned man went to Emmerich to the bookdealer van Beughem. Since they did not understand each other's language they conversed in Latin. Van Beughem summoned the Mennonite preacher Heinrich van Voorst and served as interpreter for him. Formantyn was amazed at the Biblical knowledge of the Mennonite. He looked up in a French Bible the references cited and underlined them. After a two days' discussion they departed on friendly terms and Formantyn promised to give a favorable report. But the effect of this report was not evident, for Louis XIV had to withdraw from the country. The French troops retreated to Alsace via the Palatinate, doing a great deal of damage (1674). The unfortunate Palatinate, to which many Mennonites from Switzerland had fled, was devastated again in 1689.

But the hour of persecution was also to strike for the Alsatian Mennonites. There were many of them in the gravure Rappoltstein and especially around Ste.-Marie-aux-Mines, where they had achieved a certain economic position through their industry, rousing the envy of their neighbors, especially since they were exempt from military service. Complaints reached Versailles. In the name of the king, de la Houssaye issued a circular on Sept. 9, 1712, requiring that all Anabaptists be expelled from the kingdom. They turned to the gravure of Montbéliard, which at that time belonged to Württemberg, to the duchy of Lorraine, to Zweibrücken, and to the Breisgau in Baden.

The count of Rappoltstein at that time was Christian II von Birkenfeld, a captain in the French army, a favorite of the king. Although it meant a great loss to his country, he had to carry out the king's command exactly, whereas other lords in Alsace were more lenient. It seems that the numerous Mennonites living in Upper Alsace and especially in the Sundgau (south of Altkirch) were not molested. Also in Rappoltstein they were again tolerated on a petition by the count, at least a certain number of families.

Louis XIV died in 1715. Under his successors the Mennonites again enjoyed relative peace on the condition that they would draw no public attention to themselves. In 1766, when Lorraine became French, inquiries were made about them; but since the reports were favorable they were tolerated until finally the French Revolution brought religious freedom to all. P.So.

Alfred Michiels, Les Anabaptistes des Vosges (Paris, 1860); ML II, 697 f.

Louis V (1478-1544), Elector Palatine 1508-44, conservative in church matters, and not averse to Protestantism. He frequently strove to mediate between religious factions. He did not leave the Catholic Church, in part because four of his brothers were bishops (Ried, 57).

The Anabaptist movement became rather widespread in his realm beginning in 1527. Immediate countermeasures were passed, involving the death penalty. Apparently the elector was opposed to its infliction in matters of faith, as can be inferred from the fact that he asked opinions of jurists at 21 places (Wiswedel, 23).

In 1527 the Palatine chancellor Florenz von Venningen composed a legal document which advocated the death penalty for persons who were baptized on their faith, and which was sent to the juristic faculties of ten universities for criticism (Krebs, 568). Replies rejecting the death penalty did not influence the elector, for he did not wish to irritate the emperor. On Jan. 4, 1528, the notorious mandate of Charles V was published, which ordered the death penalty for Anabaptists. In this connection Louis issued a mandate on March 5, 1528, in order, as he stated, "to live out most obediently the command and edict of the Roman Imperial Majesty," forbidding baptism on faith on penalty of death and confiscation of goods, offering high rewards for information on a baptized person (Hege, 58 f.; see Palatinate). The Hutterite chronicles report that 350 Anabaptists were executed under Louis V (Beck, 279). Other reports give lower figures. But that they were numerous enough to cause some uneasiness is implied in the opinion of the Nürnberg scholars on the punishment of the Anabaptists dated April 29, 1531, which states that Louis "had caused a large number to be sentenced from life to death" (TA Bayern I, 226).

This severe procedure against the Anabaptists brought Louis many a reproach (Krebs, 570 and 574). The Hutterite chronicles report that he rued the many executions (Beck, 32). In fact after 1529 there is no record of an Anabaptist execution in the Palatinate. A confirmation of the Hutterite assertion can be seen in his request of March 23, 1529, in the consultations concerning the imperial law against the Anabaptists April 22, 1529; though he declared himself in agreement with its specifications on punishment, he wished "that only those be punished by death who refused to abstain from Anabaptism" (Ney, 138). The law then specified that those who recanted should be pardoned. HEGE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); Manfred Krebs, "Beiträge zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer am Oberrhein," in Ztscht f. d. Gesch. d. Oberrheins LXXXII (1931); J. Ney, Geschichte des Reichstages zu Speyer im Jahre 1529 (Hamburg, 1879); Karl Ried, Moritz von Hutten, Fürstbischof von Eichstätt (1539-1557) und die Glaubensspaltung (Münster, 1925); TA Bayern I; TA Baden-Pfalz; Wiswedel, Bilder II; ML II, 699.

Louis, Duke of Bavaria, conjoint ruler with his brother William IV 1515-45. Both were violent opponents of the Anabaptists. Even before the edict of Charles V they issued a mandate on Nov. 15, 1527, which declared the Anabaptists to be criminals who deserved corporal and capital punishment (Winter, 170-76). On Dec. 5, 1527, the inquisitor Martin Pasensner of Jesenwang was given supreme authority to ferret them out (Winter, 177). Whoever joined them and was caught must die; recantation did not save them from death (Nestler, 77). Louis carried on a correspondence with the council of Regensburg concerning the Anabaptist preacher Würzlburger, and had him sentenced and executed in Regensburg (Nestler, 76-78). HEGE.

Hermann Nestler, Die Wiedertäuferbewegung in Regensburg (Regensburg, 1926); V. A. Winter, Geschichte der baierischen Wiedertäufer im 16. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1809); ML II, 697.

Louis (1554-93), Duke of Württemberg 1568-93, son of Duke Christoph, until 1558 under the guardianship of the privy councilor Melchior Jäger and later completely dominated by him, was very good-natured, strictly Lutheran, musical, somewhat given to drink. To check the spread of Anabaptism the official Landhofmeister, chancellor, and councilors, in 1584 insisted on the death penalty and torture in certain cases for Anabaptist leaders and for exiles who kept returning. But Louis, under the influence of the court chaplain Lukas Osiander, who pointed out that the Catholics would then also apply torture and the death penalty to Protestants, decided that for a while he would wait and use the more lenient method. G.Bo.

Stälin, "Das Rechtsverhältnis der religiösen Gemeinschaften und der fremden Religionsverwandten in Württemberg nach seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung," in Württembergische Jahrbücher für Statistik und Landeskunde (1868) 170; ML II, 699.

Louisiana, a southern state bordering on the Gulf of Mexico. It is probable that the first Mennonites to visit this state were immigrants from Alsace-Lorraine, who landed at New Orleans, a seaport and the chief city of the state. Thus in 1839 Christian Reeser and his two brothers and sister from France arrived in that city. In 1874 John F. Funk had correspondence with Mennonites who were residents of New Orleans (Menn. Hist. Bulletin, July 1954).

In 1898 Mennonites settled near Lake Charles (q.v.), about 200 miles due west of New Orleans, and founded a church (MC) which at one time had 40 members. By 1955 only one family was left in the community, the others having moved away because rice farming did not become as successful a venture as expected. In 1918 a Mennonite congregation was organized at Allemands, 30 miles west of New Orleans, but it existed only a few years, the families all moving away. In 1936 three families from the Franconia Mennonite Conference moved to Allemands (q.v.) and established a Mennonite (MC) church which now has 45 members. An outgrowth of this church is the one at Akers (q.v.), 40 miles north of New Orleans. It was built in 1942 and in 1955 had 20 members, all natives of Louisiana, largely French-speaking. M.G.

Louisville, Ohio, a town (pop. 4,000) in a farming community in east central Stark County. Five miles northeast of Louisville a Mennonite (MC) settlement worships at the Beech Church, which has 369 members, 7 per cent of whom live in the town. Probably all live within shopping distance of Louisville. Mennonites (Amish from Alsace) came to this community in 1823. N.O.

Lourens Janssen (Louwereyns Jansz Nooddruft). This Anabaptist martyr is named twice by van Braght, once (Mart. Mir. D 726, E 1036) as Lourens de Schoenmaker, and again (D 747, E 1055) as Louwerens Jansz Nooddruft. He was a shoemaker of Delft, Holland. He was arrested at Antwerp in August 1576 and after a severe imprisonment was burned at the stake on Jan. 18, 1577. Since no writing materials were available to him, he wrote two letters to his friends by scratching them with a pin on pewter spoons, which show a deep piety. One of them says, "Grace and peace from God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ be with you my very dear and in God beloved sister in the Lord, Weyndelken and her daughter M.; this I wish you from the depths of my heart before God, who searcheth the hearts and reins, that you may walk before Him unharmed and unhindered in His truth, to which He has called you; and always look to Christ and to all the righteous. Adieu, in this time, adieu." (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 211; XIV, 98 f., No. 1120; ML III, 265.) NEFF.

Lourens (Laurens) de Schoenmaker, an Anabaptist martyr: see Laurens Janssen.

Lourents de Schoenmaker, an Anabaptist martyr: see Schuster, Laurenz.

Lourys Lourisz, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr of Leiden, beheaded on July 28, 1534, at The Hague. He was active in preaching and baptizing at Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland, probably in the spring of 1534. The assertion of Knappert that Lourisz practiced polygamy and left behind "two widows" has been disproved by Mellink, who suggests that Lourys Lourisz was a brother of the martyr Adriaen Lourisz (q.v.). vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 47c, 744 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, 191 f., 194, 229, 353; L. Knappert, De opkomst van het Protestantisme in eene Noord-Nederlandsche stad (1908) 139; DB 1917, 112, No. 25.

Louwe (Louw), a Dutch Mennonite family living at Zaandam, province of North Holland. Some of them were owners of whaling boats and were well-to-do businessmen. Already in 1628 they were members of the Frisian congregation (Oude Huys). A large number of them served the Mennonite congregation of Zaandam-West as deacons. Louwrens Jansz Louwe (b. Feb. 2, 1657, at Zaandam, d. there Jan. 30, 1723) was preacher of the Zaandam-West congregation from 1681 until his death. In 1697 he was among the four buitenleraren (preachers or elders from other congregations) who were at Wormer (q.v.) to decide concerning Jacob Pieters Banning, preacher of Wormer who had enunciated "new opinions"; e.g., that there are no angels or devils (DB 1898, 77-97, passim). Cornelis Louwrens Louwe in 1781 bequeathed to the Mennonite orphanage of Zaandam-West 2,000 guilders and a beautiful clock, which is still in possession of the Zaandam congregation. Jan Hendriksz Louwe, of Krommenie, was a member of the Waterlander congregation and at the same time an ardent Collegiant (q.v.). In the period 1691-1712 he often delivered addresses in the Collegiant center at Rijnsburg. vdZ.

S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (1937) 80, 121 f., 186, 192 ff.

Louwer (Lauren, Louren, Louwers), Bartel (Bartholomeus), born at Goch, Germany, about 1580, d. at Amsterdam after 1670, in his youth traveled over many countries and lived in 1617 for some time at Vilna, Lithuania, was from 1642 preacher (later elder) of the Flemish congregation of Amsterdam until about 1660. He published Kort Verhael, eens Gesprecks, voorghevallen in der Wildae oft Vylnae (Amsterdam, n.d.; 2nd ed., n.p., 1655; 3rd ed. Amsterdam, 1664). An extract of this booklet and some biographical notes on Louwer are found in Maatschoen's Aanhangzel. Louwer, who was a champion of strict Mennonite principles, was a representative of the Amsterdam congregation in the Flemish conferences at Haarlem in June 1649 and Leiden in June 1660. He was a friend of T. J. van Braght, to whom he gave a letter from Zürich, Switzerland (Mart. Mir. D 805, E 1104), containing particulars about the martyr Hans Landis. NEFF, VDZ.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis III, 249-69; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 35, 71-73; Biogr. Wb. V, 621-23; ML II, 695.

Louwerens Jansz Nooddruft, an Anabaptist martyr: see Lourens Janssen.

Louwys de Wever (official name Loys Luycx) of Laerne near Gent, Flanders, was beheaded on April 22, 1558, at Antwerp, Belgium. He was threatened with burning at the stake, but after recanting he was beheaded. The martyrbooks, not knowing this fact, have listed him among the martyrs. Hence his name is found in a hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. Van Braght states that Louwys was beheaded at Antwerp in 1558 (without exact date) because of his true confession and his steadfastness. VDZ.

Mart. Mir. D 201, E 583; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 444 f., XIV, 22 f., No. 255.

Love (Greek, Agape). Agape as Primary and Sacrificial. Agape is the deepest and truest fact of the Christian faith. To Jesus love to God and to neighbor constituted those commandments on which depend all the law and the prophets. To Paul it is the greatest in his faith, hope, and love trilogy and the crucial ingredient of all relations and realities.

The sacrificialists are right (to use the typology of sacrificialist-mutualist of Dan Williams) in stressing agape as a gift from God and as a reality bestowed on the unworthy, the ugly, and the downtrodden rather than the lovely. On the other hand, Nygren strains unduly in trying to force the whole Biblical presentation of agape through the narrow definition of uncaused agape. And, moreover, the sacrificialists have not adequately developed the concrete incarnational reality of agape in Jesus Christ, the supreme response to whom is discipleship. Following Christ is the key to Christian ethics even though it operated dialectically with forgiveness. The mutualists are correct in stressing community as the crucible in which love operates and toward which it moves. Just as discipleship saves agape from being a philosophical abstraction, community saves it from individualism. Against the mutualists' (MacMurray and Wieman) question the affirmation is to be questioned that self-realization is the cause or effect of community. Rather the truly Christian foundation is: self-realization through self-sacrifice in Christian community.

Amos Wilder writes that ". . . the claims of the Kingdom take the forms of claims of discipleship to Jesus in the accomplishment of his errand." Thus our Lord seeks a response: vertically in worship and obedience; horizontally in service to the neighbor. In human history there is no guarantee of this response; indeed, there is a basic dimension of tragedy expressed in alienation, separation, hostility, conflict, and martyrdom. Here the eschatological dimension of love enters since there is never a fully temporal realization. God in Christ is a suffering lover whose love is never fully returned. Christ suffered for us on the cross; Christ suffers with us in discipleship living; Christ suffers because of us in sin and rebellion. In all this, divine love is revealing itself. And in all this divine love seeks a response.

Agape as Brotherhood and Mutuality. God's love is socially creative—thus producing fellowship, community, and church. The primary meaning of community is the Christian community which, in turn, effects the larger human community. The church is a brotherhood of love, and this is a superior view to the church as an impersonal station dispensing grace, or to the church as a static intellectual depository of truth, or to the church as a link in the chain of historical continuity, or to the church as the chaplain of culture values. Therefore, as a corporate society the church is originated, sustained, and characterized by agape.

The tension between the Anabaptist understanding of agape as creative of community and other Protestant and Catholic views is the issue of direct or indirect influence in the larger secular community. The Anabaptist tradition developed in the context of rigorous Bible study and severe persecution. This suggested that the Anabaptists ought to be willing to sacrifice universality for intensity. The world observes the love, the voluntary, filial obedience, and the cultural creativity of the Christian community, and finds this suggestive and stimulating to its own life. There are strong voices advocating a more direct way of influencing the secular community, but thus far this view has floundered on the dilemma of pacifism and power.

To the Anabaptists one of the sure fruits of love is mutual aid. In recent years this has had a real renewal in theory and practice. On the other hand, there is the Niebuhrian claim that the essence of mutual love is reciprocity, a fact that introduces prudential considerations where agape is compromised by ego-claims. Patterns of institutional mutual aid (hospitals, homes for aged, fire insurance) tend to provide specified kinds of care and service for specified amounts of financial contribution. An element of reciprocity enters in here and, unchecked, can be destructive of agape. But, fundamentally there is unlimited liability for the brother regardless of the ego-claims he can make. And, in addition, sacrificial love on all the Jericho roads of history has the obligation to help the neighbor outside of the Christian brotherhood.

In the Anabaptist tradition communities are of two types: the communal or communistic as in the Hutterites, and the semi-communal. The semi-communal has been normative, calling for private property in the form of home and business yoked to a radical doctrine of stewardship in a brotherhood-centered existence with common liability for all risks as well as duties of Christian witness and work.

The real enemy of love in modern society is atomistic individualism, which has no doctrine of community, and which, when it enters the church, views love as subjectively inward.

Within Anabaptist community there has been a regular peril in the rejection of the outgoing missionary thrust in order to preserve mutuality in the Christian brotherhood. While there is a rich inner life in the church, it is precisely the reality of Christ's saving love which sends Christians out into witness and service.

Agape and Justice. The Cross is the symbol of sacrificial love, the Golden Rule is the symbol of mutuality, and an eye-for-an-eye and a tooth-for-a-tooth doctrine is the symbol of justice. The Lex Talionis of the Old Testament is confirmed in the suum cuique of classical jurisprudence. The latter refers to the rendering to each man that which is due him whether in punishment or damages.

Once again the problem for agape is raised by the ego-claims of justice. The first degree murder is punished by death or life imprisonment, and the speeding driver by a $10.00 fine. What is even more painful, the state enforces these claims of the law with policemen, militia, and armies. Ultimately, it poses the problem of war itself, which is the collective denial of agape.

Love and justice are dialectically related. Love, even perfectly nonresistant love, can do many things which justice wants to do: give equal care to the lowly, help people to secure the help they deserve, and create the integrity, order, and character, without which society is impossible.

But love is also the contradiction of justice and the law. There are times, especially in periods of danger and upheaval, when the counsel of love cannot be made plausible mundane common sense and fulfillment; it may appear to be treason, folly, and naive religious zeal. To the disciple of Christ in such moments love must then rest its case on the foundation of Truth. Love is Biblical. Love is in the will of God. Any Christian convinced that he is abiding in the love of God, the will of God, and the truth of God obviously would be foolish to abandon this for prudential considerations of justice. Perhaps Emil Brunner has caught the strange relationship here when he said, "There is an antithesis between love and justice. The antithesis does not sever the bond between them nor the bond sever the antithesis."

To be truly loving the Christian ought to be nonresistant. Yet, in the years ahead, it would appear that the English and Greek words for love might be better terms in describing the peace testimony than the valid but more limited term of nonresistance. I John 4:8 declares that God is love. Our response to His love is the central fact of the Christian life. D.E.S.

Loveland (Col.) Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, was organized in 1906 with Heinrich Nikkel as leader, succeeded by Conrad Burkhart in 1914. The membership never exceeded 37. By 1924 most of the members had moved away and the congregation became extinct. P.C.H.

Lovendegem, a village between Gent and Brugge in Belgium, where in 1629-30 the Mennonites held some meetings in the home of a farmer Zegher Clays, son of Gheerolf. These Mennonites also attended the meetings at the Biezen near Aardenburg (q.v.) in Dutch Zeeland, Flanders. The names of some Mennonite families living here are known (among them Coppens, Claeys, Dobbelaere). Some Mennonites formerly living in Gent seem to have joined this group. A lawsuit was opened against the Mennonite Samuel Pitts and his mother (outcome unknown). After 1630 no meetings seem to have been held at Lovendegem, most Mennonites then having moved away to the Netherlands, especially to Aardenburg. vdZ.

DB 1876, 96, 101, 103-6; F. K. van Lennep, Verzameling van Oorkonden betr. het geslacht van Eeghen (Amsterdam, 1918) 134 ff., 140, note 2; A. L. E. Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.

Low German language: see Plattdeutsch.

Löwen, Peter (1882-1955), a Mennonite missionary and elder, was born at Muntau, Ukraine, South Russia, on April 2, 1882, the son of Peter and Maria Löwen. He taught the elementary school at Spat, Crimea, and at the age of 22 went to the Mission School of Neukirchen near Mörs, Germany, after which he continued his education at Leiden, the Netherlands. On July 8, 1911, he married Emilie Fellmann. They had eight children.

On Sept. 11, 1911, Löwen was ordained as elder and missionary and worked for three years in the Dutch Mennonite mission of Sumatra (q.v.), after which he returned because of the ill health of his wife. For forty years he served as a minister promoting missions among the Mennonites of South Germany. He served primarily at Donauwörth, Augsburg, Nürnberg, and Würzburg, where he died on Feb. 13, 1955. C.K.

Obituary in Gbl., May 1, 1955, p. 43; Der Mennonit IX (April 1955) 63.

Löwenberg, a Mennonite family found principally in the Palatinate and in the United States. The progenitor of the family was Johannes Löwenberg, born 1775, a weaver of Bolanden. He was originally Protestant, but married Elisabeth Hahn, a member of the Mennonite congregation at Weierhof, and joined the Mennonite Church there and also settled there. A son with the same name emigrated to the United States in 1850 with his family and a group of relatives and friends and settled in Donnellson, Iowa. The present members of this family in the United States are his descendants. The progenitor of the branch remaining in Germany was Michael Löwenberg (1821-74), a minister of the Weierhof congregation and the founder of the school at Weierhof (q.v.).

One of Michael's sons was Thomas Löwenberg, b. Feb. 26, 1849, at the Weierhof, married first to Kathi then to Sophie Göbel, d. March 23, 1928. He received his pedagogical training in the normal school at Schiers, Switzerland, and his theological training in the mission school at Barmen, Germany. In 1873 he accepted the position of minister in the Weierhof-Uffhofen congregation and after his father's death for a time was the head of the Weierhof school. In 1882 he was called as minister of the Mennonite congregation at Ibersheim-Eppstein-Ludwigshafen, and served them until 1917. He spent his period of retirement at the Weierhof. All the present members of this family in Germany are descendants of Thomas and his brother August.

Some members of this family settled in Iowa, from where the name spread over other states.
NEFF, P.S.

"Einiges aus dem Leben des Michael Löwenberg," Gem.-Kal. 1896, 2-20; Christian Neff, "Thomas Löwenberg, ein Lebensbild," Gem.-Kal. 1929, 106-11; ML II, 695 f.

Löwenberg, Michael (1821-74), preacher of the Mennonite church at Weierhof (q.v.), Palatinate, Germany, founder of the Realschule at Weierhof, b. Nov. 8, 1821, at Weierhof, d. there Dec. 13, 1874. He married the widow of Johannes Dahlem in 1848. Löwenberg received his training at the normal school in Beuggen. In 1848 he opened a private elementary school at Weierhof. In 1849 he was called to the ministry of the congregation there, serving until his death in 1874. In 1868 he published in the Mennonitische Blätter an appeal to "the Mennonites in Germany, South Russia, and Holland" to establish a Christian school, the principal purpose of which would be to train preachers. On Dec. 2, 1867, the school was opened on a modest scale, and under the direction of Ernst Göbel (q.v.) it became the largest private school in the Palatinate. (See Real-Anstalt am Donnersberg.) It was first located in the Weberhäuschen, which had been built in 1810 by the original Johannes Löwenberg. One of Michael's sons, Thomas (1849-1928), was pastor of the Weierhof congregation 1873-82, and 1882-1917 pastor at Ibersheim. (Gem.-Kal. 1896, 2-20; ML II, 695.)
NEFF.

Löwenberg (Löwenburg), a government district (Amt) of the former grand duchy of Berg, in the Siebengebirge, Rhineland-Westphalia, Germany. In the 16th century and the first half of the 17th numerous Anabaptists were living here. In 1564 the duke gave orders to keep a close watch for Anabaptists and rebaptized persons, and to hunt them up in the woods, ravines, heaths, and similar lonely places. In 1565 the pastor of Honnef denied that he was a follower of the Anabaptists; he had, on the contrary, converted a number of those who had followed after the Anabaptists for one to six years. On Nov. 26, 1565, Konrad Koch (q.v.) was beheaded in Honnef. On May 1, 1591, the Concept of Cologne was signed for the Löwenberg congregation by "Jan Koch, on behalf of the church in Hauffen (i.e., Honnef) and Caspar of Dollendorf." On April 9, 1619, a decree was issued by the Count Palatine that he, the count, perceived with displeasure that the Anabaptists were greatly increasing in the Löwenberg district and were secretly meeting. All the Anabaptists caught at such meetings were to be punished. Following new decrees by the government against the Anabaptists lists of the Anabaptists were turned in to the authorities. On Dec. 30, 1562, the decree was issued that the Anabaptists who were carrying on important trade or possessed considerable estates were to leave the country within two years; those who had no possessions, within six months. From the Löwenberg area some went to the gravure of Wied, south of the Siebengebirge, in 1654-56, and became the founders of the Neuwied Mennonite congregation. Others (especially the Schumacher family) went to the Palatinate around Kriegsheim, from where they later emigrated to the United States. The later fate of most of the Anabaptists of the Löwenberg area has not yet been investigated. The last information about the Mennonites in this area is a report of 1670 that the Mennonites had all left the country, but were still owners of estates.
W.N.

State archives of Düsseldorf, Jülich-Berg II, 244, 255, 256; Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 444, note 2; W. Risler, "Täufer im bergischen Amt Löwenburg," Gesch.-Bl. XII (1955) 6-21; XIII (1956) 31-46; W. Niepoth, "Die Wanderungen und Wandlung der Mennonitenfamilie Schuhmacher," Der Mennonit X (1956) 27 f.

Lower Deer Creek Mennonite Church (MC), Kalona, Iowa, is located four miles north and four west of Kalona, in the neighborhood of the first Amish Mennonite settlement in Johnson County in 1846. After an influx of settlers, their first church was organized in 1851. Sometime before 1863, the church had become large enough to make necessary its division into two congregations, the Deer Creek district and the Sharon Township district. In 1877 the former district was divided into Upper Deer Creek and Lower Deer Creek. Although these two churches were Old Order Amish Mennonite, contrary to custom they discontinued holding services in their homes and in 1890 built churches. In 1917 Lower Deer Creek erected a large frame structure, which was destroyed by fire in January 1956. A new church was constructed a short distance north of the former site during the same year (1956). Following the severance of fellowship with the Old Order churches in 1917 after a controversy and a division over the issue of the installation of telephones in the homes of members, the Lower Deer Creek congregation followed an independent course until it joined the Western District Amish Mennonite Conference in 1919. Jacob F. Swartzendruber (q.v.) for many years served as bishop of the church (1887-1913). In 1955 the bishop was John Y. Swartzendruber, having been ordained to that office in 1919. The membership was 364. In 1945 the Iowa Mennonite School (q.v.) was established across the road from the church.
M.G.

M. Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939); E. G. Swartzendruber, Amish and Mennonite Church Centennial Anniversary (Wellman, Iowa, 1953).

Lower Mennonite Church (OOM), located four miles southwest of Wadsworth, Medina Co., Ohio, is a member of the Ohio-Indiana Conference. A minister by the name of Abraham Rohrer moved into this area from Maryland in 1832 and was ordained as bishop in 1836. Therefore it is probable that the church was organized under his leadership about 1832. Other ministers who have served the congregation were Michael Rohrer, Henry Beery, Bishop Isaac L. Good, Jacob Newcomer, and Edwin Koppes. The first meetinghouse was probably a frame structure built between 1835 and 1840. The present (1954) congregation numbers 27 members and is in charge of Moses G. Horst as bishop and Abram Good as minister.

When the Wisler (Old Order) Mennonite division occurred in Elkhart Co., Ind., in 1871, the Lower congregation, including Bishop Rohrer (1788-1878) and the other ordained men, and all but a half-dozen families, sided with Wisler. The small minority who remained with the other Mennonite Conference withdrew from the congregation, though still using the meetinghouse part of the time, and ultimately built the Bethel meetinghouse in 1893 hence are called the Bethel Mennonite Church (q.v.). They had no minister until 1881. Ab.G.

Lower Rhine, the section of the Rhine from Cologne to its mouth in the North Sea, 117 miles of which lie in Germany. In Mennonite history this section of the river and the area extending as far as Andernach played an important role. It was a part of the route which connected Switzerland, the cradle of the Anabaptist movement, to Holland, the home of Menno Simons.

Even before the Reformation the division of the country into many small religious and political regions facilitated the rise of separatist groups. Of lasting influence on circles of practical Christianity were "Master" Johannes Eckhart (q.v.), who died in 1327 while he was on trial for heresy before the Court of Inquisition under the Archbishop of Cologne, and Thomas a Kempis, the author of the devotional book De imitatione Christi. Thus the soil in the region of the Lower Rhine was well prepared for the reception of the Upper German Anabaptists.

As in the Netherlands, the Anabaptists were until the middle of the 16th century the only Reformation party in this region. Contributory to the spread of the movement, in addition to the urge to proclaim the Gospel, was also the wretched spiritual care of the people, which caused frequent complaint on the part of the Catholic populace. A church inspection ordered by the duke in 1533 revealed that many of the clergy "administered the sacraments only in return for payment, and many had subsidiary businesses, such as the sale of intoxicating beverages," with a train of evil consequences, as the criminal records of the time show. The revelations of the inspectors concerning the educational level of the clergy were quite shocking. Real theologians were the exception. "No wonder that the clergy and with them the church fell into popular disrepute and that the itinerant preachers of the new doctrine found favorable soil" (Scheibler, 13).

Furthermore, the Jülich Declaration of April 8, 1533, admits that there had always been things in the Catholic Church which should have been corrected, but which had been tolerated and overlooked for the sake of peace. The chaplains and priests were conspicuous for their immorality. In Jülich all moral laws seemed "to have been dissolved in the communities in which Anabaptist congregations were later formed" (Rembert, 52 and 60).

Thus the Anabaptists found entry all along the Lower Rhine, especially in the largest state, the duchies of Cleve-Mark and Jülich-Berg, which were united in 1521, but had separate jurisdiction, also in the county of Mörs, in the archbishopric of Cologne (q.v.), as well as in the imperial cities of Aachen (q.v.) and Cologne (q.v.). Because of the mandates (q.v.) isued against them they conducted their meetings in secret.

On the origin and development of Mennonite congregations little is known. Congregations arose at first in the Jülich districts of Wassenberg, Heinsberg, Millen, and Born, from which numerous martyrs are reported. The first martyr in the duchy of Jülich was Vit to Pilgrams, who died at München-Gladbach in 1537 (not as Martyrs' Mirror says in 1532). Congregations were also formed in Aachen in 1533, in Cologne in 1531, which had over 100 members in 1562, and in München-Gladbach (see München-Gladbach) in 1532, where the congregation numbered 151 families in 1622, most of them weavers (names in Keller, II, 224-29; a register of 1654 with 114 names is given by Walter Risler in Beiträge, 97-107). In 1534 there was also a congregation in Emmerich (q.v.), which soon after the one in Cleve (q.v., 1895) expired in the early 20th century. In the second half of the 16th century other congregations were formed, the period 1589-1609 being remarkable in "that the laity here kept the leadership in religious matters in their own hands" (Keller, 6). Anabaptists were also found at many places in the duchies of Cleve, Jülich, and Berg.

The growth of the Anabaptist movement in the region of the Lower Rhine gave the governments cause for a second church inspection in 1550. In Jülich (q.v.) it was hoped that this church inspection would bring about an improvement in this respect, so that complaints about evil conditions would cease (Rembert, 425). Church reforms could, however, be carried out only gradually (Keller, 10). On March 9, 1560, Duke William III issued an edict to the officials of Cleve and Mark, ordering that "Sacramentists and Anabaptists" should be instructed by orthodox preachers and an attempt be made to bring them back to the Catholic Church.

In 1563 the Catholic priest Georg Cassander (q.v.) was assigned to convert to Catholicism the Anabaptist teacher Johannes Campanus (q.v.), who had for years been a prisoner; but he was not successful. Later Protestant preachers were also called to convert arrested Anabaptists. In the districts of Blankenberg and Bensberg in the duchy of Berg, where the Anabaptists were numerous, William arrested many participants in nocturnal worship services in the open fields; with these prisoners Peter Lo (Lohe), the Protestant parson of Elberfeld, disputed in the presence of several councilors June 13-24, 1565, in the castle of Blankenberg on the Sieg, and June 28-July 2, 1565, in Bensberg, principally on questions which had been discussed at the disputation of Frankenthal (q.v.). Several of the prisoners joined the Protestant Church; the others persisted in their opinion or escaped further oppression by flight. Lo was rewarded for his efforts by honorable recognition by the duke (Bockmühl, 296-301).

On Jan. 23, 1565, William issued a further order to eliminate abuses in worship. But at the same time he demanded that "Anabaptists, Sacramentists, followers of David Joris, Menno Simons, and others" should be reported, so that orthodox pastors could convert them; in case they refused to become Catholic, their goods should be confiscated (Keller, I, 114). A mandate of Oct. 1, 1585, against religious groups not included in the religious peace of 1555 gave the officials orders to extirpate the Anabaptists (Keller, I, 75 f.).

In spite of this sharp measure the Anabaptists spread along the Lower Rhine. Some Protestants also joined the Anabaptist groups. The pastors were to prevent this. A decision of the third Reformed synod of Berg, at Elberfeld on Jan. 3, 1590, required the preachers to explain to the people the "coarse and great error" by personal admonition, intercession, and prayer in the churches (Keller, II, 102, 180; Rembert, 439).

The seriousness of the Anabaptist profession of faith is shown in the agreements they made in Cologne on May 1, 1591, with the Mennonites on the Upper Rhine and in Holland under the name of the "Concept of Cologne" (q.v.), which formed a unifying bond between widely scattered Anabaptists (Hege, 149-52). The document was signed by several congregations in the Lower Rhine region: Cologne, Flammersheim, Odenkirchen, Rees, and Lieber, and also by all the congregations in the duchy of Berg, at Millen, and on the Maas (Rembert, 618).

Under Johann Sigismund, Elector of Brandenburg, and Wolfgang, Count Palatine of Neuburg, an era of tolerance dawned in 1610; the old restrictions which limited the religious faiths in the country to the three recognized by the Empire were over. But when Wolfgang's successor adopted the Catholic faith in 1614, new persecutions began in Jülich-Berg (in 1619). Persons caught at Anabaptist religious services were to be punished (Rembert, 445). On Sept. 1, 1619, all officials and clergymen received orders to exterminate the Anabaptists (Keller, III, 257). But this decree was not radically carried out.

After 1652 the pressure increased, when an edict was issued by Philip William ordering compulsory conversion or exile, so that the Mennonites began to emigrate from Jülich and Berg to Crefeld, where the Mennonites had been preaching in public since 1634 and considered themselves an independent congregation. From Gladbach 70 families moved to Crefeld after emigrations to Nijmegen had already taken place. In 1653 the Elector of Cologne expelled the Mennonites, 70 families finding reception in and around Crefeld (Nieper, 18 and 30).

With the emigration of Mennonites from Crefeld to America in 1683 the old imperial law against the Anabaptists was silently abandoned. It had been passed in 1529 by the Diet of Speyer, and brought unspeakable woe to the Anabaptists. Since none of the treaties recognized the Mennonites as a body to be tolerated, the old imperial law was invoked again and again. As late as 1694 Elector John William of the Palatinate, the regent of Jülich and Berg, had 40 Mennonites at Rheydt (q.v.) arrested at night, and rejected a petition of the Dutch government on their behalf on the ground that he would have to bear the wrath of the entire empire if he should release the prisoners; but for a consideration of 8,000 Talers he would be willing to release them. William III of England and Emperor Leopold I (q.v.) also intervened on their behalf. Finally after three years they were released, their property restored, and they were permitted to live in peace and pursue their trades (Nieper, 24-36). Since that time no German government has based a decision on the imperial law against the Mennonites.

The Mennonite congregations of the Lower Rhine area were Crefeld, Cleves, Goch, Emmerich, and Rees. All except Crefeld died out at the end of the 19th or the beginning of the 20th century.

In economics the later Mennonites in the region of the Lower Rhine occupy a special place. To them Crefeld owed its rapid development and Germany owed a new means of income, namely, the velvet and silk industry, which has its center in Crefeld. (See Crefeld and Jülich.) HEGE.

L. Keller, Die Gegenreformation in Westfalen und am Niederrhein (3 vv., 1881-95); Rembert, Wiedertäufer; Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); Fr. Nieper, Die ersten deutschen Auswanderer von Krefeld nach Pennsylvanien (Neukirchen, 1940); W. I. Hull, William Penn and the Dutch Quaker Migration to Pennsylvania (Swarthmore, 1935); Beiträge zur Geschichte Rheinischer Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1939); W. Risler, "Mennoniten in Duisburg," Menn. Gesch.-Bl. VIII (1951) 2-17; W. Scheibler, Geschichte der evang. Gemeinde Monschau (Aachen, 1939); M. Goebel, Gesch. des chr. Lebens in der rhein.-westphäl. evang. Kirche I (Coblenz, 1849); P. Bockmühl, in Monatshefte für Rheinische Kirchengesch. (Mörs, 1910); Otto Redlich, Jülich-Bergische Kirchenpolitik (Publikationen der Gesellschaft für Rheinische Geschichtskunde) XXVII I, II (1), II (2) (Bonn, 1907, 1911, 1915); Ernst Crous, "Auf Mennos Spuren am Niederrhein," in Der Mennonit VIII (1955) 155, 170-71, 186-87; IX (1956) 10-11, 26; idem, "Von Täufern zu Mennoniten am Niederrhein," in Der Mennonit IX (1956) 74-76, 90-91, 106-8, 122 f.; W. Risler, "Täufer im bergischen Amt Löwenberg, Siebengebirge," Gesch.-Bl. XII and XIII; Gottfried Buschbell, Geschichte der Stadt Krefeld I (Krefeld, 1953); Gerhard von Beckerath, "Die wirtschaftliche Bedeutung der Krefelder Mennoniten und ihrer Vorfahren im 17. und 18. Jahrhundert" (dissertation, Bonn, 1951); ML III, 249-51.

Lower Skippack Mennonite Church, an independent congregation in Skippack Twp., Montgomery Co., Pa. The Mennonite settlement in this township was made in 1702, and the first house of worship for what was called the Skippack congregation was erected about 1725. A new meetinghouse was built in 1844. Three years later the Oberholtzer division occurred in the Franconia Conference (MC) to which the congregation then belonged, and the portion of the Skippack congregation which seceded from the conference to join the Oberholtzer group took possession of the new meetinghouse. The portion of the congregation which remained in the Franconia Conference finally in 1848 built what came to be called the Upper Skippack meetinghouse, and as a consequence the meetinghouse of 1844 came to be called Lower Skippack. By 1851 there was disharmony in the Lower Skippack congregation which a committee of the new (Oberholtzer) conference failed to resolve. Three ordained men of the congregation withdrew from both congregation and conference, namely, Bishop Abraham Hunsicker, and preachers Henry A. Hunsicker and Abraham H. Grater. Trouble and dissension continued, partly because Preacher Henry G. Johnson, who had been ordained in 1847, insisted strongly on a literal observance of footwashing (John 13:1-17). In 1861 the Oberholtzer Conference expelled Johnson, who retained the support of most of his congregation. The small remnant of the congregation that stayed with the conference under the leadership of Preacher David Bergey died out by 1886. Johnson's son, Henry H. Johnson, was ordained in 1878 as a preacher in the now independent Lower Skippack Church, and the latter's son, Henry M. Johnson, was ordained preacher in 1915. Because of three generations of Johnson preachers the group has often been called Johnson Mennonites (q.v.). Amos K. Bean was ordained preacher in 1873 and bishop two years later. The congregation still observes footwashing, and is a bit more conservative in discipline than are the General Conference Mennonite congregations of eastern Pennsylvania, although less strict than the churches of the Franconia Conference (MC). The membership of Lower Skippack stood at about 300 for the last twenty years. In 1954 Henry M. Johnson was serving as bishop, and Frank Croll as minister. J.C.W.

J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937).

Lowville-Croghan Conservative Mennonite Church in Lewis Co., N.Y., had its beginnings in 1833, when the Mennonites of Alsace-Lorraine, looking toward America for new opportunities and to escape compulsory military training, were approached by a land agent who came to them in search of settlers for a large plot of ground in northeastern New York. In 1833 the first three Mennonite families came. They were the preachers Michael Zehr and Rudolph Virkler, and Bishop Joseph Farney. Other settlers followed the first pioneers and by 1836 the first Amish Mennonite congregation of Lewis County was organized. They met in the homes until 1912 when the first meetinghouse was erected at Croghan.

In 1847-52 a number of the members, including all of the ministers but Michael Zehr, left to form a new group, the Apostolic Christian Church (q.v.), because they felt that immersion was the correct mode of baptism. This group, fully organized in 1852 by Benedict Wyeneth, who was sent out from Switzerland by Fröhlich, at the request of the Virkler family, is now known as the Evangelical Baptist Church.

In 1909 the settlement had enlarged so much that several families felt it advisable to move to Lowville, about 20 miles away from the earlier settlement; a meetinghouse was built near Lowville in 1914. In 1914 the congregation joined the Conservative Amish Mennonite Conference that had been organized in 1910. Then the first Sunday school began in 1915. The present church was built in 1934.

The second church schism came in 1941 because several church workers refused to wear the required Amish Mennonite garb. The 68 members who left formed the First Mennonite Church of New Bremen, which in 1954 had 193 members.

In 1939 several families moved to Woodville (q.v.), about 50 miles from Croghan. From 1944 services were held once a month until 1947, when Andrew Gingerich was ordained as pastor to serve this group, later organized as a separate congregation with Gingerich ordained as bishop in 1952, and 53 members in 1954.

Lowville and Croghan continue as one congregation with a membership in 1954 of about 600, including the Pine Grove Mission at Glenfield.

Christian Nafziger (1861-1953) was ordained to the ministry in 1896 and long served as bishop. Bishop Lloyd Boshart (1913-   ), ordained bishop in 1945, was in charge of the congregation in 1955, assisted by preachers Elias Zehr, Richard Zehr, and Leon Martin. M.G.S.

Loy Pruystinck: see Eloy Pruystinck.

Loys de Clercq (de Visschere), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake in 1537 at Antwerp, Belgium. Further information was not available. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 433; XIV, 14 f., No. 157.) vdZ.

Loys Luycx: see Louwys de Wever.

Loyse de Coucq, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on May 26, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium, with three others. She was sentenced to death because she had attended the forbidden meetings of the Mennonites. Apparently she had not yet received (re)-baptism. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 116 f., 178; XIV, 90 f., No. 1028.) vdZ.

Loysen (Loisen, Loytzen), a former Polish banking house, to whom is due the credit for the settling of Dutch Mennonites in the lowlands of the Vistula in the second half of the 16th century. Hans, Simon, and Steffen van Loysen had possession of Tiegenhof as security for a loan made to the King of Poland. It was at that time a marsh, most of it covered with reeds and brush. In 1562 they persuaded the Dutch Mennonites to build a new home here; the offer was gladly accepted, for in Holland they were not tolerated, whereas in Tiegenhof they would not be subject to oppression. In a short time the land was made arable; and after the expiration of the free period the Mennonites took it on lease. The lease contracts promised them exemption from certain fees and from military burdens. The contracts were repeatedly renewed and confirmed by the Polish kings. The Privilegium which Ladislas IV (king 1632-48) gave the Mennonites on Dec. 22, 1642, stressed the cultural achievement of their ancestors, and stated that the Mennonites had been called into the country by the Loysen family with the consent of King Sigismund August. The area was at first called the "Neue Hof," later Loytzenhof, though it was only a short time in the possession of the Loysen family; in 1581 it was taken over by Ernst von Weiher, and was then called "Weihershof." After 1760 it was known as Tiegenhof.

There have been some Dutch Mennonites by the name of Loysen. They apparently came to the Netherlands from Flanders, Belgium. Joos Loysen, a Mennonite of Middelburg, a wood dealer and owner of a sawmill, and a certain Maillart in 1593 wrote a letter to Prince Maurice of Orange in the name of the "nonresistant Christians" (i.e., Mennonites) of Middelburg in order to plead for freedom from the oath, which had been granted by his father William of Orange (DB 1908, 40). HEGE, vdZ.

A. Brons, Ursprung, Entwicklung und Schicksale der Mennoniten (3d ed., Norden, 1912); W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Danzig, 1863); Ernst Regehr, "Geschichtstabelle d. Gemeinde Rosenort," in Menn. Bl., 1937, 2; Felicia Szper, Nederl. Nederzettingen in West-Pruisen gedurende den Poolschen tijd (Enkhuizen, 1913) 95 f., 199; ML II, 696.

Lubberden (Lubberde), an old Mennonite family of Aalsmeer (q.v.), Dutch province of North Holland.

Klaas Jacobs Lubberde (1769-Nov. 1849) was a preacher of the "Oude Vermaning" of the Frisians on the Uiterweg, Aalsmeer 1804-49, and Pieter Jans (Lubberden) (1815-88) was from 1847 a deacon of the "Nieuwe Vermaning" on the Uiterweg, and preacher 1858-66; in 1866 he resigned, when the congregation merged with the Zijdweg Waterlander congregation, which had a trained minister. Pieters Jans Lubberden then served the united congregation as a deacon until his death. vdZ.

W. Tsj. Vleer, De aloude Aalsmeerse families (De Kaag, n.d.-1954) 32.

Lubbert Gerritsz, a Dutch Mennonite elder: see Gerritsz, Lubbert.

Lubbert-Gerritsz-volk or Lubbertisten, name given to a Dutch branch of Mennonites, the followers of Lubbert Gerritsz (elder 1559-1614, q.v.), which originated in a schism in 1589 in Amsterdam (Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 432; DB 1864, 25; 1872, 56). This group was more usually called Jonge or Zachte or Slappe Vriezen (young, moderate, or lax Frisians, q.v.). vdZ.

Lubbertsdochter, Judith, b. Dec. 21, 1601, at Amsterdam, d. there about 1670, was baptized in 1618 upon confession of faith in the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation. She was an unlettered and simple woman, earning her living by darning hose. About 1628 she moved to Alkmaar and became engaged to Jan Philips Schabaelje (q.v.), but this engagement was broken off about a year later. Judith returned to Amsterdam, left the Mennonite Church, and became a member of the Roman Catholic Church by rebaptism. She was a poet, her poems showing a somewhat mystical trait. A number of her poems are found in Mennonite hymnaries, e.g., in Gheestelijck Kruydthofken (De Rijp, 1629), Rijper Liedtboecxken (2d ed., De Rijp, 1636), and Gheestelyck Bloem-hofken (Haarlem, 1637). (N.N.B.Wb. X, 529-31; Jaarboek Amstelodamum 1937.) vdZ.

Lübeck, a city (pop. 238,000) in Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, an important Baltic seaport. As early as the middle of the 16th century a wave of the Anabaptist movement was felt in East Holstein (see Holstein). Until 1700 there was a group of Mennonites in Lübeck, although they were never "privileged," nor did they have a church or school. No records written by them have been preserved. Refugees from the Jülich district settled there after 1532 as renters and tanners, and even as manufacturers of gunpowder. Mayor Jürgen Wullenwever seems to have favored them.

In 1535 and again in 1553 and 1555 the theologians of the "Wendic cities," of which Lübeck was one, passed unified measures against them. The Anabaptists, "with whom God has scourged the world," were to be expelled from all the localities; sheltering them was made punishable; anyone who was not accepted in one city should not be taken into another of the group; for the sake of caution the preachers of the state church were to be examined in the Augsburg Confession and its "Apology." Outsiders should announce themselves to the spiritual and secular authorities before taking lodging; nevertheless they repeatedly found reception and work without announcement or questioning. Repeated renewals of the mandates did not have the desired result. In spite of exiles on a week's notice, "Netherlanders tainted with all kinds of suspicious religions" kept appearing within and outside the city. In 1546 Menno Simons (q.v.) had a discussion in Lübeck with N. M. van Blesdijk (q.v.), the son-in-law of David Joris (q.v.), which did not lead to unification, and in 1552 an equally fruitless discussion with Adam Pastor (q.v.) on the deviating doctrines.

The Thirty Years' War brought new accretions from Fresenburg (q.v.) and the rest of Holstein, which however apparently did not disturb the council. The Mennonites were summoned and examined by the clergy, with scant results. The people liked the strangers; in 1671 a Menist woman was employed as a "Bademutter." About 1690 a preacher held the forbidden "conventicula" even during divine services. This time the council interfered, and promised the church authorities that they would prevent the sectarian baptism of Lutherans and sectarian marriages. The protest of the accused that they had nothing to do with the dangerous fanatics of Münster did not carry any weight. In 1735 there were only two or three Mennonite families counted in the city. In 1700 there had been seven. Hans Hermansz (d. ca. 1722) was the preacher of the congregation.

We learn some particulars about the economic importance of the Mennonites "in the office of lacework and ribbon making"; Isaak von Eken, one of its founders, was accused of having made forbidden propaganda for his sect and having changed the pledge with an addition that avoided the oath. But his reference to the punctual payment of his taxes as well as to the toleration Mennonites were receiving in other places had the intended effect.

The decline of the little congregation was chiefly the result of Lutheran propaganda; they watched carefully to see that the children were baptized, sometimes baptizing them without the knowledge of their parents.

Little is known of internal conditions among the Lübeck Mennonites. They held their meetings in the neighboring Ovendorf, observed communion twice a year, or else went to Fresenburg for this purpose. The visit of outside preachers was welcome. Jakob Denner of Hamburg is said to have obtained permission to hold quiet church services (1687-94, 1700). Ministers had, in general, no fixed salaries; an exception may have been the noted Hamburg preacher Gerhard Roosen. The rites forbidden in Lübeck (baptism, etc.) were usually performed in Hamburg. In the second half of the 17th century twenty persons from Lübeck were baptized in the Hamburg-Altona congregation. In the 19th and 20th centuries there were still a few Mennonites there.

In 1950 a new congregation was organized at Lübeck out of Danzig-West Prussian refugees who had been meeting in an unofficial way in the city since 1945. In 1954 the baptized membership was 144. The congregation was under the pastoral oversight of the Hamburg Mennonite congregation.

R.Do.

C. H. Starcke, Lübecker Kirchenhistorie (1724); B. C. Roosen, Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona (Hamburg, 1886-87); Robert Dollinger, Geschichte der Mennoniten in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg und Lübeck (Neumünster, 1930); C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936); ML II, 696 f.

Lubin: see Gross-Lubin.

Lucas County (Ohio) Reformed Mennonite Church, located 1½ miles east and one-half mile north of Whitehouse, Ohio, was organized by Frederick Bucher in 1864. In 1838 John Moser, who with his family had come from the Emmental, Switzerland, and settled in Putnam Co., Ohio, in 1834, moved with his wife and two children to the Whitehouse community, followed by the Geiger, Bösiger, Neuenschwander, and Bucher families from Switzerland, and several families from Pennsylvania Mennonite and others of Alsatian Amish background. These were the families who left their former Mennonite affiliation to follow Bucher in 1864.

From the beginning they used a small building near the site of the present church, which was built in 1892, but which is no longer in use. Ministers who have served the church include Nicholas Roth, John K. Myers, Benjamin Bucher 1889-1923, Joseph Bucher 1898-1928, and Herbert Bucher 1923-51. The membership at present is six, who attend the Fulton County Reformed Mennonite Church. D.L.G.

Lucas-Filips-volk or Borstentasters, a name given to a group of Mennonites at Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland. They were adherents of Lucas Filips (Philips), a preacher of the Old Flemish (Huiskopers) congregation, meeting at the Helmbrekersteeg. In 1620 a quarrel arose between Filips and his co-preacher Vincent de Hondt (q.v.), who was offended by Filips' defense of a young man who had behaved improperly with his fiancee and by Filips' refusal to "ban" the young man. De Hondt banned not only the young man, but also Filips and his adherents, who, however, kept the meetinghouse, though the minority of the members sided with Filips. The Vincent de Hondt group obtained a new meetinghouse elsewhere. The Lucas-Filips-volk died out soon after 1700. (DB 1863, 135 f., 156.) vdZ.

Lucas Hendricks (Heindricx), an Anabaptist martyr, was seized at an Anabaptist meeting at Brugge in Flanders, and burned at the stake on Dec. 10, 1561, with Adriaen Brael (q.v.) and four other companions; they died with the confession of Paul on their lips: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give to me at that day" (II Tim. 4:7, 8). Lucas Hendricks was a native of Landegem in Flanders. His name is found in the hymn "Genade en Vrede moet Godvreesende sijn" (Mercy and peace must be to the God-fearing), found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1569 and later editions. It was reprinted by Wackernagel. Neff, vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 288, E 655; Verheyden, Brugge, 49, No. 36; Wackernagel, Lieder, 190; ML II, 282.

Lucas de Groot, an Anabaptist martyr, born at Oostende, Belgium, was executed there in 1568 by hanging. Particulars are lacking. (Mart. Mir. D 367, E 722; ML II, 187.) vdZ.

Lucas Lambertsz van Beveren (Bestevaer), an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded at Amsterdam on Jan. 19, 1544, with Jan Claesz (q.v.). Lucas Lambertsz is the oldest of all the martyrs, being 87 years of age. No particulars are known about him except that he had been baptized by Menno Simons. The statement in the Mennonitisches Lexikon that he was a preacher, is not correct. Jan Claesz and Lucas Lambertsz are celebrated in a hymn found in Offer des Heeren, beginning "Het waren twee gebroeders goet" (There were two good brethren). vdZ.

Offer, 78, note 86, 88; Mart. Mir. D 66, 70; E 471; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 259; DB 1864, 145 f.; ML I, 214.

Lucas (Luckes) Michielsz, an Anabaptist martyr of Dordrecht, Dutch province of South Holland, by profession a glass-blower or a painter on glass, who was burned at the stake with seven other martyrs on March 20, 1549, at Amsterdam. He had been baptized by Gillis van Aken (q.v.). These martyrs are celebrated in the hymn "Tis nu schier al vervult ons broeders getal" (The number of our brethren is now nearly full), found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1556 and later editions. (Mart. Mir. D 82, 84; E 483, 484; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 308; ML III, 124). vdZ.

Lucelle, Grand (German, Grosslützel), a group of houses on both sides of the border between Switzerland and Alsace near the source of the Lucelle in a charming wooded region. The civil seat of government is on the Alsatian side of the border. It has been the seat of a Mennonite congregation since the end of the 19th century.

Very early some Anabaptists persecuted by the government of Bern, Switzerland, must have sought protection on the isolated farms around Lucelle in Pleigne (Pleen), Bourrignon (Bürgis), and Develier (Dietwiler), all in the Delémont (Delsberg) district. In 1731 the officials of Delémont appealed to the bishop, for the landless were demanding the expulsion of the Mennonites, while the landed offered them protection. In 1732 the people of Delémont asserted that the Mennonites were there to the advantage of the wealthy and the ruin of the poor. It is therefore likely that the mountain estates were pretty well settled by Mennonites about 1732.

In 1874 services were held in Bourrignon, Develier, and Roggenburg in the various homes; the brotherhood called itself the Delsbergtal church, as it is still often called today. Mennonites also settled the Alsatian border farms, and to meet the need for a common, centrally located church building, Abraham Bögli of Scholis, and David Neuenschwander, on May 26, 1891, bought the "Glashütte," an inn on the Alsatian side of Lucelle. In 1901 after a serious fire it was completely remodeled, and on Nov. 24 the new chapel was dedicated. During World War I it became so difficult to cross the border that the Swiss members began to hold their services in private homes again. By the end of the war some of the families on the Alsatian side had moved away. In 1955 only two member families were living on the Alsatian side out of about 80 members.

The elders of the Lucelle congregation have been Michael Nussbaumer ? -1902, Peter Allemann (preacher only), David Gerber 1924-38, and Christian Schmutz now (1955) serving. With the death of Elder David Gerber in 1938 Christian Schmutz, preacher and later elder of the Pruntrut congregation at Courgenay, took over and has continued the ministry at Lucelle alone. When the dissolution of the Courgenay (q.v.) congregation took place at the death of the last elder, Peter Ramseyer, in 1933, the former members of this Amish congregation living on the Swiss side joined either Lucelle or Porrentruy, while those on the Alsatian side went to the Birkenhof (q.v.) church. Porrentruy and Lucelle were Mennonite, not Amish. (Note: The article Courgenay is in error in that since 1933 there has not been a congregation bearing the name Courgenay; it is called Porrentruy.)

Around 1850 emigration to America was extensive. Later the congregation suffered further losses to the new congregation at Porrentruy (q.v.) (Pruntrut). In 1928 it had 62 baptized members (and 52 children) living on individual farms in the Delémont district, in 1955 about 80 members. The most common family names were Amstutz, Gerber, Bögli, Klay. The members are all farmers. The congregation belongs to the Konferenz der altevangelischen Taufgesinnten Gemeinden der Schweiz. (ML II, 188.) A.-T., H.S.B.

Lucerne, a canton in Switzerland (pop. 223,409), predominantly Catholic. The Reformation found no entry here. Lucerne headed the Catholic cantons and in the religious wars it led the Catholic party.

The Lucerne Council took severest measures to suppress the Anabaptist movement. In 1525, the year of the birth of the brotherhood, Johann Krüsi (q.v.) died at the stake at Lucerne as the second blood witness of the Swiss Brethren, Eberli Bolt (q.v.) having been executed a few months previously in Schwyz. Julius Lober (q.v.) in his list mentions two martyrdoms in Lucerne in 1531 by drowning (Beck, 311). Orderly court procedures in religious matters were excluded in Lucerne; a decision of the Catholic cantons of June 10, 1532, decreed that Anabaptists in their territory, if they did not desist from their false doctrine, were without ado to be put to death (Strickler, 589). How many Swiss Brethren became victims of this decree is not known. At the Lucerne Assembly of the Catholic cantons it was decided on April 30, 1560, to take steps against the Swiss Brethren at Appenzell, and the meeting in Baden in 1567 confirmed the resolutions of 1532 (Bergmann, 42). HEGE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Bergmann, Die Täuferbewegung im Kanton Zürich (Leipzig, 1916); Joh. Strickler, Actensammlung zur Schweizerischen Reformationsgeschichte in den Jahren 1521-1532 IV (Zürich, 1881); ML II, 709.

Lücken, Jan (Johann): see Luykens, Jan.

Lücken, von, established a Mennonite church on his estate Zahrensdorf, one mile from Boitzenburg in Mecklenburg, Germany, ca. 1850, thereby arousing the opposition of the government, leading to his arrest and a prison sentence. His final plan was to sell his estate and emigrate to Australia, in order to establish a large Mennonite church there. He had negotiated with the British government for an extensive tract of land, but died suddenly in 1852. (Menn. Bl., 1883, 6; ML II, 697.) NEFF.

Lüdemann, Hermann (1842-1933), a German Protestant theologian, professor of theology at the University of Bern, Switzerland, in 1884, retired in 1928, author of the book, Reformation und Täufertum in ihrem Verhältnis zum christlichen Prinzip (Bern, 1896), in which he expresses a surprisingly unfriendly attitude to the Mennonites, and particularly to the views of Ludwig Keller (q.v.). NEFF.

Menn. Bl., 1897, 1 and 89; Vorträge und Aufsätze aus der Comeniusgesellschaft V, Nos. 1 and 2; ML II, 697.

Ludi, Hans, the first Anabaptist martyr in the canton of Basel, Switzerland, from Bubendorf in the Waldenburg district, joined the Swiss Brethren in 1528, destroyed the images of the saints in the local church, and was therefore whipped, and later, on Jan. 12, 1530, beheaded at Basel. By trade he was a mason. He may have belonged to the Swiss Lüthi (q.v.) family. NEFF.

P. Burckhardt, Die Basler Täufer (Basel, 1898) 26, 33, and 37; ML II, 697.

Ludwigshafen, the largest city (pop. 122,329) in the Rhenish Palatinate, Germany, founded in 1843 by Louis I, King of Bavaria, elevated to a town in 1853. Since 1891 it has been the seat of a Mennonite church which was previously known as Friesenheim (q.v.). The oldest parts of the present city (Ankerhof, Hemshof, Rohrlacherhof, and Gräfenau) were settled by Mennonites soon after the Thirty Years' War. They were all hereditary leaseholders on lands owned by nobles and monasteries. At first they belonged to the Mannheim (q.v.) congregation. The origin of the congregation really goes back to 1702, according to the Gemeinde-Kalender. In the beginning it was united with Eppstein and Ruchheim.

The Ludwigshafen-Friesenheim congregation is in a circuit with Ibersheim (q.v.) and Eppstein (q.v.), which together employ a common pastor who lives in Ibersheim. The baptized membership in 1954 was about 80. The members are farmers, officials, merchants, and laborers. The congregation has a meetinghouse, which was dedicated on Sept. 9, 1903. The Conference of the South German Mennonites met here annually for many years, until the church became too small; then larger halls were rented. The location of the city makes it a center for the Mennonites of South Germany. The city was badly damaged in the bombings of World War II. NEFF.

Valuable information is found in Heimat-Blätter für Ludwigshafen a. Rh. und Umgebung, 1922, 1923, 1928, 1930, and 1933; also in Pfälzische Familien- und Wappenkunde (Ludwigshafen a. Rh.), since 1952; ML II, 699.

Lugovsk Mennonite Brethren Church was located in the Buzuluk area of the province of Samara, Russia. The area was of somewhat rolling contour but promised new hopes for the landless class which had settled here under the auspices of the mother settlements.

Johann Löwen was among the first settlers. Abraham Martens and Bernhard Bergen were two of the first ministers. Other ministers were Cornelius Klassen, Jakob K. Wieler, N. Töws, Jakob Wiens, and Tobias Voth. In 1926 most of the leading men were sent into exile and the church was used as a public school; thus the church ceased to exist. J.J.T.

Lugt, a Dutch Mennonite family, found from about 1600 at Aalsmeer, province of North Holland, where they were shipbuilders; from about 1700 they were shipbuilders and tar brokers and later in insurance at Amsterdam; some of them are now lawyers or bankers. This family has produced two preachers: Pieter Evert Lugt (b. Jan. 10, 1841, at Amsterdam, d. June 1, 1908, at Amersfoort, married to Welmoet Tideman), who served at Noordeinde van Graft 1865-71, Noordbroek and Nieuw-Scheemda 1871-74, IJlst 1874-78, and Winterswijk 1878-1908; and Paul J. Lugt, b. 1916, pastor of Wieringen 1941-45. (Ned. Patriciaat XXIX, 1943, 291-318; DB 1908, 209.) vdZ.

Luies (Lues, Luyes, Lucas), Jan, date and place of birth unknown, d. Jan. 21, 1637, was a farmer, apparently at Kloosterburen, Dutch province of Groningen (not Noordbroek as has been suggested both by Blaupot ten Cate and Kühler). He was at the same time preacher and elder of the Flemish Marne (q.v.) congregation, and founder of the Groningen Old Flemish branch of Mennonites.

Jan Luies was a stubborn and very intolerant man, who opposed the attempts at unity between the different branches of Dutch Mennonites. He especially condemned the Harlinger Vrede (Peace of Harlingen, 1610) between the Frisian and Flemish congregations of Harlingen, Friesland. In 1617 he was at Haarlem, where he banned Jacques Outerman (q.v.), elder of the Flemish congregation. Again about 1620 at a meeting at Langezwaag (q.v.) in Friesland, he denounced Outerman as the "most awful heretic he had ever met." On April 13-16, 1622, he disputed at Hoorn with P. J. Twisck, elder of the Frisians, and prevented a union with the Frisians. In 1623 Luies went to Blokzijl to ban the Flemish elder Claes Claesz (q.v.), who according to Luies was too lenient in maintaining the old principles of banning and shunning. Claesz defended himself against Luies in Onschult ende Bestraffinghe des onschriftmatighen oordeels, 't welck by Jan Luyes ende sijne medestanders gegeven ende uytgesproocken is (2nd ed. Amsterdam, 1627). Likewise in 1623 Luies stayed at Amsterdam, where a part of the Flemish were planning to merge with the Frisians, and prevented the union by his obstinacy, banning a number of members including the preacher of the Amsterdam Flemish congregation, Abraham Dirksz (Bierens). For this act he was blamed by his former adherent Jan Gerritsz in a booklet Een Spieghel des Geloofs (printed not before 1641, Amsterdam). He also was active in Blokzijl, Giethoorn, and Deventer (all in 1627).

The question of unification was fully discussed at a meeting on Sept. 18-21, 1628, at Middelstum (q.v.). Here Jan Luies, assisted by Elder Uko Walles (q.v.) from Noordbroek, opposed a number of tolerant Flemish leaders, such as Claes Claesz of Blokzijl, Pieter Jans Moyer of Amsterdam, and Joost Hendriks of Harlingen. Here the rupture between Jan Luies and his intolerant adherents on the one side, who presumed that only the Flemish church was the visible church of the Lord, and on the other side the more lenient elders, led by Claes Claesz, who wished to make peace and union with other groups of Mennonites, became definite.

The followers of Jan Luies, who were numerous in the province of Groningen and who were at first called Jan-Lucas-volk, but soon were given the name of Groningen Old Flemish (q.v.) Mennonites, broke off all intercourse with the Flemish. After the death of Jan Luies, his coelder Uko Walles became their leader, for whom they have also been called Ukowallists (q.v.). vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 558 I, II, VI, 571, 606; II, 1232-40; II, 2, No. 66; N.N.B.Wb. III, 797-800; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 60, 64-67; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 83 f., 133-35; ML II, 389.

Luik: see Liége.

Luiken: see Luyken.

Luikinga, Willem (1879-1928), a Dutch Mennonite pastor, who after study at the University of Groningen and the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam, became a ministerial candidate in 1906, thereupon serving the congregations of Aalsmeer 1907-15 and IJmuiden 1915-28. In the Doopsgezind Jaarboekje 1920 he published the paper "Langs een oude Vermaning," an interesting study of old Mennonite life at Aalsmeer. His son Hendrik Luikinga, b. 1916, is also a Mennonite pastor, serving at Veendam-Pekela 1943-47, Almelo 1947-49, and since 1949 at Zaandam. vdZ.

Luirts, Luirt, a preacher (already serving in 1645) and elder of the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites, being a farmer near Westeremden in the Dutch province of Groningen. From 1645 until 1663 he repeatedly traveled about to visit the Groningen Old Flemish congregations in the Netherlands and North Germany. He was present at the delegates' meeting at Loppersum (q.v.) in 1659, where a number of restrictions were made concerning plain clothing and furnishings for the members of the Groningen Old Flemish group. Luirt Luirts died on Oct. 6, 1674. He was a member of the Huizinga (q.v.) family, but did not yet bear this family name. (DB 1879, 5, 9 f., 86, 89 ff., 111.) vdZ.

Lulofs, a Mennonite family, living at Leer, East Friesland, Germany, since the 17th century. A branch of this family in the early 18th century moved to Amsterdam, where Warner Lulofs became a deacon of the Lamist congregation in 1735. A descendant of this family was Sicco Lulofs (b. 1849 at Amsterdam, d. 1927 at The Hague), who was a Mennonite pastor for more than 55 years, serving at Broek op Langendijk 1872-75, Winterswijk 1875-77, Koog-Zaandijk 1877-89, Deventer 1889-1901, and The Hague 1901-27. For many years he was a trustee of the A.D.S. (Dutch General Mennonite Conference) and a curator of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. He published only a number of sermons. His colleague G. Wuite Jz of The Hague wrote his obituary in Doopsgezind Jaarboekje of 1929. vdZ.

Lundenburg (Czech, Breclav), a city (pop. 10,371) on the border between Moravia and Lower Austria. The whole vicinity of Lundenburg, in the possession of the barons of Zierotin, who were friendly to the Anabaptists, became one of the most important Anabaptist settlements. Some of the chronicles give the year 1543, others 1545 as the year of the founding of the Lundenburg Hutterite Bruderhof. It was set up in a house purchased from the barons and in the shoemaker's house "where the bath (barbershop) is." The Lundenburg barber-surgeons soon enjoyed a wide reputation.

At about the same time Bruderhofs were set up in the immediate neighborhood in Altenmarkt, Kostel, Bilowitz, Schaikowitz, Saitz, Paulowitz, and other places. The prosperity of Lundenburg industry made it possible after a short time to purchase a second house near the Meierhof, which Bartholomäus von Zierotin gave over to the Hutterites.

Johann Jr. von Zierotin, who expelled them from his land in 1579 for refusing to pay taxes, recalled them after three days, and in 1580 even gave them a park and forest belonging to the Catholic prebend of Kostel, thereby involving himself in some difficulty with Pawlowsky, bishop of Olmütz. The Brethren of Lundenburg, Kostel, and Landshut (q.v.) greeted their new lord, Ladislaus Welen von Zierotin, with a gift of knives and majolica produced by their shops; the majolica was so beautiful that he sent it to his teacher Dr. Grynäus in Basel.

During the revolt this region suffered particularly severely; on Sept. 19-20, 1619, imperial troops under Dampierre burned down the Bruderhofs, including the one in Lundenburg, having first plundered it and murdered about 20 men and women. On Nov. 10 the army returned, plundered the castle, into which the Brethren had put some things for safekeeping, and the mill and brewery belonging to them; they stole the cattle and kidnaped the leaders. In 1621 new misfortune struck the Bruderhofs which had with great toil been partly rebuilt: destruction, robbery, compulsory military service, especially on Wallenstein's orders, were the order of the day.

The expulsion of the Hutterites in 1621 annihilated the splendid settlements in this domain. The wish of Gundakar von Liechtenstein to employ a few Anabaptists was refused in 1624 by Cardinal Dietrichstein. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Loserth, Communismus; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; L. Preuss, Geschichte Lundenburgs (Progr. des Lundenb. Gymnasiums 1903-04); ML II, 701.

Lüneburg, an area of Braunschweig in the former Prussian province of Hanover, Germany, with Celle as its capital, which was made Protestant by resolution of the Landtag on April 18, 1527. At the head of the church system Duke Ernest placed Urban Rhegius (q.v.) in 1531, as superintendent general, an office which had not previously existed in the Lutheran Church. Rhegius had been called to Celle in September 1530 from Augsburg, where he had just finished a severe struggle with the Anabaptists and had finally had them suppressed by force. In Lüneburg the movement had not won a foothold, but Rhegius used the influence of his position to injure them in other countries.

In an opinion delivered to Philip of Hesse by the Lüneburg clergy on June 5, 1536, on the question "whether it was fitting that a government compel Anabaptists and other heretics to accept the true faith, and to punish with the sword those who persist in their heresy," they advocated capital punishment. They compared the task of the government with that of a physician who cuts off a bad limb when medicine fails to cure, lest it contaminate the entire body. Secular authority could with a good conscience put to death all persistent heretics, just as it has power to kill adulterers, thieves, murderers, and revolutionaries. As evidence several Old Testament Scriptures were cited.

Philip did not follow these suggestions, but many theologians found the arguments convenient. Bullinger (q.v.), for instance, used them in a letter to Calvin on June 12, 1554, to weaken the opposition to the burning of Servetus (Paulus, 221). The opinion was widely read. In the 16th and 17th centuries it was reprinted several times under Rhegius's name; in 1537 at Hamburg, 1538 Strasbourg, 1562 Nürnberg in Die Deutschen Bücher von Urban Rhegius (Vol. IV, pp. 211-15); and 1608 in Frankfurt, in J. Bidenbach, Consiliorum theologicorum Decas (Vols. III and IV, pp. 201-18). (Hochhuth, 266-578.)

In 1555 Lüneburg joined in the decision of the Hansa cities to prevent Menno Simons from baptizing among his brethren in the Baltic Sea region (Mannhardt, 84). Hege.

K. W. H. Hochhuth, "Mitteilungen aus der protestantischen Sekten-Geschichte in der hessischen Kirche," in Ztscht für die hist. Theol., 1858; Mannhardt, Jahrbuch, 1883; N. Paulus, Protestantismus und Toleranz im 16. Jahrhundert (Berlin, 1911); Gerh. Uhlhorn, Urbanus Rhegius (Elberfeld, 1861); Johs. Warns, Die Taufe (Cassel, 1922); ML II, 701 f.

Lunéville, a city (pop. 19,065) in northeastern France, known as the residence of Stanislaus Leczinski, King of Poland, when he was Duke of Lorraine. Peace was concluded here in 1801 between Austria and France. Lunéville is the seat of a small Mennonite church. The Mennonites living here in the 18th century belonged to the Welschland (q.v.) congregation. On account of the distance between the members they divided, the local Mennonites formed the Lunéville-Dieuze church (Mannhardt, Jahrbuch, 1888, 42), which met twice a month at the homes of the members. The congregation then consisted of fifteen families, with Christian Schweitzer as elder.

The Franco-Prussian war divided the congregation politically, but they continued to meet together until 1893, when border difficulties made it advisable to separate. The French families joined the congregation at Nancy. The German families continued to meet once a month in Dieuze. The number declined because of emigration and a low birth rate. Finally they joined the congregation at Morhange.

After World War I the Nancy church died out. The Lunéville-Dieuze group joined Gerbéviller (q.v.), a subsidiary of Baccarat (q.v.); together they organized the Lunéville congregation. It had then a membership of about 40 souls, and met once a month in a rented hall in Lunéville. There were smaller meetings and prayer meetings in the various homes. In 1954 the membership was ca. 30 souls, with no elder, and with a meeting only once a month. The preacher is Emile Muller, living in Herbéviller. (ML II, 702.) P.So.

Luray (Va.), the name generally applied to the Shenandoah National Park Civilian Public Service Camp No. 45. It was operated by the Mennonite Central Committee under the National Park Service. Opened in August 1942, by December it had an enrollment of 152 men. The camp was located approximately 15 miles southeast of the town of Luray, near the center of the Shenandoah National Park and a stone's throw west of the Skyline Drive. Among the jobs assigned to the men were the conducting of wild life surveys, blister rust control, construction of lookout towers, maintenance of the National Park headquarters, clearing the highways of snow, emergency farm work, and fire fighting. Two special schools, directed by the MCC, were held at Camp No. 45, an arts and crafts school and a cooking school. The camp was closed in June 1946. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 150-7.

Lüsen (Lisen), a village (pop. ca. 300) in the Lüsental, a subsidiary valley of the Rienz in southern Tirol, Austria (now Italy). Although it was close to Brixen, it was open to the Anabaptist movement. In 1532 Hutter (q.v.) baptized seven persons here according to a statement made by Friedrich Brandenberg, his companion, who was put to death soon afterward. In 1534 Offerus Griesinger (q.v.), one of the boldest and most adept Anabaptist apostles in Tirol, won many adherents here. In 1535 the judge of Brixen came to Lüsen, called the people together, and announced to them the severe Anabaptist mandates of the Brixen government, and threatened that anyone who in the future sheltered an Anabaptist would be executed, and his house burned down. He took ten unsubmissive persons with him to Brixen, of whom seven recanted but only apparently, in order to escape to Moravia.

In 1536 Hans Grünfelder (q.v.) was leader and treasurer in Lüsen, and held a "big meeting" in March. Sigmund Han, the chancellor of the prince-bishop, informed the bishop that Hans Amon (q.v.) was active around Lüsen, and that 17 persons had left their homes to go to Moravia, including some who had once "sworn off" their error. The Brixen authorities raided the region, combing it for certain persons. Grünfelder escaped, but was later caught in the Oetztal and executed at Imst. Griesinger again took up the work here; in the meantime he had taken several groups to Moravia, returned as a missionary to Moravia, been imprisoned, and escaped. Now he was captured again at Lüsen in April 1537 and imprisoned in Brixen, whence he managed again to escape.

Anabaptists of Lüsen en route to Moravia in 1542 were stopped in Kropfsberg and sent to Brixen for judgment. Lüsen was also the home of Balthasar Dosser, "a particularly dangerous agitator," who was cruelly put to death with several companions at Innsbruck in 1562. Even in the 1580's, indeed in 1604 there are in the court record still some traces of the Anabaptists. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; J. Loserth, Der Anabaptismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1892); J. V. Zingerle, Schilderungen aus Tirol (1877); Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Loesche, Tirolensia; ML II, 702.

Lusthof des Gemoeds, a Dutch Mennonite devotional treatise: see Schabaelje, J. Ph.

Lusthof des Gemoets (Pleasure Garden of the Heart), a Dutch Mennonite hymnary, published in 1732 at Groningen, with an introduction by Alle Derks (q.v.). This hymnbook, which was to replace an older songbook, was used by the Groningen Old Flemish until about 1830. It contains 139 "schriftuirlycke liedekens" (Scriptural songs) borrowed from other hymnaries and without notes, being intended for public meetings and also, as is said in the title and in the introduction, "to be read to refresh the souls." It is followed by an appendix, called Agter-Hofje (Back Yard), of which two editions 1732 and 1736 are known, both at Groningen. This Agter-Hofje contains 51 hymns with notes; it has a short preface by Alle Derks. vdZ.

Lusthof der Zielen, a Dutch hymnary: see Stapel, Claes.

Lusthofje des Gemoeds (Little Pleasure Garden of the Heart), a Dutch Mennonite booklet, only 2 x 3 inches, containing 31 devotional songs by J. H. Deutel (q.v.), arranged alphabetically and without notes. There is extant only a 2d edition, published at Hoorn in 1663. vdZ.

Lusthofje Sions, 't, a Dutch Mennonite hymnal, was published in 1668 at Hoorn and contains on 533 pages 239 hymns (27 psalms and 212 "geestelijke liedekens"), all without notes. It was published, and very probably also edited, by Jan Jansz Deutel (q.v.). The full title reads: 't Lusthofje Sions, Bestaande in eenige Psalmen Davids, Lofzangen ende Geestelijke Liedekens. Zeer bequaam om in de Christelijke Vergaderingen der Geloovigen, ofte elders ter eeren Godts, ende tot onderlinge stigtinge met aandacht gezongen te werden. (Copy in AML.) vdZ.

Lustprieel der Zeeden, om te dienen tot vermaek en stichting der zeedige sanglievende gemoeden, is a Dutch Mennonite hymnal, of which as far as is known no copy is extant. Blaupot ten Cate (Holland II, 213) mentions an edition of 1685 published by Hendrik Rijntjes (q.v.) at Leeuwarden. vdZ.

Lustre, Valley Co., Mont., is the center of one of the most recent Mennonite colonization successes. The community, which now contains three Mennonite congregations, the Lustre E.M.B. (1917) with 103 members, the Bethel G.C.M. (1924) with 71 members, and the Lustre M.B. (1917) with 132 members, for a total of 306, was started about 1917 on virgin prairie. The nearest other churches are the Larslan M.B. congregation with 38 members, 20 miles northwest, and the two G.C.M. congregations at Wolf Point (Bethel and United) 37 miles southwest with 129 members. Wolf Point, a town of 2,500, is the business center for the Lustre community. The Lustre settlement is located in the Fort Peck Reservation region, the Fort Peck Dam on the Missouri River being 50 miles to the south. The three Mennonite churches of Lustre, all clustered closely together, unite in the support of Lustre Bible Academy (q.v.), which was established in 1928. From the beginning there has been the closest co-operation in various matters between the Mennonites of all branches in the community. H.S.B.

Lustre Bible Academy, located at Lustre, Mont., is an outgrowth of the Lustre Bible School, which was begun in 1928. In 1947-48 a two-year high-school course was added. In 1948-49 the Academy was accredited as a regular 4-year high school by the state of Montana. In addition to the high-school curriculum Bible subjects are also taught. In 1954 a new school building with gymnasium was erected. The girls' dormitory, two teacherages, and the old and new school buildings stand on a spacious campus.

The school is located in the heart of this Mennonite area, with the M.B. Church of Lustre, the Bethel (q.v., G.C.M.) Lustre Church, and the E.M.B. Church, all within two or three miles of the Academy, and draws its support completely from the interested local Mennonite constituency. Leo Goertzel has been serving as principal for 6-7 years, with three additional teachers on the staff. The enrollment for 1954-55 was 40-45. H.P.W.

Lustre Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church, located near Lustre, Mont., was organized July 7, 1917, the first of the three Mennonite congregations in this prairie community. The first meetinghouse, 16 x 28 ft., was built the same year, and replaced in 1928 by a new church, 40 x 60 ft., with a seating capacity of 300. In 1954 the membership was 103, with Henry P. Wiebe as pastor. H.P.W.

Lustre Mennonite Brethren Church, a rural church located at Lustre, Valley Co., Mont., 25 miles north of Frazer, was organized by Heinrich Voth on Nov. 17, 1917, with 47 members. The congregation met in a schoolhouse until 1923, when a building was erected. J. F. Thiessen, its first pastor, served for 26 years. He was assisted by Benjamin Redekopp until 1922, by A. A. Dick until 1943, and by J. J. Toews. These ministers also served the Volt and Larslan M.B. congregations. Arthur Flaming served from 1944, assisted by J. J. Toews. This church is strongly missionary-minded, having sent four of its members to the foreign field. In 1954 the membership was 132, with Leo S. Wiens as pastor. A.A.D.

Lüthard, Christoph (1590-1663), professor of philosophy at the University of Bern, Switzerland, from 1618, professor of theology from 1628 until his death. In high esteem for his work in training the pastors of Bern, he also merited praise for his contribution to the school system. On Jan. 4, 1659, he was appointed on the newly organized Anabaptist Commission, and with his colleagues interviewed the "Anabaptists in the penitentiary." About this time Dutch intervention in behalf of the Mennonites was begun. Abraham Heidanus (q.v.), professor of theology at the University of Leiden, and Hans Vlamingh, an Amsterdam merchant, wrote long letters to Lüthard (printed in Müller, 173-79), advocating a free exercise of religion. In his reply Lüthard as a member of the Anabaptist Commission tried to present the condition of the Mennonites in a favorable light and to justify the attitude of the Bern theologians and the government. S.G.

"Bernische Pfarrer im 16.-19. Jahrhundert," a manuscript in the state archives of the canton of Bern; Müller, Berner Täufer; ML II, 702 f.

Luther, Martin (1483-1546), reformer and founder of the Lutheran Church, was born Nov. 10, 1483, at Eisleben, Germany; died there on Feb. 18, 1546. The subject of Luther and his relations with Anabaptism (Luther, with other opponents of Anabaptism, called them "Wiedertäufer") naturally falls into two parts; viz., a purely theological inquiry into his concept of baptism in general and infant baptism in particular, and an inquiry into the punitive measures against the Anabaptists desired or sponsored by Luther in connection with his basic position on the persecution of heretics.

1. Luther's Concept of Infant Baptism. Concerning baptism Luther expressed himself at some length for the first time in 1519 in his "Sermon on the Holy, Worthy Sacrament of Baptism" (WA II, 4 ff.). Infant baptism was not yet a problem here, but was taken for granted as premise; here Luther opposed the practice prevalent "at many places," of sprinkling with the hand, and wished that "the child be completely submerged in the water and pulled out again," to correspond with the meaning of baptism, "that the old man and sinful birth of flesh and blood is to be completely drowned through the grace of God"—only thus is it possible to satisfy the meaning of baptism and give "a true complete symbol." Baptism is furthermore a mark by which the people of Christ are recognized and which separates us from "all unbaptized human beings." This idea later became important for the idea of the mass church.

In contrast to the Catholic magical and sacramental view which soon (in the growing Christian life) replaced baptism with one's own works of repentance, or thought that "there was no longer any sin left, became lazy" and negligent, Luther stressed the obligation which baptism places upon the entire life—"therefore all of life is nothing but a spiritual baptism without cease until death"—in confidence in God's assurance, who in the sacrament "unites Himself with you and becomes one with you in a merciful comforting bond." For Luther the baptized person is in principle ("sacramentally") "entirely pure and innocent," but not in fact, since he is still living in the sinful flesh, and is now to become clean in the strength of the Holy Spirit, who is guaranteed in baptism. But it must never become "a false security," as if in trusting in the grace imparted by the sacrament one might live according to his own will: "See to it, if you so wickedly and willfully sin upon grace, that judgment does not seize you!" Faith is religious strength; when Luther designated it as "the most necessary of all and the foundation of all comfort," he interpreted faith in this connection as the sustaining foundation of life in baptism, and faith is thus seen not from the point of view of the child but of the adult, mature Christian.

This is different from the accents in De captivitate babylonica ecclesiae (Concerning the Babylonian Captivity of the Church) in 1520 (WA VI, 526 ff.). Here is found right at the beginning the statement that baptism is "most beneficial to children"; they are "initiated" thereby and "are sanctified by the most simple faith in the word of God." If this sacrament had been given to adults it would have lost its strength, since the devil would surely have had it sold for money as he then did the indulgences. According to the promise of Mark 16:16, faith is an absolute necessity for the proper working of baptism, to the extent that "faith can save even without the sacrament"; without faith baptism is harmful. Since this faith must accompany one throughout his entire life, it begins in the act of the baptism of the child as the "justifying" faith. Luther here logically deals with the objection that this faith is impossible in children "who do not grasp the promise of God and cannot have the faith of baptism." He solves this problem in harmony with tradition ("because all say it"; thereby he is thinking of the guarantee of the godparents) by stating that the faith of the person bringing the little child to the act of baptism comes to the assistance of the child. This is not to be understood to mean that this faith of another has a substitutionary effect but rather that it is evaluated as the prayer of the believing church which affects God so that the word of God works upon the child, just as it is also capable of transforming the heart of an ungodly man, "which is no less deaf and incapable than any little child." Thus the child is "transformed and renewed by a faith infused into him." The sacrament is capable of bursting even "the most obstinately opposed bar," especially here where it works through the strength of faith and of the prayer of the church.

In order to understand this view of Luther, the following must be observed. "As the sacrament of baptism is a gift of God, it is He who does something here, not man. This completely precludes the idea that baptism is to be considered an act of presentation of the child to God by the parents and the church as Zwingli thought of it. Faith too, however necessary, must be considered purely as an act of God, not as an act of expression of man; all subjective psychological anchorage is missing." Since it is a work of God, not of man, as Paul teaches (Eph. 2:8), Luther rejected the concept of the baptism of children upon their future faith as adults as the Waldenses and Bohemian Brethren held it. And for this very reason infant baptism was religiously valuable to Luther because by it in his view children are put into right relationship with the sacramental activity of God, "not concerned to do any kind of effort or any kind of work, completely free, sure and blessed alone through the glory of their baptism." Little children are thus the perfect example for correct baptism. Furthermore as the sacrament of initiation and the supporting foundation of faith baptism can only be infant baptism.

2. Luther's Reasons for Infant Baptism and Infant Faith. Luther founded infant baptism and the faith of children on Matt. 19:14 or Matt. 2:16 (innocent children are "holy and blessed"), on John the Baptist who leaped in faith in his mother's womb (Luke 1:41), on the example of circumcision in the Old Covenant, on the baptism of whole families by the apostles (Acts 10:48; 16:33; I Cor. 1:16), and on Christian tradition "since the times of the apostles in all the world by all of Christendom," which God would surely not have allowed to continue if it had not been right, especially since all other heresies perished. But he admitted that there is in the New Testament no particular command to baptize children; they are included in "all the heathen" (Matt. 28:19). Just as the faith of a Christian remains with him in his sleep, unaware to him, so also faith can begin in children though they are unaware of it (WA 17, 2, 86).

3. Luther's Opposition to Anabaptism. These above principles as held by Luther show that any understanding with the Anabaptists was for Luther theologically impossible. He remained true to his concept of baptism expressed in 1520 and only stiffened in the objectivization of his doctrine of the sacrament in his dispute with Carlstadt and Zwingli, in which he became more and more unyielding. God's word of promise remained for him superior to the symbol, the water. "It is more important to teach God's word than to baptize" (WA 26, 164). Baptism is also subordinated to faith; "even if someone had never been baptized but did not know any better or firmly believed that he has been properly and surely baptized, such faith would still be enough for him, for as he believes, so he is before God" (WA 26, 171). But the effectiveness of the word is so immediately put into the symbol that this symbol, i.e., the water, becomes its bearer and is therefore taken away from the profane. It is no longer "simple water"; but it is "with" and "by" the water that baptism carries the strength of the word of God, of the promise of the forgiveness of sin.

At the same time the baptism of children "is the surest baptism of all" (WA 26, 157), precisely because the child "cannot deceive" but possesses the true passivity and receptivity of the believer. These two facts together make the act of baptism appear as an opus operatum and of magical Catholic nature, which was not at all Luther's intention. His religious interest lay in making the sacrament independent of human wishes, in the working out of the pure objectivity of God's work of grace. But Luther's formulation is theologically unsatisfying. His error lies in the impossibility of giving faith the theological significance here ascribed to it as a matter of principle. It is strange that this theologian of faith was unable to do this. He always feared "works," i.e., human self-righteousness, if faith should become "personal" in the modern sense.

4. Disputes with the Anabaptists. Luther disputed theologically with the Anabaptists only in literary form, and principally in four writings: (1) his booklet Von der Wiedertaufe an zwei Pfarrherrn of 1528 (WA 26, 137 ff.); (2) the foreword to the book by Justus Menius, Der Wiedertäufer Lehre und Geheimnis of 1530 (WA 30, 2, 209 ff.); (3) his Von den Schleichern und Winkelpredigern of 1532 (WA 30, 3, 510 ff.); and (4) his sermons of February 2, 9, 16, and 23, 1528 (WA 27), as well as in the Kirchenpostille of 1523 for the Gospel on the third Sunday after Epiphany (WA 17, 2, 72 ff.), also separately published under the title Von der Kinder Tauf und fremdem Glauben in the introductions to Urbanus Rhegius' Widerlegung des Bekenntnisses der Münsterischen neuen Valentinianer und Donatisten und zur Neuen Zeitung von den Wiedertäufern zu Münster 1535 (WA 38, 336 ff.). In addition there are his letters, his official opinions, and the expressions in his Table Talks.

Luther apparently did not have exact information on Anabaptist writings, however certainly he has "heard" and "read" and "knows" all manner of things (WA 26, 140). All individualization is missing, especially since Luther lumps the Anabaptists together with the Sacramentists (Zwingli, Carlstadt, Schwenckfeld, etc.), not entirely without justification, of course, to the extent that the Anabaptist doctrine of the communion was the same as that of Zwingli or Oecolampadius. It is of no significance that he declared "the error of the Anabaptists more tolerable than that of the sacramentists in this matter" (baptism), "for the Sacramentists completely destroy baptism, but they [the Anabaptists] make it new" (WA 26, 173); Anabaptists and Sacramentists remained for him still Pilate and Herod, who were united as one over and against Christ.

In the divisions of Anabaptism Luther sees a sign of its ungodliness. The Anabaptist limitation of baptism to the believer he considers entirely impossible, since the baptizer cannot look into the heart of a man to see whether he really believes. Such a baptism is a "baptism upon adventure" (Mark 16:16), even if there is talk of "the sure faith"; for the confession of the one to be baptized proves nothing, since he too is not "sure" of his faith since he is of course not free of temptation. (One is impressed with Luther's rejection of all anchoring of the grace of baptism in a human or emotional activity such as "trusting and building upon oneself and not upon the word of God alone.")

The Anabaptist practice of preaching in secret (in actuality the consequence of persecution) was to Luther "a certain sign of the devil," especially since they had no "call" to preach. The eschatological hope of certain Anabaptist circles for an earthly kingdom with the murder of all the ungodly (e.g., Müntzer) was to him an unchristian, seditious, and vengeful spirit (Luke 22:26). In Christology he accused the Anabaptists of Münster of teaching "that Christ did not receive His body from Mary, as they call it [but in Mary], although He was called the seed of David" (WA 38, 349). The claim of the Anabaptists to have authorization to speak because of the "Sitzrecht" (I Cor. 14:30, "If a revelation is made to another sitting by, let the first be silent") he definitely rejected with the interpretation that Paul was speaking of prophets, i.e., "teachers who have the office of preaching in the churches" (WA 30, 3, 522).

Luther rejected the whole idea of rebaptism (which was among the Anabaptists merely the practical consequence of their demand for adult baptism, and not a principle) with the argument that the person who performs the act of baptism is irrelevant; baptism "under the papacy" was also right, and Augustine had opposed the Donatists (WA 27, 42 ff.). "It was a mistake to build baptism on the faith of the baptizer; I base baptism on God's Word." Luther was here referring to the Donatists of the fourth century who rejected the baptism of a bishop who had recanted under persecution and then was restored to office.

In the moral demands of the Anabaptists, based on the ethics of the Sermon on the Mount (rejection of the oath and holding magisterial office, stress on the holy living of the believing Christian), Luther saw legalism, sedition, and the denial of ineradicable human sinfulness. His entire polemic here is however completely doctrinaire in rejecting realism and individual differentiation.

But it is undeniable that there were unbridgeable theological differences between the two sides; and just as Luther failed to try to understand the Anabaptists, so also did the Anabaptists fail to understand him when they pointed out the ineffectiveness of infant baptism. This last argument in particular was not fair to Luther, since he had from the beginning attacked the inadequacy of the bare act of infant baptism as such and pointed out its ineffectiveness for the whole of life. (See also p. 421.)

5. Luther and the Catholic Heresy Laws. The manner of the proceedings against the Anabaptists by both church and secular authorities which Luther advocated and desired, is rightly to be seen as a part of the whole question of Reformation and "heresy." Anabaptism offered the principal practical occasion for his consideration of the question of what legal procedures were to be applied to heretics.

To be sure, the first basic statements by Luther on this question were made in regard to his own case and were against the existing Catholic heresy laws. "The burning of heretics is contrary to the will of the Holy Spirit," says one of the paragraphs of the 95 theses of 1518 (WA I, 624; see 391 f.), and in the Address to the Christian Nobility of the German Nation in 1520 he said, "Heretics must be overcome with the Scriptures, not with fire; if it were an art to overcome heretics with fire, then the executioners would be the most learned doctors on earth" (WA 6, 455). Spiritual things must be judged spiritually (I Cor. 2:13); the government is not lord of the conscience, but has only to do with temporal, not with spiritual order. On the other hand, the church has its own means of discipline by the norm of Matt. 18:16 ff., i.e., by brotherly admonition and finally the ban, which may, however, not extend into the civil sphere (see Sermon on the Ban of 1518, published in 1520, WA VI, 61 ff.).

Luther's sharp differentiation between the Gospel and the world works itself out logically here. "The soul's thoughts and feelings can be known to none but God; therefore it is . . . impossible to command and compel anyone with force to believe thus or so; another approach is needed for this; force will not do it" (1523, WA 11, 264). This "other approach" was to fight with the word of the Bible, and Luther was firmly convinced that it would win the day with everyone in the one true understanding comprehensible to all. "God's Word illumines the hearts, and thereby all heresy and error will vanish from the heart" (WA 11, 269). Luther's strength of faith was able here to demonstrate splendid strength and confidence in the purely spiritual conquest of heresy; only lack of faith doubts the effectiveness of the Holy Scriptures. "I believe that the idea of burning heretics comes from the fear of being unable to overcome them with the Word" (1520, WA 6, 582). "Let the spirits burst and clash one with the other. If some meanwhile are misled, very well, that is what happens in the real course of war; where there is strife and battle, there some must fall" (WA 15, 219). Heresy appears, entirely within the sphere of faith, as an aspect of divine leading of history; heresy is necessary from this point of view (Matt. 18:7; I Cor. 11:19). "It is a plague of divine wrath" over sin; heretics admonish to alertness, "cause the faith and the doctrine of the church to be practiced," thereby promoting it directly. "If Cerinthus had not been, then John the Evangelist would never have written his Gospel." Indeed, there is truth concealed in heresy—"There has never been a heresy that has not stated some truth" (1525, WA 14, 694). All these are verdicts of faith.

These verdicts in part fall into the period when Anabaptism had already entered in the field of Luther's vision. In Part II of the booklet Of Worldly Government, to What Extent Obedience Is Its Due (1523) the statement is defended in the sharpest imaginable manner that "Heresy can never be resisted with fire" (WA 11, 268); if there is heresy, let it be overcome, as is proper, with God's Word (WA 11, 270), even though Luther is not here referring to the Anabaptist movement, but was led to this formulation of the issue by Melanchthon. In his writing, A Letter to the Princes of Saxony Concerning the Seditious Spirit (1524), which is concerned directly with Müntzer, but indirectly with Carlstadt and the "Schwarmgeister," Luther writes, "Just let them preach as they like and with confidence; for, as I have said, there must be sects and the Word of God must go to the battle field and fight" (WA 15, 218). But now, disturbed by the violent iconoclastic seditious aggression of Müntzer (WA 15, 200 f.), he drew a sharp line: "But if they want to do more than fight with the Word, and also want to break and strike with the fist, there your Excellency shall attack, be it we or they, and let them be at once expelled from the country" (WA 15, 219), i.e., then they are to be punished by the government as rebels, for they then themselves overstep the Christian area of action and enter into the secular area which is the concern of the government.

6. Fighting the Anabaptists with Secular Power. Unfortunately in Luther's mind the Anabaptist movement came more and more into the category of sedition, partly because of civil disturbances connected with the movement (e.g., WA 30, 3, 513), partly because of radical utterances on the part of certain Anabaptists, and partly because of more or less biased reports. Consequently Luther was never able to recognize the quiet, purely religious Anabaptism. It was to him not a matter for spiritual weapons, since he was unable to differentiate them, and no longer saw any of them as purely spiritual opponents. In the foreword to the Instruction of the Inspectors to the Pastors in the Electorate of Saxony (1528, WA 26, 200) Luther speaks of the duty of the government to see that "dissension, partisan spirit, and sedition do not arise among their subjects." This statement concerned the prohibition of all Anabaptist literature in Saxony. For Luther the Anabaptists were no longer "sinners primarily against religion," but rather "against the essence of the state" (Wappler, Kursachsen, 15).

In the punishment of Anabaptists as revolutionaries Luther, in an official opinion to Philip of Hesse, gave the ruler the right to decide. According to the occasion of the incidents he might pardon, expel, or—in the case of obstinate transgressors against the ruler's mandates—execute with the sword. To be sure, in a letter of July 14, 1528 (Enders VI, 299 ff.), he wrote, "I hesitate to pass the death sentence, even when it has been amply merited; their expulsion is sufficient." And in 1530 in his Exposition of Psalm 82 (WA 30, 1, 192 ff.) he warned the state not to abuse its power and sought to protect and retain the moral character of the governmental "majesty." Nevertheless, in practice he became more and more inexorable, recommending that "corner preachers," Anabaptists, etc., be commended to the executioner. Luther's judgment became definitive for Saxony's treatment of the Anabaptists, even though he cannot be held accountable for particulars. He approved the imperial mandates against the Anabaptists of 1529 ff.

A second line of thought plays a part in Luther's attitude. In the letter to Lazarus Spengler, Feb. 4, 1525 (Enders V, 117), Luther wrote that he did not yet consider Anabaptism (Schwärmertum) blasphemous. After about 1528, in connection with his opinion that Anabaptism was essentially seditious and in view of the fact that the preaching of the Word, which he had hitherto believed would always be victorious, was failing here, he changed his mind and demanded a ruthless application of the penalty for blasphemy, as found in natural law (equivalent to the second commandment), in the Old Testament (Lev. 24:16), and in the Justinian Code. The objectivity of the fact of blasphemy seemed to Luther so compelling that in 1530 in his Exposition of Psalm 82 and in 1531 in his concurrence with Melanchthon he said that heretics (Anabaptists) should be condemned even without trial and process of law. Even if the potentate acts too hastily, he is still right (WA 31, 1, p. 309 Corp. Ref. IV, 740).

7. Luther Favors the Execution of Anabaptists with the Sword. From this point of view Luther's famous official opinion of 1531 (not 1541!) in cooperation with the Wittenberg theologians must be understood (Corp. Ref. IV, 737 ff.). It repeats his views in a more or less classical form and must not be weakened. His addition to the decision of his colleagues is explained by the fact that John of Saxony had requested an opinion of the theological faculty as a whole and of Luther in particular. The opinion was formulated by Melanchthon, but Luther added the words "I approve," and expressly sanctioned the executions of heretics, "although it is terrible to view." He did this for four reasons: (1) They condemn the office of preaching the Word. (2) They have no definite doctrine. (3) They suppress true doctrine. (4) They want to destroy the kingdom of this world.

All four points, even the condemnation of the office of preaching and their false doctrine, were included in the category of sedition and blasphemy, and were therefore, on the basis of the second commandment, to be punished by the government. This was not at all a matter of interference by the state in the inner realm of faith; it was a question of the preservation of public order, which lies in the hand of the sword of government. Anabaptism was punished as a crime against the public, not because its faith was different, but because it (in Luther's opinion) disturbed public order through sedition and blasphemy.

Luther often replied to objections to this view, raised in part by himself and in part by others. He did so especially in his Exposition of Psalm 82 in 1530 (WA 31, 1, pp. 183 ff.), where he replied to the charge by Lazarus Spengler, of Nürnberg, that he (Luther) contradicted himself. He held to the principle that "no one should or can be compelled to believe"; but if one is punished for teaching contrary to the creed, he is not punished as a "simple heretic," but as a "public blasphemer, subject to secular penalties. Personally one may believe what he will; on inner matters of faith no judge passes sentence," but teaching and blaspheming are prohibited, "unless the teacher goes where there are no Christians." The Papists, who confess the Apostles' Creed, were logically not included among the blasphemers.

The congregating of nonconformists who cannot be compelled to believe is to be punished by the government for the reason that "corner preaching" foments disturbance and sedition; here too it was not the heretical belief that was punished. Luther also forbade Protestant clergymen to preach to the congregation of "a Papist or a heretic," seeing sedition in the very act of preaching without an official call. But why were not the Jews, who blaspheme against Christ, not punished as blasphemers? Luther replied: they were already punished in their "staying outside Christendom, and furthermore are not admitted to public office." Furthermore, they would be punished if they blasphemed openly or by "corner preaching" in Christian homes. But on these principles, would it not be possible for "the tyrants who persecuted the Gospel," i.e., the Catholics, to punish the Evangelicals in whom they see blasphemers? "Answer: what difference does that make?" The kings of Israel killed some true prophets also, nevertheless the command to stone the false prophets remained in force.

Furthermore, a citizen is obliged to report to the magistrate and to the pastor any case of a corner preacher that might come to him. Should he not do this, he would be acting contrary to his oath of loyalty to the magistrate, and would be acting as a despiser of the pastor, to whom he owes the honor, and would be against God, and would be guilty along with the corner preachers of causing trouble.

8. Luther's Distinction in the Matter of Heresy. Luther's Sermon on Matt. 13:24 ff. (the tares among the wheat) of Feb. 7, 1546, thus shortly before his death (EA XX, 2, 2nd ed. pp. 540 ff.) maintained this position and is not to be construed as moderation due to old age. One should remember that by this time the threat which Luther saw in Anabaptism and Schwärmertum no longer existed; no more sedition (Aufruhr) and no more blasphemy was in evidence. The tares, it is true, still included heretics, conspiracies, and sects (Ketzer, Rotten und Sekten) but these were "within the church" (ibid., 555, 558), and were not to be considered as disturbers of public order or as blasphemers. Hence the severest penalty was to be only the ban of the church, not governmental punishment, "no human power and might." Here the heretic is "only a heretic."

The much - debated question whether Luther sought to establish the death penalty for heresy is therefore to be answered thus: a distinction is to be made between two kinds of heretics, i.e., those who are "only heretics," namely, those who diverge from the official doctrines of the church only in purely internal churchly matters which have no public significance, and those whose divergent teaching occasions public unrest or blasphemy of God. This latter kind of heresy is a public crime and as such falls into the sphere of the state authorities, who punish such cases in accord with the existing laws on rebellion and blasphemy, usually with the death penalty. Such cases of heresy were to be reported, although the reporting was to be not only to the civil authorities but also to the pastor; the pastor was to be considered in this case not as the representative of the church but as the state-appointed guardian against blasphemy.

On the other hand, the other type of heretics, the "only heretics," did not fall within the sphere of the state, but were subject only to church discipline (Matt. 18:16 ff.). Of course it is true that in practice this type seldom occurred any more since the failure of the earlier disputations to win them (although disputations were not completely abandoned). This was not due to any inconsistency on Luther's part or any abandonment of his principles, but to the fact that in those days (quite differently from the present time) the state and society were understood to be controlled by Christian principles.

The Apostles' Creed was at that time, so Luther understood, the fundamental constitution of Christian society, and consequently the state and the public were under a creed which included particularly the whole of Christian theology, and which accordingly required that the state punish in the civil courts the holding of doctrines which no longer concern the modern state. A Christian government would have to consider as blasphemy against God (and punish appropriately) any offense against the Gospel, and that included the rejection of infant baptism. And in a consciously Christian society divergences in church matters could scarcely be distinguished in practice from civil disorders and conflicts. The state was the "custodian of the two tablets," i.e., it was also the guardian of order in the church, was sensitive to sedition in this area, and punished accordingly. As a result the heretic who was "only a heretic" practically ceased to exist.

But in this respect Luther did not belong to the Middle Ages (as N. Paulus claimed), nor is therefore the Reformation type of heresy trial, which was based upon Luther's ideas, to be rated as a Catholic inquisition trial. The Catholic-medieval principle that the church investigates, while the state executes, was absolutely not Luther's concept. He dissolved the connection of church and world at this point. In him there could be no church-state heresy trial, but rather two theoretically sharply distinct trials, one the ecclesiastical trial against the heretic, as a pure heretic, and the other the state trial against rebels and blasphemers.

9. Elimination of the State Heresy Trial after the Separation of Church and State. According to Luther's concept then, the executions of Anabaptists took place only on the basis of the second type of civil heresy trial, not on the basis of the first type of ecclesiastical trial. The result was of course the same as it was in the Middle Ages; the heretics were persecuted and as much as possible wiped out. But the above distinction [of two types of heresy trial] is therefore not to be considered as superficial or a piece of sophistication. It became highly important when the "Christian" character of the state and society vanished. As the obligations of the state to punish the heretic ceased, the ecclesiastical heresy trial against the "pure heretics" was all that remained, and the Protestant church never demanded that the "pure heretic" should be punished by the state. It was just because the church was not interested in this matter that she unreservedly endorsed the development of the modern state. Such was not the case in Catholicism—think of Spain, for instance. Wherever in Catholicism the bond between church and state was dissolved in the matter of heresy trials, it was dissolved by the state and not by the church. This important difference in the general development of culture and ideas was the result of Luther's position.

The tragedy is to be seen in the fact that as a result of the interrelationship of the most diverse circumstances from which the self-responsibility of certain individual Anabaptists cannot always be excluded, Anabaptism was not evaluated by Luther on the basis of its own religious quality and depth. There were, to be sure, isolated instances when Luther spoke words of recognition for the martyr courage of Anabaptists (Enders 6, 263), but to the end Anabaptism remained for him the "seditious spirit" (aufrührerische Geist). Even after the bloody persecutions ceased, Anabaptism suffered severely in the public mind because of Luther's verdict. Current Reformation historiography is successfully trying to correct Luther's verdict. W.K.

Köhler makes it clear that Luther's recommendation of harsh action against the Anabaptists, including the death penalty, was based upon his belief, shared by Melanchthon, that they were guilty of sedition and blasphemy. It is difficult, however, to avoid the feeling that a major cause for the severity was the simple fear that the Anabaptists might gain sufficient influence to threaten the success of the Reformation by winning too many adherents to their cause and thus breaking the monopoly of the church which Luther and Melanchthon were establishing. In the earlier period of his activity, as Köhler points out, in the high confidence which Luther had in the victory of the truth he was proclaiming, Luther was quite willing to let others speak, in the confidence that the true Word of God would overcome all heresy. Later, shaken by the Peasants' War and the ensuing reaction, as well as by general evidence that the support of the populace for true spiritual religion was not all that he expected or considered necessary, he leaned more and more on the arm of flesh, the ecclesiastical and political power, to guarantee the success of the evangelical movement. At that point it was safer to call on force than to risk the free contest of ideas. In addition to this, the general fear of revolutionary uprisings evoked by the Peasants' War and Thomas Müntzer, as well as by other minor incidents related to the Anabaptists, makes it easy to understand that Luther's insecurity could intensify the appeal to force.

But on what just background could Anabaptists, who did not deny the Apostles' Creed or any article of it more than did the Roman Catholics, be accused of blasphemy? The common and standard meaning of blasphemy is abandoned if rejection of infant baptism is blasphemy. Was any major deviation from the established faith to be rated as blasphemy?

The charge of sedition is likewise very suspect, no matter how sincerely it may have been believed. Philip of Hesse did not take the charge seriously, neither did Johannes Brenz and others who could be mentioned. Bainton has pointed out that "Luther construed mere abstention from public office and military service as sedition" (Here I Stand, 376). The Anabaptists were arrested as disturbers of the peace, but actually because Luther considered the introduction of a second and rival religion into a locality to be a disturbance of the public order. The greatest irony, however, is the repeated condemnation of the Anabaptists by Luther and other reformers as "corner-preachers," i.e., as conducting private and not public services. But when did the authorities or Luther ever offer or permit the Anabaptists the privilege of public preaching? Anabaptist preachers were discredited by Luther also because they had no proper call, i.e., because they were not appointed by his official state church, regardless of the call from their own brotherhood church.

Luther and Melanchthon can be understood as children of their time, but they can not be excused from rising above it as others did, notably the Strasburg authorities and Philip of Hesse, who, like others, saw that the better answer to the Anabaptists was not to execute them but to improve the life and character of the preachers and church members and thus remove a major ground of Anabaptist criticism.

Köhler makes baptism the chief point of difference between Luther and the Anabaptists. An adequate understanding, however, calls for the recognition of other major points of difference. The most important of all was the concept of the church. The Anabaptists called for a brotherhood composed of adult and responsible believers only, committed to full discipleship, a voluntary, free and holy church. Baptism on confession of faith was one of the symbols of this church and the only mode of entrance. Luther, who understood well this vision, rejected it as impracticable and chose to maintain the traditional concept of the mass church with the entire population included in it by compulsory infant baptism. This was the real break of the Anabaptists with the Reformation. With this concept of the church it is easy to understand why the Anabaptists, as Albrecht Ritschl says, "considered themselves to be the ones who were bringing to its true conclusion the work of restoration of the church which Luther and Zwingli had begun" (Geschichte des Pietismus, p. 7), . . . "the more thorough, decisive, and complete Reformation which Luther surrendered in 1522 and Zwingli in 1524" (p. 22, Ritschl summarizing the view of Max Göbel). Here lies a vast difference in basic central position, and not just a disagreement in the meaning of baptism. H.S.B.

WA—Weimar edition of Luther's Works, D. Martin Luthers Werke, kritische Gesammtausgabe (1883-1932); EA—Erlangen edition of Luther's Works (2nd ed. 1863-1932), Dr. Martin Luthers sämmtliche Werke; E. L. Enders, Luthers Briefwechsel, Dr. Martin Luther's sämmtliche Werke, 15 vv. in Erlanger-Frankfurter Ausgabe (2nd ed., Leipzig, 1884-1932); J. Gottschick, Die Lehre der Reformation von der Taufe (Tübingen, 1906); H. Hermelink, Der Toleranzgedanke im Reformationszeitalter (Leipzig, 1908); Walter Köhler, Reformation und Ketzerprozess (Tübingen, 1901); J. Köstlin, Luthers Theologie (2nd ed., 2 vv., Stuttgart, 1901); J. Küstlin-Kawerau, Martin Luther (5th ed., 2 vv., Berlin, 1903); Th. Kolde, Martin Luther 2 vv.. (Gotha, 1884, 1893) 89; N. Paulus, Luther und die Gewissensfreiheit (Munich, 1905); idem, "Luther und die Todesstrafe für Ketzer, neue Rettungsversuche" in Histor.-Politische Blätter (145) 1910, 177-89, 243-55; R. Sohm, Kirchenrecht I (Leipzig, 1892) 546 ff.; K. Völker, Toleranz und Intoleranz im Zeitalter der Reformation (Leipzig, 1912); Paul Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von. Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Jena, 1913); idem, Thüringen; Johannes Warns, Die Taufe, Gedanken über die urchristliche Taufe, ihre Geschichte und ihre Bedeutung für die Gegenwart (Cassel, 1913, 2nd ed., 1922); John Horsch, Infant Baptism, Its Origin Among Protestants and the Arguments Advanced for and Against It (Scottdale, 1917); Roland H. Bainton, Here I Stand, A Life of Martin Luther (N.Y., 1950); Hans-Werner Gensichen, Damnamus. Die Verwerfung von Irrlehre bei Luther und im Luthertum des 16. Jahrhunderts (Berlin, 1955); John Oyer, "The Writings of Luther Against the Anabaptists," MQR (1953) 100-10; H. S. Bender, The Anabaptist Vision, (Goshen, 1944, repr. of MQR XVIII (1944) 67-88; ML II, 703-8.

Lüthi (Luthi, Lüthy) is a well-known Swiss Mennonite family name. Hans Lüthi, of Eggenwil, canton of Aargau, was present at the Anabaptist debate at Bern in 1538. In the 17th century members of this family were found near Rauperswil in the Emmental (q.v.). In the last decades some Lüthis moved from Switzerland to Alsace (q.v.); about 1800 some of them were living in the valley of Ste-Marie aux Mines, Alsace, now in the Montbéliard congregation. To this family also belonged the preacher Hans Lüthi (q.v.) of Sumiswald, and perhaps also the Anabaptist martyr Hans Ludi (q.v.), executed at Basel in 1530. vdZ.

D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 38, 48, 87, 190, 191, 200.

Lüthi, Hans, a Mennonite preacher of Schaufelbühl near Sumiswald, in the Emmental (q.v.), Switzerland, was shipped to the galleys with four other Mennonites in 1714 at the age of 54. Because they had frequently been banished, but kept returning home, and because they spread Mennonite doctrine, "helping to fill the country with such stubborn rabble," the government inflicted this severe penalty. They were taken to Sicily and forged to the galleys. A letter dated Nov. 16, 1715 (printed in Müller, Berner Täufer, 226), written by the three comrades in suffering, Christian Liebe, Peter Wüthrich, and Joseph Probst, stated that of the five Mennonites, Niklaus Baumgartner had died at Turin and Hans Lüthi on the galleys. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1377; ML II, 708.) S.G.

Lutkegast, a hamlet in the Dutch province of Groningen, formerly seat of a Groningen Old Flemish Mennonite congregation. It must have been dissolved before 1700. (Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 138; DB 1879, 4.) vdZ.

Luton (Iowa) Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church was founded in February 1941 by about a dozen families emigrating from the dried out areas of Jansen and Henderson, Neb., and a few families who came later from Colorado. Church services were held in the larger farm homes for a year; then a modest church was built. Lay members and guest speakers supplied the pulpit until September 1941, when John R. Dick was called as pastor. In 1953 Frank C. Wiens was pastor and the membership was 45. J.R.D.

Luxembourg, an independent constitutional grand duchy with an area of 999 square miles (about the size of Lancaster Co., Pa.) and a population (1947 census) of 290,992, of whom 283,273 are Roman Catholics.

The Reformation made little headway in this strongly Roman Catholic country. Relatively few individuals accepted the new teaching, which was vigorously suppressed by both church and state authorities. There were no Anabaptists here, as far as is known, until recent times, when Amish Mennonites migrated here from near-by countries. On Oct. 13, 1843, the farm estate called Spittelhof, near Flaxweiler, canton of Grevenmacher, Luxembourg, was rented by Daniel Oesch (b. 1795 in Alsace). In the spring of 1844 he with his wife Elise (nee Beller) and children moved here from Rehlingerhof, near Wincheringen, Germany, and took up residence on this farm. So began the little Mennonite congregation in this little country, with 13 baptized members and 17 children.

In 1876 Joseph Schertz from the Saar married the youngest daughter of Daniel Oesch and took up residence near Berdorf, canton of Echternach. In 1892 the Peter Nafziger family migrated here from Liessem, Germany. The present Luxembourg Mennonites consist largely of descendants of the three immigrants—7 Oesch families, 2 Schertz families, and 4 Nafziger families—a total of 13 families numbering 65 souls, of whom 46 are counted as members of the congregation. A Nafziger family in Liessem and a Guth family in Jägershof in near-by Germany are also associated with this congregation. Most of the Luxembourg Mennonites are farmers, located on farms scattered across the north-central part of the country.

Elders of the congregation have been Nicolas Oesch (1841-1906, son of pioneer Daniel), Nicolas Nafziger (1849-1922) of Liessem, Germany, Peter Nafziger (1858-1944, the immigrant), and Joseph Oesch (1905-54), who served as elder from 1939 until his accidental death in 1954. The congregation belongs to the Alsace Mennonite Conference in France.

Sunday morning services are held on the second, third, and fourth Sunday of each month. Sunday school is conducted for the children. A Bibelkurs (Bible Conference) has been held each winter since 1946. A spring youth day was held in 1939 and several times since.

Services were held in the homes of the members until 1948, when a wooden barracks was rented in Diekirch. In 1953-54 a stone building for worship was built at Rosswinkelhof near Consdorf, canton of Echternach in the eastern part of the country, so that the congregation now has its own chapel, dedicated Sept. 26, 1954.

In the latter 1940's the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (Pa.) took steps to find a location for launching mission work in Europe. Because of spiritual need discovered in the industrial area extending from the southern part of this country to Metz, France, it was decided to begin work in Esch-sur-Alzette, the industrial center of southern Luxembourg. The first missionaries sent were Clarence and Lela Fretz, who arrived in the country on Sept. 13, 1951. Accompanying them were Harvey and Mildred Miller, missionaries sent by the Conservative Amish Mennonite Mission Board, which was also co-operating in this undertaking. The Fretzes were stationed in Esch-sur-Alzette and the Millers in Dudelange, six miles away. Gospel services, literature distribution, Bible camps, and boys' and girls' crafts clubs are among the activities carried on to give a Gospel witness in this area.
C.Y.F.

Josef Meyers, Geschichte Luxembourgs (Luxembourg, 1940) 149-53; Mannhardt, Jahrbuch 1888, 35; ML II, 708.

Luyck, Petrus de, a Dutch Reformed minister at Groede, Zeeland, Flanders, who published Het eerste deel van den Spiegel der Waerheyt, waerinne duydelick ghesien wort, dat de Mennisten, aennopende de H. Schrifture, zijn een verwardt Babel ende Midianitisch ghevecht onder malcanderen (Vlissingen, 1633); there is also an edition published at Rotterdam in the same year. In this rare book, containing seven dialogues, a number of Mennonite leaders are attacked by the author, including Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, Jacques Outerman, Claes Claesz of Blokzijl, François de Knuyt, Anthoni Jacobsz, Jacob Pietersz van der Meulen, and Cornelis de Kuyper. This book is valuable not for the strict Calvinistic views and arguments, which are almost all borrowed from H. Faukelius (q.v.), Babel der Wederdoperen of 1621, but for the fact that some Mennonite writings are named in it, which have since been lost. vdZ.

Luyken, a Dutch family. Caspar Christoffel Luycken moved from Essen, Germany, to Amsterdam. In 1633 he married Hester Coores from Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland. Caspar Luycken, at first a clothmaker, later became schoolteacher. He felt keenly existing "social disorder," the contrast between the poor and the wealthy shipowners and crew, and employers who took advantage of the miserable situation of the employed. He joined the Remonstrant congregation at Amsterdam, but in later years he participated in the meetings of the Collegiants (q.v.). Being a friend of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam, Luycken defended him against the calumnies and falsehoods of his antagonists in a booklet, Ondersoeck over den inhout van twee boecxkens, genaemt de ontdekte Veynsinge (Amsterdam, 1655). A son of Caspar Christoffel Luycken was Jan Luyken (q.v.), the noted artist. In the late 17th and early 18th centuries some Luykens were members of the Amsterdam Lamist Mennonite congregation. Jan Luykens (q.v.), who emigrated from Crefeld to Germantown in 1683, may have been a member of this family. It could not be ascertained whether Andries Lucken, who signed the Dordrecht Confession for the Rotterdam congregation in 1632, belonged to this family or not. vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. VI, 974; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 55, 64.

Luyken (Luiken, Luycken), Jan, famous engraver and poet, especially of devotional poems, b. April 16, 1649, at Amsterdam, d. there April 5, 1712. He became an apprentice in the atelier of Martinus Saeghmolen, and moved in a frivolous anti-church society. This is the period of his bombastic book of poems, Duytse Lier (1671), and his acquaintance with Maria de Oudens (1646-82), whom he married in 1672. Four of his five children died young. The oldest son, Caspar Luyken (1672-1708), was also trained as an engraver by his father, and supported his father during his last years. His work was chiefly in illustrating books. Of Caspar's work 1,187 pieces are extant.

In 1673 Jan Luyken was baptized in the Lamist Mennonite Church at Amsterdam, and shortly after joined the Mennonite congregation at Beverwijk, about 16 miles northwest of Amsterdam, though he was probably attracted by the Collegiant views of Paulus Bastiaensz of Beverwijk, where he stayed for a time. But the great change in his life came at a later period. The book Kort Verhaal van het Godvrugtig leven en Zalig Afsterven van Joannes Luiken (1712) reports, "In the twenty-sixth year of his life the Lord appeared in his heart in a powerful manner" (1675), whereupon, "afire with the love of God, he forsook his old bad company," to join the God-fearing. These were the followers of Jakob Böhme. There was at that time a colony of Böhme's disciples, under the leadership of Coenraad van Beuningen, a noted statesman, Professor Allardt de Raedt, and especially Johann Georg Gichtel (see Gichtelianer), a lawyer who had been expelled from Regensburg. Galenus Abrahamsz, Mennonite preacher and physician, must have had some influence upon Luyken's conversion.

After his conversion Luyken withdrew from the church. In solitude he continued his etching and his contemplation; closely attached to a few kindred spirits, he wrote mystical poems tinged with pantheism. In the course of time these poems were considered orthodox and were held in high esteem in pietistic circles in the first half of the 19th century. With the publication of Hylkema's book Reformateurs (1900-2) a new light was shed on these devotional poems, revealing their anti-church and heterodox character. Since then these poems have been even more admired.

A number of volumes of these lyrics, with artistic steel etchings, appeared in the course of time: Jesus en de Ziel (1678), Voncken der Liefde Jesu (1687), De Spiegel van het Menselijk bedrijf (1694), Zedelijke en Stichtelijke Gezangen (1704), Beschouwing der Wereld (1708), De Bykorf des Gemoeds (1709), Het Leersaam Huisraad (1709), De onwaardige Wereld (1710). After Luyken's death there appeared: Schriftuurlijke Geschiedenissen en Gelijkenissen (1712), Des menschen Begin, Midden en Einde (1712), Geestelijke Brieven (1714), Verzameling van Geestelijke Brieven (1741), Het Overvloeiend Herte (1767). A number of his poems are found in former Dutch hymnbooks, and even in the present Doopsgezinde Bundel. (See Literature, Netherlands.)

Ten years after Luyken's death the widow of Barend Visscher published a collection of ninety-two Luyken engravings, professedly among his best, illustrating events from early church history. Beneath each plate is a verse of six lines by Claas Bruin (1671-1732), who was a member of Luyken's circle of devotional poets. Opposite each plate is a poem by Pieter Langendijk (q.v.; 1683-1756).

C.B.H.

A complete bibliography on Luycken (1712-1889) is found in Dr. Maurits Sabbe, Joan Luykens Duytse Lier (Zutphen); articles by C. B. Hylkema in De Gids XIV (1904) p. 28, by J. C. van der Does in Stemmen des Tijds (1928, Nos. 137 and 264; 1929, Nos. 147 and 508; 1931, No. 621); and in Nieuwe Taalgids (1929, No. 197; 1930, No. 245); J. Luycken, Tafereelen der eerste Christenen (Amsterdam, 1722) "Voor-bericht"; N.N.B.Wb. II, 223.

◆

Jan Luyken was a very important, versatile, and creative Dutch engraver and etcher in the period after Rembrandt; 3,275 works are known to be his. His favorite field was the illustration of books. In addition to travel literature and historical works he used many Biblical subjects. He made his own preliminary sketches; many of them can be seen in Amsterdam (Prentenkabinet and Museum Fodor), Haarlem (Teyler Museum), and Rotterdam, as well as in London (British Museum) and Vienna. A collection donated to Amsterdam contains 897 leaves.

His work is distinguished for its clarity, especially in group studies. His best illustrations are found in his own books of poems. For the second edition (1685) of van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror he furnished 104 copper etchings, illustrating the martyrdom of Anabaptists and Mennonites of the 16th century. These plates with eleven additional plates from J. L. Gottfried, Historische Kronyck (Leyden, 1698), were reprinted at Leiden without van Braght's text, with French and German captions, and called Théatre des Martyrs. A Dutch edition was published in 1738 by Marten Schagen at Alkmaar. They also appeared in the 1780 edition of the Martyrs' Mirror printed at Pirmasens, but not in any succeeding German or American editions. After the printing of this edition the plates were supposedly lost; in 1925 they reappeared in South Germany in private possession.

Hege.

N.N.B.Wb. VI, 974-76; DB 1890, 71; 1900, 90 f.; 1902, 99 f.; G. Kalff, Geschiedenis der Nederl. Letterkunde IV (Groningen, 1910) 467, 522-37, 543-47; Bibliographie des Martyrologes II, 417-28; P. van Eeghen, Het Werk van Jan en Casper Luycken (Amsterdam, 1905); M. D. Henkel, "Jan und Caspar Luyken," in Allgemeines Lexikon der bildenden Künstler (ed. Hans Vollmer) XXIII (Leipzig, 1929) 488-89; Chr. Hege, "Ein kurpfälzisches Bücherverbot," in Menn. Gesch.-Bl. I (1936) 26; ML II, 700.

Luykens (Lücken), Jan, head of one of the 13 Crefeld families who landed in Philadelphia on Oct. 6, 1683, and settled in Germantown. He was a Quaker, a citizen of Crefeld, but was a native of Wesel. When the land was divided among the Germantown settlers by lot on Oct. 25, 1683, Luykens as a farmer acquired 200 acres. Jan served as constable of Germantown in 1691-95, as sheriff in 1694-95, and died in 1744.

Hege.

Daniel K. Cassel, Geschichte der Mennoniten (Philadelphia, 1890) 36-44; W. I. Hull, William Penn and the Dutch Quaker Migration to Pennsylvania (Philadelphia, 1935); W. Niepoth, Die Eltern und Voreltern des Johann Luyken (1935 and 1948); ML II, 697.

Luyt Jansz, b. at Amsterdam, a citizen of Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded on May 6, 1531, probably at The Hague. Concerning this martyr, among the first Anabaptist martyrs in the Netherlands, no further information was available. (Grosheide, Bijdrage, 49, 302.) vdZ.

Luytgens, Walig Dirk: see Waechlink Dirks.

Luytjes, Cornelis, a member of the Waterlander congregation at Barsingerhorn, Dutch province of North Holland, who published the following books: 1. Godt verheerlykt in den Zondaar (Hoorn, 1757; of this book there is an edition of Amsterdam, n.d., of which only the title page is changed, then reading God in den Sondaar verheerlijkt); 2. Beoeffenend Onderwys voor de Jeugd tot Doop en Avondmaal (Hoorn, 1761), a catechism; 3. De Gangen Gods in Zyn Heyligdom ontdekt (Amsterdam, 1765), which contains an account of the life of Jesus. Concerning Luytjes there is no further information; apparently he was not a preacher, since his name is not found in the Naamlijsten. vdZ.

Luyttyen Dircxzoen, an Anabaptist martyr, of whom there is no further information, was executed at Leeuwarden, capital of the Dutch province of Friesland, because he had been rebaptized. The sentence is dated April 10, 1535. vdZ.

K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 228.

Lydens-Geschiedenisse van den Zaligmaker, De, is a book, particularly for young people, in the Dutch language by an anonymous author. It deals with Christian martyrs, describing their lives and sufferings. It contains many Mennonite martyrs both Dutch and Swiss. The book is of no special value for Mennonite history. The 51 pictures found in it were taken from J. B. (Bout, q.v.), 't Merg van de Historien der Martelaren. There are three known editions, all rather rare: Amsterdam 1778, Haarlem 1791, and Rotterdam 1820. (Bibliographie II, 407-16.) vdZ.

Lynken, the wife of Jan van de Walle, an Anabaptist martyr: see Calleken Meevels.

Lynken (Lijnken) Baillaerts, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on Feb. 28, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium, with Henry Hannon, because she had been rebaptized, had attended forbidden meetings, and had refused to deny her faith. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 109 f., 176; XIV, 90 f., No. 1017.)

Lynken (Lijnken) Claesdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on Aug. 14, 1561, inside the Gravensteen castle at Gent, Belgium, with Tanneken Delmeere. Lijnken, who was a daughter of Claes Ghijselbrechts, was born at Maren near 's Hertogenbosch, Dutch province of North Brabant. (Verheyden, Gent, 27, No. 78.) vdZ.

Lynken Clercx, an Anabaptist martyr, executed (manner unknown) on Jan. 28, 1575, at Antwerp, Belgium, with Janneken Pots. She had deviated from the Roman Catholic Church and though she had not yet been baptized upon her faith, she was eager to receive this baptism. (Mart. Mir. D 693, E 1008; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 198; XIV, 98 f., No. 1105.) vdZ.

Lynken (Lijnken) Ghysseleers (or Ghyssels), a native of 's-Hertogenbosch, Dutch province of North Brabant, wife of the martyr Jacques Verhulten, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on Feb. 21, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium, together with Willem Huyberts and Lysken Pennaerts. She was charged with the crime of having been rebaptized. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 107 f., 175; XIV, 90 f., No. 1014.) vdZ.

Lynken (Lijnken) Groffels (Groffelaers), of Brussels, an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake on May 28, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium, with Jenneken de Cantere. She had twice attended a Mennonite meeting. Apparently she was not (yet) a member of the congregation. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 119, 178; XIV, 90 f., No. 1030.) vdZ.

Lynken (Lijnken) Jacops, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned at the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, on Dec. 31, 1558. Van Braght calls this martyr Lijntgen, and gives only the year of execution, not the exact date, giving only brief information. From the records it is known that she was born at Dilsen, in the territory of Liége, Belgium, the daughter of a boatman. According to Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren she was "Hendricks Joncwijf," i.e., she was married to Hendrick shortly before. Together with Lynken three other martyrs died. The four women, each of them crookedly bound with ropes, died steadfastly and peacefully. Lijnken is celebrated in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. vdZ.

Offer, 566; Mart. Mir. D 202, E 655; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 456, 466; XIV, 24 f., No. 275; ML II, 709.

Lynken de Meyere (Smeyers), an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on March 24, 1562, inside the Gravensteen castle at Gent, Belgium, together with Janneken Kinderkens and Kathalyne van Lokerhoute. Lynken, who was 26 years of age, was the wife of Pieter van Male, who was put to death at Gent on July 17 of the same year. She is said to have been a native of Zandbergen and a daughter of Jan de Meyere. The name of De Meyere (q.v.) is often found among the Flemish emigrants who fled about 1630 to the Dutch town of Aardenburg. (Verheyden, Gent, 28, No. 82.) vdZ.

Lynken Pieters (Lynken van Heercke), an Anabaptist, secretly beheaded on Nov. 20, 1560, inside the Gravensteen castle at Gent, Belgium, together with Soetken van den Houtte and Martha Baets. After the execution their corpses were thrown into a pit outside the Muide Gate. Soetken and Martha are named by van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, but Lynken is not. Lynken was a daughter of Pieter Cornelis; she was born at Hamme near Dendermonde in Flanders, was unmarried and 25 years of age. (Verheyden, Gent, 27, No. 77.) vdZ.

Lynn (Mich.) United Missionary Church had 10 members in 1953. Bruce W. Pearson was its pastor.

Lyntgen (Lijntgen), the name of a number of martyrs: see Calleken Meevels, Lynken Clercx, Lynken Jacobs, Lyntgen van Dale.

Lyntgen, "a young maiden," an Anabaptist martyr, who was executed at Antwerp, Belgium, on Jan. 28, 1575, obviously is identical with Lynken Clercx (q.v.). (Mart. Mir. D 693, E 1008.) vdZ.

Lyntgen (Linken) van Dale (van Braght, Mart. Mir. only Lijntgen), wife of Jan van Lyers, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned at the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, on Nov. 13, 1562 (not Aug. 15, 1561, as Mart. Mir. says; see Bastiaen, ME I, 247), with some other Anabaptist martyrs. They are celebrated in a hymn "Lieve broeders, ick groet u met sanghen" (Dear brethren, I greet you with hymns), found in the Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562. The hymn is included in Wackernagel, Lieder. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 288, E 655; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 143, 150; XIV, 32 f., No. 370; Wackernagel, Lieder, 140.

Lyntgen (Lijntje) Joris (Goris), an Anabaptist martyr. Lijntgen and her daughter Trijntgen were among the 12 Anabaptists arrested by Spanish soldiers on March 11, 1571, at Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel. Notwithstanding the effort of the judges to make her renounce her faith, Lijntgen remained steadfast and suffered death by being burned at the stake at Deventer on June 16, 1571, together with her daughter and some other Anabaptists. (Mart. Mir. D 552 ff., E 885 ff.; DB 1919, 30-38.) vdZ.

Lyntgen Kemels, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake in 1570 at Liége, Belgium. Besides the brief account by van Braght no particulars were available about this martyr. (A Bartel Kemels was in 1566-67 among the Calvinists at Hasselt in the bishopric of Liége; see W. Bax.) vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik II (The Hague, 1941) 213, 215, 225, 311; Mart. Mir. D 509, E 848; ML II, 481.

Lyntgen Wendelyn, an Anabaptist martyr from Flanders, drowned on Sept. 5, 1562, at Antwerp, Belgium, with Mariken van Meenen. (Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 141, 149; XIV, 32 f., No. 363.) Lyntgen had been baptized and persisted in this baptism. vdZ.

Lysanderhöhe, a village of the Trakt Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in the province of Samara, Russia, founded in 1864, consisting in 1897 of 22 farms, with a population of 119. A part of the population joined the trek to Turkestan in 1891, while others emigrated to America. In 1914 the population was 146. Franz Bartsch (q.v.), the author of Unser Auszug nach Mittelasien, was the teacher of the village school. After the Revolution of 1917 the cultural and economic level of the village began to decline. Some of the inhabitants went to Canada and others were exiled. Little is known about the fate of those who remained and the present status of the village. C.K.

Am Trakt, Eine Mennonitische Kolonie im Mittleren Wolgagebiet (North Kildonan, Man., 1948); ML II, 709.

Lysbet van Dulmen (Dülmen in Westphalia, Germany), an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned on June 11, 1539, at Utrecht in the Netherlands with 10 other women. They were apparently Davidjorists (q.v.). vdZ.

Berigten Hist. Genootschap Utrecht IV, 2 (1851) 139; Mellink, Wederdopers, 237.

Lysbeth, the wife of Amel Jacobs, from Koog on the Dutch island of Texel, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed in 1537; place, exact date (before April 21), and manner of execution are unknown. Her property was confiscated. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 185.) vdZ.

Lysbeth (Lysbette, Elisabeth Piers(s)ins; van Braght, Mart. Mir., only Elisabeth), an Anabaptist martyr burned at the stake on July 21, 1551, on the Veerle square at Gent, Belgium, with Gilles de Gusemme. Standing on the place of execution, the executioner treated her indecently, the only case of indecency which is related in the literature concerning the martyrs. Gillis and Lysbeth are celebrated in a song "Als men schreef vijftienhondert jaer en een en vijftich daer toe voorwaer," No. 8 in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. Both had been (re)-baptized by Gillis van Aken. Lysbeth Piersins may have belonged to the Pierson family later found in the Netherlands and the Pearson family of England. vdZ.

Offer, 535-37; Mart. Mir. D 105, E 502; Verheyden, Gent, 17, No. 33; ML I, 552.

Lysbeth Bouwes and Lysbeth Diricxdochter participated in the revolt at the Oldeklooster (q.v.) in the Dutch province of Friesland; they were arrested and brought to Leeuwarden on April 7, 1535, where on April 14, 1535, they were sentenced to death by drowning. vdZ.

K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 229.

Lysbeth Dirksdochter, an Anabaptist martyr: see Elisabeth Dirks.

Lysbeth Hermansdochter, a native of the bishopric of Münster, Germany, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned on Jan. 31, 1539, at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland. She declared that her first baptism was false and regretted having not yet received (re)baptism. She was probably a Davidjorist (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749.) vdZ.

Lysbeth Jansdochter, an Anabaptist martyr from Benschop, Dutch province of Utrecht, probably a sister of Adriana Jans (q.v.), was drowned on May 15, 1535, at Amsterdam with six other women. They were in prison already on March 1 of that year. (Mart. Mir. D 413, E 764; Mellink, Wederdopers, 144.) vdZ.

Lysbeth Smeets, an Anabaptist martyr, who was drowned on March 16, 1535, in the Scheldt River at Antwerp. Her husband Mattheus Sauvaige had been put to death as an Anabaptist on March 3 of the same year. Particulars are lacking. Mattheus and Lysbeth are among the first Anabaptist martyrs of Antwerp. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 319; XIV, 12 f., No. 139.) vdZ.

Lysbeth Somerhuys of Deventer, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on June 16, 1571, at Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel, together with her sister Catharina and others. For particulars see Catharina Somerhuys. vdZ.

Lysken (Lijsken, Lysken or Lynken Vermeulen, wife of Maerten van Wijk or Maerten Thomaessen), an Anabaptist martyr who was burned at the stake on May 5, 1571, at Antwerp, Belgium, with her husband and Gillis van Havere. Van Braght gives the date of execution as May 2, and states that Lysken was in prison for about one year. (Mart. Mir. D 506, E 846; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 53, 63; XIV, 76 f., No. 900.) vdZ.

Lysken, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Sept. 11, 1538, at Vught near 's Hertogenbosch in the Dutch province of North Brabant. Lysken and her husband, Jan Block of Gent, belonged to the small congregation of 's Hertogenbosch, of which Paulus van Drunen (q.v.) was the bishop. Eight members of this congregation were apprehended and, remaining steadfast, were burned at the stake at Vught on Sept. 10-11, 1538. Van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 41 f., E 447 f.) gives an account from an old manuscript which he received from Friesland. In the account of the trial and execution, van Braght mentions twelve martyrs but names only four of them (Paulus van Drunen, Jan Block, Michiel Stevensz, and Adriaen of The Hague), not including Lysken. vdZ.

Lysken (Lysken Luchtens or Lichtens), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on Oct. 6, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium, with Maeyken Goossens, Jenneken van den Velde, and Maeyken van Dissenbeke. Particulars are lacking except the information that Lysken was a native of Tongeren in the bishopric of Liége, Belgium. Lysken and her fellow martyrs are celebrated in a hymn, found in the Rotterdamsch Lied-Boeck: "Och vrienden al te samen, hoort" (Ye friends all together, hear). vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 664, E 983; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 130, 180; XIV, 92 f., No. 1039; ML II, 709.

Lysken, wife of Jan van de Walle, an Anabaptist martyr: see Calleken Meevels.

Lysken (Elisabeth) Dirks (Dirk Andries Dochter, Lisken Aerts, Aertssen), wife of Jeronimus Segersz, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned in the Scheldt River at Antwerp, Belgium, on Feb. 19, 1552, after she had given birth to her child in prison. The old record says, "Because of her heresies and because she has confessed to have been rebaptized she was sentenced to be put alive into a sack and to be drowned." Her husband had been burned at the stake at Augsburg on Sept. 2, 1551. The Offer des Heeren and later martyrbooks, including van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, have preserved a correspondence between Jeronimus and Lysken, while both were in prison. Jeronimus wrote eight letters to Lysken, Lysken three to Jeronimus. These letters give a striking testimony of her strong Biblical faith and a warm love to her husband. They are among the most moving pieces of martyr literature. By her faith Lysken comforted her husband and by singing devotional hymns she is said to have heartened and strengthened her fellow prisoners. Lysken and Jeronimus have been celebrated in a hymn, "God de Heere is getrouwe" (The Lord is faithful), found in the Offer des Heeren. vdZ.

Offer, 126-76; Mart. Mir. D 107-28, E 504-22; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 409, 416; XIV, 20 f., No. 215; Wolkan, Lieder, 66; DB 1864, 100; ML II, 635.

Lysken van Linschoten was lashed and expelled from the country upon orders by Duke Johann of Witgenstein, Germany, in 1601. (Mart. Mir. D 803, E 1103; ML II, 709.)

Lysken Pennaerts, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Feb. 21, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium, with Lynken Ghysseleers and Willem Huyberts. Particulars are lacking. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 107 f., 175; XIV, 90 f., No. 1015.) vdZ.

Lysken Smits, an Anabaptist martyr, who (according to Offer des Heeren and later Dutch martyrbooks, including van Braght, Mart. Mir.) was executed in 1560 at Antwerp, Belgium, by being drowned in a tub. Lysken Smits is likely identical with Elisabeth Christiaens (q.v.) (Kerstiaens), who according to the records was drowned in a tub at the Steen castle at Antwerp on March 16, 1560. The name of Lysken Smits is found in a hymn, "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. (Offer, 567, No. 69; Mart. Mir. D 270, E 640.) vdZ.

Maakal, Wolter Martens (ca. 1760-1846), was the last lay preacher of the congregation of Warns, Friesland, Netherlands, serving there in 1810-16. He was unmarried and had formerly been the captain of a ship. Some sermons which he used to read in the meetings have been preserved. (DB 1900, 40-46, 51-54, 57, 60 f.) vdZ.

Maarse (Maarsse, Maarsen), a Dutch Mennonite family of Aalsmeer, province of North Holland, found there from about 1700. Many members of this family were deacons of the various congregations found at Aalsmeer. A member of this family was Jan Maarse, b. 1886 at Amsterdam. He earned his doctorate in chemistry at the University of Amsterdam in 1913, served as a professor of chemistry 1914-30. During this time he began the study of theology at the University and the Mennonite Seminary of Amsterdam. Becoming a ministerial candidate in 1932, he served the congregations of Krommenie-Wormer-Jisp 1932-47 and Edam-Monnikendam 1947-51. In this year he retired. In 1936 he obtained his Th.D. degree (thesis: Een psychologische en zedekundige studie over de begrippen eer en eergevoel). Besides this and a number of papers in chemical and theological periodicals, he edited in 1939 and 1947, together with N. Westendorp Boerma (q.v.), two posthumous works of I. J. de Bussy (q.v.) and in 1955 a psychological-ethical study, Toorn, haat en zelfbeheersing (Anger, Hatred, and Self-control). vdZ.

Maarseveen, a former Mennonite church in the Dutch province of Utrecht. According to the report of a conference held at Haarlem in 1649 by the Frisians, High Germans, and Flemish congregations, the Maarseveen congregation belonged to this union. It has disappeared without a trace. (Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 330; II, 43; DB 1863, 101; ML II, 710.) vdZ.

Maartensdijk, Sint, a town on the island of Tholen, Dutch province of Zeeland. Mennonites living in Tholen in the early days met in a private house at Sint Maartensdijk; in 1647 Elder Jacques van Maldeghem (q.v.) of Aardenburg performed a marriage here. This troubled the Reformed church board of Sint Maartensdijk and caused the board in 1633-48 to make repeated complaints to the magistrates, which, however, seem to have been without result. It is not clear whether there was a Mennonite congregation at Sint Maartensdijk. At any rate nothing is known about this congregation. vdZ.

J. Was, "De Doopsgezinden op het eiland Tholen, voornamelijk te St-Maartensdijk in de XVIIe eeuw," in Jaarboek Zeeland, 1852, 35-50.

Maartje Medinx of Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, who is listed by Boomkamp as having been executed at Amsterdam on May 15, 1536. The list of persons executed at Amsterdam, however, does not name her. vdZ.

G. Boomkamp, Alkmaar en deszelfs Geschiedenis (Amsterdam, 1747) 92.

Maaslandsluis: see Maassluis.

Maassluis, a town in the Dutch province of South Holland, about 10 miles west of Rotterdam, where there was a Mennonite congregation in the 17th century, belonging to the Flemish branch. It was subsidized by the Rotterdam congregation in 1635; and at the delegates' meetings, both at Haarlem in 1649 and Leiden in 1660, it was reported to have a vacant pulpit. There was in the 17th century also a very small Waterlander congregation at Maassluis, of which however there is no further information. The Flemish congregation, which owned a simple meetinghouse, died out in 1691. In 1731 the neighboring church of Rotterdam received the sum of 183 guilders, which was the remnant of the possessions of the Maassluis Flemish congregation and administered until then by someone at Maassluis. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 330; K. Vos, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Rotterdam (Rotterdam, 1907) 13; De Zondagsbode XXXII (1918-19) No. 4.

Maastricht, capital (1951 pop. 80,000) of the Dutch province of Limburg (q.v.). The soil had been well prepared for the Anabaptist movement, for the city had been a center of the Beghards and Beguines (q.v.) in the Middle Ages.

As in the duchy of Jülich, there was in Maastricht a separatist brotherhood at least by 1527, which called itself the "Christian Brethren"; the arrest of a member is reported in that year. It is possible—Habets considers it very probable —that this was an Anabaptist group. In doctrine they were at least closely related to the Swiss Brethren. They avoided public church services, observed communion in its primitive form, and gathered to study the Bible; they did not make use of the courts. But there is no record that they practiced adult baptism. When they were noticed by the authorities they were accused of "Lutheran heresy"; this of course does not prove that they were Lutheran. They were more likely Sacramentists (q.v.). The brotherhood had a strong following in the guilds. Their leaders were Jan Berne, Merten Goltsmeth, Meess Droegescherer, Paes Tymermans, and Jan van Genck.

About 1530 there were Anabaptists in Maastricht. The group grew rapidly, numbering over 100 by 1533. It was visited in 1533 by Hendrik van Tongeren (also called Slachtscaep), a traveling Anabaptist preacher. In the same year Gys van Rotheim and other Anabaptist leaders from abroad visited the Anabaptist group at Maastricht, of which Jan Smeitgen (q.v.) and Ruth Ketelbueters were the leaders. Of greater importance to them was Henric Rol (q.v.), a preacher who had left Münster, and now led them, quietly and intelligently, as a "bishop." Though he worked very quietly, he did not escape the authorities. He was taken prisoner on September 2, 1534, and burned at the stake in Maastricht shortly after. Then Jan Smeitgen took his place. In January 1535 a severe persecution broke upon them, and 16 persons were executed. Only three of them, Lysken Ketelbueters, Bartholomeus van den Berge, and his wife Mente Jan Heynendochter, remained steadfast, and were burned at the stake; the other 13 recanted and were beheaded. The peaceful principles preached by Rol obviously were not maintained, since the Münsterite booklet Van der Wrake had been read during the meetings of the congregation. It is known that 54 fled, some of them to Antwerp (among them Jan Smeitgen), and the congregation became extinct, though there were some Anabaptists in the city later on. Jan van Bemelen was executed at Maastricht in 1538; Lenaert de Schoolmeester (q.v.) preached here in 1540 and the elder and martyr Theunis von Hastenrath (q.v.) baptized two women here before 1551. Van Braght names as martyrs from Maastricht Trijnken Keuts and Jan Durps, a weaver in 1559; Arent van Essen and his wife Ursel, and the aged Neeltgen and her daughter Trijnken in 1570. And in 1573 Marie Kerckhoffs, not named by van Braght, suffered martyrdom here.

Because of the mandate (Nov. 30, 1652) issued by Wolfgang Wilhelm, Duke of Jülich, the Mennonites found themselves compelled to leave the duchy. Some of them settled in Maastricht, where they more or less in concealment formed a brotherhood. The name of the congregation varied; sometimes it was known by the name of Maastricht, sometimes Burtscheid (Botschert), or Vaals. In Vaals, in the extreme southeast near the German border, there was a meetinghouse. The congregation was served by the following preachers: Pieter van Limburg ca. 1684-97, Jacobus van Hoorn ? -1710, Joannes Helgers 1711-d.1714, Pieter Staal 1747-87, Cornelis de Haan 1787-91, and Bernardus Cremer 1792-95. When the preacher Pieter Staal moved away from Burtscheid to Maastricht in 1768, the Burtscheid-Vaals group separated and soon expired. By 1795 the meetinghouse in Vaals was no longer in use. Nothing is known of a meetinghouse at Maastricht.

The congregation at Maastricht was also small. After 1795 it had no preacher. Their considerable capital was managed by a notary. In 1828 only one member was left. In 1864 the property was taken over by the Dutch government. All attempts to prevent the confiscation as well as later attempts to regain the property failed. The Mennonites now living in Maastricht have no connection with the earlier congregation and belong to the congregation of South Limburg (q.v.), also called Heerlen.

VDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 235, 1468 f.; II, Nos. 2073-88; II, 2, Nos. 259-60; DB 1861, 178-80; 1909, 122; Gedenkboek Ned. Herv. Gemeente Maastricht (1932) 9-18 and 379-85; Jos. Habets, De Wederdoopers te Maastricht ten tijde van Keizer Karel V. (1877); Rembert, Wiedertäufer; Monatshefte für rheinische Kirchengesch., 1914, 66; 1919, 60; L. Keller, Gesch. d. Wiedertäufer . . . zu Münster (Münster, 1880) 155 ff.; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik en vooral te Maastricht (The Hague, I, 1937; II, 1941); E. Crous, "Auf Mennos Spuren am Niederrhein," Der Mennonit IX (1956) 10; ML II, 710.

Maatschappij tot Nut van 't Algemeen, a Dutch association for the public welfare, usually called "Het Nut," was founded on Nov. 16, 1784, on a plan made by Jan Nieuwenhuizen, the pastor of the Mennonite Church of Monnikendam, and his son Martin Nieuwenhuizen, a physician at Edam. The objective of "Het Nut" was to promote education among the poorer classes by means of the publication of good but inexpensive books, and also to improve the school system and the education of youth. To this end independent chapters of the organization were founded in various places in the Netherlands under the leadership of the central management at Amsterdam. Article I of the first constitution of the association stated, "Everyone, of any rank or religion, wherever he may live, and at any time shall be eligible for membership on the Association and its chapters." This principle of toleration has been preserved to the present by the stipulation of Article II, "The Association strives to attain its goal independently of any ecclesiastical or political party."

In the first years of its existence the Association had a great influence on the improvement in instruction, especially by means of building model schools and publishing good schoolbooks. The first school law of 1806 incorporated to a large extent the principles that the Association had presented to the "National Convention" of 1796 as "General Thoughts Concerning National Education," and which were already practiced in their schools.

In 1791 the Association began its work in the field of libraries. The first library was opened in Haarlem. By 1956 the Association had 205 public libraries, in addition to 45 libraries for young people.

The Association also gave the impulse for the establishment of the first savings banks in 1817; the number of savings banks had grown to 133 by 1956.

Taking its work seriously, the Association has sought to extend its field of activity by paying an increasing amount of attention to social work. It also supports the promotion of preparatory and "continuation" instruction, guarantee of pension for kindergarten teachers, instruction in handicrafts, establishment of specialized libraries, arranging library reading, lectures, refining popular entertainments, physical exercise, sport, leasing of garden plots, founding of savings banks and people's banks.

In 1918 the Association created a professorship of pedagogy at the University of Amsterdam, with which is connected a seminar and an office for research in problems of organization and pedagogy. Since 1919 it has been publishing the periodical Volksontwikkeling.

The Association has about 300 chapters in the same number of localities. From the very beginning the Mennonites have taken a large interest in the activities of "Het Nut." Both in the head board and in the boards of the chapters Mennonites often were leading. H. Craandijk, now (1957) moderator of the A.D.S. (Dutch general Mennonite conference), is at the same time president of the Maatschappij tot

Nut van 't Algemeen. In 1927 it had 40,000 members. (Gedenkboek 1784-1934; Het Nut Nu, 1953; ML II, 102 f.) K.Ho.

Maatschoen, Gerardus (d. 1751), was an apothecary and in 1726-50 the preacher of the Zonist Mennonite congregation in Amsterdam. He is known for his Dutch translation of the Historia Christianorum, qui in Belgio Foederatione inter Protestantes Mennonitae appellantur (2 vv., 1723 and 1739) by Herman Schijn (q.v.), his friend and colleague. The translation—a previous one had been made by Matthys van Maurik—he completed with the addition of the foreword, notes, illustrations, and a third volume (Amsterdam, 1743-45). The title of Maatschoen's translation reads: Geschiedenis dier Christenen welke in de Vereenigde Nederlanden onder de Protestanten Mennoniten genaamt worden, and the third volume, composed by Maatschoen himself, is entitled Aanhangzel, Dienende tot een Vervolg of Derde Deel van de Geschiedenisse der Mennoniten; this contains 19 additional biographies and bibliographies of outstanding Dutch Mennonite ministers. Maatschoen also published Eeuwigdurende Gedagtenis der Rechtvaardigen (Amsterdam, 1728), a funeral sermon for Herman Schijn (q.v.), and Lyk-reden op Dirk Cornelisz (Amsterdam, n.d.-1741). Maatschoen was attacked by G. van Hemert (q.v.) in Brief aan G. Maatschoen (Middelburg, 1744), in which this Reformed pastor censured Maatschoen for denying the descent of the Mennonites from the Münsterites. The catalog of his library, "containing 278 pages," is evidence that he knew Mennonite history. C.K., vdZ.

M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schrijveren (Amsterdam, 1745) 65; Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 136; Glasius, Godgeleerd Nederland ('s Hertogenbosch, 1853) 423; N.N.B.Wb. VII, 829; DJ 1837, 100; DB 1891, 66; ML II, 710.

Mabé, a Dutch Mennonite family, apparently of Flemish descent, whose members lived particularly in Groningen and Haarlem, and belonged to the Groningen Old Flemish branch. Jan Jansz Mabé, of Groningen, who likely was a preacher, was present at a Flemish conference at Middelstum (q.v.) in 1628 (Groningsche Volksalmanak 1921, 103). At Haarlem, Evert Mabé was a preacher of the Groningen Old Flemish congregation from 1711 until his death about 1754; Pieter Mabé was a merchant or factory-owner, and in 1743-d.81 a preacher in the same congregation. Cornelis Mabé (1696-ca. 1760) was at first a preacher, then an elder of the Danzig Old Flemish group at Haarlem, as was his son Cornelis Mabé de Jonge 1753-ca. 58. In the 19th century some of the descendants of Cornelis Mabé served as deacons in the Haarlem Mennonite church. Femina Mabé (1784-1870), of Haarlem, was married to Samuel Muller (q.v.). vdZ.

Naamlijst 1731 ff.; DJ 1840, 40 ff.; DB 1879, 7; 1892, 94; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 677; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 65, 133.

Mabel Memorial Chapel is located three miles southeast of Harrisonburg, Va. It was built and endowed by Dr. Lucian Heneberger, a naval officer, as a memorial to his wife Mabel who had died many years before the building of the chapel in 1898. The congregation is a branch of the Harrisonburg Presbyterian Church. Moses Wenger, a Mennonite, donated the land for the church, school, and cemetery. This gift likely gave the Mennonites a right to hold services here once a month for the benefit of the Wenger, Good, and Landis families who lived near by. These services were discontinued in the 1920's. H.A.B.

McClusky (N.D.) Mennonite Brethren Church, a member of the M.B. Central District Conference, was organized in 1903 by Ludwig Seibel, who became the first pastor and served this congregation for 27 years. A small church was built in 1914 and later enlarged. Other ministers who have served for brief periods are John Siemens, Peter Wiens, David Fast, Herman D. Wiebe, LaVern Loewens, and G. W. Schroeder. Gothilf Winter, an ordained deacon, was the leader of the congregation at intermittent periods. The pastor in 1954 was Ernest T. Schafer, followed by Alvin Ysker, who was serving in 1956, with a membership of 22. A.A.D.

McCook County, in southeastern South Dakota, adjoins the two heavily Mennonite populated counties of Turner and Hutchinson. The one Mennonite church (GCM) in the county is located in Bridgewater. This town with population of less than 1,000 is an important trading center for Mennonites and has a number of business establishments operated by them. The total Mennonite population of the county is approximately 300, of whom less than 100 live in Bridgewater. J.D.U.

Maccovius (Makovski), Johannes (1588-1644), a Reformed theologian, came from Poland to Franeker in the Netherlands in 1613 as tutor of some young Polish noblemen who were students at the University of Franeker. In 1615 Maccovius was appointed professor of theology in this university. He was an ultra-orthodox follower of Calvin, who continually came into conflict with other Calvinistic theologians, and who at the Reformed synod held at Dordrecht in 1618-19 took a rigid attitude against all kinds of religious toleration. Maccovius attacked the Mennonites in a few writings, particularly in Proton Pseudos Anabaptistarum, a bitterly prejudiced book.

Maccovius was married three times; his first wife was Antje van Uylenburgh (d. 1634), a sister of Saskia van Uylenburgh, known as Rembrandt's (q.v.) wife. vdZ.

A. Kuyper, Joh. Maccovius (Leiden, 1899); N.N.B.Wb. IX, 637-39.

McDougal Flat United Missionary Church, located 3 miles west of Sundre, 27 miles west of Olds, Alta., was organized in 1934. Its membership in 1955 was 15, with G. W. Dedels as pastor. A new church is in process of building. G.W.D.

Machiels, Simon: see Simon Michielsz.

Machno, Nestor, commander of an army of anarchists in South Russia during the revolution of 1918-21, at a time when various Russian armies of divers political inclinations were contending for the possession of the Ukraine. Since this movement rejected every form of government (on their flags was the inscription: anarchy is the mother of all order), their hostility was directed not only toward the rightist parties, but also against the communists, who were not sufficiently radical. This army that at one time is supposed to have numbered 100,000 men was recruited chiefly from the ranks of the poor Russian peasantry. Every estate holder, industrialist, in short every owner of property, was considered an enemy of the working masses. They recognized only one verdict—execution.

This army, consisting almost exclusively of Russian peasants, naturally had a strong nationalistic attitude despite the fact that the contrary was maintained by their leaders. Thus a great gulf existed between these and the generally well-to-do Mennonite population, who had sympathized with the Germans during the occupation after 1917. This accounts for the severe suffering endured at the hands of the bandits by this group. When in the late summer of 1919 Batyko Machno (Little Father Machno, as his devoted adherents called him) broke through the army front of the loyalists with General Denikin near Umany in the Western Ukraine, he stormed with his horses back into the Ukraine. From Gulyay-Pole, his home, he directed the reign of terror as long as it was safe for him there. In this region there were wealthy Mennonite landowners on whose estates Machno in his youth had been a cattle herder. The Machno troops preferred to stay in the Mennonite villages, and stole great quantities of horses, wagons, produce, clothes, and whatever they could carry with them. Local bandits united with this army to take their share in the loot of furniture, agricultural machinery, etc. What they could not take away they simply destroyed.

All the Mennonite colonies which had the misfortune of being under the temporary yoke of Machno had very difficult experiences. The greatest sufferings, however, were experienced by the settlements Borzenkovo, Zagradovka, and Chortitza with its daughter settlement of Nicolaipol. Two hundred forty names appear on a list of November 1919 of those murdered in Zagradovka. In Borzenkovo in the village of Ebenfeld alone 63 persons were murdered, and in Steinbach of the same settlement 58 persons. The army stationed in the Chortitza settlement Sept. 21-Dec. 22, 1919 (the Mennonites had already left the island of Chortitza at this time), inflicted great suffering. There was hardly a village that was not mourning at least several who had been murdered by the band (see Chortitza). In the village of Eichendorf in the Nicolaipol settlement 81 men and 4 women were murdered during the night of Nov. 26, 1919. With the other villages, such as Hochfeld, Petersdorf, and Nicolaipol, the number murdered exceeds 100. It must be added, however, that the murders in the Nicolaipol settlement were committed mostly by local bands rather than the Machno army. The Self-Defense Corps (q.v., Selbstschutz), which had been organized and drilled by German occupation army officers before the withdrawal of the German troops, was ineffectual in a military sense and only provoked worse reprisals.

In addition to the violence committed by the Machno troops, an epidemic of typhus broke out among them affecting over half of the troops, including Machno himself. Since these troops were lodging in the Mennonite homes, scattering a vast amount of vermin, practically the entire adult population of the Chortitza settlement contracted the disease. As many as 11-15 per cent of the colony's population died. These were with few exceptions all adults.

The ideal Anarchists (the Russian noble Peter Kropotkin may be considered the father of Russian Anarchism) remained aloof from this movement and therefore it had no foundation upon which to build its future. The result was that it deteriorated into banditry such as Russian history had experienced in adventurers like Pugachev or Stenka Razin. Machno was frequently wounded in battle and finally fled to Rumania and from there to Poland. After a lengthy prison term in Warsaw, he was tried and condemned to death. Thus his career came to a violent end. According to other reports, however, he died in Paris, France. J.G.R.

P. Arschinow, The History of the Machno Movement, 1918-1921 (published by a "group of anarchists in Germany" in the Russian language, Berlin, 1923); Dirk Gora, Russian Dance of Death (Claremont, Cal., 1930); Gerhard Lohrenz, Sagradowka (Rosthern, Sask., 1947); C. Henry Smith, The Story of the Mennonites (Newton, 1950); Heinrich Toews, Eichenfeld-Dubowka (Karlsruhe, n.d.).

Machnovka is a town on the western edge of the province of Kiev in Russia and of significance to Mennonite history as the point of identification for the Deutsch-Michalin settlement, 1791-1874, which was located a few miles south of Machnovka. M.H.S.

Machnovka Mennonite Church (Polish Russia): see Michalin Mennonite Community and Church.

Machtelt Dieric Jansdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned in a wine cask on Aug. 26, 1539, at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, together with Marritgen Jansdochter from Deventer. Machtelt, who was apparently a follower of David Joris (q.v.), is said to have been a native of "Luynen uit het Sticht van Monster"; this may mean either Schelluinen near Monster, Dutch province of South Holland, or Löhne in the Bishophic of Münster, Westphalia, Germany. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749; De Navorscher X, 1860, 349.) vdZ.

McGlothlin, William Joseph (1867-1933), an outstanding American Baptist church historian, was born in Sumner County, Tenn., served as professor of church history in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in Louisville, Ky., and from 1919 until his death as president of Furman University. In addition to his studies on the history of the Baptists in the United States his research extended to the Anabaptists of the 16th century. One of the fruits of this work was his doctoral dissertation (University of Berlin) on the origins of the Anabaptist movement in Bern, Switzerland. He found an abundance of material in the archives of Strasbourg, Basel, Bern, Zürich, and St. Gall, and in the research done by Ernst Müller (q.v.), who had been the first to use this material in his book Geschichte der bernischen Täufer, and was able to add to the information in this book. The last two chapters of McGlothlin's work were published as his thesis under the title, Die Berner Täufer bis 1532. Under the same title the entire work was published in 1906. He also wrote articles on the 16th-century Anabaptists for Hastings' Dictionary of Religion and Ethics. In 1915 he published the book Infant Baptism in History. He died on May 28, 1933, as the result of an automobile accident. (ML III, 64.) HEGE.

Mack, Alexander, Sr. (1679-1735), chief founder of the Church of the Brethren, eighth child of Johann Philipp and Christina Philbrunn Mack, was born July 27, 1679, in a mill on Bergstrasse in Schriesheim, near Heidelberg, then in the Palatinate (now Baden), Germany. He married Margaretha Kling, a daughter of Velten Kling, a councilor of Schriesheim, on Jan. 18, 1701. The Macks had three sons and two daughters. The daughters died in Germany and one record says the mother also died there. The sons, John Valentine, Johannes, and Alexander, Jr., came to America with their father in 1729. Alexander Mack, Jr. (1712-1803), served the early Brethren church in Pennsylvania as minister for over 50 years.

Mack grew up in the Calvinist faith and was Reformed until about 1705, when he came to know some Baptists and Hochmann of Hohenau. With Hochmann he did some preaching along the Rhine and in Switzerland. In 1708 with seven others he founded at Schwarzenau, Wittgenstein, then in Hesse, the "Brüder Gemeinde," which was the beginning of the Church of the Brethren. He lived in Schriesheim until the fall of 1706, when he was expelled on account of his faith and fled with his family to Schwarzenau in Wittgenstein, where he lived until 1720. Then because of persecution he led most of the group from Schwarzenau to Westerveen, Dutch province of Friesland, a hamlet in the neighborhood of Surhuisterveen (q.v.). Here they stayed 1720-29, and from here went to Germantown, Pa., to join the group of Brethren who had emigrated from Crefeld to Germantown in 1719 under the leadership of Peter Becker. Mack died at Germantown on Jan. 31, 1735, and was buried in Axe's burial ground at that place. In 1894 his remains were moved to the cemetery just behind the Germantown Church of the Brethren, 6611 Germantown Ave., Philadelphia, Pa.

During his stay in the Netherlands a few Dutch Mennonites, including some members of the de Koker (q.v.) family of Rotterdam, were won to ideas of Mack, who baptized them by immersion. This sympathy, however, seems to have been only temporary, for they did not join the Brethren emigration to the States.

Mack's writings consist largely of answers to questions about his faith. A Conversation between Father and Son, and Ground Searching Questions. L.W.SH.

James Quinter, "Memoir of Alexander Mack, Senior" in Brethren Encyclopedia, 7-14 (published by Henry Kurtz, Columbiana, Ohio, 1867); Freeman Ankrum, Alexander Mack the Tunker and His Descendants (Scottdale, 1943); H. Brunn, "Alexander Mack, The Tunker," in L. W. Shultz, Schwarzenau Where the Brethren Began in Europe (Milford, Ind., 1954); Martin G. Brumbaugh, A History of the German Baptist Brethren in Europe and America (Elgin, Ill., 1906).

Mack, Andreas (Andrew) (1836-1917), a prominent leader in the Franconia Mennonite Conference (MC), the son of Jesse M. Mack and Susanna Stauffer, was born Oct. 16, 1836, in the Bally district of Berks Co., Pa., where he lived all his life. His family of six children included a bishop, Noah H. Mack (q.v.) of New Holland, Pa., and a preacher, Jesse, of Providence-Skippack. He was ordained preacher at Bally on Sept. 25, 1863, and, by the unanimous consent of the district, was ordained bishop on Nov. 6, 1875. He was a man of sterling character, a born leader of men, and a successful farmer. He favored missions before the Franconia Conference did, and approved the organizing of the Mennonite General Conference, even though the majority of his conference did not. He aided in the 1874 Russian immigration to Kansas, and followed the fortunes of this group with interest for his entire life. He was moderator of the Franconia Conference for many years while the German-English transition was occurring and also the transition from no missions to the organization of the Franconia Mennonite Mission Board in the year of his death. He was probably the strongest leader of his day in the Conference. He died Oct. 29, 1917. I.D.L.

John C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Scottdale, 1938).

Mack, Noah H. (1861-1948), an outstanding leader in the Lancaster Conference (MC), born at Niantic, near Bally, Pa., on Feb. 1, 1861, was a son of Bishop Andreas Mack and Elizabeth P. Haldeman. He grew up in the Bally community and was baptized in the Hereford (MC) congregation in Bally. In 1881 he came to Lancaster County to teach school. Early he associated himself with the Sunday schools of Groffdale and Metzler and mission work on the Welsh Mountain, of which he was superintendent 1899-1910. He was married on Dec. 23, 1882, to Elizabeth S. Sensenig Weber. There were no children. Mack was ordained preacher for the Groffdale-Metzler district on Aug. 30, 1900, and assistant bishop for this district on Jan. 23, 1919. By his own request he was transferred to the York-Adams district in 1926, although he continued to live in New Holland. He was a charter member of the Eastern Board of Missions and Charities, a member of the Examining Committee of that Board, and for a time secretary of the Lancaster Conference. He was very active in many aspects of church life. He died Oct. 31, 1948; he was buried at Groffdale. I.D.L.

J. Paul Graybill, Ira D. Landis, and J. Paul Sauder, Noah H. Mack, His Life and Times, 1861-1948 (n.p., n.d.).

Mackinaw, one of the nine original congregations of Amish Mennonites in central Illinois, along the Mackinaw River in southern Woodford County. In the 1830's Amish families settled along the river. As more settlers located in this area it became known as the "Mackinaw Meeting." In 1840 Christian Ropp was ordained preacher and in 1846 bishop of this congregation. The church was one of those that participated in the General Amish Conference (Diener-Versammlungen, q.v.). Later the congregation became part of the Amish Mennonite movement which organized the Western District Amish

Mennonite Conference. After 1872 the southern portion of the Mackinaw Meeting began to use the old church of the Rock Creek congregation, while the other portion continued meeting in homes. This led to the creation of two congregations, Roanoke (q.v.) and Goodfield, both later members of the Illinois (MC) Conference. M.G.

H. F. Weber, Centennial History of the Mennonites of Illinois 1829-1929 (Goshen, 1931).

McKinley Mennonite Church (GCM) in McKinley, near Mio, Oscoda Co., Mich., is a mission sponsored by the Central Mennonite Conference Board of Home and Foreign Missions. In 1951 the chapel was built to strengthen the work that had been started a few years previously by the Comins (q.v.) church. Lowell Troyer became pastor of the mission in 1951. M.G.

McLean County, Ill., is the largest county in the state and ranks as one of the four leading agricultural counties in the United States. It is located in the north-central part of Illinois. Bloomington is the county seat. Most of the land is of the rich prairie type, broken only here and there by the more rolling wooded sections along the streams. Leading agricultural products are corn and soybeans as cash crops, besides dairying. The first Mennonite (Amish from Ohio, Alsace, etc.) immigrations to this section began about 1829, but did not reach sizable proportions until about 1850. Mennonites settled entirely in the northern and western parts of the county, except for one small settlement in the eastern part near Anchor, which has since largely disintegrated. The northern and western settlements extend also into Livingston, Woodford, and Tazewell counties. Total Mennonite population of the county is approximately 900, almost all of whom belong to the Central Conference, now a district of the General Conference Mennonite Church. Mennonite congregations in the county are Meadows, Carlock, Normal, and North Danvers, with about 800 members. Mennonite institutions are the Mennonite Hospital (q.v.) in Bloomington, and the Meadows Mennonite Home (for the Aged) (q.v.) at Meadows.

Peter Maurer, the first Mennonite settler in Illinois, located in McLean County in 1829, near Rock Creek, five miles north of Danvers. The major migration to the area came in 1832-50. However, the first two congregations, organized in 1833 and 1836, were both located across the border in Woodford County. The first congregation organizing in McLean County was the Rock Creek or Yoder Mennonite Church, organized in 1851 (meetinghouse 1853). From this church, later called North Danvers, three other congregations developed—South Danvers (1859), East White Oak (1892), and Carlock (1914). The Meadows Mennonite Church (1892) and the Anchor Mennonite Church (1894, dissolved 1953) on the far north and far east borders of the county had other origins. A mission congregation and also a bookstore were established in Bloomington in 1956 by the Mennonite (MC) Church. R.L.H.

W. B. Weaver, History of the Central Conference Mennonite Church (Danvers, 1926).

McMillan Hutterite Bruderhof near Caley, Alberta, was founded in 1937 by members of the Big Ben Bruderhof near Wolford, Alberta. Their preachers are Jakob Wipf, chosen in 1921, and Samuel Kleinsasser, chosen in 1939. In 1947 the colony numbered 145 souls with 58 baptized members. D.D.

McMinnville, Yamhill County (Ore.), Old Order Amish settlement, located near McMinnville, consisting of 60 members, dates back to 1895, when the families of David Schrock, Amos Schrock, Tobias T. Yoder, Joseph Christner, and Jacob K. Miller moved there from the neighborhood of Hubbard, Marion Co., Ore. The congregation was organized in 1896 with Tobias Yoder as bishop and David Yoder as minister. Other ordained men who have served the congregation are David Y. Miller, Daniel E. Miller, David D. Schlabach, and Daniel Coblentz. The settlement died out twice, 1904-6 and 1927-28, but was reorganized in both cases. In 1955 the membership was 35, with Menno Swartzentruber serving as bishop and Samuel Weaver as minister. D.E.M.

McPherson, the county seat of McPherson County, Kan., was founded in 1872. It became a trading center for the Mennonites who settled in the county (q.v.) in the early 1870's. From 1898 to 1905 the German Department of McPherson College operated by the Church of the Brethren was staffed by the Mennonite Brethren in return for the use of the college facilities by Mennonite Brethren students, 249 of them attending the college in this period. This experience later led to the founding of Tabor College (q.v.) in Hillsboro.

W. J. Krehbiel (GCM), the son of J. J. Krehbiel of Newton, Kan., bought the McPherson Daily Republican in 1899 and operated it until 1944. His son Kenneth has since taken over this publication. In 1906 John J. Wall and Herman Rogalsky, who had operated a mill in Buhler since 1897, founded the Wall-Rogalsky Milling Company in McPherson, transferring their interests from Buhler. This concern was still doing business in 1957. The First Mennonite Church (GCM) is the only Mennonite church in the city limits. It was at first a home mission project of the Western District Conference and was organized as a church on July 29, 1945. In 1955 it reported 142 members. Pastors have been Roland P. Goering and Henry Goossen. The church building was dedicated Oct. 30, 1949. J.F.S.

Louis R. and Harold M. Regier, "The Buhler Mill and Elevator Company," Menn. Life VIII (April 1953) 82; H. P. Peters, History and Development of Education Among the Mennonites in Kansas (Hillsboro, 1925); W. J. Krehbiel, History of One Branch of the Krehbiel Family (McPherson, 1950).

McPherson County, Kan., is located immediately south and east of the center of Kansas. This county of 895 square miles was organized in 1870. A year later the first Mennonites (MC) arrived from Elkhart Co., Ind., settling in the southeastern part of the county. In December 1872 Bishop Henry Yother of Nebraska held communion services with the group in McPherson County, which became the West Liberty congregation near Windom and the Spring Valley congregation near Canton. The total membership was 163 in 1955.

The Mennonite migration from Russia in 1873 ff. resulted in several settlements in the eastern and southeastern areas of the county. General Conference Mennonite congregations established at this time were Friedenstal near Roxbury, Emmanuel south of Canton, Hopefield-Eden west of Moundridge, Christian immediately south of Moundridge, Hoffnungsau southeast of Inman, and Bethel south of Inman.

In the early 1880's the John Holdeman family moved to McPherson County from Missouri and promoted among the Polish Mennonite settlers between Canton and Moundridge the new group which he had founded in 1859, the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite. The result was the establishment of the Meridian congregation east of Moundridge, and the Lonetree congregation north of Moundridge. The Zion church at Inman is also of this group. The total membership of these three congregations in 1955 was 885. In the last decade Mercy Hospital has been established in Moundridge by the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite.

The Zoar Mennonite Church southwest of Inman was established by the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren group when the General Conference group established the congregations named above. In 1955 it had 335 members. The Zoar church established the Zoar Academy and Bible School in 1915, maintaining it until it was discontinued soon after World War II.

Present General Conference churches in McPherson County include Eden, Hopefield, West Zion, First of Christian, and Emmanuel, all of Moundridge; Inman, Hoffnungsau, and Bethel, of Inman, First of McPherson, and Friedenstal near Roxbury, with a total of 2,625 members. Of a total population of 23,670 in the county in 1950 more than one fifth were Mennonites, most of whom lived in the southeastern half of the county, and the total Mennonite membership of all branches was 4,005. J.F.S.

McRoberts, Samuel (1868-1947), a leading American banker, who was the key figure in the coming of the Canadian Mennonites to Paraguay in 1926-27. Born in Malta Road, Mo., Dec. 20, 1868, his education completed with B.A. and M.A. degrees from Baker University (1891, 1894) and an L.B. from the University of Michigan (1893), he entered into the banking business in 1909 as vice-president of the National City Bank of New York (1909-19), continuing as president of the Metropolitan Trust Company of New York (1921-25) and chairman of the Board of the Chatham-Phenix National Bank of New York (1925-32). During World War I he was chief of the division of procurement of the Ordnance Department of the United States Army and was made Brigadier General on Aug. 26, 1918, hence was commonly called General McRoberts. He died Sept. 9, 1947.

McRoberts was enlisted to help the Mennonites by a visit in 1919 of a committee of four from the Old Colony settlement near Hague, Sask., who must have learned of him through a Canadian banker friend. He refused aid but was won for the Mennonite cause by his wife (Harriet Skinner), a devout Christian, Fundamentalist, daughter of a Presbyterian minister, who was convinced the Mennonites were outstanding Christians fighting God's battle in an unbelieving world, and therefore should be helped. With characteristic thoroughness McRoberts undertook the Mennonite case and became the chief promoter and financier (losing a considerable amount in the course of time) of the Canadian colonization in the Paraguayan Chaco, operating through the Intercontinental Land Company (organized in 1925; q.v.) and the Corporación Paraguaya (organized in 1926; q.v.). Details of McRoberts' operations are given in the articles on the above two corporations. McRoberts engaged Fred Engen (q.v.), an experienced land agent, who studied a wide range of locations throughout the world (Manchuria, Africa, Mexico, South America), keeping in mind the Mennonite terms, which were complete freedom of religion, language, and schools, military exemption, local autonomy, good soil, and isolation from the world. They decided on Argentina, but soon discovered that Argentina refused the Mennonite terms. An accidental meeting with president-elect Gondra of Paraguay en route to Argentina led ultimately to the choice of the Chaco for the Mennonite colonization project. McRoberts personally negotiated with Paraguayan government and civic leaders for the Mennonite privileges. He also persuaded the Catholic authorities, including the papal nuncio and the archbishop, to approve the project.

Without this personal intervention of McRoberts the Mennonite colonization (first Menno Colony in 1926, and later Fernheim, and other Russian Mennonite colonies 1930 ff.) would probably never have been established. H.S.B.

John Bender, "Paraguay Calling," Part II, "The Mennonite Colonies in Paraguay," pp. 9-35, gives further details of McRoberts' activities. (Copy in GCL.)

Macungie Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church in Macungie, a town in Lehigh County, Pa., seven miles southweast of Allentown, was founded in 1902. In 1956 it had 27 members and was part of a circuit with Zionsville and Emmaus, of which W. W. Hartman was the pastor. H.S.B.

Madera County, Cal. (pop. 36,904), is located in the central part of the San Joaquin Valley. The county seat and principal city of 14,000 (1953 estimate) carries the county's name and is known as the gateway to Yosemite National Park.

The Mennonite population of Madera County is made up of approximately 15 families, mostly rural, and almost entirely Mennonite Brethren, with several G.C.M. families who attend the M.B. services. The M.B. congregation is the only Mennonite institution in the county, having 34 members.

The first Mennonite congregation (GCM) in Madera County was organized in 1914. The Co-operative Land Company built a church for it in the Mennonite community 10 miles northwest of Madera, which was taken over by the Mennonite Brethren in 1919, who finished paying for the church property. During the first few years of settlement, the General Conference group largely moved away because of poor economic conditions. The present Mennonites are predominantly cotton and dairy farmers, with some working for wages in the city of Madera. Several families of Mennonite origin attend the Baptist and Assembly of God churches in Madera.

Economic opportunities for the Madera County Mennonites are relatively limited, and prospects for the future, as has always been the case, are not too encouraging. Over the years, many young people have left the county in search of a more favorable economy. L.R.J.

Madera Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Madera Co., Cal., formerly the Fairmead Mennonite Brethren Church, is a member of the Pacific District Mennonite Brethren Conference. It changed its name when the town and post office of Fairmead were discontinued. The church was organized with Cornelius Wittenberg as pastor when a number of Mennonite Brethren families from Russia settled in the district in 1911-12. Together with General Conference Mennonites they erected a temporary church building, but the group dissolved when the settlers were unable to meet payments on the land they had purchased. On Oct. 19, 1919, they reorganized with Peter Wall as leader and reopened the church. Bernard Wall, a brother of Peter Wall, served the church as leader for 25 years, from 1928 until his retirement in 1953. The membership rose to 36 in 1924, but later declined to about 20. On Nov. 5, 1939, a new church building was dedicated. In 1954 the membership was 34, with Jacob R. Quiring as pastor. I.G.N.

Madison and Union County (Ohio) Amish Community. The present (1954) Old Order Amish settlement of three districts and 267 baptized members near Plain City dates back to 1896. Amish Mennonites who lived in Champaign County traveled through Madison County en route to their former home in Holmes County. They told of the opportunity, the fertile black land, and of the attractiveness of the Darby Plains in Madison County. The Amish among the hills of Holmes County became interested, and the three men who first investigated the possibilities for settlement in 1885 in Madison were Mose Slabaugh, J. J. Miller, and Benjamin Frey. The first permanent Amish settlers, J. J. Miller, Moses M. Kaufman, Eli J. Miller, Dan J. Miller, Moses Slabauch, David Farmwald, and Albert Spesinger, moved there in the spring of 1896. The first ordained men came in 1897; they were Benjamin Frey, a deacon of Holmes County, and Benjamin Troyer, a preacher from Kansas. Other settlers in 1887 were Moses Hostetler, Pete J. Kramer, John Hostetler of Holmes County; Jonas Gingerich from Geauga Co., Ohio; David Kauffman and John Troyer from Kansas.

Ministers from Holmes County came to preach for the group about every four weeks, until the ordained members, Frey and Troyer, took regular charge in 1897. In 1898 Eli P. Beachy was ordained minister, and in 1899 Jacob Farmwald. In 1900 Bishop C. S. Beachy with Preacher Christ Swartzendruber of Virginia moved to Madison County. In 1904 Preacher Moses Troyer from Geauga County moved to Madison County.

By 1904 the settlement had grown considerably, and with the influx of ministers it was thought best to divide the settlement into two church districts, North and South. In 1906 Moses Miller was ordained bishop in charge of the South district, while C. S. Beachy had charge of the North. In 1925 the North district was divided again, this time forming the East and West districts. Bishop C. S. Beachy had charge of both the East and West districts until 1930, when Jacob Farmwald was ordained bishop for the East district. Succeeding and present (1954) bishops in charge of the three districts (242 members) are John Plank and Noah L. Troyer.

Beginning in 1916 a few of the Amish here transferred their membership to the Oak Grove Mennonite Church (MC) at West Liberty, Ohio. During the early twenties a considerable number of Amish did this. At the request of the group Bishop S. E. Allgyer of West Liberty in 1924 came to Plain City for the first preaching service, which was held in the home of John B. Yoder. With the increasing demand for services at Plain City a Sunday school was organized on July 11, 1926, in an old abandoned church building at Resaca until the Sharon Mennonite (MC) congregation was organized in 1933, when Abram Kaufman was ordained minister. Sharon (q.v.) had 179 members in 1954.

During the years of gradual transition from the Amish to the Mennonite, the Amish worked out an agreement with S. E. Allgyer concerning the transfer of memberships. Amish persons who were expelled from the church were received by the Mennonite church upon confession of faith. The Amish agreed to lift the ban (Meidung) upon Amish expelled members after they were received into the Mennonite church.

On Oct. 8, 1939, under the leadership of Bishop M. M. Beachy of Salisbury, Pa., the Canaan Amish Mennonite congregation was organized (Beachy Amish). Emery Yutzy and Robert M. Kauffman were ordained to serve that congregation, which had a membership of 52 in 1954.

On Sept. 10, 1944, the United Bethel Conservative Amish Mennonite Church was organized by Elmer Swartzendruber, who had ordained Andrew Farmwald to the ministry. The 1954 membership was 140.

Thus the total Madison-Union County community of Amish background in 1954 had 613 members in 6 congregations of 4 distinct groups.

J.A.H.

John E. Beachy, "History of the Sharon Mennonite Church," Christian Monitor, November 1948, 342.

Madlinger, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr of Häflingen in the canton of Basel (q.v.), Switzerland, and his wealthy brother Ulrich, were among the first Anabaptists in Basel. Hans probably took part in the third disputation in Basel on Dec. 29, 1529, was arrested, "lay in prison over ten weeks and also had to suffer torture until he recanted" in 1530. But he returned to the Anabaptists and in December 1530 recanted a second time. In January 1531 he was arrested again as a backslider, was submerged three times, and because he would not leave the country, was drowned in a brook at the Homburg castle on Feb. 10, 1531, with Peter Linggscher (q.v.). Both Hans and Ulrich (Uli) were peasants. NEFF.

P. Burckhardt, Die Basler Täufer . . . (Basel, 1898) 30-41; Paul Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer in der Reformationszeit (Karlsruhe, 1954) 52, 53, 70, 132, Nos. 520-22; ML II, 711.

Madschidl, Michael: see Matschidl.

Maelbouts: Pieryntgen, an Anabaptist martyr: see Pieryntgen (van Male).

Maeren (Maren), Hendrik van (Hinrich or Heyndrick van Goch), a former Catholic priest who became an active Sacramentist (q.v.) preacher at Warendorf, Westphalia, Germany, in the summer of 1533. On Jan. 5, 1534, he joined the Anabaptists by baptism at Münster (q.v.) together with Rothmann, Rol, Stapraet, and other Münster preachers. Then he again was active at Warendorf, baptizing a number of persons, with whom he went to Münster on Feb. 17, 1534. In October he was one of the apostles sent out to convert the world, but a few days after leaving Münster he was arrested at Soest, Westphalia, and beheaded there on Oct. 23, together with Dusentschuer, Slachtscaep, and five others. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 22, 26-28, 48 f., 85.) vdZ.

Maerten (Martin) Bossier, an Anabaptist marytr, arrested in 1558 at Wervik in Flanders, Belgium, and burned at the stake, apparently also in Wervik. Particulars are lacking. (Mart. Mir. D 200, E 582; ML I, 249.) O.H., vdZ.

Maerten Cornelisz (Marten de Schoenmaker), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at The Hague, Holland, on July 7, 1558, with Waechlink Dirks (Walig Dirk Luytgensz) and Adriaen Pietersz (Adriaen Pier Trappers). All three were natives of Winkel, Dutch province of North Holland. Particulars about these martyrs are lacking. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 391, 744 f.; Mart. Mir. D 202, E 583.) vdZ.

Maerten van Delft, an Anabaptist martyr: see Maerten Jansz (Corendrager).

Maerten Dirksz, of Limmen near Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on April 25, 1534, at The Hague or at Haarlem in the Netherlands. He had been with the Anabaptists who sailed from North Holland on March 24, 1534, en route to Münster (q.v.), but was arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; DB 1917, 121, No. 138.) vdZ.

Maerten Jansz (Jansen) Corendrager (Maerten van Delft), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, on Feb. 5, 1572, with Jan Hendriksz (Jan Hendricksen, q.v.). Their death was commemorated in the song "Verhoort ons droevich claghen, o Heer in dese noot" (Hear, O Lord, our sad complaint in this distress). Both this hymn, found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, and also the detailed account found in the Dutch martyrbooks of 1615 and later, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, give substantial information about these two martyrs, who had to endure many cruelties and died loyal, Maerten Jansz with the words, "O Lord, be merciful to me, poor sinner, who am not worthy to suffer for Thy name; but Thou hast made me worthy." Maerten Jansz was a citizen of Delft, a grain porter (hence the name) of the market place. The official sentence of these martyrs is found in the Martyrs' Mirror. (Offer, 658-62; Mart. Mir. D 606 f., E 931; ML II, 549.) NEFF, vdZ.

Maerten Karrettier, an Anabaptist martyr of Bousbecque (Busbeke), put to death for his faith in 1570 at Rijssel (Lille) in France. Particulars are lacking. (Mart. Mir. D 509, E 848; ML II, 468.)

Maerten Luykensz (Luycx), of Beveren in Flanders, Belgium, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded on June 4, 1539, at Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland. Particulars are lacking; according to Mellink, Maerten was an adherent of David Joris (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 748; DB 1909, 22; Mellink, Wederdopers, 173.) vdZ.

Maerten Pieters, an Anabaptist martyr from Maasland, near Den Briel, was beheaded at Den Briel (Brielle) on the Maas, Dutch Province of South Holland, on June 25, 1569, with Grietgen Jans. (Mart. Mir. D 388, E 740; ML III, 372.) NEFF, vdZ.

Maerten Saey-Wever, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, with some other martyrs on Jan. 30, 1557. His name is found in hymn No. 16, "Aenhoort, Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father) of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. His official name was Maerten (Martin) van Steertegem; he was a native of Wervik in Flanders and a weaver of serge. He left behind some furniture, which was confiscated. vdZ.

Offer, 564; Mart. Mir. D 184, E 568; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 433, 437, 469; XIV, 22 f., No. 240; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72.

Maerten Schoenmaker: see Marten Cornelisz.

Maerten van der Straten: see Martin van der Straten.

Maerten de Wael (official name Martin le Josne), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on May 22, 1557. His wife, Claerken Boucquet (q.v.), suffered martyrdom at Antwerp on July 6 of the same year. Maerten was a native of Douai in France. His name is found in the hymn "Aenhoort, Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. vdZ.

Offer, 564; Mart. Mir. D 185, E 569; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 434, 437; XIV, 22 f., No. 243; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72.

Maerten van Wijk(e) (Maerten Thomassen), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Feb. 26, 1571, together with Calleken Meeuwels and Jan van de Walle. Concerning this martyr van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror is incomplete and not quite accurate in stating that he was executed in 1570 (without exact date). The records published by Génard give a number of particulars. Maerten was a tailor, a native of Wijk bij Duurstede, Dutch province of Utrecht. He was 25 or 26 years of age; Hans Busschaert had baptized him four years previously at Antwerp one evening after dark. During his trial Maerten rejected infant baptism and refused to take an oath. He signed the trial with his name: Merten Thomassen. His marriage with Lysken (Calleken Meeuwels) had been performed in the Anabaptist congregation. (Mart. Mir. D 506, E 846; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 30, 42, 62; XIV, 76 f., No. 872.) vdZ.

Maertsz, Willem, a Dutch Mennonite preacher of Hoorn, who published Twaalf Predicatien over verscheyden Plaetsen der Heyliger Schriftuer (Hoorn, 1679). (Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 655 f.) vdZ.

Maes, Hans van der: see Hans Vermeersch.

Maes Sc(h)oenmaker: see Matthijs van Balk.

Maeyken, an aged Anabaptist martyr, "an honorable widow deserving double honor," was seized with five sisters of her faith at Antwerp, Belgium, and after steadfastly confessing her faith drowned on Oct. 11, 1559. (Mart. Mir. D 249, E 623, 639; ML II, 711; see also Oude Maeyken.) Neff.

Maeyken, 't Oude (Old Maeyken), an Anabaptist martyr: see Oude Maeyken.

Maeyken, an Anabaptist martyr, was taken prisoner with Hans van Munstdorp, his wife, and two other women, as they had met to hear the Word of God, and imprisoned at Antwerp, Belgium. In September 1573 Hans van Munstdorp was burned at the stake. Since his wife was pregnant, the four women were not delivered to the stake until Oct. 6, after "they had valiantly withstood the many terrible threats, the arguments of the worldly learned men and other means used against them." Their death is mourned in the song, "Och vrienden al te samen hoort," included in the Rotterdamsch Liedboek (now lost). This martyr is apparently identical with Maeyken Goossens (q.v.). (Mart. Mir. D 644, E 983; ML II, 711.) Neff, vdZ.

Maeyken van Aken: see Maeyken de Hont.

Maeyken Boosers, an Anabaptist martyr, a descendant of the Alard de Boosere family, magistrates of Doornik (Tournai, Belgium), was burned at the stake there, Sept. 18, 1564. A song written for her, "Die op den Heere betrouwen" (Those who trust in the Lord), is found in Offer and later martyrbooks. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror prints seven short letters written to her parents, children, brothers and sisters, that testify to her clear religious understanding, her strong faith, and her great joy in suffering and dying for her conviction. During her trial Maeyken was disrobed and tortured to compel her to name her fellow believers; the attempt was futile. The 1566 edition of Offer des Heeren also contains a short letter of her children to her, which, however, was not inserted in later editions; it is also missing in the Martyrs' Mirror. Maeyken's letters, and the one written by her children were published in a separate edition of 1566 (n.p.), together with Testament ghemaeckt by Jan Gheertsen. This short letter was published by Cramer in BRN II (Offer des Heeren) 626. Maeyken Boosers, who was a wealthy woman and only twenty-four years old when she was executed wrote in a graceful style. On one of the visits of her children to her cell she gave her son a pear. The boy did not eat the pear, but saved it; it is now in Amsterdam. This son Hans (Jan) (b. 1559) escaped to Emden and attended the disputation with the Reformed in 1578. He lived at the "Groote Veen" near Oldersum, East Friesland, where he died on May 20, 1652. This is known through the van Geuns family, which is descended from the de Boosers. K.V., vdZ.

Offer, 411-20; Mart. Mir. D 302 ff., E 667-69; Bibliographie I, 705-8;; DB 1898, 114-16; 1902, 168-70; 1906, 56, 64, 69, 79; Wolkan, Lieder, 68; ML I, 245.

Maeyken (Mayken) Cadts (Kats, de Catte), a daughter of Joos de Catte, an Anabaptist martyr of Wervik, Belgium, was seized on May 20, 1559, by the margrave of Antwerp with five other Anabaptist women and was drowned in the Steen castle after a courageous confession of faith on July 19 or 29, 1559 (not during the night of June 18 as related by van Braght). Maeyken and the five other women who were to die with her are celebrated in a hymn "Babels Raets Mandamenten worden aldus volbracht," found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (No. 19); her name is also found in hymn No. 16, "Aenhoort, Godt, hemelsche Vader." vdZ.

Offer, 566, 581 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 249, E 623; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 71 f.; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 3, 9; XIV, 26 f., No. 296; ML II, 475.

Maeyken (Mayken) Christiaens, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on April 30, 1569, at Antwerp, Belgium. The account in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror concerning this martyr, here only called Maeyken, is rather brief, but Génard published some particulars from the official records. Maeyken Christiaens was born about 1539 at Nypkerke (Nukerke, Nieppe) in Flanders; she was married to Willem de Clercq (Willem van Poperinghe, (q.v.), also of Nypkerke. Adriaen, a Mennonite elder, had performed the ceremony at Nypkerke in 1561. Their daughter of four years had not yet been baptized. Maeyken had received (re)baptism only one year before. She did not know the man who baptized her. The ceremony took place in a wood. Maeyken was apprehended with many other members of the congregation when a Mennonite meeting in the house of Jan Poote (q.v.) near Antwerp was surprised. She was tortured on March 5, but did not betray the names of her fellow members and died steadfast. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 661-64, E 979-82; Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 360, 376, 400; XIV, 64 f., No. 721; ML II, 711.

Maeyken (Mayken) de Corte (Korte), an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake (Mart. Mir. erroneously beheaded) with Grietge Bonaventuers and "old Maeyken" on Oct. 11, 1559, at Antwerp, Belgium. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror prints a letter she wrote, giving striking testimony to her strong Biblical faith and her joy in dying. She says her two sisters visited her and tried by all means to save her life; if she would only say she had erred; but she resisted, and would gladly seal her faith with death.

"I feel," she writes, "that the more I humble myself, the more the mighty God works in me, and pours His grace into me. Then I cry most bitterly, fall upon my knees, and thank my God, and say: O my Lord and God, what am I, child of Adam, that Thou art mindful of him, Thou hast given him dominion over all Thy works .... What shall we render unto Him, my dear sister, but a penitent and contrite heart, ... with love and great gratitude .... Let us love one another fervently, for God is love, and constantly exhort each other, lest we wax cold through the deceitfulness of sin; so that God may be glorified in us, and we may be delivered from pride, and from unreasonable and wicked men; for all men have not faith. The Lord is faithful; He will strengthen and keep us." Maeyken was a native of Gent, Belgium. She is commemorated in two hymns, "Babels Raets Mandamenten" and "'Aenhoort, Godt, hemelsche Vader," both found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren.

NEFF, VDZ.

Offer, 566, 581 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 249, E 623; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 71 f.; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 4, 10, 16; XIV, 26 f., No. 301; ML II, 553.

Maeyken Daniels (Mayken uyt Waes van Ghendt), an Anabaptist martyr, was strangled and burned at the stake on Feb. 21, 1559, at Middelburg in the Dutch province of Zeeland. Being a native of Roesselare in Flanders, Belgium, she was held in prison for a long period, while the magistrates of Middelburg sought information about her from the Roman Catholic priest of her native town. VDZ.

K. R. Pekelharing, "Bijdragen voor de Geschiedenis der Hervorming in Zeeland," in Archief Zeeuwsch Genootschap VI (1866) 38-40.

Maeyken van Deventer, an Anabaptist martyr, who is said to have been executed in Rotterdam, Dutch province of South Holland, in 1573 (Mart. Mir. D 657, E 977-79). This is, however, rather questionable (DB 1905, 173), for in 1573 Rotterdam was no longer in Spanish hands, and her bequest to her four children is almost identical with that of the martyr Anneken van Rotterdam (q.v.). (ML II, 432.) NEFF.

Maeyken Deynoots, an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Rijpermond (i.e., Rupelmonde, Belgium), in 1571. The method and exact date of execution are unknown. With Hendrik Verstralen (q.v.) she was imprisoned in the castle of Rupelmonde and chained with iron shackles. The Offer des Heeren (1578) and the later Dutch martyrbooks, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, contain short letters by Maeyken addressed to the congregation. They were farewell letters, in which she admonished them to remain steadfast in the faith. She was apparently acquainted with the writings of Menno Simons or Dirk Philips. Maeyken's letters had been published separately before they were included in the Offer des Heeren. (Offer, 646-48; Mart. Mir. D 548, E 880-82; DB 1899, 83; ML II, 432.) VDZ.

Maeyken van Dissenbeke, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Oct. 6, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium. Particulars about this martyr are lacking (Bibliographie II, No. 841). She may be identical with Maeyken Wens (q.v.). (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 130 f., 180; XIV, 92 f., No. 1040; DB 1904, 127 f.) VDZ.

Maeyken Doornaerts, an Anabaptist martyr, who with two other Anabaptist women was subjected to horrible torture and, still true to her faith, burned at the stake at Belle (Bailleul), Flanders, in 1556. (Mart. Mir. D 166, E 553; ML I, 467.) NEFF, Maeyken Filiers (Filgiers), an Anabaptist martyr: see Mariken Fransse.

Maeyken Floris (Flours), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Gent, Belgium, on Aug. 7, 1559. Van Braght's account, which follows the account in the Offer des Heeren, is incorrect. He states that Maeyken was executed with 11 comartyrs and does not relate the exact date of the execution. Maeyken was a native of Nukerke (Nypkerke, Nieppe) in Flanders. She was one of a group of 12 Mennonites whose stay had been reported to the magistrates by treachery, and who were all apprehended. Baudin (Baudynken), Maeyken's 12-year-old sister, was also examined; but notwithstanding the severe threats of the officers, she resolutely refused to reveal the place where her parents were staying. Of the group arrested four victims were burned on July 5, and six more, including Maeyken, on Aug. 7. Two members either escaped or abjured their faith. Maeyken died steadfast. The execution took place on the Vrijdagsmarkt at seven o'clock in the morning.

Maeyken and the other martyrs are commemorated in a hymn, "Ic moet een liet beginnen" (I must begin a song), No. 14 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren; this hymn is also found in the Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562. Another hymn, "Een eeuwighe vruecht, die nieten vergaet" (An eternal joy, which does not pass away), is found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1569. This hymn is more accurate than that of the Lietboecxken; it also gives the information that the group of 12 Mennonites was betrayed to the attorney-general of Gent by a Beguine, and that they were apprehended that very evening while they were eating together. VDZ.

Offer, 348, 556 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 246, E 620-22; Verheyden, Gent, 25, No. 67; ML I, 656.

Maeyken Goossens, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Oct. 6, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror names her twice, once with her full name, and once calling her only Maeyken, both times giving 1573 as the year of execution, once giving the exact date. The records published by Génard give the information that she had previously lived in the Dutch province of Zeeland, and that she was married to Hans van Obbergen, who is identical with Hans van Munstdorp (q.v.). VDZ.

Mart. Mir. D 644, E 965; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 130, 179; XIV, 92 f., No. 1038; ML II, 139.

Maeyken Groffelaers, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake with three other martyrs at Antwerp, Belgium, on May 26, 1573. She was a native of Brussels, had often attended the Mennonite meetings, but was not yet (re)baptized, though she would have liked to receive baptism upon her faith "if she had only had an opportunity." (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 115 f., 177; XIV, 90 f., No. 1025.) vdZ.

Maeyken de Hont (Hondt), an Anabaptist martyr, drowned in a tub or wine-cask on April 4, 1560, within the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, with Janneken Eghels (Janneken van Aken) and Lenaert Plovier. She was a daughter of Jan de Hont. In the Dutch martyrbooks, where no exact date of the execution is given, she is called Maeyken (Mayken) van Aken. Her name is found in the hymn "Aenhoort, Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father) of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (hymn No. 16). vdZ.

Offer, 567 f.; Mart. Mir. D 270, E 641; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 7, 12; XIV, 28 f., No. 317; ML II, 711.

Maeyken (Mayken) Jans, an Anabaptist martyr, the widow of Frans Laureysz, was burned at the stake in Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, in 1569 (probably May 2). She was a native of Middelburg and about 40 years of age. (DB 1908, 17; ML II, 390.) vdZ.

Maeyken Janssens van der Goes, an Anabaptist martyr, was a fellow captive of Abraham Picolet (q.v.) and his friend Hendrick van Etten (q.v.) of Breda, with whom she was burned at the stake in Antwerp, Nov. 22, 1569. Her husband Jasper de Taschringmaker (q.v.) had suffered a similar death on June 22. Her 18-year-old daughter Neelken (q.v.) (Nelleken) was also burned at the stake for her faith, on June 27, 1570. Maeyken was apparently a native of the town of Goes in the Dutch province of Zeeland. (Mart. Mir. D 475, E 818; Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 425, 453; XIV, 70 f., No. 792; ML II, 133.) K.V., vdZ.

Maeyken Kocx, an Anabaptist martyr, was seized at Ieper (Yperen), Flanders, Belgium, in 1561 with four others, and "loving God above all, and, out of love to Him, adhering to the truth known and accepted," she was publicly burned at the stake. Her name is celebrated in a hymn, "Geroert ben ick van binnen" (I am inwardly stirred), which is found in the Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562, as well as in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1563 (No. 23) and Tweede Liedeboeck of 1583. In this hymn she is called only Maeyken (Mayken). vdZ.

Offer, 603 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 285, E 654; Wackernagel, Lieder, 141; Wolkan, Lieder, 72; ML II, 519.

Maeyken Pickelin, an Anabaptist martyr, a simple, pious woman, who suffered a martyr's death in 1590 after much suffering. In his account van Braght (Mart. Mir.) does not relate particulars nor the place and exact date of her execution. Notwithstanding her Dutch Christian name it is unlikely that she was a native of the Netherlands. She may have been German and put to death in Germany. (Mart. Mir. D 777, E 1080; ML III, 371.) Neff, vdZ.

Maeyken Pieters, an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake at St. Veit in Luxembourg in 1585 together with Anneken Botson (q.v.) and her daughter Janneken Botson. (Mart. Mir. D 753, E 1060; ML III, 371.) Neff.

Maeyken Pieters, a Mennonite woman, wife of the martyr Willeboort Cornelisz (q.v.), was arrested on Jan 19, 1562, at Gent, Belgium, and imprisoned in the Gravesteen castle of Gent. Here she gave birth to a child, which immediately was baptized in a Catholic church. Maeyken, who had been arrested with many other Mennonites, a number of whom were put to death, was released during the riots which arose at Gent. Later, when the magistrates intended to rearrest her, she had fled. vdZ.

K. R. Pekelharing, "Bijdr. tot de Geschiedenis van de Hervorming in Zeeland," in Archief Zeeuwsch Genootschap VI (1866) 44-46.

Maeyken Sprincen, an Anabaptist martyr: see Oude Maeyken.

Maeyken Trams, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Brugge, Belgium, on Dec. 11, 1561. She was one of a group of members of the Brugge congregation who had been apprehended on Nov. 10, 1561, when they were holding a meeting in a house outside the town. Five of them suffered martyrdom on Dec. 10; the other seven, including Maeyken, were executed on the next day. These martyrs are celebrated in the hymn "Genade ende vrede moet Godvresende zijn" (Mercy and peace should be to the God-fearing), found in the Dutch hymnal Veelderhande Liedekens of 1569, reproduced by Wackernagel. This hymn has been the principal source for the account in the martyrbooks. In the records she is called Maykin, wife of Bertram de Raedt, born at Wynne in Flanders. In the index to the 1685 Dutch edition of van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror she is listed as Maeyken Frans, but this must be an error. (Mart. Mir. D 288, E 655; Verheyden, Brugge, 49, No. 38; Wackernagel, Lieder, 130.) vdZ.

Maeyken Truyens, an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Antwerp, Belgium, on Jan. 19, 1577, because she had been (re)baptized and frequented Mennonite meetings. Particulars about this martyr are lacking. With her Geertruyt Faes and Laureys Janssen suffered martyrdom. They were the last Mennonites to die in Antwerp. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 211; XIV, 98 f., No. 1121.) vdZ.

Maeyken Wens, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Oct. 6, 1573. The Dutch martyrbooks following the Historie der Martelaren of 1615 contain five letters by Maeyken, which are also found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. Two of these letters are addressed to her husband Mattheus Wens, two to her son Adriaen, and one to Jan de Metser, a preacher or a deacon of the congregation. These letters are among the most moving parts of the martyr literature, both in the firmness and purity of Maeyken's faith and in the care she shows for her children. "The Lord be forever praised for the great grace He has shown me, who have feared so much. My dear brother in the Lord, always watch, for the Lord will come like a thief in the night," she wrote to Jan de Metser after she had been sentenced to death. And to her husband: "O my very dear and beloved husband, pray to the Lord heartily in my behalf, to remove the conflict from me; for it is in His power, if it is His pleasure." To her son Adriaen, only 15 years old: "Write me a letter as to what your heart says, whether you desire to fear the Lord; this I should like to know. But you must write it better than the last two letters were written; the one which Maeyken Wils brought, however, was good." In the second letter to her son, a farewell letter of Oct. 5: "Adieu once more, my dear son Adriaen; ever be kind, I pray you, to your afflicted father all the days of your life, and do not grieve him. . . . I have written this since I was sentenced to die for the testimony of Jesus Christ."

Maeyken had been arrested in April 1573. She was imprisoned in the Steen castle of Antwerp, where her husband and her children sometimes visited her; they also wrote some letters. One of these letters, written by her husband, has been preserved, and is now found in the Amsterdam Mennonite archives. This rare piece is the more precious, because on the back of the paper is written Maeyken's farewell letter of Oct. 5 to her children, the only existing autograph letter of a martyr.

Maeyken was executed on the morning of Oct. 6, with a tongue screw to prevent her from addressing the crowd as martyrs often did. Her son Adriaen watched the execution, but when his mother was tied up to the stake he fainted. When he regained consciousness he looked for the tongue screw in the ashes where his mother had been burned, and took it as a memento of his mother.

There has been some question on the identity of this martyr. Since Génard did not find her name in the records of Antwerp, the Bibliographie even suggests that she may never have existed, the account in the martyrbooks being merely a phantasy. But this is not the case. It has been clearly shown, as the Bibliographie reluctantly admits, by Samuel Cramer (DB 1904, 127 f.) that Maeyken, the wife of the mason Mattheus Wens, being a native of Dissenbeke in Flanders, was in the official Antwerp records called Maeyken van Dissenbeke (q.v.) and in the martyrbooks Maeykens Wens. In 1566 about 50 persons of Antwerp, suspected of Anabaptism, were summoned to answer to the magistrates for their heresy; among them were besides Janne de Weese (i.e., the preacher Jan de Metser, to whom Maeyken wrote her letter in prison) also "Mattheus Wens, mason, and Maeyken his wife," having been living "in den oudenaertschen ganck" (Oudenaerde lane). They did not appear to answer, apparently because they had fled from the city. They later must have returned.

The autograph letter by Maeyken was acquired by the Amsterdam Mennonite archives in 1902 at a public auction. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 661-64, E 979 f.; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 291, 294; XIII, 130 f., 179 f.; XIV, 92 f., No. 1040; Bibliographie II, No. 841; DB 1898, 114; 1899, 104, 108, 121; 1904, 115-33.

Maeyken Wouters (Wauters, Wolters), an Anabaptist martyr, drowned at Liege (Luik) in Belgium, together with Aeltjen Baten. On the same day they were thrown from a bridge into the Maas River. According to van Braght this happened on July 24, 1595, after the women had stayed in prison for ten weeks. The statement of Daris (Bax II, 344) that the execution took place on Oct. 29, 1593, is not very tenable, since Maeyken's letter is dated 1595. Aeltgen was a rather aged woman, Maeyken rather young and unmarried. Both were natives of Zonhoven in the territory of Vogelsanck, Belgian province of Limburg. The accurate and detailed account in the Martyrs' Mirror portrays their firm faith in trial and even in torture. In prison Maeyken wrote a letter to her parents and further to "all the believers (i.e., members of the congregation) and all who love the truth." These martyrs are celebrated in the hymn "Voorwaer 't dient niet versweghen, dees werelts blintheyt groot" (The great blindness of this world should not be concealed) found in Veelderhande Liedekens of Lenaerdt Clock (Haarlem, 1598) and other Dutch hymnals. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 789-92, E 1091-93; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik II (The Hague, 1941) 344-47.

Magdaleene Jans, an Anabaptist martyr "belonging to the sect of the Mennonites," wife of Matheeux Maurisz of Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, was burned there at the stake on March 13, 1572. Particulars are lacking. vdZ.

W. te Water, Kort Verhaal der Reformatie van Zeeland (Middelburg, 1766) 148; DB 1908, 17.

Magdaleentken (Magdalena) Andriesd, an Anabaptist martyr, was taken prisoner with five sisters of the faith by the margrave of Antwerp, Belgium, on May 20, 1559, condemned to death with two of them on June 18, and after a courageous confession of their faith they were drowned in the same night in the Steen prison at Antwerp. The name of Magdalena, who was a native of Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, is found in two hymns: "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (No. 16) and "Babels Raets Mandamenten" (The mandates of the Council of Babel are thus executed), which hymn is found both in the Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562 and in Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1563. vdZ.

Offer, 566, 581 note 1; Mart. Mir. D 249, E 623; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 71 f.; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 3, 9; XIV, 26 f., No. 297; ML II, 711.

Magdalena, an Anabaptist martyr from Waterland, i.e., the district north of Amsterdam, Holland, was executed about Aug. 14, 1544, at Vught, Dutch province of North Brabant, on the charge of being a follower of David Joris (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 287). vdZ.

Magdalena de Vos, a daughter of Willem de Vos of Oost-Vleteren in Flanders, an Anabaptist, was arrested at Brugge, Belgium, in July or August 1538. Though she recanted she was punished for forsaking the Roman Catholic Church by being buried alive at Brugge on Aug. 21, 1538, which was very unusual. (Verheyden, Brugge, 32, No. 7.) vdZ.

Magistracy: see State.

Mahaska County, Ia., in the southeastern part of the state, was the location of a Mennonite (MC) settlement which was established in 1852 some distance west of Oskaloosa, when the Peter Beutler family of Ashland Co., Ohio, located there. Beutler was a Mennonite preacher. Among the original settlers were three Beutler families and the Jacob Gehman family. Sometime after 1863 Peter T. Beutler was ordained to the ministry and Jacob K. Beutler served as deacon. After 1863 the Herald of Truth reported several visits to this community by Mennonite (MC) ministers from the east and occasionally communion services conducted in the small congregation. At no time was there a Mennonite meetinghouse in the county. Meetings must have been discontinued sometime before Jacob K. Beutler's death in 1892. Descendants of these families are no longer Mennonites. Now known as the Butlers, members of the family have been prominent in Oskaloosa, Iowa. M.G.

M. Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939) 138-45.

Mahbubnagar, a Mennonite Brethren Mission station in India, located in the district center, Mahbubnagar, 50 miles southwest of Hyderabad, Madhya Pradesh (formerly Central Provinces), built by the American Baptist Telugu Mission about 1890. In 1937 the American Mennonite Brethren Mission purchased the property and took over the field, the indigenous church uniting with the Andhra M. B. Church.

Resident M. B. missionaries have been Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Wiebe and Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Unruh; the present (1953) missionaries are Mr. and Mrs. J. N. C. Hiebert and Mr. and Mrs. Ernest E. Schmidt. The spacious mission compound contains a missionaries' residence, church, school, hostels for school boys and school girls, a building housing the printing press, and some smaller buildings. An adjoining compound contains a building formerly used as hospital.

The activities include the regular services in the station church, extensive evangelistic and church work in the town and in villages, the conducting of a middle and primary school for many years but which was changed in 1949 to a high school and primary school, publication and the operation of a printing press, and the work of a dispensary for some time. The station field, having an area of 1,400 square miles and 200,000 population, has several village churches, and the total church membership of the field (1953) is 900. J.H.L.

Mahieu Antheunis (Antoine), called Dupla, an Anabaptist martyr. Van Braght names him after his home and birthplace Mahieu van Halewijn, a village in the Belgian province of Flanders. He was imprisoned, and the authorities tried all sorts of means to dissuade him from his belief. But these efforts were without results. On Feb. 18, 1559, he was burned at the stake at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Belgium with Jelis (Gilles) de Groot. His possessions were confiscated. An investigation carried out in his house at Halewijn by the prosecutor revealed that Mahieu owned Mennonite books (we are not informed what books they were) and an extensive correspondence. (Mart. Mir. D 242, E 616 f.; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 33, No. 7.) vdZ.

Mahieu van Halewijn, an Anabaptist martyr: see Mahieu Antheunis.

Mahieu (Hieu) de Swarte, youngest son of the martyr Jan de Swarte (q.v.), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake probably on April 27, 1563, at Rijssel (Lille) in France. He had been arrested at Halewijn (q.v.), Flanders, on March 7, 1563, together with his parents, his brothers Claes, Christiaen, and Hans, and other members of the congregation. These Mennonites and also his father were put to death on March 16 at Rijssel (Lille) in France, while his mother and his three brothers suffered martyrdom with him, all remaining steadfast. Mahieu was only 16 years of age when he died. (Mart. Mir. D 299 f., E 664 f.) vdZ.

Mahieu Waghens, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Aug. 15, 1538, on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium. He was a peddler and the leader of the early Anabaptist congregation of Gent. This congregation used to meet in his home, and when no preacher was present Mahieu delivered an address. He held some revolutionary views; e.g., the believers should be ready to clear away evils and abuses in Gent, when necessary even by force. These ideas were very rare among the Belgian Anabaptists and if the congregation of Gent may have shared the principles of its leader at this moment, it soon chose the way of peaceful nonresistance, following the footsteps of its Lord. On the scaffold before the execution took place Mahieu was placed on show with a placard on which was found the inscription, "Archdeacon of the Anabaptists." After the execution his carbonized corpse was hanged on the gallows together with this placard. (Verheyden, Gent, 4, No. 11.) vdZ.

Mahoning County, Ohio, located in eastern Ohio adjacent to the Pennsylvania state line and formed from Columbiana (q.v.) and Trumbull counties in 1846, is the home of two Mennonite churches (MC), Midway (q.v.) with a membership of 159 and North Lima (q.v.) with 149, and one Wisler congregation (OOM), Pleasant View (q.v.), with a membership of 94. The first Mennonites in the county came from Bucks Co., Pa., in 1807 and were later joined by others from Canada. The Leetonia congregation (q.v.), located a few miles to the south in Columbiana County and organized ten years later, is part of the settlement. Early bishops were Jacob Oberholzer (q.v.) and Jacob Nold (q.v.). Until recently, when a bishop was ordained for each of the three M.C. congregations, A. J. Steiner (q.v.) had served as their bishop. The town of North Lima is the trading center of the community. Youngstown, 11 miles to the north, is the county seat. J.S.U.

Maidstone Mennonite Brethren Church, at Maidstone in northern Saskatchewan, a member of the Canadian Conference, was organized in 1926 with 12 members. At present (1954), there are 8 members, with W. W. Martin as leader. J.H.E.

Maillaert de Grave, of Leisele, near Veurne in Flanders, Belgium, was a member of the Mennonite congregation in his native village, together with his wife Valentyne Ryckele. Paulus van Meenen (q.v.) was for a time the elder of this congregation. Later Maillaert, who was a cabinetmaker, moved to Brugge and participated in the life of the congregation there; meetings were held in his home. In February 1568 he, his wife, and their three children were arrested. Though they recanted, their petition to the Duke of Alba (q.v.) was rejected and both Maillaert and Valentyne were burned at the stake at Brugge in July 1568. (Verheyden, Brugge, 55 f., Nos. 56 and 58.) vdZ.

Main Centre Mennonite Brethren Church, Saskatchewan, was organized in 1904 under the leadership of Bishop Benjamin Janz. The meetinghouse was built in 1907, enlarged in 1922, and improved in 1945. The 1954 membership was 221. The following have been ordained: as leader, Benjamin Janz; as preachers, Jacob J. Martens, John P. Wiebe, Heinrich P. Janz, Klaas Ewert, Jacob F. Redekop, John Siemens, John D. Goertzen, and Arthur F. Martens. The following have been the leaders of the church at Main Centre: Benjamin Janz, Jacob Ewert, John P. Wiebe, Klaas Ewert, Jacob A. Martens, Abram P. Janz, and Abram D. Rempel. The pastor in 1956 was Abe Goertz; the preachers were John Siemens and John Goertzen, the latter serving as assistant pastor. J.I.R.

Mainz (Mayence), the capital (pop. 87,000) of Rheinland-Pfalz, Germany, situated on the Rhine, opposite the confluence with the Main. In the eighth century Boniface made it an archbishopric. The city long remained a center of Christian Germany. In Mainz and Bingen the Waldenses had a considerable number of adherents; they were severely persecuted during the Inquisition (Haupt, 9).

The first years of the Reformation also saw the establishment of Protestant congregations in the archbishopric. In 1524 a pamphlet was published titled Trostbrief der Christlichen Kirchendiener zu Wormbs an die frommen Aposteln und bekenner Jesu Christi, so itzt zu Meintz, Ringaw, und allenthalben im Bistum gefangen liegen, iren lieben Brüdern (copy in the city library of Mainz), containing serious charges against the Catholic clergy, and admonishing the prisoners to be steadfast in faith, since they cannot count on human aid. Which wing of Protestantism they adhered to is not clear. Archivist F. W. E. Roth thinks they were "Anabaptists" (Menn. Bl. 1893, 89 and 105); he bases his assumption on the use of the terms "bishops" and "elders." Hermann Haupt supposes that they were Lutherans (Haupt, 26), while Ludwig Keller and Friedrich Thudichum consider them to have been organized Moravian Brethren congregations (Monatshefte, 49-51 and 134 f.). At any rate they cannot have been Anabaptists of the Swiss Brethren type, since that movement did not arise until the following year.

Concerning the fate of these prisoners there is no record, but it may be safely assumed that they lost their lives; for the clergy of Mainz were determined persecutors of all non-Catholics. At the end of December 1525 the cathedral of Mainz sent a delegation to Pope Clemens requesting him to use his influence with Charles V to have the heretics annihilated (Friedensburg, 101). The mandates passed by the emperor substantiate this idea. Meanwhile the Anabaptist movement reached the bishopric; there are records, though sparse, of the punishment of its adherents (Bossert, 4).

Elector, cardinal, and archbishop Albrecht of Mainz, archchancellor of the Holy Roman Empire, known for his trade in indulgences which occasioned the posting of Luther's theses, issued a severe mandate on Jan. 31, 1528, threatening his subjects with loss of life and property if they joined the Anabaptists, but promised immunity to the Anabaptists if they would give themselves up and become informers on their brethren (Wappler, 227). The movement was not so easily suppressed, however, for the electoral law (Strafordnung) of 1594 still stipulates that "anyone who defends Anabaptism, calls secret meetings, preaches, or . . . belongs to a sect shall at once be reported to the government" (Menn. Bl. 1894, 74). There is no information on later regulations or penalties. HEGE.

G. Bossert, TA I: Württemberg; W. Friedensburg, Zur Vorgeschichte des Gotha-Torgauischen Bündnisses der Evangelischen 1525-1526 (Marburg, 1884); H. Haupt, Beiträge zur Ref.-Gesch. der Reichsstadt Worms (1897); P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 111; Monatshefte der Comenius-Gesellschaft VII (1898) 49-51, 134 f.; ML III, 1.

Mair (Mayr), Baltasar (Walser), a Hutterite martyr, a preacher in the brotherhood, was beheaded at Walsburg in Carinthia, Austria, with two other Brethren in 1531. A song that he wrote has been lost. NEFF.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 48; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 105; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 67; Mart. Mir. D 33, E 440; ML III, 1.

Mair, Matthias, a Hutterite martyr, a native of Tirol, Austria, chosen deacon in 1551; betrayed by a priest, who sent his cook after him to detain him under the pretense that she wanted to become an Anabaptist, he fell into the hands of the Catholic peasants at Wier near Vienna, was taken to Baden, and after six days of imprisonment, during which the priests tried in vain to convert him, he was drowned on July 27, 1592. Three or four times the executioner pulled him out of the water to ask him whether he would recant, but he refused as long as he could speak. His death produced excitement and disappointment among the people, for he was known as a good and upright man. He and Thoman Haan (q.v.) are mourned in the song (20 stanzas), "Trost, Fried und Freud, Standhaftigkeit im Herren." NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 317; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 437 f.; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 565 f.; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 797; Wolkan, Lieder, 236; Mart. Mir. D 788, E 1089; ML III, 1.

Mair, Wolf (Wolfgang), a Hutterite martyr, was seized with Wolf Huber (q.v.), near Tittmoning, Austria, in 1559, taken to Salzburg, and cruelly tortured to force him to name those who had given him shelter; but he betrayed no one. Then the monks and priests tried to make him abjure his faith. "They put them all to shame with the Word of God, and their testimony and with their steadfastness, and showed that their faith was the way of divine truth to eternal life in Christ Jesus, on which they would stay with God's help." Then they were taken back to Tittmoning and condemned to die there on Nov. 10, 1559. They sang joyfully on their way to execution. At the site Wolf Mair cried out to the people, "Today I will offer unto my God a true burnt sacrifice, pay my vows, and testify with my blood to the divine truth." In prison he wrote to his wife, describing the two examinations on the rack, relating his conversation with the officials, and assuring her that he would die cheerfully, knowing that his family was provided for. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror states that he was executed at Luxembourg. He is known as the author of two songs: "Wo soll ich mich hinkehren, Mein Gott, in dieser Frist" (12 stanzas), "Wo soll ich mich hinkehren, Mein Gott, in diesem Zwang" (12 stanzas). NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 221; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 303 ff.; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 398 f.; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 623-26; Mart. Mir. D 243, E 617; ML III, 2.

Maisbrunn, an estate in the Dachau district of Bavaria, Germany. The former owners of this land had set aside a field to be used as a burying ground, before the Mennonite chapel and cemetery were built at Eichstock (q.v.). After the Hartmetz and Hirschler families left, the estate passed into the possession of a Catholic, who broke down the cemetery fence and used the gravestones to improve his buildings. The appeals of the previous owner to purchase the cemetery in the name of the Mennonite Church of Eichstock were not recognized, since the congregation was not incorporated and could therefore not acquire property. (ML III, 2.) D.M.

Maisch, Gottlob (1825-1908), a German writer of historical and theological works. In his book Religion und Revolution (1892) he discusses Anabaptism. Maisch is one of the modern scholars who find the roots of Anabaptism in the peaceful Swiss Brethren. Not until the leaders had been wiped out by the cruel persecution were the radical elements able to win the upper hand as in Münster. But even in Münster he sees at first a good Protestant movement under Rothmann, until the radical elements won out and destroyed the work begun in a truly religious spirit. The book, to be sure, presents no new material on the Anabaptist movement, but Maisch gives it a positive evaluation. (ML III, 2.) H.Q.

Major County, Okla., in the northwestern part of the state, is the seat of six Mennonite churches with a total membership of 1,153, as follows: 3 G.C.M. with 507 members: Saron in Orienta, 6 miles north of Fairview, New Hopedale in Meno, and West New Hopedale north of Ringwood; one M.B. Church in Fairview with 411 members; one Church of God in Christ, Mennonite (Fairview), with 235 members. A small group, called the Penner Church, related to the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, but independent, worships about 6 miles north of Fairview. Fairview is the county seat. The Meno Bible Academy (q.v.) is located in Meno in the northeast corner of the county. H.U.S.

Makkum, a town in the Dutch province of Friesland close to the dike which shuts off the former Zuiderzee, the seat of a Mennonite congregation, founded here (according to Blaupot ten Cate) in 1550-80, but possibly of a still older date. About 1600 there were three congregations here:

(a) A Jan Jacobsz group, sometimes also, though incorrectly, called Old Flemish. This congregation was founded before 1599; for on July 22 of this year representatives of the Makkum congregation were called to Dokkum, Friesland, to settle the dispute between Jan Jacobsz and Pieter Jeltjes. In the early 17th century this congregation must have been rather large; in 1603-18 Elder Jacob Theunisz baptized a large number of persons here. Its meetinghouse was found in the Wijde Steeg. From about the middle of the 17th century there was a decline: in 1755 the congregation had no preacher and was served by those of Ameland and Baard. In 1785 the last member of the Makkum Jan Jacobsz congregation died; then Baard and Ameland, the two remaining congregations of this branch, divided the property of the Makkum congregation, each receiving 1600 guilders, and in 1788, when the old meetinghouse was sold, another small amount.

(b) A Waterlander congregation, the history of which is entirely unknown. The existence of this congregation is proved by the fact that mention of it is made at the large Waterlander conference at Amsterdam in 1647. It must have merged with the Flemish congregation before 1695.

(c) A Flemish congregation, on which there is only scanty information. In 1695, after it had merged with the Waterlanders, it joined the Friesche Sociëteit (Mennonite conference of Friesland). At this time the baptized membership numbered about 260. Among the first trustees of the Friesche Sociëteit were representatives of the Makkum congregation, in the 18th century called United Flemish and Waterlander congregation. Of this congregation a book of members baptized since 1690 has been preserved and also a book of births in the families of the members from 1740-1816. In the course of time its membership decreased: 167 baptized members in 1740, 90 in 1808, 115 in 1861, 77 in 1900, 48 in 1957. This decrease is partly caused by the fact that the town of Makkum, like most little towns on the Zuiderzee, declined in the late 17th and in the 18th century because of the wars of the Netherlands with England; also in the 19th century many inhabitants moved elsewhere. A curious circular of 1771 by the church board, in which the members were encouraged to make larger contributions to the church, clearly shows the decline of the congregation. (This letter was published in De Zondagsbode XLVI, 1932-33, No. 33.) Until 1790 the congregation had been served by untrained preachers. The first minister trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary was Pieter van der Bij, serving here 1792-1814. He was followed by Reitze de Vries 1814-19, Klaas Ris 1820-23, H. L. Bauman 1824-34,

A. Doyer van Cleef 1835-76, J. A. Oosterbaan 1878-1901, F. C. Fleischer 1902-9, Jacob Hulshoff 1909-20, P. J. Keuning 1921-25, and Miss J. M. Eelman 1925-32. In 1933 the Makkum congregation made an arrangement with the near-by congregation of Witmarsum-Pingjum to be served by the same minister. These ministers were W. F. Golterman 1933-36, H. P. Tulner 1936-39, A. H. van Drooge 1940-46, and Miss S. E. Doyer 1946-57.

The Makkum meetinghouse of the former Flemish congregation was a plain building. About 1850 it was modernized and in 1909-10 entirely rebuilt (dedicated April 17, 1910). The congregation of Makkum has a youth group. In the town of Makkum is found the well-known Dutch pottery owned by the (Mennonite) Tichelaar (q.v.) family. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2089-92; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, passim, see Index; J. Loosjes, Jan Jacobsz en de Janjacobsgezinden (1914) reprint, p. 49 f.; DB 1890, 15-18; 1899, 211; 1909, 186; 1910, 190; ML III, 2.

Malcolm, Neb., the address of Unit 2 of CPS Camp No. 138: see Lincoln.

Maldegem, Jacques (Jacob) van, a Mennonite preacher born about 1580 at Hansbeke near Zomergem, in the bishopric of Gent, Belgium, was banished from the bishopric because of his successful work for his brotherhood. In 1614 he was made elder of the church at Aardenburg (q.v.) in Dutch Zeeland-Flanders and on April 12, 1615, he was taken prisoner at a church service. He was a cattle breeder by trade and in addition he faithfully served the Mennonite church. He preached not only at Aardenburg, but also at Sint Martensdijk (q.v.) and, braving the mandate of the magistrates, in 1630 at Zomergem (q.v.). He was active especially in trying to win over to the Mennonites the Protestant refugees from Flanders. By this activity he incurred the displeasure of the Reformed magistrates of Aardenburg. In 1634 he was seized by the Spaniards and was held in Brugge and later in Damme, but acquired his freedom on Sept. 16, 1635. He preached several times more and then, probably by government orders, resigned his ministry. From 1636 there is no further record of his work in Aardenburg; in 1647 he was still active, for in that year he officiated at a marriage at Sint Martensdijk. (DB 1876, 81, 86, 98 f., 108, 109-15; 1883, 4-6; 1884, 59; ML III, 2.) Neff, vdZ.

Male, van, family name of Mennonites in Flanders and at Amsterdam. Cornelis Jansz van Male was a preacher and elder of the Old Flemish congregation meeting at "de Kruikjes" (q.v.) at Amsterdam. He died about 1620 at a very advanced age. Among the Mennonite martyrs found in Offer and Martyrs' Mirror are Pieter van Male and Marijntgen and Pierijntgen van Male, all of Gent, Belgium, and executed there in 1562 and 1564. vdZ.

DB 1896, 104-7; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 131 f.; Mart. Mir. D 289, 301, E 656, 666.

Maler, Gregor, an Anabaptist preacher of Chur (q.v.), Switzerland, stopped for a time in Augsburg, Germany, to baptize several persons who wished to join the brotherhood. He took part in the Martyrs' Synod of Aug. 20, 1527 (Keller, Ref., 428), and was one of the evangelists sent out by that body. According to a statement made by Jakob Gross (q.v.), who was imprisoned at Augsburg soon after the synod, Maler was assigned with Hans Denk (q.v.), Ulrich Trechsel (according to the statement of Hans Hut, who was also seized, Trechsel was sent to Worms), and Hans Beck (q.v.) to the Cantons of Basel and Zürich; the council of Augsburg passed this information on to the council of Strasbourg with the request that they keep close watch on these men, and report back (Röhrich, 33). While Denk and Beck went first to Ulm, and from there had to move on soon, Gregor remained a while longer in the vicinity of Augsburg (Keller, Apostel, 221). On Oct. 15, 1527, he visited Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.), who had been banished from Augsburg, at Göppingen.

He also visited Strasbourg (exact date unknown) and is also said to have been in Basel. In April 1528 he was arrested at Feldkirch in Vorarlberg, Austria. Because it could not be proved that he had been rebaptized (he refused to answer this question) he was released. There is no further trace of him. Hege, vdZ.

L. Keller, Ein Apostel der Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1882); idem, Die Reformation und die älteren Reformparteien (Leipzig, 1885); T. W. Röhrich, "Zur Geschichte der strassburger Wiedertäufer," in Ztscht für die Historische Theologie, 1860; Fr. Roth, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberschwaben," in Ztscht des Historischen Vereins für Schwaben XXVII (1900); Paul Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer (Karlsruhe, 1954) 42, 89, 113 No. 89; ML III, 3.

Maler, Jörg, a South German Anabaptist of the Marpeck circle, the copyist and compiler of the Kunstbuch: see Marpeck, Pilgram.

Maler, Martin: see Zehentmayer.

Malerin, Anna, an Anabaptist martyr: see Anna Malerin.

Maliapen, an epithet given the Mennonites around Hoorn in West Friesland, Netherlands, "because of their enormous stupidity," according to the statement of the notorious heresy judge W. D. Lindanus (q.v.), in his book, Dubitantius de vera certaque, etc. The term is probably derived from "malle apen" or "japen" (dull monkeys, or stupid fellows). (DB 1872, 32; ML III, 3.) vdZ.

Malsch, two villages in Baden, Germany, in which the Anabaptist movement found a number of adherents in the 16th century, one situated south of Karlsruhe, and the other north. Malsch, in the Ettlingen district, with about 5,000 predominantly Catholic inhabitants, belonged formerly to the abbey of Reichenbach, but was annexed by Duke Frederick of Württemberg in 1595, and in 1603 fell to Baden. The earliest records concerning Anabaptists are dated 1543. The village chronicle records that Count Palatine John had an illegal regulation announced, expelling Anabaptists. Nevertheless it is known that there were Anabaptists in the city for many decades. They maintained connections with the Hutterian Brotherhood. In 1559-81 many families fled to Moravia, abandoning their property. That this amounted to a considerable sum may be inferred from the fact that in 1610 Baden and Württemberg fell into a dispute concerning it.

In Malsch in the Wiesloch district, a village of about 1,600 predominantly Catholic inhabitants, a number of persons, taking offense at the conduct of the local priest, joined the Anabaptists (see Baden). In March 1539 three men, five women, and three girls were arrested and imprisoned in the fortress of Rotenberg. They had recently been baptized by Wendel Metzger of Heidelsheim (Bruchsal district) and Hans Gentner of Sulzfeld (Eppingen district); the latter went to Moravia and died in 1548 at Schäkowitz as "a faithful evangelical servant of Christ, after many sorrows and many a struggle, which he endured for Christ's sake." Two preachers as well as the Bishop of Speyer sought to indoctrinate the prisoners and win them back to the Catholic Church. Of Barbara Decker it was said that she vigorously resisted the demand to recant, but the others yielded. Some of the Malsch Anabaptists went to Moravia. Among the 150 Hutterian Brethren imprisoned in the Falkenstein Castle (q.v.) in 1539 who were to be sent to the galleys there were several Anabaptists of Malsch (Wolkan, 157). Hege.

TA Württemberg; Bossert, "Beiträge zur badisch-pfälzischen Reformationsgeschichte," in Ztscht für die Gesch. des Oberrheins LIX, 71-88; B. Schwarz, "Wiedertäufer in Malsch," in Mitteldeutscher Courier (1904) No. 21; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 200 f.; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; ML III, 3 f.

Malysch District (Malyschner Bezirk), a Mennonite settlement in the Volga region of Russia, about 60 miles southeast of Saratov, named for the creek Malysch, which flows into the Tarlyk, a tributary of the Volga. It was settled in 1854-59 by Mennonites from West Prussia, led by Claas Epp, the former mayor of the village of Fürstenwerder (q.v.), and comprised 10 villages: Hahnsau, Köppental, Lindenau, Fresenheim, Valuyevka, Hohendorf, Lysanderhöhe, Orloff, Ostenfeld, and Medemtal. The oldest village, Hahnsau, passed into Little Russian possession at the end of the 19th century. North and west of the Mennonite settlement German Lutherans and Catholics were settled. (ML III, 4.) F.B.

Man, Klaes Jansz, usually called only Klaes Jansz, was a Dutch Mennonite preacher at Uithoorn (of moderate ability, years of service unknown) and published a funeral sermon, Lykpredicatie over het salig Afsterven van J. G. Buyser (Amsterdam, 1697) delivered for Buyser (q.v.), an elder at Emden. Klaes Jansz was a follower of Buyser. vdZ.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 657; N.N.B.Wb. IX, 455; Biogr. Wb. IV, 526; J. Hartog, Geschiedenis der Predikkunde (Amsterdam, 1865) 229 f.

Manatant, an 18th-century geographical designation for a territory which covers a portion of the eastern section of Berks County, Pa. The term is evidently a variant form of Manatawny, the name of a huge tract of land of more than 20,000 acres, sold by William Penn to John Henry Sprogel. By 1715 Sprogel had set aside about three acres within the limits of the present borough of Pottstown for burial purposes, and in this Sprogel cemetery many Mennonites were buried in the 18th century, including Bishop Martin Bechtel (1710-86). The term Manatawny is still used in Berks County as one of the four groups of townships which comprise the county: there are fifteen townships in the Manatawny district. Part of the area, at least, is drained by the Manatawny stream, a part of the Schuylkill River system. But Bally, the village where the Hereford Mennonite Church (q.v.) is located, is also in the Manatawny district, although located in the Perkiomen Valley, another branch of the Schuylkill. Mennonites settled in what were later the townships of Colebrookdale (created 1741) and Hereford (created 1753) as early as 1720; the present Washington Township of Berks County, in which the Hereford congregation is located, was not created until 1839. When the Mennonite ministers of eastern Pennsylvania met to adopt the Dordrecht Confession in 1725 two of them signed as representing the "Manatant." One of these was Daniel Langenecker of near Royersford, who served the Coventry congregation across the line in Chester County, and the other was Hans Jacob Bechtel, who lived near Pottstown, but who preached, at least in part, at Hereford. The term Manatant was therefore loosely employed by the Mennonites to designate the area from the present town of Bally (established 1860) to Pottstown, and even down the Schuylkill Valley to the Coventry area. J.C.W.

Cyrus T. Fox, Reading and Berks County, Pennsylvania I (New York, 1925) 273-94; J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, Pa., 1937) 15, 19, 45, 93, 113, 206, 251, 280, 403.

Mancelona, Mich., a town about 40 miles south of Petoskey, the location of a small settlement of Mennonites (MC), where J. S. Coffman held several services in July 1881, and where he hoped a congregation would soon be organized. One of the Coffman meetings was held in the house of David Garber. One must have been organized soon, since on Sept. 22, 1883, "two young persons were received into the church by baptism," and "on the 23rd communion services were held." Nothing further could be learned about this early group. In 1948 a mission was established here called Cold Springs. In 1956 Willard Bontrager was the pastor, with 22 members. (Herald of Truth, 1881, 139; 1883, 314.) H.S.B.

Mancelona (Mich.) United Missionary Church had 25 members in 1954. E. R. Sims was serving as its minister. M.G.

Manchester Mennonite (MC) Church (formerly called Liverpool), a member of the Lancaster Conference, is located eight miles north of York, in York Co., Pa. The Mennonites in this community, the Keller, Leib, Reiff, and Rodes families, worshiped in private homes and in the Hoover Union Church until 1810. In that year a yellow sandstone meetinghouse was built on land given by Christian Keller one-half mile north of the town of Manchester. It was regularly used until 1850 when the congregation in effect had died out. Thereafter it was occasionally used by the Stony Brook congregation as an additional preaching point. In 1948 it was reopened as a mission station in the old building, the oldest meetinghouse still in use in the Lancaster Conference. In 1949 Joseph H. Martin was ordained as pastor and in 1954 Lloyd L. Hollinger as assistant pastor. In 1955 the membership was 50. I.D.L.

Mandach, Sophie von, mother of the owner of the Hohenegg castle in Tirol, Austria (now Italy). Loesche reports that she gathered a group of Anabaptist women about her and took no taxes from the Brethren. Nothing further is known concerning her relations with the Anabaptists. Her son joined the Schwenckfelders. W.W.

G. Loesche, Die Gesch. des Protestantismus in Oesterreich (3rd ed., Leipzig, 1930) 374; ML III, 4.

Mandailang, Groot, a territory on the Indonesian island of Sumatra (q.v.), where a mission station among the Tobanes immigrants was opened in 1925 by the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association, on the special instigation of Pastor J. E. van Brakel (q.v.) of Koog-Zaandijk. This mission, generously supported by the congregation of Heubuden (q.v.), West Prussia, was successful (two small congregations soon arose at Bonandolok and Sihipeng) but in 1930 had to be transferred to the German Rheinland Mission Society because of lack of Mennonite missionaries. (Jaarverslag, reports of the Mennonite Mission Association 1925-30.) vdZ.

Mandates were the laws of the Holy Roman Empire which gave instructions to the higher officials. In the German territories the regulations passed for their own domain in the 15th-18th centuries were often also called mandates. In addition the term "edict" was used for regulations meant for general knowledge, for commands as well as for prohibitions. Such laws were passed during the Middle Ages against religious brotherhoods which arose beside the Catholic Church. For the Holy Roman Empire Frederick II introduced a general church regulation in 1232, decreeing that persons condemned and delivered to the secular courts by the church must be put to death. This applied first of all to extra-church reform groups.

For the suppression of the Anabaptists and the Mennonites mandates were issued in amazingly large numbers. Persecution began in Zürich immediately after the initiation of the Anabaptist movement in 1525 with the passing of a decree that introduced a long series of mandates announcing the severest penalties. Whatever violence fanaticism could invent for the annihilation of a separatist group was precipitated into these mandates. In harshness these mandates differed very little from the heresy laws of the Middle Ages.

The organization of independent congregations was strictly prohibited by the mandates, and accordingly their preachers were denied the right to perform any official functions. Children were forcibly baptized by preachers of the established state churches; the Swiss Anabaptists were obliged to participate in state church communion services, and had to be married in the state church at a time when this regulation was not yet mandatory for the people in general. Their devotional literature was confiscated in all countries, and most of it destroyed; in some states the very buildings in which they met were torn down.

Every member of a congregation was personally hit by the ruthless stipulations of the mandates. They were thrown into prison, deprived of their property; it was made a criminal offense to shelter them, employ them, feed them; high rewards were offered for their capture; they were subjected to cruel torture; their bodies were mutilated by cutting off limbs or by branding them with hot irons on forehead or cheek, and finally those who persisted in their faith were killed by drowning, hanging, beheading, and even by burning or burying alive—not at all because they were accused of some heinous crime, but because they did not agree with all the doctrines and institutions of the established churches.

But it was not only the difference in doctrine that gave the Anabaptists occasion to separate themselves from the church, but frequently also the offensive conduct of members of those churches. This can be seen not only in the mandates on morals of the 16th century, but also by the various regulations passed against the Anabaptists, which stress these unworthy conditions, thereby trying to influence officials and clergy (Müller, 87, 116; Hege, 141; Bergmann, 53; Loserth, Communismus, 318).

A summary of the numerous mandates issued against the Anabaptists and Mennonites does not exist. Nevertheless the laws published in the recent collections of sources afford a dependable view of the proceedings against the movement which seized wide circles of the population and found followers in nearly all of the German territories. The following table is an attempt on the basis of available sources to give a survey of a struggle which the governing powers ruthlessly waged with secular means against spiritual forces for several centuries, without, however, obtaining their goal, which was the universal eradication of their opponents. (Symbol * indicates that a copy of the original mandate is found in GCL; symbol  indicates that the mandate is printed in TA Württemberg, pp. 1-10.)

1525

Jan. 18. Zürich orders unbaptized children to be baptized and expels foreign Anabaptists.

Feb. 1. Zürich forbids infant baptism in private homes.

Feb. 26. Elector John of Saxony forbids preaching and officiating at marriages, baptisms, etc., by persons not called by the church.

March 1. Zürich forbids baptism on faith on penalty of fine and exile.

April 26. St. Gall forbids baptism on faith.

Nov. 30. Grüningen (Zürich) penalizes baptism on faith with fines.

1526

March 1. Zürich threatens the death penalty for baptism on faith.

May 20. Grisons forbids all extra-church brotherhoods on penalty of corporal and capital punishment.

June 2. Basel forbids adult baptism on penalty of exile.

July 14. Basel inflicts corporal punishment and confiscation of property for attendance at Anabaptist preaching services.
Nov. 19. Zürich announces the death penalty for listening to Anabaptist sermons.

1527

March 1. The mandate of Bishop Weigand of Bamberg.
March 26. The Nürnberg edict against Hans Hut.
March 31. John of Saxony extends the decree of Feb. 26, 1525, to other districts.
July 6. Basel orders corporal punishment and confiscation for baptism of adults, omission of infant baptism, and sheltering Anabaptists.
July 27. Strasbourg prohibits the sheltering and feeding of Anabaptists.
*Aug. 14. Concordat of the cities Zürich, Bern, and St. Gall.
Aug. 20. General mandate of Ferdinand I against all Protestants.
Oct. 11. Augsburg threatens membership in an Anabaptist group with corporal and capital punishment.
Oct. 18. Cardinal Matthias Lang of Salzburg forbids Anabaptist preaching and orders raids to hunt them out.
Oct. 23. Mandate of Ferdinand I for Upper Austria.
Oct. 27. New mandate issued by Cardinal Lang.
Nov. 1. Regensburg announces severe corporal punishment for adult baptism and for sheltering Anabaptists.
Nov. 5. Dukes William and Louis of Bavaria require all Anabaptists to be seized.
Dec. 15. Margrave Philip of Baden forbids adult baptism on penalty of corporal and capital punishment.
Dec. 16. Zürich mandate sharpened.
Dec. 19. Mandate of Bishop Weigand of Bamberg renewed.
Dec. 23. The prince-bishop of Brixen orders the seizure of Anabaptist preachers.
Dec. 31. Duke George of Saxony proclaims severe punishment for adult baptism.

1528

*Mandate of Duke Christoff of Württemberg, issued at Stuttgart.
Jan. 4. Mandate of Emperor Charles V (Speier).
Jan. 6. Margrave George of Brandenburg orders corporal and capital punishment and confiscation as a penalty for adult baptism or giving Anabaptists shelter and food.
Jan. 7. The mandate of Bern is extended to the canton.
Jan. 16. Mandate of Ferdinand for Upper Austria.
Jan. 17. John of Saxony orders those to be seized who function as preachers without ecclesiastical calling.
Jan. 22. Bern mandate sharpened.
Jan. 23. Mandate of the city of Biel (Switzerland).
Jan. 26. Mandate of Ferdinand I for Württemberg permits execution without court procedure.
Jan. 28. Mandate of Dukes Ottheinrich and Philip of Pfalz-Neuburg.
Jan. 31. Cardinal Albrecht of Mainz forbids joining the Anabaptists on penalty of corporal punishment and confiscation, but promises pardon for those who will betray Anabaptists.
Feb. 4. Mandate of Ferdinand I for Lower Austria.
Feb. 22. The Swabian League decides to send out scouts to hunt out the Anabaptists.
*Feb. 24. Mandate of Ferdinand I for Austria.
Feb. 26. Order of regent to officials of Stuttgart, Cannstatt, etc., to watch for Anabaptists.
Feb. 27. Ferdinand I stipulates that rebaptized persons be put to death in spite of recantation.
March 5. Louis V of the Palatinate decrees the dealth penalty for adult baptism.
March 24. New general mandate of Ferdinand I orders death by fire for Anabaptist preachers and beheading for the penitent.
March 24. Mandate of Frankfurt.
*April 1. Ferdinand decrees a mandate for Upper Austria, promising pardon for Anabaptists who voluntarily recant, accept church penance, and betray their preachers.
April 5. Mandate of the Bishop of Speyer.
April 18. Cardinal Lang of Salzburg decrees the death penalty for Anabaptist preachers.
July 28. Decree of Ferdinand I to the local courts in Lower Austria.
Aug. 1. Mandate of Ferdinand I for Silesia.

1529

Jan. 26. Styria orders the seizure of Anabaptists and the burning of their houses.
April 1. A regulation in the reformation of Basel demands that Anabaptists join the state church or be sentenced to life imprisonment, with the death penalty for apostates.
April 7. Mandate of the Bishop of Bamberg.
April 22. Imperial law at Speyer.
April 23. Mandate of Emperor Charles V.
May 18. Mandate of Ferdinand I for his hereditary lands decrees death by fire for the Anabaptists.
May 24. Mandate of Ferdinand I for the Austrian possessions in Alsace.

1530

Jan. 18. Edict of banishment by Enno I of East Friesland.
*March 2. Mandate of Ferdinand I ordering the officials to carry out the prescribed punishments of Anabaptists without pity.
March 26. Zürich orders the death penalty for sheltering Anabaptists.
April 27. Sharpened mandate of Bavaria decrees death penalty even with recantation.
Sept. 24. Strasbourg renews the mandate of July 27, 1527.
Nov. 17. Basel joins the concordat of Aug. 14. 1527.
Nov. 19. Imperial recess at Augsburg.
Nov. 23. Basel pardons the Anabaptists who recant after their first imprisonment, otherwise they are banned, and those who return are to be drowned.

1531

March 22. Mandate of Ferdinand I for Lower Austria decrees the execution of Anabaptists who do not recant and the burning of their meetinghouses.

June 20. George of Brandenburg warns against the Anabaptists, demands that they be found, and threatens a severe penalty for arguing about or defending their doctrine.

July 31. Bern threatens the death penalty for exiles who return.

Dec. Philip of Hesse deprives the Anabaptists of their hereditary possessions if they do not join the state church.

1532

May 7. Mandate of Ferdinand I for Carinthia.

June 10. Decision of the cities of Lucerne, Uri, Schwyz, Unterwalden, and Zug to abolish court procedures for Anabaptists.

1533

March 2. Bern threatens steadfast Anabaptists with life imprisonment.

1534

Feb. 12. A Dutch proclamation orders the seizure of all Anabaptist preachers.

March 3. Strasbourg orders the installation of "Täuferherren."

May 9. Sharpened edict of Ferdinand I proclaiming the death penalty for all who promote Anabaptism and severe punishment for lax judges.

June 29. Imperial law against the Anabaptists (Kadan).

Nov. 8. Bern orders marriages to be solemnized by the pastors and participation in communion in the churches.

Dec. 23. George of Saxony orders that every Anabaptist be put to death and his property confiscated.

Dec. The council of Mühlhausen (Thuringia) forbids joining the Anabaptists.

Dec. The council of Erfurt warns against the Anabaptists and demands that they be reported.

1535

March 13. Bern threatens returning Anabaptists with beheading (instead of drowning).

April 22. In the Bishopric of Passau the sheltering of Anabaptists is prohibited.

April 25. Imperial recess at Worms against Münster.

April 28. Strasbourg orders the compulsory baptism of infants.

May 26. Repetition of the mandate of May 24, 1529, for the Austrian possessions in Alsace.

June 11. Regensburg enforces former mandates and orders submission to church doctrine.

June 18. Ulrich of Württemberg promises recanting Anabaptists mercy, and to backsliders the death penalty.

Aug. 14. New decree of the Dukes of Bavaria.

Oct. 23. Proscription by Duke Albrecht of Prussia.

1536

April 10. Mandate of John Frederick of Saxony in part repeating the mandate of Jan. 17, 1528.

July. Ulrich of Württemberg promises pardon for recantation, exile for steadfastness, and death for preachers and apostates.

Oct. 24. Friesland threatens the death penalty for anyone who shelters Menno Simons.

1537

Dec. Philip of Hesse threatens foreign Anabaptists with exile, and the death penalty in case of return.

1538

March 23. The Strasbourg mandate of exile: upon return four weeks in prison, upon second return fingers cut off and cheeks burned, upon third return drowning.

July 18. Edict of Rostock.

Sept. 6. Bern threatens all Anabaptist leaders with death.

1539

April 19. Anabaptists are not to be tolerated (Frankfurt).

June 13. A sharp new mandate of Ferdinand I.

Nov. 18. Mandate of Ferdinand I for Tirol orders the razing of Anabaptist meetinghouses and the quartering of troops on the villages until the Anabaptists are eradicated.

Nov. 27. Ferdinand I demands that Regensburg suppress the Anabaptists.

Dec. 2. Regensburg mandate threatens anyone joining the Anabaptists, sheltering them, or giving them food with the extreme penalty.

Dec. 10. The Bishop of Brixen offers a reward of 100 guilders for an Anabaptist preacher brought in alive and 50 for one brought in dead.

1540

Generalkonstitution of Charles V.

April 9. Sharpened Strasbourg mandate; corporal and capital punishment upon refusal to take an oath, corporal punishment and confiscation for sheltering Anabaptists.

July 25. Edict of Heilbronn.

1541

July 24. New mandate of the Dukes of Bavaria.

1542

Dec. 21. Command of Ferdinand I to the judges not to pronounce sentence according to their conscience, but to proceed according to the mandates.

1543

Feb. 12. Duke Albrecht of Prussia orders exile.

1544

June 10. Imperial recess at Speyer.

Aug. 31. Edict of Charles V against Menno Simons.

Sept. 8. Regulation of Kempten stipulates exile or eternal punishment for Anabaptists.

Nov. 10. Federal decree of Switzerland.

Dec. 10. Sharpened mandate of Ferdinand I for the Austrian possessions in Alsace.

1548

Jan. 25. Groningen orders the Anabaptists to leave the city on penalty of death.

May 5. Ferdinand I orders exile of Anabaptists from Austria.

June 15. Ferdinand I orders the exile of the Anabapists from Hungary.

1549

April 6. Countess Anna of East Friesland forbids sheltering Anabaptists.

1551

Feb. 14. Imperial recess at Augsburg.

Aug. 26. Inquisition in Venice.

1553

Sept. 6. Mandate of Ferdinand I to find Anabaptist preachers.

1554

Oct. 22. Edict of Ferdinand I for Tirol against those returning from Moravia.
Edict of Cologne announces strict execution of imperial laws.

1555

July 10. Renewed edict of Cologne.

Aug. 1. Mandate of the Wendic cities (Lübeck, Hamburg, Lüneburg, Wismar, Rostock, Stralsund, Greifswald) against Menno Simons.

Sept. 25. Imperial recess at Augsburg.

1556

April 23. Mandate of the Count Palatine Wolfgang of Pfalz-Zweibrücken.

May 9. Mandate of Ottheinrich in Pfalz-Neuburg.

1557

July 9. Renewed order of exile from Moravia.

1558

*June 25. Duke Christoph of Württemberg decrees severe punishment for teaching extra-church doctrines.

Jan. 25. Ottheinrich of the Palatinate forbids Anabaptist meetings of their preachers.

Sept. 29. Mandate of Archbishop Michael Khünberg of Salzburg.

1561

July 5. Sharpened mandate of Ferdinand I for Austria.

Aug. 7. Mandate of the Prince-Bishop of Brixen.

1563

Oct. 2. Renewed mandate of Ferdinand I for Tirol.

1564

Feb. 16. Bern threatens Anabaptists with penalties of property and body.

1565

Jan. 23. Duke William of Jülich orders the razing of the meeting-houses, separatist brotherhoods, and the punishment of the steadfast.

1566

April 28. Bern orders the church to find the Anabaptists.

May 30. Imperial recess at Augsburg (against sects and erroneous opinions).

Sept. 16. First mandate of Ferdinand II which does not tolerate non-Catholics.

1567

June 8. Resolution at Baden (Switzerland) stipulates drowning for those who do not recant and apostates.

Aug. 12. Ferdinand II renews the mandate of Ferdinand I of July 5, 1561.

1573

April 26. Expulsion of Mennonites from Danzig; they are received in the suburbs.

July 1. Mandate of the Archbishop of Salzburg.

1578

Oct. 8. Mandate of Ferdinand II for the Tirol.

Oct. 30. Mandate of Johann Thomas, Bishop of Brixen.

Dec. 10. Mandate of Cologne threatening Anabaptists with death.

1579

Jan. 8. George Frederick orders the expulsion of the Mennonites from the duchy of Prussia.

Dec. 30. Bern renews the threat of confiscation of goods and death.

1581

Feb. 1. Mandate of Ferdinand II for Tirol.

1582

Aug. 13. Count Edzard II of East Friesland prohibits the sale of real estate to Mennonites.

1583

Feb. 16. Edict of exile of Mennonites in the duchy of Prussia. Severe edict of Johann Kasimir for the Palatinate ordering the seizure of Anabaptists and the compulsory baptism of their children.

1584

Sept. 20. Duke William of Bavaria gives a reward of 40 or 50 guilders for information concerning an Anabaptist passing through. Renewal of the edict of exile against the Mennonites of Prussia.

1585

July 1. Mandate of Ferdinand II for the Tirol and part of Austria.

Sept. 3. Bern threatens the Anabaptists with expulsion and with death in case of return.

1586

Nov. 12. Renewal of the edict of exile against the Mennonites of Prussia.

1587

Feb. 28. Duke William V of Bavaria rewards the capture of an Anabaptist with 25 to 100 guilders.

1591

Jan. Johann Kasimir of the Palatinate prohibits the employment of Mennonites.

July 20. New mandate of Ferdinand II for Tirol.

1592

April 15. Mandate of Bern against the migration of Anabaptists to Moravia.

1593

July 1. Archbishop Wolf Dietrich of Salzburg orders the execution of every Anabaptist without previous inquisition, by fire and sword and confiscation of property.

1595

Renewed mandate of the council of Cologne.

June 11. Basel orders confiscation of property of all expelled Mennonites.

1596

June 11. The bishop of Basel orders the expulsion of the Anabaptists in the Münstertal.

1597

Feb. 10. Bern mandate of Sept. 3, 1585, renewed.

1598

May 27. The Frisian States forbid Mennonite worship services.

1599

March 10. Bern declares confiscated Mennonite property to be a state possession.

1601

Groningen forbids Mennonite church services and excludes unbaptized children from inheritance.

March 23. Mandate of exile of Rudolf II for Lower Austria.

April 30. Cologne order of expulsion on penalty of death.

1612

Dec. 30. Zürich imposes a fine for nonattendance at state church services and orders the imprisonment of Mennonite preachers.

1613

Nov. 24. Count Enno II of East Friesland forbids Mennonite religious services on penalty of a fine of 5,000 Reichstaler and the loss of the meetinghouse.

1614

Sept. 9. Mandate of expulsion by the city of Aachen.

1619

Feb. 19. Jülich forbids Mennonite religious services.

Sept. 1. Jülich mandate of expulsion.

1620

Prohibition of meeting in Deventer on penalty of expulsion.

1622

Sept. 17. Mandate of expulsion by Ferdinand II for Moravia.

Sept. 25. Count Enno III of East Friesland orders the seizure of attendants at Mennonite service.

Sept. 28. Order of expulsion by Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein against the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia.

1624

Feb. 11. Bern demands marriage in the state church on penalty of imprisonment.

1625

March 3. Mandate of Ferdinand II for Lower Austria.

1628

Dec. 4. Ferdinand II requires Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein to impose fines on the Moravian nobles who do not expel the Hutterites.

1637

Zürich decides on expulsion of Anabaptists who will not join the state church and orders confiscation.

Sept. 12. Count Palatine Wolfgang Wilhelm commands the expulsion of Mennonites from Jülich, Cleves, and Berg.

1641

March 10. Ulrich II of East Friesland revokes the rights of the Mennonites, but they are restored in 1647.

1644

April 11. Bern orders the imprisonment of Anabaptists who do not join the state church.

Dec. 26. Renewal of the Bern mandates of Sept. 3, 1585, and Feb. 10, 1597.

1648

Jan. 10. Bern decides to send Anabaptists to the galleys.

1650

Nov. The diet of Brno orders the expulsion of the Anabaptists who are still in the employ of the nobles.

1652

Nov. 30. Mandate of Wolfgang Wilhelm of Jülich that induces the Mennonites to emigrate.

1658

Dec. 20. Mandate of Bern orders the expulsion of Anabaptists who do not join the state church and seizure of their preachers.

1659

Jan. 4. The appointment of a committee for Anabaptist affairs in Bern.

Aug. 9. Bern commands expulsion of the Anabaptists with whipping and branding.

1669

Feb. 1. Bern offers a reward of 30 Kr. for the arrest of an Anabaptist.

1670

Sept. 8. Bern imposes heavy fines for sheltering Anabaptists and offering them meals.

1671

Jan. 7. Bern requires an oath of allegiance in order to discover the Mennonites.

Aug. 24. Bern demands 2 or 3 hostages from localities that are lax in expelling the Mennonites.

1690

March 6. Bern disinherits children of marriages not solemnized in the state church.

1691

March 16. Bern mandate of expulsion for refusing the oath and military training.

1693

March 10. Mandate of expulsion by Bishop Johann Konrad of Basel.

April 6. Bern offers a reward of 25 to 50 thalers for the arrest of a Mennonite preacher.

May 31. Bern forbids the sale of "Täufer Testamente."

July 10. Reprint of the Bern mandate of Aug. 9, 1659.

1694

April 25. Bern forbids the employment of any who do not have papers from officials or pastors.

1695

Feb. 22. Bern declares all legal business of Mennonites as invalid, prohibits the burial of Mennonites in the cemeteries, pays 100 Reichstaler for a Mennonite preacher, threatens young women with expulsion, older women with life imprisonment if they do not join the state church.

March 28. Bern threatens to arrest all who do not take part in communion at Easter.

1699

May 19. Institution of "Täuferjäger" (Anabaptist hunters) in Bern.

1707

June 7. Bern orders that persons who do not take communion be reported to the Täuferkammer.

1709

April 26. Bern renews its prohibition against giving Mennonites a room for meeting.

Dec. 28. Bern offers 30 Kr. for reporting the return of an expelled Mennonite.

1711

Feb. 11. Bern permits the Mennonites to leave for Holland and Prussia.

Sept. 30. Bern renews its former mandates against the Mennonites.

Dec. 11. Mennonites remaining or returning to Bern are threatened with life imprisonment if they do not join the state church.

1712

Aug. 13. Louis IV orders the expulsion of Mennonites from France.

1714

May 23. Bern again threatens to send Mennonite preachers to the galleys.

1718

Aug. 29. New Bern mandate.

1720

March 12. Bern threatens Mennonites who return with whipping and branding.

1731

Feb. 5. Prince-Bishop Johann Konrad of Basel again commands the expulsion of the Mennonites.

1733

Hungarian mandate orders the Hutterian Brethren to have their newborn children baptized by Catholic priests.

1734

July 10. Bern imposes a fine of 50 to 100 Thaler for furnishing the Mennonites a room for meeting.

1743

Dec. 4. Bern dissolves the Täuferkammer, whose duty it was to excute the mandates.

1761

Jan. 8. The Hutterian Brethren in Hungary are placed under the local priests, their preachers are removed, and their books confiscated.

The dates of the mandates reveal the rapidity of the spread of the Anabaptist movement when its leaders were compelled to leave the canton of Zürich. Very soon it made itself felt in central Germany and in the Austrian Alps; for by 1527 a number of mandates had been issued threatening the severest penalty upon joining the Anabaptists. The mandate of Charles V of Jan. 4, 1528, extended the persecution to the whole empire. It was supported by further mandates by princes, bishops, and cities. With the greatest zeal a hunt was instituted for the Anabaptists, resulting in numerous deaths. At the Augsburg session of the Swabian League which decided to send a military division of 400 horsemen to scout for Anabaptists, the Bamberg chancellor Georg Tessinger reported on Feb. 28, 1528, that Bishop Weigand was having many Anabaptists executed, and it was said that Duke Wilhelm of Bavaria was at the same time having a large number (grosse mechtige somm) of Anabaptists put to death including two noblemen, the barons of Perwangen (Kühn, 239). When the Diet of Speyer in 1529 assented to the imperial mandate of the previous year, persecution reached its ultimate severity. Since the populace and the judges frequently felt sympathy with the persecuted, the Diet of Speyer of 1544 made it the duty of everyone to give information of Anabaptists, and the imperial recess at Augsburg of 1551 threatened judges who tempered their judgment with mercy with deposition, fines, and imprisonment.

It is amazing that the Anabaptists were able to maintain themselves under this long continued use of violence. Without the inner security which their trust in God afforded them in hours of decision, they would certainly have been defeated by this violent attack. They were, to be sure, greatly weakened numerically in this unequal battle, but contrary to the wish of their oppressors they could not be wiped out, and proved what confidence in faith is able to achieve in suffering.

It is characteristic of the attitude of former historiographers that until the 19th century only the individual aberrations were considered as typical of Anabaptism, whereas they completely ignored the serious striving for a life of discipleship as well as the dangers and suffering the Anabaptists endured. For the history of the Anabaptist-Mennonite movement and for the history of modern civilization the mandates furnish significant source material which has hitherto received little notice.

With few exceptions the mandates were directed against religious opinions. The early mandates frequently expressed a fear that ignoring the church doctrines might lead to political revolution. That argument had been used in all periods for the suppression of doctrines that deviated from the established church. For instance, in the edict passed by Dukes William and Louis of Bavaria on March 5, 1522, the statement was made in prohibiting Lutheran doctrine that "there is no more certain consequence than the destruction of all divine and human laws, order, and government; through it an irreparable, troublesome misunderstanding would rend the Christian faith, if anyone would take the liberty to explain the holy Gospels and Scriptures according to his own head and understanding, and thereby the unity of the Christian church would be destroyed." Many of the mandates against the Anabaptists likewise resulted from this fear, and therefore condemned separation, and designated the Anabaptists as a seducing sect and as tares that must be weeded out (Bern mandate 1527).

The intention of these severe measures against separatist religious groups in the Reformation period was, as it had been in the Middle Ages, to preserve the unity of the church. Therefore no exposition of Scripture was tolerated which did not agree with established church doctrines. Most of the mandates promised immunity upon return to the church and the recognition of its doctrines, above all of infant baptism, making it clear that it was not a question of civil transgression.

Questioning the doctrine of infant baptism was interpreted as a criminal offense (mandate of Jan. 4, 1528). Rejection of this doctrine and the introduction of adult baptism initiated the persecution. The change in the views of the theologians on infant baptism and adult baptism in the course of centuries can be seen in the history of the church. At the fifth council of Carthage in 401 the resolution was passed: he who does not know definitely that he has been baptized shall be baptized again (Sachsse, 37); in March 413, Roman law penalized rebaptism with death. The church council of Switzerland, in spite of the fact that religious freedom had been legally established in Switzerland since April 12, 1798, favored the compulsory baptism of Mennonite children as late as 1809, and would leave it to the children to decide when they were grown whether they wished to be baptized again (Müller, 376); the church council brought it about that in the canton of Bern Mennonite children born between 1799 and 1810 were baptized in the state church on command of the government (Müller, 382).

This course of action and this concept of the law of Rome that baptism on confession of faith should be punished by death if it was preceded by infant baptism has long been outgrown. The Mennonites had to pay enormous sacrifices before this tolerant concept, for the recognition of which they had struggled for so long, became the commonly accepted idea. The Mennonites share in the credit for the fact that a free personal conception has replaced the medieval compulsion of the state church, as it is expressed once again in the mandates listed above. Thereby one of the Mennonite requirements has been fulfilled, namely, that the power of the state should not exert a determinative influence in religious questions, nor should the church mingle in politics, and that a strict separation between church and state should be maintained, which leads to the toleration of various religious brotherhoods.

In the Netherlands the execution of the mandates is not clear, because in the Reformation period the supremacy of the emperor was not everywhere established there, with the consequence that mandates issued for the entire empire were not strictly enforced in some of the provinces.

There were fourteen imperial mandates that concern the Reformation in general. They were known as "Placcaten" there, and popularly as "Bloedplaccaten" (blood-mandates). The mandate of June 10, 1535, was issued expressly against Anabaptism. Those who had preached and baptized, borne the name of prophet, apostle, or bishop, and refused to recant were to be punished by fire; those who were rebaptized or harbored a rebaptized person were to be put to death, the men by beheading, and the women by drowning. The one who revealed an Anabaptist to the authorities was to receive one third of his property; the one who failed to reveal him was to be put to death.

In addition to the imperial mandates others were issued by the regent and the stadholders; these were often repetitions of the imperial mandates in shorter form. Besides these there were also decrees that were intended only for some province, like the one issued in Friesland on Dec. 7, 1542, against Menno Simons, which offered a reward of 100 guilders and the pardon for any crime to the one betraying him to the authorities. Schwarzenberg lists 18 further edicts issued against the Anabaptists in Friesland.

After the war of liberation against Spain when the governments of the northern Netherlands had become almost entirely Calvinist, mandates still continued to be issued. Most of these were issued by the provincial and city governments. Thus the Frisian States forbade all Mennonite services in the province in an edict of May 27, 1598. In Groningen a severe mandate was published in 1601, which not only prohibited Mennonite services, but also disinherited all baptized children. In the same province mandates were issued against Uko Walles (q.v.) and his followers on Aug. 30, 1637, and March 16, 1661. In 1722 the States of Friesland forbade all Mennonite services unless the preachers would sign a formulary of agreement with the orthodox creed. Though two mandates against Socinians, Quakers, and "Dompelaars," published by the States of Friesland in 1622 and 1687, did not directly concern the Mennonites, they were sometimes used against Mennonite preachers, as for example in 1687 in the case of Foecke Floris (q.v.). City edicts against the Mennonites contained similar penalties as late as the 18th century, though in general they were no longer strictly enforced. HEGE, vdZ.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; C. Bergmann, Die Täuferbewegung im Kanton Zürich (Leipzig, 1916); TA Württemberg; TA Bayern I; TA Zürich; E. Egli, Actensammlung zur Geschichte der Zürcher Reformation (Zürich, 1879); A. Fluri, Beiträge z. Gesch. der bernischen Täufer (Bern, 1912); S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); J. Kühn, Deutsche Reichstagsakten unter Kaiser Karl V. VII (Leipzig, 1935); Loserth, Anabaptismus; idem, Communismus; Chr. Meyer, "Zur Gesch. d. Wiedert. in Oberschwaben," Ztscht d. Hist. Vereins f. Schwaben u. Neuburg I, 1874; Müller, Berner Täufer; H. Nestler, Die Wiedertäuferbewegung in Regensburg (Regensburg, 1926); A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin von Linz und die oberösterreichischen Täufergemeinden (Berlin, 1893); Rembert, Wiedertäufer; T. W. Röhrich, "Zur Gesch. der strassburgischen Wiedertäufer," Ztscht f. d. historische Theologie XXXI (1860); C. Sachsse, D. Balthasar Hubmaier als Theologe (Berlin, 1914); Theologische Studien und Kritiken LXI (1888) 503 f.; K. Schottenloher, Die Buchdruckertätigkeit Georg Erlingers in Bamberg (Leipzig, 1907); E. Staehelin, Das Buch der Basler Reformation (Basel, 1929); J. Strickler, Actensammlung zur Schweizerischen Reformationsgeschichte IV (1881); P. Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen (Jena, 1913); idem, Inquisition und Ketzerprozesse (Leipzig, 1908); idem, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); V. A. Winter, Geschichte der baierischen Wiedertäufer (Munich, 1809); Richard Tester, "Die Religionsmandate des Markgrafen Philipp von Baden 1522-1533," Ztscht für Kirchengeschichte (1890) 307-29; Catalogus Amst., 19, 20, 60, 101; W. Schreiber, Geschichte Bayerns I (1889) 476; Mart. Mir. D 35 f., 64, 104, 163-65, 802 f., 806-8; E 442 f., 466, 501, 551-53, 1102 f., 1105 f.; I. M. J. Hoog, De Martelaren der Hervorming in Nederland (Schiedam, 1885) 67-86; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 63-70, 142 f., 312 f.; idem, Groningen I, 285-87; II, 32 ff., 167-84; DB 1870, 22; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 19, 26, 35, 38, 59, 130, 136, 164, 231, 299 f., 308, 316 f., 327, 335 f., 339, 341, 366, 381, 398, 405 f., 414, 419 f., 444, 446, 448, 450 f.; ML III, 4-11.

Mandemaker, Cornelis Jans, a Dutch Mennonite preacher, belonging to the Flemish branch, who about 1630 was ordained as elder of the Arnhem congregation by Adriaen Cornelis, elder of Dordrecht. Mandemaker was one of the moderate Flemish and in 1632 signed the Dordrecht Confession (q.v.) both personally and in the name of his congregation. He lived at Arnhem on Ketelstraat and apparently was a basketweaver, from which trade he or his father derived his name. The congregation met as early as 1607. Cornelis Jans died before 1649, since in this year the congregation of Arnhem had no preacher. vdZ.

Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 195; Een Eeuw Doopsgezinde Gemeente (Arnhem, 1952) 26-28.

Mander, Karel (Carel) van (or Vermander), was a Mennonite painter and poet. He was born in 1548 in Meulebeke in Flanders, Belgium. After a short period in Rome and Vienna he married Ludovica Buyse, painted in Kortrijk (Courtrai) and Brugge, left Flanders in 1583 for the sake of his conscience (it is not known when he joined the Anabaptists), and became the head of the Haarlem School of painting. He was the teacher of some noted Dutch painters, including Cornelis Cornelisz van Haarlem, Hendrick Vroom, and Hendrick Goltzius. He lived in Amsterdam from 1604 until his death on Sept. 11, 1606; "he was buried with the laurel wreath."

Van Mander was a man of versatile gifts. In resisting foreign influence he added to the development of the Dutch language. Although he was under Renaissance influence (in 1597 he published a Dutch translation of Virgil's Bucolica and Georgica, and later a commentary on the Metamorphoses of Ovid), he was opposed to the pagan influences in the world of art. His poetry, which is of slight literary merit, clearly portrays this conflict. His collection of poems, De Gulden Harpe, inhoudende al de geestelycke Liedekens (Haarlem, 1599, reprints Alkmaar, 1605; Enkhuizen, 1607; Amsterdam, 1613, 1620, 1626; Haarlem, 1627; Rotterdam, 1640, 1656; Enkhuizen, 1709), shows typical Mennonite traits. Van Mander, however, played no important role in the church. He belonged to the Old Flemish branch. His Gulden Harpe was used as a hymnal in some of the Old Flemish congregations. Mention should be made also of van Mander's volumes of poems, Tafel-boecxken, inhoudende voor en nae den eten verscheyden dankseggingen en tafelredenen, in rijm gestelt (Alkmaar, 1603), Olyf-Bergh ofte Poëma van den laetsten Dagh and Bethlehem, dat is het Brood-huys, both published in 1609 after his death. Bethlehem was reprinted in all the editions of the Gulden Harpe, from 1613.

Few of van Mander's paintings have been preserved. His fame today rests chiefly on his Het Schilderboeck, which he began in 1597 and published in 1604 (reprints 1764, 1936, 1946). It contains the biographies of Dutch artists, and constitutes the chief source for the study of early Dutch painting. There are also French (1884 f.) and German (1906) versions of the Schilderboeck. vdZ.

Thieme-Becker, Künstlerlexikon XXIII (1929) 606-7; Kalff, Gesch. der Nederl. Letterkunde III, 387-413; R. Jacobsen, Carel van Mander (Rotterdam, 1906); Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 117-24, 130; N.N.B.Wb. I, 1295-98; DB 1900, 79-83; Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 210; H. E. Greve, De Bronnen van Carel van Mander (The Hague, 1903); Helen Noë, Carel van Mander en Italië (The Hague, 1954); ML II, 669; III, 11.

Mändl (Mendel), the name of several Hutterite brethren of different origin and descent. The first of this name is Jakob Mändl, formerly an administrator of the Lord of Liechtenstein at Nikolsburg, Moravia, who had joined the earliest Anabaptist group, there led by Jakob Wideman (q.v.), and was appointed Diener der Notdurft (q.v.) at Austerlitz in 1529. Perhaps the best-known brother of this widespread name is Hans Mändl (q.v.) or Klein Hänsel, of Guffidaun, Tirol, whose courageous stand at his trial and martyrdom at Innsbruck in 1561 won him abiding high regard among the Brethren. Another Mändl, apparently of no relationship to the former, is reported by the Hutterite Chronicle for 1582. He was Jakob Mändle, who, while accompanying a Hutterite missioner to Switzerland, was apprehended by the authorities and shortly thereafter drowned in the Limmat River near Baden, Aargau, Switzerland. A schoolmaster Wilhelm Mändl was active around Nikolsburg before 1621, but no further details are given. The Klein Geschichts-Buch reports also a brother Paul Mändelig of Czech origin, who had joined the brotherhood in Slovakia late in the 18th century and in 1783 migrated together with 56 other brothers and sisters to Vishenka (q.v.) in the Ukraine to be reunited with the remnants of the brotherhood. His name quite probably was later changed into Mändl or Mendel, and it is he who became the ancestor of all Mendels of today who live on Hutterite Bruderhofs in North America, or have become members of the G.C.M. or K.M.B. groups. (See Hutterite Family Names.) (Zieglschmid, Chronik and Klein-Geschichtsbuch.)

R.F.

Mändl (Korbmacher), Hans, official name Hans Reichenberger, also called "Der kleine Mändl," a Hutterite martyr, was after Blaurock (q.v.), Hutter (q.v.), and Amon (q.v.) the most important of the Hutterite leaders in Austria. A native of Albeins near Gufidaun, a basketmaker by trade, he was won for the Anabaptists by Offerus Griesinger (q.v.) and was baptized by him in the Weissenbach Valley near Pens in the summer of 1536. Shortly afterward, while he was attending a meeting with a number of recent converts in the Sarn Valley, at which Griesinger preached, he fell into the hands of a band of scouts sent out by the district judge Joseph Grebmer. He lay in chains for 26 weeks at Sterzing. Wearied by his long imprisonment and the continued attempts to convert him, he escaped from the tower. "God helped him out," say the Hutterite chronicles.

Nothing is heard of his work until 1544 in connection with his second arrest. He was staying at Freiwald near Kortsch in a congregation of about 50 persons, to whom he presented Gilg Federspiel as leader. Not long afterward he was taken prisoner; after 22 weeks in chains at Landeck he escaped "with an unspotted conscience," but four years later, in November 1548, he again fell into the hands of his adversaries, and was held in prison 11 weeks in the company of Hans Gregenhofer, a Hutterite preacher of Nikolsburg. The priests of St. Lorenzen and Brixen received orders to instruct the two prisoners, but they escaped before any attempt could be made to convert them. Their jailers were surprisingly sympathetic with them; the priests raised the complaint that the prisoners were being treated with too much lenience, that they had been told that they were in prison not because of doctrine, but for disobedience, and they were given Bibles and other books according to their wish.

The escaped prisoners may have gone to Moravia, for many Anabaptists arrived there in the next year from Landeck, Schwatz, and Petersberg. In Moravia, Mändl was made a preacher in 1551, serving with vigor until his death. His particular assignment was to travel as a missionary. Thus he appeared almost year after year in Tirol and sent one little group after another to Moravia, most of them from the Vintschgau and the Puster Valley. To be sure, some fell into the hands of scouts, but most of them reached the Canaan they longed for. All attempts to seize Mändl failed; for the people protected this emissary in spite of all the mandates. During this period of roving evangelism he wrote three epistles, which have been preserved: (1) To the brethren in the Lord who live here and there in the Adige; (2) To the zealous in the Oberland; and (3) To all the good of heart, who have a zeal for God and His truth, sent in 1554 by us brethren and followers of Christ and His divine truth, we whom you know well and request that you become God-fearing.

Since the authorities did not manage to catch Mändl, who had so often been in the country and had baptized so many and was there again now, they were ordered "that they should henceforth keep a better watch on water as well as land." The government had made the discovery that the doctrines of the Anabaptists were making inroads in the Vintschgau, at mines in Scharl, at Matray, Salurn, etc., and that the Anabaptists were selling their goods and leaving the country by day and night secretly and openly by land and on the Inn. So much the more zealously did the authorities look for Mändl. On Jan. 19, 1560, they sent orders to Gufidaun, Steinach, and Axams to find out whether Mändl had property in Ableins, and whether he had a wife and child. They made the unhappy discovery that in Schlanders alone there were about 1,000 Anabaptists. So much the more pleasant was the news that Mändl had been captured near Rosenheim on Nov. 15, with Jörg Rack (q.v.) and Eustachius Kotter (q.v.).

Mändl was taken to Tirol and imprisoned in a deep tower on the Wellenberg, the other two in the Kräuterturm in Innsbruck. The priest Jörg Schiechl, "a clever and learned" man, was given the task of examining and converting them, "found that they were attached to Anabaptist doctrine and were completely obstinate therein and not open to his Christian instruction," and that more serious and severe measures were required. Mändl was cross-examined on Jan. 2, Kotter on Jan. 22, 23, and 24, Rack on Jan. 26 and 27, with and without the use of the rack. Several articles were presented to them which they were required to answer point by point. To the question whether they believed that one must obey the church, they replied that "of the present church they were not able to acknowledge that it was the true one. Only these who walk consistently in faith, doctrine, and life are true Christians." Baptism is a true sacrament. They denied that the sacrament of the altar is the true body of Christ. Concerning marriage, the wife is not obliged to obey the ungodly husband. Also it is not godly to marry for money or for fleshly lust. Their faith is not a "damned sect." They refused to recant; they thanked God that they were in the true faith and would stay in it to their end. Mändl's confession of faith has been preserved. It has the title, "Glaubensbekenntniss dreier Mannspersonen mit Namen Hans Mändl, Eustachius Kotter and Jörg Rack," and is found in the manuscripts at Pressburg, Gran, and Budapest.

The trial was prolonged because of jurisdictional disputes. Hans Mändl described his situation in a letter to his fellow prisoners. "They have put me into the tower where our dear brother Jörg Liebich lay for a long time. It is probably very deep, I have heard 6 fathoms, but it has a tiny window at the top, and when the sun comes around there it shines in a while, so that is is light. When the new year was past the authorities came with a new order." He received the articles mentioned above (a total of 46), which he had to answer. "I went to the torture as unfraid as if it had been no torture. After they had dealt with me three days, they put me back in the tower. At times I hear the worms in the wall. Bats buzz around me at night, and the mice rustle around me, but God makes everything easy for me. The second time they dealt with me one day because there were only six articles." The confession given by Mändl and his fellow prisoners coincides with the Rechenschaft by Peter Riedemann (q.v.), which appeared in print four years later. The death sentence—some of the judges evidently suffered qualms of conscience—was pronounced on June 10 and was carried out on the same day.

The chronicles record that a great multitude of people was there. On their way to execution, Dax pressed their hands, making them very happy. At the site of execution their statements and the sentence were read to the crowd. The spectators accused the judges and jury of shedding innocent blood. They explained that they had to obey the imperial commands. "O blind world," said Mändl. "Each one ought to judge according to his own heart and conscience. But you judge us according to the imperial mandates." He made a lengthy address to the witnesses; what he said was the divine truth, say the chronicles. Even when the judge said, "Hans, stop a little," he kept on talking until he was hoarse. Eustachius, "who was weak in the flesh," was first beheaded; then Jörg bowed his head to the sword; the executioner bound Hans Mändl to a ladder and threw him alive into the flames with the corpses of the other two (Codex 235, Pressburg).

Besides his epistles Mändl left four songs: "Dein Wunsch und Gab empfangen hab," 6 stanzas (Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 630); "O Gott in deinem Himmelsthron," 13 stanzas (of the year 1548; op. cit., 631 f.); "O Vater mein, ein Kindlein dein" (op. cit., 632-34); and "Gott Vater, in deinem Reich" (manuscripts 203 and 232 at Pressburg, Domkapitel). Kotter and Rack each also left three songs (manuscripts 203, 232, and 194 at Pressburg). Loserth.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 222-25; J. Loserth, Anabaptismus; for this article a manuscript by Beck was also used, "Hans Mändl und die Rechtsprecher des Landgerichts Sonnenburg," which coincides with the chronicles and the above book; Mart. Mir. D 276, E 645; Wolkan, Lieder, 228; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 11-13.

Mändl, Jakob, an Anabaptist martyr, was arrested with Heinrich Summer at Zurzach in Switzerland, and after five weeks of imprisonment in the town of Baden drowned there on Oct. 9, 1582. Twenty-four priests had vainly tried to convert the two men. Some of the judges hesitated to pronounce the death sentence on a matter of faith. Finally the majority voted for the death penalty, which the Brethren suffered joyfully. They admonished the great crowd of spectators to leave their sinful life and turn to God, and sang a song of praise. Their death made a deep impression on the spectators. Three songs were written on their death: "Merkt auf, ihr gliebten Gottes kindt, Die ir hie im Jammertal sindt," 42 stanzas; "Wir haben lust, Ein liedt zu singen, Könens nit vnderlon," 38 stanzas, found in Wolkan, Lieder, 234 f.; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder contains the first and also "Aus tiefer Not schrein wir zu dir, Herr Gott, hör unser Bitten." Neff.

Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 428; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 527 ff.; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 272 f.; Mart. Mir. D 749, E 1057; ML III, 11-13.

Manelfi, Pietro, of San Vito, Italy, a Catholic priest, became a leading figure in the north Italian anti-Trinitarian "Anabaptist" movement of the late 1540's until he relapsed and exposed the sect to the Inquisition at Bologna in October 1551. Instructed in Lutheran teachings around 1540-41 at Ancona by the Capuchin Fra Girolamo Spinazola and by Bernardino Ochino, after about a year he gave up his priestly duties on the advice of another ex-Capuchin, one Master Giulio. Some three years later he left for Padua where he was installed as a Lutheran minister. He then traveled about for some time in northern Italy visiting evangelical communities.

In 1548 or 1549 in Florence Manelfi met Tiziano (q.v.), who had recently been expelled from the Rhaetian Leagues on account of radical doctrines he had probably acquired from Camillo Renato. Tiziano and two companions, Iseppo of Asolo and Lorenzo of Modiano, acquainted him with the "Anabaptist" doctrines; to wit, (1) infant baptism is not Scriptural, (2) Christians cannot be magistrates, (3) the sacraments are only signs, (4) the Scriptures are the sole standard of truth, (5) the Catholic Church is diabolical and its baptism is not Christian. Some months later in Ferrara a former canon Iseppo of Vicenza converted him to these beliefs, upon which Manelfi, along with four companions, was baptized by Tiziano.

Manelfi now went to Vicenza with these men and soon Christological questions were brought up in the congregation. To settle the disputed points it was decided to call a council of leaders of the sect, two from each congregation in Italy and Switzerland, plus other interested parties. Tiziano and Iseppo of Asolo recruited the delegates in northern Italy, the Rhaetian Leagues, and the Swiss cantons. Manelfi had part of the responsibility for seeking funds and providing housing for delegates. Some 60 persons, all Italians and representing around 30 places, including Basel, Chiavenna, and St. Gall, gathered at Venice in September 1550. They met for 40 days and reached nearly unanimous agreement on several points which may be summarized as follows: Jesus was a man but filled with the virtue of God; there are no angels, and there is no devil or hell; only the elect shall be raised at the Judgment Day, the souls of the wicked dying with their bodies; salvation is by election alone and not by good works or by the sacrifice of Jesus. Manelfi claimed to have been instrumental in getting these points discussed and adopted. There was agreement on the other "Anabaptist" views mentioned above, special emphasis being laid on the teaching concerning magistrates.

At the conclusion of the council several men were designated as "apostolic bishops" to bring the conciliar decisions to the member congregations. Manelfi, as one of these, traveled to Vicenza, Padua, Treviso, and Istria with Marcantonio of Asolo.

Their labors brought about a separation between the congregations willing to accept the radical doctrines and those which held to the more moderate course, a division that was already in evidence at the council when the delegates from Cittadella refused to accept its conclusions. Manelfi named Lorenzo Niccoluzzo of Modiano and Pasqualino of Asolo as other companions on these visits, especially to the Romagna, Ferrara, and Tuscany. In September 1551 Manelfi was called to Verona to explain his doctrines. At a Sunday meeting attended by around 25 persons in a secluded spot not far from the city he found acceptance for his teachings on baptism and the incarnation of Christ but the meeting broke up in disagreement when he asserted that Christ was a man, born of the seed of Joseph.

October 1551 found Manelfi and a friend en route from Vicenza to Tuscany, when near Ravenna he decided to return to the Catholic Church. He told his companion of his decision, proceeded to Bologna and turned himself over to the Inquisition. On Oct. 17 he made his first deposition, wherein, after describing the circumstances of his conversion, he revealed the story of the Venetian Council. The authorities saw the vital importance of this information and transferred the case to Rome, where Manelfi prepared three more statements. In a deposition made on Nov. 12, 1551, he added details of his work as apostolic bishop and of what he knew about Tiziano. He also discussed the beliefs of his sect, stressing its teaching on magistrates, and pointed out that the unorthodox Christological doctrines did not form a part of the Anabaptist teaching until the council's meetings. He asserted that the only authority recognized by the sect was the Bible, excepting the first two chapters of Matthew and the first two chapters and part of the third of Luke: these passages, he said, were believed to have been inserted into the Gospels by St. Jerome. On Nov. 13 Manelfi provided more information about the council and named several men who attended it. He summarized the arrangements made for accommodating delegates and described the character of the proceedings. He named some of the other men who were selected as apostolic bishops: Nicola of Treviso, Tiziano, Iseppo of Asolo, Marcantonio of Asolo, Paolo of Treviso, Iseppo of Vicenza, Hieronimo Speranza of Vicenza, Bartolomeo of Padua, Giacometto of Treviso. Manelfi also listed as many members of the sect as he could recall and added the names of a number of Lutherans in Venetia. On Nov. 14 in his final deposition he described several occasions on which he and others had narrowly escaped capture and how they had more than once effected entrance to prisons to comfort fellow believers and even to win new converts. Thus in 1549 with Benedetto of Asolo, Manelfi had bribed the guards at a prison in Venice and had persuaded Pietro Speziale of Cittadella, a Lutheran prisoner, to undergo rebaptism at their hands. In some other cases they actually helped prisoners to escape. It is evident that the sect had a well-organized underground network and communication system. Finally, after telling of his attempt to win over the Veronese community to anti-Trinitarianism, Manelfi concluded his evidence by listing the names of several more Anabaptists in Vicenza.

About Manelfi we have no further knowledge. Presumably he was received back into the Roman Church, but his fate is of less interest than that of the people on whom he informed. The Inquisition moved swiftly. In December 1551 orders for the arrest of the persons named by Manelfi were sent to the political authorities at Padua, Vicenza, Treviso, and Asolo, and arrests and recantations followed. Many persons were forced to hide or flee the country; some went as far as Thessalonica, while a few years later some found refuge in Moravia with the Hutterites. The fate of the remainder is obscure, but this much is clear: Manelfi's treachery was substantially responsible for the exposure of the movement to destruction, even though the last symptoms of evangelical religion did not disappear from north Italy for about two decades. DEWIND.

K. Benrath, Geschichte der Reformation in Venedig (Halle, 1887); idem, "Wiedertäufer im Venetianischen um die Mitte des 16. Jahrhunderts," Theologische Studien und Kritiken LVIII (1885) 9-67; E. Comba, I nostri protestanti II (Florence, 1897); E. Comba, "Un sinodo anabattista a Venezia anno 1550," in Rivista cristiana XIII (1885) 21-24, 83-87; ML III, 13 f.

Mang, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, a hatter by trade, was taken prisoner at Sonthofen in Swabia, Germany, and died in prison in 1567 after a severe imprisonment; he kept the faith to the end.

Mart. Mir. D 344, E 703; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 252; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 324; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 423; ML III, 14.

Mangold, Stephan, a weaver by trade, a member of the Anabaptist congregation of Augsburg, Germany, baptized by Jacob Gross. Soon after the Martyrs' Synod his membership in the group became known to the Augsburg City Council, and he was arrested on Sept. 17, 1527. He refused to recant, but finally agreed "to swear himself out of the city," and was consequently expelled with five other members of the congregation including the stonemason Sebold Peuthelin (Roth, 235) and the wife of the preacher Sigmund Salminger. He sought refuge in Strasbourg, where he participated in a public hearing held in the presence of the reformers Capito and Bucer with several Anabaptists from Augsburg and many "others of all sorts of trades" (Röhrich, 36). But like all the rest, he refused to desist from his faith, and was therefore probably liable to the decision of the council expelling all Anabaptists (Gerbert, 56). There is no information concerning his further course. HEGE.

C. Gerbert, Gesch. der Strassburger Sectenbewegung (Strasbourg, 1889); T. W. Röhrich, "Zur Geschichte der strassburgischen Wiedertäufer," in Ztscht für historische Theologie, 1860; Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Ref.-Gesch. (2d ed., Augsburg, 1901); ML III, 14.

Manheim, a town (pop. 4,246) on the Big Chiques, 10 miles northwest of Lancaster, Pa., was laid out in 1762 by Henry W. Stiegel, and named after Mannheim, Germany. The noted Stiegel glassware was manufactured here in colonial times. In 1756 over 100 of the 118 families in the surrounding township of Rapho were of German-Swiss extraction. Two Mennonites, Stauffer and Eby, made grandfather clocks here in the early 1800's. Peter Longenecker about 1763 and Abraham Hostetter in 1839, both Mennonites, built gristmills near by. The Manheim (q.v.) Mennonite Church has its meetinghouse in the town, built in 1896. A large and thickly populated Mennonite community surrounds the town. I.D.L.

Manheim Mennonite Church (MC) was organized and its meetinghouse built in 1896 for the convenience of the members from the surrounding churches who had moved to town. After the East Chestnut Street meetinghouse in Lancaster it was the next town church built in the conference district. In 1955 the active ministers were Homer D. Bomberger, bishop, and Ira B. Huber, minister, with 170 members. The regional winter Bible school for this district is held here. I.D.L.

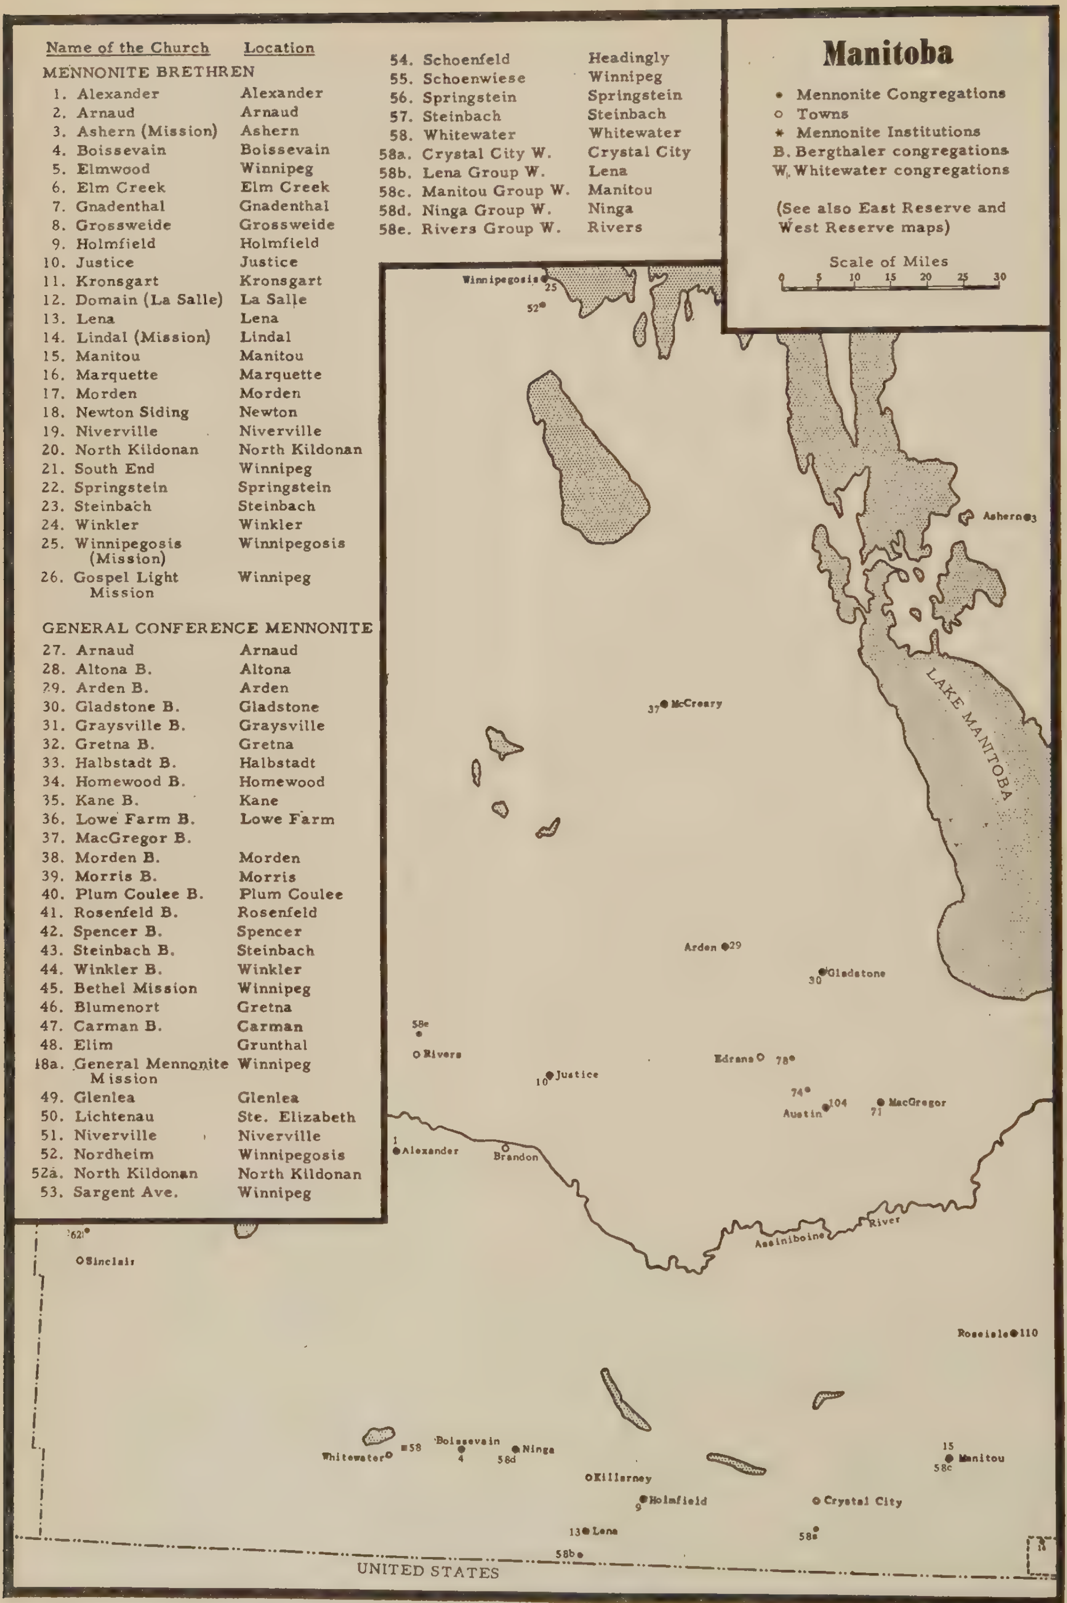
Manitoba, a province of central Canada, area 219,723 sq. mi., pop. 729,744, with 44,667 Mennonites (1951), divided into 16 civil units, called municipalities, bounded on the south by Minnesota and North Dakota, on the west by Saskatchewan, and the east by Ontario; chiefly an agricultural province, wheat being the main crop. Winnipeg is the capital. Its many lakes and rivers drain to Hudson Bay. The principal rivers are the Red, the Winnipeg, and the Saskatchewan. The Red River settlement was established by Selkirk in 1811 and was the nucleus of the province when it was organized in 1870. Beginning in 1874 Mennonites from Russia settled in Manitoba on both the east and west of the Red River between Winnipeg and the United States boundary. This area still constitutes the main concentration of Mennonites in the province. The great change that has taken place is that whereas they were originally confined to the rural areas, they are found today in all the surrounding towns and cities and particularly in Winnipeg (q.v.), which had 5,751 baptized Mennonites in 1951, and over 7,000 in 1955.

The Coming of the Mennonites. The Mennonites of Manitoba are of Prusso-Russian background; they began to come to Manitoba in the 1870's as a result of the introduction of universal military conscription in Russia. The second and third waves of Mennonite immigrants came to Manitoba after World Wars I and II. By far the largest of these three was the second migration, when nearly 21,000 Mennonites came to Canada. In contrast with the immigrants settling in the prairie states of the United States in 1874-80, who were primarily from the Molotschna settlement of Russia, Prussia, and Poland, the Manitoba settlers of the same period were with a few exceptions from the Chortitza (q.v.) or Old Colony (q.v.) settlement and its daughter settlements Bergthal (q.v.) and Fürstenland (q.v.). That this group and some of the Kleine Gemeinde Mennonites chose Manitoba is not accidental. The delegates of these groups were interested in the most liberal guarantees which would safeguard the future of their traditional economic, cultural, and religious life in a foreign environment as they had known it in Russia. Most of the Mennonites settling in the United States, particularly those of Molotschna and Prussia, were willing to adjust themselves to a much greater degree to the environment of the chosen land. They had already adjusted themselves to the economic and cultural life of their Prusso-Russian homelands to a larger degree than the conservative Old Colony groups.

After delegates from the Chortitza and Molotschna settlements had repeatedly tried in vain to obtain from the Russian government a guarantee to the effect that they would continue to be exempt from any form of governmental service to the country some of the leaders listened to voices stating that the only alternative would be emigration to a country which would offer them the "Privilegium" which the Russian government had given them and was now withdrawing. Cornelius Jansen and Leonhard Sudermann promoted this idea. Many meetings took place in the Chortitza and Molotschna settlements. The Bergthal and Fürstenland Mennonites took an active part in these meetings and watched the development with apprehension. Under the influence of Cornelius Jansen, Elder Gerhard Wiebe of Bergthal became interested in emigration to North America. When a delegation of 12 was sent to North America in 1873 to investigate settlement possibilities, the Bergthal group sent Jacob Peters and Heinrich Wiebe. The Old Colony (Chortitza) itself and Fürstenland had no official representatives in the delegation. The Kleine Gemeinde was represented by David Classen and Cornelius Toews. Meanwhile John Lowe, Secretary of the Canadian Department of Agriculture, sent William Hespeler to Russia, who met Cornelius Jansen at Berdyansk on July 25, 1872, and promised the Mennonites "fullest assurance as to freedom from military service."

The Bergthal delegates, Peters and Wiebe, arrived in Berlin, Ont., in March 1873, where they were guests of Jacob Y. Shantz (q.v.), who was a great booster of Manitoba. Together they investigated Kansas, Texas, Colorado, and Nebraska, finally proceeding to the Red River Valley of Manitoba to meet the other delegates. Here the 12 delegates were introduced to the governor by Hespeler. A group of 24 persons on five wagons drove 40 miles southeast of Winnipeg to inspect the land which became known as East Reserve (q.v.). Before the group had seen all the eight townships of the East Reserve they returned to Winnipeg; most of them, being disappointed, went to the United States. Hespeler accompanied the four Bergthal and the Kleine Gemeinde delegates to the West Reserve (q.v.) located north of the boundary and west of the Red River extending toward the Pembina Mountains.

After this inspection four of the delegates proceeded to Ottawa, where they received on July 26, 1873, a statement regarding the conditions under which the Canadian government would accept and settle the Mennonites who desired to come to Manitoba. These "privileges" were briefly the following: (1) complete exemption from military service; (2) a free grant of land in Manitoba; (3) the right to conduct their own traditional schools (with German and Bible as the main subjects); (4) the privi-



Name of the Church	Location
MENNONITE BRETHREN
1. Alexander	Alexander
2. Arnaud	Arnaud
3. Ashern (Mission)	Ashern
4. Boissevain	Boissevain
5. Elmwood	Winnipeg
6. Elm Creek	Elm Creek
7. Gnadenthal	Gnadenthal
8. Grossweide	Grossweide
9. Holmfield	Holmfield
10. Justice	Justice
11. Kronsgart	Kronsgart
12. Domain (La Salle)	La Salle
13. Lena	Lena
14. Lindal (Mission)	Lindal
15. Manitou	Manitou
16. Marquette	Marquette
17. Morden	Morden
18. Newton Siding	Newton
19. Niverville	Niverville
20. North Kildonan	North Kildonan
21. South End	Winnipeg
22. Springstein	Springstein
23. Steinbach	Steinbach
24. Winkler	Winkler
25. Winnipegosis (Mission)	Winnipegosis
26. Gospel Light Mission	Winnipeg
GENERAL CONFERENCE MENNONITE
27. Arnaud	Arnaud
28. Altona B.	Altona
29. Arden B.	Arden
30. Gladstone B.	Gladstone
31. Graysville B.	Graysville
32. Gretna B.	Gretna
33. Halbstadt B.	Halbstadt
34. Homewood B.	Homewood
35. Kane B.	Kane
36. Lowe Farm B.	Lowe Farm
37. MacGregor B.
38. Morden B.	Morden
39. Morris B.	Morris
40. Plum Coulee B.	Plum Coulee
41. Rosenfeld B.	Rosenfeld
42. Spencer B.	Spencer
43. Steinbach B.	Steinbach
44. Winkler B.	Winkler
45. Bethel Mission	Winnipeg
46. Blumenort	Gretna
47. Carman B.	Carman
48. Elim	Grunthal
48a. General Mennonite Mission	Winnipeg
49. Glenlea	Glenlea
50. Lichtenau	Ste. Elizabeth
51. Niverville	Niverville
52. Nordheim	Winnipegosis
52a. North Kildonan	North Kildonan
53. Sargent Ave.	Winnipeg
54. Schoenfeld	Headingly
55. Schoenwiese	Winnipeg
56. Springstein	Springstein
57. Steinbach	Steinbach
58. Whitewater	Whitewater
58a. Crystal City W.	Crystal City
58b. Lena Group W.	Lena
58c. Manitou Group W.	Manitou
58d. Ninga Group W.	Ninga
58e. Rivers Group W.	Rivers

Manitoba

- ● Mennonite Congregations
- ○ Towns
- * Mennonite Institutions
- B. Bergthaler congregations
- W. Whitewater congregations

(See also East Reserve and West Reserve maps)

Scale of Miles
0 5 10 15 20 25 30
Winnipegosis 25
52
Ashern 3
LAKE MANITOBA
37 McCreary
Arden 29
30 Gladstone
58e
Rivers
10 Justice
Edrans 78
74
Austin 104
MacGregor 71
1 Alexander
Brandon
Assiniboine River
62
Sinclair
Roseisle 110
Whitewater
58
Boissevain 4
Ninga 58d
Killarney
9 Holmfield
13 Lena
58b
Crystal City
58a
15 Manitou 58c
UNITED STATES

CHURCH OF GOD IN CHRIST MENNONITE

59. Greenland (Ste. Anne)
60. Kleefeld
61. Rosenort
62. Sinclair (Ewart)
63. Steinbach
64. Whitemouth

EVANGELICAL MENNONITE (KLEINE GEMEINDE)

65. Rosenort (Morris)
66. Blumenort
67. Steinbach
68. Kleefeld
69. Prairie Rose
70. Riverton
71. MacGregor
72. Winnipeg (Mission)

RUDNERWEIDE MENNONITE

73. Altona
74. Austin
75. Bergfeld
76. Eigenhof
77. Glencross
78. Mayfield
79. Morden
80. Neubergthal
81. Plum Coulee
82. Reinland
83. Rosefarm
84. Rosenfeld
85. Winkler
86. Winnipeg (Mission)

OLD COLONY MENNONITE

87. Chortitz
88. Blumenfeld
89. Rosenort
90. Reinfeld

CHORTITZ MENNONITE

91. Chortitz
92. Silberfeld
93. Niverville
94. Rosengart
95. Grunthal
96. Weidenfeld
97. Steinbach
98. Winnipeg (Mission)

EVANGELICAL MENNONITE BRETHREN

99. Steinbach
100. Stuartburn
101. Christian Fellowship Chapel (Winnipeg)
102. Winnipeg (Mission)

SOMMERFELDER MENNONITE

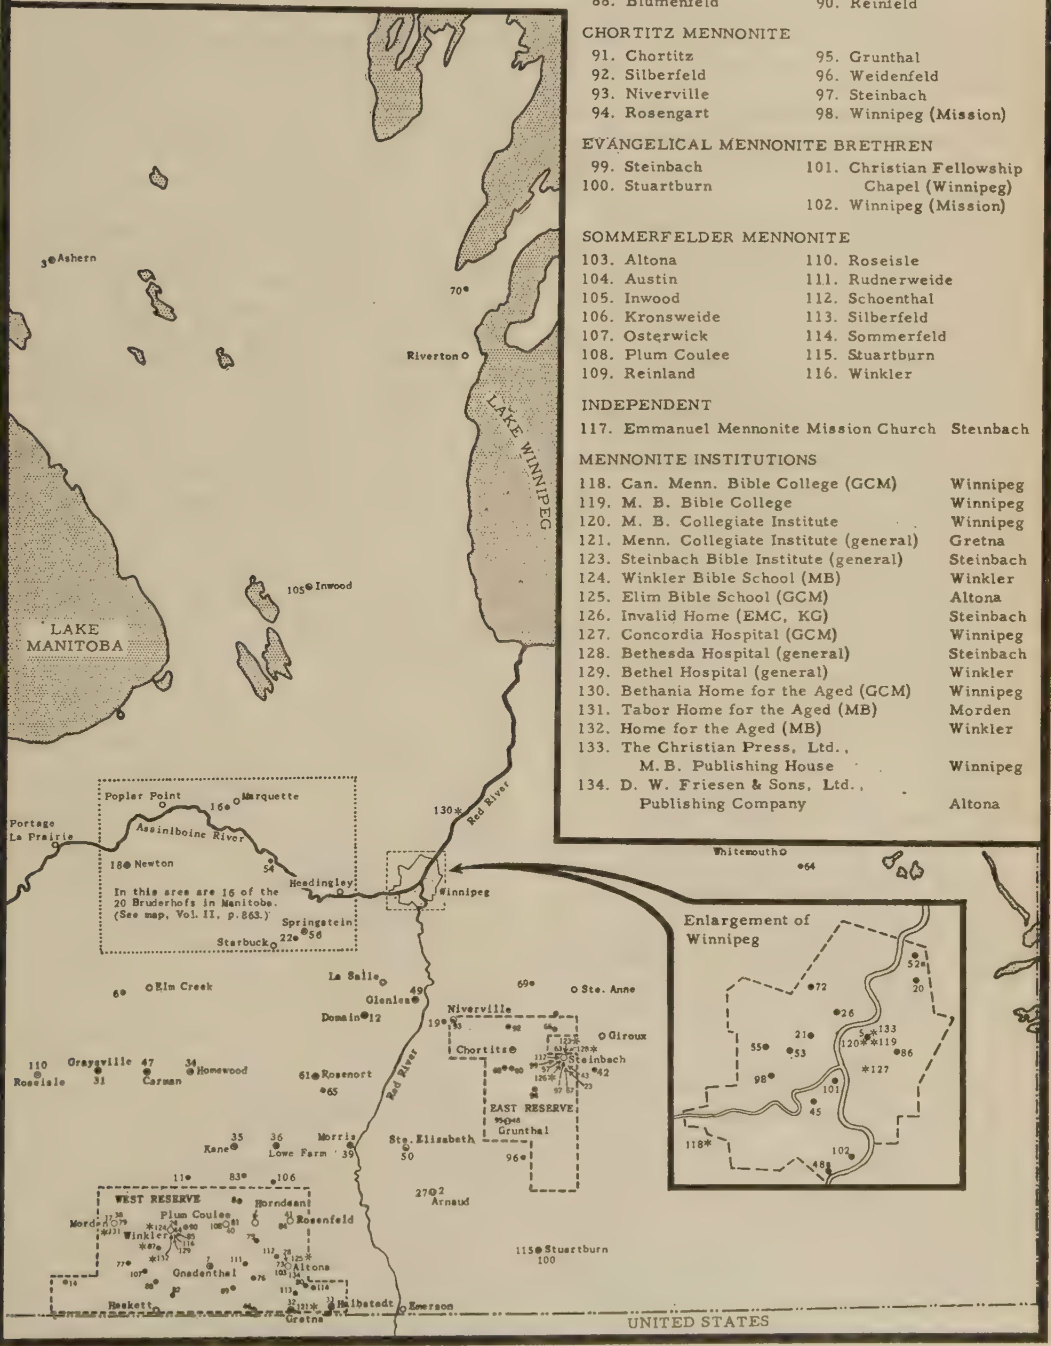
103. Altona
104. Austin
105. Inwood
106. Kronsweide
107. Osterwick
108. Plum Coulee
109. Reinland
110. Roseisle
111. Rudnerweide
112. Schoenthal
113. Silberfeld
114. Sommerfeld
115. Stuartburn
116. Winkler

INDEPENDENT

117. Emmanuel Mennonite Mission Church	Steinbach

MENNONITE INSTITUTIONS

118. Can. Menn. Bible College (GCM)	Winnipeg
119. M. B. Bible College	Winnipeg
120. M. B. Collegiate Institute	Winnipeg
121. Menn. Collegiate Institute (general)	Gretna
123. Steinbach Bible Institute (general)	Steinbach
124. Winkler Bible School (MB)	Winkler
125. Elim Bible School (GCM)	Altona
126. Invalid Home (EMC, KG)	Steinbach
127. Concordia Hospital (GCM)	Winnipeg
128. Bethesda Hospital (general)	Steinbach
129. Bethel Hospital (general)	Winkler
130. Bethania Home for the Aged (GCM)	Winnipeg
131. Tabor Home for the Aged (MB)	Morden
132. Home for the Aged (MB)	Winkler
133. The Christian Press, Ltd., M.B. Publishing House	Winnipeg
134. D. W. Friesen & Sons, Ltd., Publishing Company	Altona



3 Ashern
70
Riverton
LAKE WINNIPEG
105 Inwood
LAKE MANITOBA
Poplar Point
16 Marquette
Portage La Prairie
Assiniboine River
18 Newton
54
Headingley
Springstein
22 56
Starbuck
130
Red River
Winnipeg
Whitemouth
64
Enlargement of Winnipeg
72
52
20
26
21
55
53
5
133
120
119
86
127
98
101
45
118
102
48
6 Elm Creek
La Salle
49
Glenlea
Domain 12
69
Ste. Anne
Niverville
19
93
92
66
Giroux
Chortitz
123
63
128
117
Steinbach
99
97
126
43
42
23
97
67
EAST RESERVE
95 48
Grunthal
96
110 Roseisle
Grayaville 31
47 Carman
34 Homewood
61 Rosenort
65
Red River
35 Kane
36 Lowe Farm
Morris 39
Ste. Elisabeth 50
27 2 Arnaud
11
83
106
WEST RESERVE
Horndean
Plum Coulee
17 38
Morden 79
131
124
Winkler
90
108
81
40
85
116
129
87
132
84
41 Rosenfeld
75
77
107
7
Gnadenthal
111
76
112
78
125
73 Altona
103
134
14
88
89
80
113
114
Haskett
44
32
121
33
Halbstadt
Gretna
Emerson
115 Stuartburn
100
UNITED STATES

In this area are 16 of the 20 Bruderhofs in Manitoba. (See map, Vol. II, p. 863.)

lege of affirming instead of taking the oath in court; (5) a cash grant for passage from Hamburg to Ft. Garry (Winnipeg) of $30 per adult, $15 per child under eight years, and $3 per infant.

After the return of the delegation to Russia the Bergthal group, consisting of five villages, went in a body to the East Reserve of Manitoba. Elder Gerhard Wiebe reports about the choice as follows: "The congregation chose Canada because it is under the protection of the Queen of England and, therefore, we believe that the principle of nonresistance will be maintained there for a longer period of time and also that the school and the church will be under our own administration." The last point was made possible because the Canadian government set aside the East Reserve and West Reserve tracts for the Mennonites to establish compact settlements with their own schools and local administration. Although the Mennonites probably misunderstood the extent and duration of some of these "privileges," the United States could not match this offer.

The first Bergthal immigrants arrived in Winnipeg on July 31, 1874, on the steamer International by way of Chicago, St. Paul, and the Red River. Immigrant houses had been erected for them at the place where Niverville is located today. During 1874, 780 Bergthal Mennonites arrived, who were joined by members of the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.). The largest number of Bergthal immigrants came in 1875, followed by the last group in 1876, making a total of about 500 families consisting of nearly 3,000 persons who were transplanted from Bergthal in Russia to the East Reserve in Manitoba.

The Kleine Gemeinde also came to America as a group, being the conservative wing of the Molotschna Mennonites, organized by Klaas Reimer (q.v.). About half of the members of the group went to Jansen (q.v.), Neb., and the other half to Manitoba, where they established Steinbach (q.v.) on the East Reserve and Rosenhof and Rosenort on the West Reserve. The total number of this group that went to Manitoba was about 800 persons. They were the only Molotschna Mennonites to settle in Manitoba.

In 1877 the East Reserve consisted of 38 villages occupied by 700 families with some 3,500 people. The majority had come from Bergthal and had been joined by a few families from the Chortitza settlement and the small Kleine Gemeinde group. Some of the original 38 villages still in existence today are Steinbach, Grünthal, Chortitz, and Schönsee. The villages are patterned after those which the Mennonites had left in Russia and received the same names. The advisers and sponsors of the settlements on the East Reserve were William Hespeler of the Department of Agriculture and the Ontario Mennonite Jacob Y. Shantz. When Lord Dufferin visited the East Reserve on Aug. 21, 1877, he praised very highly the progress made by the settlers. In Winnipeg he reported that he had seen "village after village, homestead after homestead, furnished with all conveniences and incidents of European comfort," and he had seen "cornfields already ripe for harvest and pasture populated with herds of cattle stretching away to the horizon." The Canadian government loaned the Mennonite immigrants nearly $100,000, guaranteed by the Mennonite Aid Committee (q.v.) of Ontario, to which the latter added some of its own funds.

Apparently the Bergthal Mennonites reserved for themselves the East Reserve, leaving the West Reserve for the Mennonites from the Old Colony and Fürstenland. Fürstenland, the daughter colony of Chortitza, had its own elder in Johann Wiebe, but did not have its own Oberschulze. Administratively it was a part of the Chortitza settlement, at the time of migration. The leadership of the Chortitza or Old Colony settlement was more progressive. Elder Gerhard Dyck and his cominister Heinrich Epp of Chortitza had been in St. Petersburg repeatedly but they did not favor emigration to America. Elder Gerhard Dyck and Elder Gerhard Wiebe of Fürstenland, and Elder Johann Wiebe of Bergthal, were related and in contact with each other. In spite of the fact that the Chortitza settlement had no intellectual leaders and delegates as promoters of the emigration, a great number of the Mennonites from this settlement were ready to go to Canada. They attached themselves to the spiritual leadership of Johann Wiebe of Fürstenland. Some 300 families or 1,600 persons settled on the West Reserve in Manitoba during 1875. The West Reserve, consisting of 17 townships comprising an area of 612 square miles, was located west of the National border between the Red River and the Pembina Mts. and reaching to the United States border. During the summer of 1875 the first arrivals were living in immigration houses while villages were laid out and homes constructed.

Jacob Y. Shantz, who kept a list of all Mennonites passing through Ontario on their way to Manitoba (this list has been preserved in the Bethel College Historical Library), reported that 258 families came to Manitoba in 1874, and 621 families the following year, making a total of 879 families or some 5,000 persons. The total number of immigrants to Manitoba from 1874 to 1880 was (according to Shantz) 7,442 persons. D. H. Epp (Die Chortitzer Mennoniten) reported that 3,240 of them came from the Chortitza and Fürstenland settlements. Shantz lists a total of 799 persons from the Kleine Gemeinde. Adding these two lists we have 4,039, which leaves 3,403 as coming from the Bergthal settlement. The question left open is how many of the total of 3,240 listed by Epp came from Fürstenland and how many from Chortitza. E. K. Francis (In Search of Utopia, 89), who thought that all the Mennonites of the West Reserve came from Fürstenland, and for this reason refers to the Old Colony Mennonites of the West Reserve as "Fürstenländer," has evidently overlooked Johann Wiebe's statement that 1,009 persons were ready to leave Fürstenland, and also Epp's report that a total of 3,240 went to Manitoba from Chortitza and Fürstenland. Fürstenland (q.v.) had 154 farms. On the assumption that there were 154 families consisting of 7 members each the total is 1,078. This would mean that nearly the total population is included in Johann Wiebe's figure of 1,009, and that it was impossible that all 3,290 had come from Fürstenland. We can thus conclude that the Bergthal group was slightly larger than the Chortitza-Fürstenland group together, and that of the Chortitza-Fürstenland group about one third came from Fürstenland, while the other two thirds came from Chortitza. The term "Old Colony" Mennonites referring to the conservative group of the West Reserve is therefore appropriate.

By 1877, 25 villages had been established on the West Reserve. Most of the names are repetitions of those in use in the Chortitza or Old Colony settlement in Russia: Rosengart, Neuendorf, Blumengart, Kronsthal, Chortitza, Osterwick, Schönwiese, etc. In the two reserves together some 110 villages were established in the first decade. Some gradually disintegrated, others were transplanted to other localities. When the East and West Reserves were finally set aside "for the exclusive use of the Mennonites from Russia" by Order-in-Council of April 25, 1876, they included 25 townships or over a half million acres, which was about 6 per cent of the total area of Manitoba at that time (Francis, 62).

Adjustment to the New Environment. The Chortitza-Fürstenland people had scarcely all arrived when a shift of the Bergthal people from the East Reserve to the West Reserve set in. Around 1880 Hespeler reported that some 300 families of the East Reserve had moved to the West Reserve, leaving 400 families in the East Reserve. The reason he gave for this was that the East Reserve suffered more during the wet years since it lay lower than the West Reserve. Also, the Dominion Lands Acts made it possible for those in the East Reserve to acquire a second homestead in the West Reserve. Some of the villages established by the Bergthal people on the West Reserve were Gnadenfeld, Schönhorst, Sommerfeld, Halbstadt, Altonau, Bergfeld, and Schönthal. Already at this time departure from the traditional village settlement pattern was becoming common among the Bergthal people; a similar departure soon became apparent in other areas of life. Thus the Bergthal Mennonites of the East Reserve introduced a disrupting element into the fixed pattern of the Old Colony Mennonites of the West Reserve. Innovations introduced by Bergthal Mennonites were, however, as a rule followed and accepted by some of the Old Colony Mennonites.

The Bergthal Mennonites of the East Reserve continued as an ecclesiastical unit under the name Bergthal Mennonite Church, while the Chortitza-Fürstenland group on the West Reserve was organized as the Reinland Mennonite Church (named after Reinland municipality), which later became known as the Old Colony Mennonite Church. They had all come from the same background, but had developed slight differences which increased from year to year. Now that the large group of the Bergthal Mennonites had moved into the heart of the Old Colony Mennonite settlement the differences were accentuated by innovations and personality clashes. The Chortitza-Fürstenland group of the West Reserve became the custodian of tradition, while the newcomers from the East Reserve, the Bergthal Mennonites, became champions of progress and adjustment to the new environment. For the Old Colony Mennonites of the West Reserve the village pattern was the only way of life permissible and deviation was punishable. There was also disagreement regarding singing and the use of songbooks. Thus the Bergthal Mennonites from the East Reserve who had located in the West Reserve could not worship and have fellowship with the Old Colony group of the West Reserve. Since 1880 they had had their own elder in Johann Funk. Elder Johann Wiebe of the Reinland or Old Colony Mennonite Church of the West Reserve called a Bruderschaft (general meeting of male members) on Oct. 5, 1880, at which it was decided that those who were willing to adhere to the traditional principles and practices of the church should renew their membership, thus eliminating those who were lukewarm. The "lukewarm" members actually preferred to join the Bergthal Church of the West Reserve and did so. Thus the differences between Old Colony and Bergthal Mennonite groups were in various respects intensified.

In 1880 the provincial government intended to replace the Mennonite self-government of the Schulze and Oberschulze as based on old practices in Russia by the regular Canadian civic government. In the East Reserve the change met little opposition. The Bergthal Mennonites of the West Reserve were also ready to accept this change, particularly since the Mennonite government was in the hands of the previously established Old Colony Mennonite authority. For the Old Colony Mennonites to give up their self-government with the Schulze and Oberschulze and to yield to the Canadian municipality system meant not only forfeiting a practical and cherished tradition, but also the infiltration of practices and directives coming from a government beyond the jurisdiction of the elders and the discipline of the congregation. In spite of this opposition the municipality of Reinland was organized in 1883. The civic offices were usually filled by members of the Bergthal Church or by those expelled from the Old Colony Church. The Old Colony Mennonites approved of the Waisenamt (a mutual aid system centering around the care of orphans), but refused to co-operate in the Brandordnung (a mutual fire insurance) of the Bergthal Mennonites. Excommunication and the ban were used for those who adjusted themselves by wearing the clothing of the Canadian environment and by introducing other innovations such as bicycles.

One of the greatest problems arose from the school question. The Old Colony Mennonites of the West Reserve wanted to have their own teachers (without special preparation) teaching the children during a short term for a few years according to their own curriculum. The Kleine Gemeinde and the Bergthal Mennonites were more progressive and willing to avail themselves of government aid to improve teaching, and in a number of Mennonite villages established district schools. The first inspector of the Mennonite district schools was Jacob Friesen. H. H. Ewert (q.v.), principal of the Gretna Mennonite School, did much to improve the educational system and practices of his day, particularly after he was appointed government inspector. This only antagonized the conservative Old Colony element. (The problems regarding the school question are discussed in detail in the article Old Colony Mennonites.)

Economic Life. By 1907 the West Reserve was encircled by a network of railroads, supplied with grain elevators and business places. Winnipeg became an accessible market for butter, cheese, cream, poultry, eggs, and livestock. The tendency to abandon the traditional village and to settle on one's own land increased after 1880. First it was noticeable in the outskirts of the Reserve from Winkler south to the international boundary and from there east to Gretna. By 1898 the West Reserve had only 24 villages left. This involved changes regarding the traditional community land which had to be parceled out to those who left the village. Three-year rotation of crops gradually gave way to the Canadian practices. Great changes came about through the purchase of modern American machinery. The Mennonites are credited with the introduction of the mulberry tree, flax, and sunflowers to Manitoba. Until the turn of the century the Mennonites of Manitoba and Ontario had a kind of monopoly on Canada's flax production. Grain was brought along in bags by the immigrants, especially wheat. But this hard winter wheat, which had made Kansas famous, proved to be a failure in Manitoba. Spring wheat, oats, and barley became staple crops. Vegetables and fruits were cultivated. Jacob Y. Shantz helped the Mennonites along these lines. Mennonites made use of milling facilities wherever they were provided commercially by outsiders, and built their own mills only when such services were not available. Windmills were located in a number of villages. Feed mills were found in Blumenort, Altona, and Gretna. Steinbach of the East Reserve also had its own mills. Cheese making became important among the Mennonites, who generally operated on a co-operative basis. The early Mennonite cheese factory disappeared when milk and cream could be sent to the market in Winnipeg.

On the favorable soil of the West Reserve wheat and cash crop farming soon became prevalent, while most of the East Reserve with its inferior soil was for many decades limited to dairy farming. A middle-sized farm was 100 acres. In the East Reserve the tendency was to increase the size. The West Reserve soon began to suffer from overpopulation, partly because the young people were kept close to home, until an opportunity to found daughter colonies arose. Because of the rapid increase of the Mennonite population it became necessary to subdivide standard-size homesteads. This was handled through the Waisenamt (q.v.). The Mennonites had not immediately occupied all the land of the two reserves. Later the ban against non-Mennonite settlers was lifted and non-Mennonite population moved into the unoccupied areas of the reserves. On the other hand the Mennonites later extended their own landholdings in other directions beyond the limits of the reserves. The Old Colony Mennonites took the initiative in creating a new reserve in the Rosthern-Hague district of Saskatchewan, where by 1897, 200 Mennonite families from Manitoba were residing in villages just as they had been in Manitoba. Another settlement was made in Swift Current, Sask., in 1904, also by the Old Colony Mennonites. Other settlements were established in Didsbury, Alberta, Drake, Sask., and other places. According to the church record of the Old Colony Mennonite Church (J. P. Wall) the total number of Old Colony Mennonites in Canada in 1912 was 8,166 souls, of whom 4,358 lived in Saskatchewan. This shows that more than half of the Old Colony Mennonites were at that time located in Saskatchewan. In 1911 the number of the Mennonites in Manitoba was 14,498 (according to the census given by Dawson) and for Saskatchewan 6,542, which makes a total of 21,040. The Old Colony group was thus about 40 per cent of the entire Mennonite population.

Religious Life. The religious and cultural life of the Manitoba Mennonites was marked by very conservative attitudes. With the exception of the small Kleine Gemeinde group, they were all of the same Old Colony background. The Bergthal group had been established as a daughter colony only a few decades earlier in Russia. The Fürstenland daughter settlement had been established only about ten years before the departure to Canada. Although it furnished in Johann Wiebe the elder for the West Reserve, it was only a small segment of the total. The real differences in religious and cultural views originated in Canada and were possibly to a large extent due to personalities. The immigrants coming from the Bergthal settlement in Russia settled under the leadership of Gerhard Wiebe on the East Reserve. This was the nucleus for the Bergthal Mennonite Church. The Old Colony or Chortitza and Fürstenland Mennonites settled on the West Reserve, establishing the Reinland Mennonite Church, better known since as the Old Colony Mennonites (q.v.), under the leadership of Elder Johann Wiebe from Fürstenland. These two groups were apparently getting along well with each other. Through the infiltration of the Bergthal element on the West Reserve differences and difficulties arose, most of them relating to the retention of the religious and socio-economic practices of the old country or sacrificing them for new practices of the Canadian environment. The question arose whether a member of the church could withdraw from the village and settle on his quarter of land, and exchange furniture, implements, clothing, etc., which he had brought along, for those in use in Manitoba. Of great significance was the matter of accepting government-sponsored schools and government administration of the settlements. Gradually, however, the Schulze and Oberschulze were replaced by the reeve, and Mennonite church schools by district schools. All this was alarming for the Mennonites, who remembered that they had come to Manitoba not only because of their objection to a government-prescribed service but also out of opposition to the Russianization program and the introduction of Russian into their schools. Now they faced the same problem in the Canadian environment in spite of the guarantees they had received.

In 1880 Elder Johann Wiebe through a brotherhood meeting reorganized the Reinland Mennonite Church of the West Reserve, making adherence to the old principles and practices a test of church membership. Many of the Old Colony Mennonites at this time joined the Bergthal group of the West Reserve, which had moved in from the East Reserve and had organized under the leadership of Elder Gerhard Wiebe of the East Reserve an independent church with Johann Funk as elder. However, Johann Funk was too progressive for some of the Bergthal Mennonites of the West Reserve. In 1890 most of the group rejected his leadership and organized what became known as the Sommerfeld Church (q.v.), since its elder, Abraham Dörksen, lived in the village of Sommerfeld. Elder Johann Funk and his following continued under the name Bergthal Mennonite Church (q.v.). In the East Reserve the Bergthal church became known as the Chortitz Mennonite Church (q.v.), since its elder resided in the village of Chortitz. Thus by the turn of the century the descendants of the original Chortitza settlement in Russia had divided into the large Old Colony Mennonite Church of the West Reserve, with a less conservative Sommerfeld Church and a rather progressive Bergthal Mennonite Church near by, and a Chortitz Mennonite Church of the East Reserve which was spiritually and culturally most closely related to the Sommerfeld group. In addition to this there was the Kleine Gemeinde of Molotschna background represented in both East and West Reserve as a minority group. Although conservative in comparison to the Molotschna Mennonites in their attitude toward education and other questions which confronted the Manitoba Mennonites, they could be compared with the progressive Bergthal group led by Johann Funk.

In addition to the divisions caused by internal differences, new divisions occurred also because of the infiltration of new religious ideas and practices brought in from the outside. In 1882 representatives of the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite (Holdeman group), from Kansas to Ohio caused a break among the Kleine Gemeinde of the East Reserve which led to the organization of a Holdeman Church in the East Reserve which was joined by the Kleine Gemeinde elder and nearly half of the total group. By 1890 the Mennonite Brethren, who originated in Russia in 1860, had started a fellowship in the West Reserve at Winkler which became the nucleus of the various Mennonite Brethren congregations in Manitoba. The Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, originating at Henderson, Neb., and Mt. Lake, Minn., won followers at Steinbach among the Kleine Gemeinde and others, which led to the organization of a congregation of the group there at the turn of the century. In 1937 the Rudnerweide Mennonite Church (q.v.) was organized by Wilhelm H. Falk through the separation of a group from the Sommerfeld Mennonite Church, which was more evangelistic and more progressive. The migration of the most conservative element from Manitoba to Mexico and Paraguay, after World War I, and the coming of Mennonite immigrants from Russia after World Wars I and II, greatly affected and changed the spiritual and cultural life of the Mennonites in Manitoba.

The Bergthal Mennonite Church, which originated under the leadership of Johann Funk in 1890, spearheaded educational progress and helped H. H. Ewert (q.v.) in the establishment of the Mennonite Collegiate Institute (q.v.) at Gretna and the organization of the Canadian Mennonite Conference (q.v.) in 1902, which most of the non-M.B. immigrants coming to Canada after World War I and World War II joined. Most of the congregations of this conference are members of the General Conference Mennonite Church (q.v.), but the large Bergthal Church with almost 4,000 baptized members, has remained outside the General Conference thus far.

The following were the elders of the various groups. After the turn of the century Johann Wiebe, the leader of the Old Colony Mennonite Church, who was assisted by 12 ministers, was succeeded by Elder Johann Friesen, later in Mexico by Isaac M. Dyck. Jacob Froese became elder of the Old Colony Mennonites remaining in Manitoba. Elder Abraham Dörksen of the Sommerfeld Mennonite Church was assisted by 11 ministers. Elder David Stoess of the Chortitz Mennonite Church of the East Reserve, who had succeeded Elder Gerhard Wiebe, was assisted by seven ministers. The Kleine Gemeinde had Abraham Dyck on the East Reserve and Jakob Kroeker of Rosenort as elders, each assisted by five ministers. Peter Toews, a former elder of the Kleine Gemeinde, was elder of the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite. David Dyck was elder of the Mennonite Brethren group at Winkler. Johann Funk, elder of the Bergthal Mennonite Church, was succeeded by Jacob Hoeppner in 1903. He was succeeded by David Schultz in 1926, who since 1953 has had a coelder in Jacob M. Pauls.

Migration and Population Shifts. During World War I the school question and the resistance of the Old Colony Mennonites and other conservative groups of Manitoba to adjustment to the Canadian environment came to a showdown. The School Attendance Act passed in 1916 did not prohibit the attending of private schools, provided they conformed with the standard set up by the school administration, but once a private school was condemned, a public school was established with compulsory attendance. C. B. Sissons summarized the situation as follows: "When the war spirit got hold of the West, and to poor equipment were added the dual sins of pacifism and German speech, . . . recourse was had to compulsion." It was at this time of "persecution" that the thought of a migration into another country was born. Repeated delegations sent to the provincial and dominion Canadian governments were without success. The government was determined to break the resistance of the conservative Mennonites. Public schools were established in all Old Colony districts, and teachers were hired to hoist the flag each morning and lower it again each evening, but not a single child attended the schools. Thereupon attendance at public schools was made compulsory and punishment was administered when children did not attend the school. When repeated petitions to give the Mennonites the right to conduct their own schools were of no avail, a decision was reached to look for another country.

In 1919 two delegations went to South America, visiting Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay. Even Alabama and Mississippi were considered as places to settle. In 1920 the Old Colony Mennonites sent a delegation to Mexico. A second one followed in January 1921. They obtained a "Privilegium" very similar to that which they had once received from the Canadian government, which they presented to their constituency in Canada. On March 1, 1922, the first train left Plum Coulee, Man., followed by three from Haskett, Man., on March 2-11. Two more trains left Swift Current. All of these settled near Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua, Mexico. The Old Colony Mennonites from Hague, Sask., settled in Durango, Mexico. By 1926, of the 4,926 Old Colony Mennonites of Manitoba 3,340 had moved to Cuauhtemoc. Only a few more than 1,000 of the approximately 3,250 Old Colony Mennonites of Swift Current, Sask., and only 946 of the 3,932 of the Hague, Sask., Old Colony Mennonites moved to Mexico. This indicates that the willingness to migrate to Mexico was much weaker among the Old Colony Mennonites of Saskatchewan than in Manitoba where about three fourths of them participated in the migration. A smaller group of the Sommerfeld Mennonites of the West Reserve under the leadership of Abraham Derksen settled in Mexico in 1922 at Santa Clara, not far from the Old Colony Mennonites. During 1926-27, 1,744 Sommerfeld and Chortitz Mennonites from Manitoba went to the Chaco, Paraguay, where they established the Menno settlement, the first one of a number of settlements established by Mennonites in that country, the later settlements being made by Mennonites from Russia. After World War II Chortitz and Sommerfeld Mennonites from Manitoba also went to Paraguay, establishing a settlement near Villarrica in the eastern part of the country. Of the 1,650 persons who first settled there about one third returned to Manitoba. After World War II, Old Colony Mennonites from Manitoba, Mexico, and Saskatchewan also established a settlement in the Peace River Valley of Alberta, near Fort Vermilion. Kleine Gemeinde Mennonites from Manitoba established a settlement near the Old Colony settlement at Cuauhtemoc in 1948, called Quellenkolonie (q.v.).

Thus the most conservative element of the North American Mennonites located in Manitoba and Saskatchewan became trail blazers of Mennonite settlement in a wholly new cultural environment. They sought out an environment to which it would be least tempting to adjust themselves. This was Latin America. Probably 5,000 to 6,000 Mennonites left Manitoba after World Wars I and II for the new settlements. In the case of the Old Colony Mennonites a minority was left in Manitoba without leadership. In the case of the Sommerfeld and Chortitz Mennonites the majority in Manitoba stayed, which is also the case with the Kleine Gemeinde. The most conservative element of Mennonites was thus removed from Manitoba. This in itself was significant for the later development of the Mennonites of that province. However, the most important fact was that an almost equal number of Mennonites from Russia settled in Manitoba after World Wars I and II. Thus far Mennonites of Manitoba had been rural; many believed that to give up rural life for city life would mean to give up the Mennonite faith. With the coming of the Mennonites from Russia after World War I and the depression this was completely altered. Of the 2,000 Mennonite families which came to Manitoba in 1922-30 about four fifths settled on farms, some of which had been left behind by the conservative element moving to South America and Mexico, while about one fifth located in Winnipeg. After World War II about 3,000 Mennonites from Russia came to Manitoba, mainly to Winnipeg. In the city the Mennonites are employed as laborers and have established businesses, factories, etc. A number of Mennonite schools and congregations have been established in Winnipeg, and the present Mennonite population in the city makes it, next to Amsterdam, the largest Mennonite city population in the world.

In the rural areas Manitoba has been significant for the spread of the co-operative movement. By 1946 the Federation of Southern Manitoba Co-operatives, with 26 affiliated organizations, covered territory with a total population of about 20,000, which was almost exclusively Mennonite. The co-operative tended to replace the old institution of mutual aid which had served the Mennonites in decades past. Altona in the West Reserve became the center of numerous co-operative enterprises. In 1944 the Co-operative Vegetable Oils Limited was organized by some 800 farmers and businessmen in the Altona area. Less successful were the co-operatives on the East Reserve, where private enterprise prevailed.

CANADIAN MENNONITE CONFERENCE CHURCHES IN MANITOBA, 1954-55

Churches	Members	Total Population	Families	Ministers	Elders	Places of Worship
Arnaud	124	244	45	3	0	1
Bergthal	2,089	3,390	944	24	2	20
Bethel	269	384	120	3	2	1
Blumenort	368	684	146	9	2	5
Elim	250	472	111	2	1	1
Glenlea	55	87	19	2	0	1
Lichtenau	132	201	55	3	0	1
Niverville	139	366	62	1	0	1
Nordheim	117	195	41	2	1	1
Schönfeld	154	253	61	4	1	1
Schönweise (Winnipeg)	1,477	2,249	478	7	1	8
Springstein	194	354	83	1	1	1
Steinbach	208	354	86	5	0	1
Whitewater	568	1,103	230	12	1	6
Winnipeg	224	325	80	6	1	0
St. Vital	59	100	21	1	0	1
Scattered	30	50	15	1	0	1
	6,457	10,811	2,597	86	13	51

All except Bergthal are members of the General Conference Mennonite Church. The Bergthal Mennonite Church worships at the following places: Morden, Winkler, Plum Coulee, Rosenfeld, Altona, Gretna, Halbstadt, Morris, Lowe Farm, Kane, Homewood, Carman, Graysville, St. Vital, MacGregor, Gladstone, Arden, Neu Bergthal, Steinbach, and Spencer.

(Statistics are based on reports by B. Ewert, "Die Mennoniten in Manitoba," Mennonitisches Jahrbuch, 1951; reports of 1955; Jahrbuch der Konferenz der Mennoniten in Canada 1955; and other records.)

MANITOBA MENNONITE CONFERENCES AND CHURCHES

Church	Year Founded	Location
Chortitza Mennonite Church	1874	East Reserve
Kleine Gemeinde Mennonite Church	1874	East and West Reserves
Old Colony Mennonite Church (Reinland)	1875	West Reserve
Bergthal Mennonite Church	1880	West Reserve
Church of God in Christ, Mennonite	1882	East and West Reserves
Sommerfeld Mennonite Church	1890	West Reserve
Mennonite Brethren	1890	East and West Reserves
Evangelical Mennonite Brethren	1894	East Reserve
Canadian Mennonite Conference	1902	East and West Reserves
Rudnerweide Mennonite Church	1937	West Reserve
Hutterian Brethren	1918	West of Winnipeg

STATISTICS OF MANITOBA MENNONITE CHURCHES, 1950

Name	Location	Baptized Members	Total Population	Families	Ministers	Congregations
Chortitza	East Reserve	1,684	3,516	800	12	6
Kleine Gemeinde (EM)	Steinbach and Morris	1,920	3,800	1,000	20	6
Old Colony	West Reserve	638	1,465	360	5	4
Bergthal	West and East Reserve	2,089	3,390	944	24	20
Church of God in Christ	East Reserve and Morris	773	1,500	350	12	4
Sommerfeld	Manitoba	4,120	7,944	1,900	16	10
Mennonite Brethren	East and West Reserve	3,512	7,100	1,750	80	30
Evangelical M. B.	Steinbach, Stuartburn, Winnipeg	400	800	200	3	2
Canadian Mennonite Conf. (including Bergthal)	East and West Reserves	6,457	10,811	2,597	98	43
Rudnerweide	Rudnerweide	1,716	3,400	853	24	20
Emanuel Mission	Steinbach	300	600	590
Hutterian Brethren	West of Winnipeg		1,990			18

The flow of Mennonites from the country to the city increased rapidly with the coming of the Mennonites from Russia after World War I. During the days of depression many of the daughters went to the city to do housework. They had to make a living and to pay off debts for their transportation from Russia to Canada. One of the settlements of Mennonites, North Kildonan on the outskirts of Winnipeg, has grown to a modern suburb with numerous enterprises as well as two Mennonite churches. Winnipeg has a factory established by J. Klassen, the C. A. DeFehr and Sons' Importing and Sales Company, and numerous other enterprises. There is also the Concordia 50-bed hospital, and the Bethania Old People's Home on the bank of the Red River operated by the Mennonite Benevolent Society. Winnipeg is also the home of the Mennonite Brethren Bible College, and the Canadian Mennonite Bible College, established in 1947 and 1948 respectively. The Old Colony Mennonites were not permitted to go to Winnipeg, and if they did they were considered to have left the fold. Today Winnipeg with its 7,000 Mennonites has a larger Mennonite population than any other North American city. According to the census of Canada the Mennonite population of Winnipeg was 114 in 1921, 909 in 1931, 1,285 in 1941, and 5,751 in 1951. Other towns with a predominant Mennonite population in the East Reserve are Steinbach, Niverville, Grünthal; and in the West Reserve Winkler, Altona, Gretna, Plum Coulee, Rosenfeld, Lowe Farm.

During World War II approximately 2,453 Manitoba Mennonites served their country in Alternative Service as conscientious objectors. Almost an equal number served in the regular army. In addition to this a great number of men were exempted from service because they were farmers or teachers. During this time all the Mennonite congregations in Manitoba organized the Mennonite Peace Committee. The elders of the Sommerfeld, Chortitz, Bergthal, Rudnerweide, Kleine Gemeinde, Church of God in Christ Mennonite, E.M.B., and Old Colony Mennonites organized a Council. The executive committee of this Council had authority to negotiate with the government pertaining to all CO matters.

During World War I the Hutterites in the United States living on Bruderhofs underwent some hardships which led to their migration to Canada. Of the 17 Bruderhofs of South Dakota, 15 went to Canada in 1918-25. In 1955 there were 23 Bruderhofs in Manitoba located west of Winnipeg, named as follows: Blumengart, Sturgeon Creek, Barrickman, Maxwell, Iberville, Rosedale, James Valley, Riverdale, Waldheim, Bon Homme, Milltown, Huron, Poplar Point, Elm River, Sunnyside, New Rosedale, Lakeside, Riverside, Rock Lake, Springfield, Bloomfield, Crystal Spring, and Oak Bluff. The total population of these 23 Bruderhofs was 2,600 in 1955.

C.K.

Cornelius Krahn, "Adventure in Conviction. Russia, Canada, Mexico" (manuscript); E. K. Francis, In Search of Utopia. The Mennonites in Manitoba (Altona, 1955); E. H. Correll, "Mennonite Immigration into Manitoba," MQR XI (July and October 1937); and Carl Dawson, Group Settlement. Ethnic Communities in Western Canada (Toronto, 1936); E. K. Francis, "Mennonite Contributions to Canada's Middle West," Menn. Life IV (April 1949); Cornelius Krahn, ed., From the Steppes to the Prairies (Newton, 1949); Heinz Lehmann, Das Deutschtum in Westkanada (Berlin, 1939); George Leibbrandt, "Emigration of the German Mennonites from Russia to the United States and Canada in 1873-1888," MQR VI f. (October 1932 and January 1933); Paul J. Schäfer, Die Mennoniten in Canada (Altona, 1947); Walter Schmiedehaus, Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott (Cuauhtemoc, 1948); J. J. Thiessen, "Present Mennonite Immigration to Canada," Menn. Life IV (July 1949); Paul J. Schaefer, Heinrich H. Ewert. Lehrer, Erzieher und Prediger der Mennoniten (Gretna, 1945); C. Henry Smith, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (Berne, 1927); J. G. Rempel, Fünfzig Jahre Konferenzbestrebungen 1902-1952 (Steinbach, 2 volumes); Erfahrungen der Mennoniten in Canada während des zweiten Weltkrieges 1939-1945; Benjamin Ewert, "Die Mennoniten in Manitoba," Menn. Jahrbuch, 1951; Don E. Totten, "Agriculture of Manitoba Mennonites," Menn. Life IV (July 1949) 24; J. N. Hoeppner, "Early Days in Manitoba," Menn. Life VI (April 1951) 11; P. J. Schaefer, "Heinrich H. Ewert—Educator of Kansas and Manitoba," Menn. Life III (October 1948) 18; J. J. Siemens, "Sunflower Rebuilds Community," Menn. Life IV (July 1949) 28; J. W. Fretz, "The Renaissance of a Rural Community," Menn. Life I (January 1946) 14; Gerhard Wiebe, Ursachen und Geschichte der Auswanderung der Mennoniten aus Russland nach Amerika (Winnipeg); Jahrbuch der Konferenz der Mennoniten in Canada 1955 (Didsbury); David Janzen, "A Sociological Study of the Mennonites of Winnipeg" (manuscript); D. H. Epp, Die Chortitzer Mennoniten (Chortitz, Russia); H. H. Ewert, "Die Mennoniten in Manitoba," Bundesbote Kalender, 1903, 31-35; J. F. Galbraith, The Mennonites in Manitoba, 1875-1900 (Manitoba, 1900); Karl Götz, "Bei den russlanddeutschen Mennoniten in Manitoba, Kanada," Mitteilungen des Sippenverbandes der Danziger Mennoniten-Familien . . . 1939, 28-31; Journals of the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada . . . Session 1886, printed by order of the House of Commons; Klaas Peters Die Bergthaler Mennoniten & deren Auswanderung aus Ruszland & Einwanderung in Manitoba (Hillsboro); W. Rempel, "Die Mennoniten in Süd-Manitoba," Bundesbote Kalender, 1898, 36; J. Shantz, Narrative of a Journey to Manitoba, Together with an Abstract of the Dominion Lands Act and an Extract from the Government Pamphlet on Manitoba (Ottawa, 1873); C. B. Sissons, Bilingual Schools in Canada (London, 1917); Sixty Years of Progress. Diamond Jubilee, 1884-1944 (Altona, 1944); Walter Quiring, Russlanddeutsche suchen eine Heimat (Stuttgart, 1938); Waisenverordnung der Reinländer Mennoniten Gemeinden . . .; J. B. Hedges, Building the Canadian West: The Land Colonization Policies of the Canadian Pacific Railway (New York, 1939); S. C. Yoder, For Conscience Sake (Goshen, 1940); Johann P. Wall, "Diary, 1919"; Johann P. Wall, "Statistics of the Old Colony Mennonites from 1910 ff." (both microfilm, BeCHL); "Old Colony Mennonites and Hutterites," Record Groups No. 85; Records of the Bureau of Immigration . . . , Files 54623/130 and 54623/130H, April 21, 1919-Nov. 10, 1931, The National Archives of the U.S., 1934 (microfilm, BeCHL); David Harder, "Von Kanada nach Mexiko" (manuscript, BeCHL); various yearbooks and conference reports; Victor Peters, "Manitoba Roundabout, a Pictorial Survey," Menn. Life XI (July 1956) 104-9; ML III, 14-16.

Manitoba Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church, called in the Act of Incorporation "The Mennonite Brethren Church of Manitoba." The M.B. Church of Manitoba had its beginning on May 30, 1886, when Henry Voth baptized two couples. The place of beginning was Burwalde, near Winkler, where a little chapel was constructed. In 1898 this chapel was moved to Winkler. Then other churches sprang up around Winkler. A large influx of new immigrants arrived in 1922-25, most of them settling in or near Winnipeg. Today the M.B. Church is spread over the southern portion of the province, with a membership of 3,462 in 22 congregations.

On April 5, 1940, it was decided to incorporate the Mennonite Brethren Church of Manitoba, which was done. "The objects of the corporation are to promote, engage in and carry on the Christian Religion and Christian Worship and religious education according to the religious belief of the members of the corporation." The doctrines of the church are the fundamental teachings of the Bible about God the Father, Jesus Christ, and the Holy Spirit, as given in the Glaubensbekenntnis of the M.B. Church. At present there are 22 local churches in Manitoba, including five missions. The following institutions are owned by the Manitoba M.B. Church: one Bible school, one high school, one old folks' home, five mission stations, one Bible college (owned and supported by the whole M.B. Church of Canada). The Conference met twice annually until 1942, since then only once annually.

The M.B. Church of Manitoba is a member of the Northern District (Canadian) Conference, which holds its meetings once annually in one of the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, North Saskatchewan, South Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Ontario. The Northern District Conference is a member of the General Conference of the M.B. Church of North America.

Outstanding personalities of the Manitoba Conference have been H. S. Voth, A. H. Unruh, J. G. Wiens, H. H. Janzen, D. D. Derksen, and G. D. Pries.

H.H.R.

Manitoba Mennonite Mutual Insurance Company was established at Steinbach, Man. (its present head office), in 1874, and incorporated in 1940. It serves all branches of Mennonites in Manitoba, and in 1955 had 2,800 policy holders with $18,000,000 of property covered.

H.S.B.

Manitoba Mennonite settlement, the largest Old Colony Mennonite settlement in Mexico, located on the outskirts of Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua, 70 miles west of the city of Chihuahua, was established in 1922 by Old Colony Mennonites from Manitoba, Can. The land consists of 23,000 acres and was purchased from Zuloaga in the San Antonio Valley in 1921 for $8.25 per acre by two companies founded for this purpose (Heide-Neufeld und Reinländer Waisenamt and Rempel-Wall und Reinländer Waisenamt). Charles Newman and J. F. Wiebe were the mediators in the purchase. The settlement occupies a strip about 75 miles long (north-south) and several miles wide.

The Manitoba Mennonite settlement forms a civic and ecclesiastical entity. The civic leader is the Oberschulze (q.v.) and the spiritual leader is the elder (Isaac M. Dyck). The affairs of this settlement are handled independently of the Swift Current Mennonite settlement (q.v.) located to the north, and the Durango Mennonite settlement (q.v.) located in the neighboring state. In 1926 the Manitoba settlement consisted of 3,340 persons; in 1949 the number had grown to 7,706, and in 1953 the number was 8,768. The settlement consists of some 45 villages stretching from Cuauhtemoc to Rubio. Very few of the settlers live in Cuauhtemoc (q.v.). (See also Old Colony Mennonites, Mexico, and Cuauhtemoc Mennonite Settlement.) C.K.

Manitoba School Commission (Schulkommission) was organized in 1913 through the initiative of H. H. Ewert for the purpose of encouraging the instruction of German and Bible in all Mennonite district and parochial schools. It was composed of representatives of the Sommerfeld and Bergthal Mennonites and the Mennonite Brethren. The Commission reported annually to its constituencies. A special task was the negotiation with the authorities when the Mennonites were in danger of losing their privilege to continue their own schools in the German language. When the Commission failed in its efforts along these lines it was discontinued. A newly created Mennonitische Schulvorsteher-Konvention assumed the other tasks of the Commission. C.K.

Paul J. Schaeffer, Heinrich H. Ewert (n.p., 1945) 85 ff.

Manitou (Man.) Mennonite Brethren Church, a member of the Northern District Conference, was organized in 1927 under the leadership of Anton Berg, with 44 members. All of these were at that time new immigrants from Russia. A church building was erected in 1931. The following have served the church as ministers: Abram Friesen, Heinrich Goosen, and Gerhard Klassen. Many of the members moved to British Columbia in recent years. The membership (1954) is 84; John Wiebe is the pastor and John Lepp assistant pastor. J.P.F.

Manitou (Col.) Mennonite (MC) Church, at 206 Deerpath Ave., Manitou Springs, Col., a member of the South Central Conference, was organized in 1920, the meetinghouse having been dedicated on Aug. 15, 1920. The first pastor was Kore Zook, followed by L. C. Miller. The highest membership was 106 in 1946. Later more of the members lived in Colorado Springs, hence in 1948 the congregation was renamed First Mennonite Church of Colorado Springs (q.v.), with a meetinghouse in that city, which had 148 members in 1954, with Jess Kauffman as pastor. Near by is the Rocky Mountain Mennonite (MC) camp. L.C.M.

Manna, The, a 4-page doctrinal and inspirational monthly, edited by John G. Stauffer and published at Milford Square 1879-80, and at Quakertown, Pa., 1881-1909. Until 1906 it appeared as an English edition of Das Himmelsmanna (q.v.), first published in 1876. Bluffton College Library has a complete file. N.P.S.

Mannhardt, a German family, a part of which became Mennonites at the turn of the 19th century. Several members of the family were important in the development of the Danzig Mennonite Church and for German Mennonitism in general.

Johann Wilhelm Mannhardt (1760-1831), was born Feb. 14, 1760, the son of a teacher in Klein-Heppach in Württemberg, became a ministerial candidate in the Lutheran seminary in Tübingen, and was employed as private tutor in the home of the pietistically inclined Mennonite merchant, Jakob Gysbert van der Smissen (q.v.) at Altona on the Elbe. There he became the teacher of Anna van der Smissen, a niece of his employer, who later (1790) became his wife. With the assistance of his father-in-law, Hinrich III van der Smissen, he acquired possession of Hanerau, an estate near Neumünster in Holstein in 1798, and lived there until his death on Nov. 20, 1831. Er.G.

Heinz Münte, Das Altonauer Handlungshaus van der Smissen 1683-1824 (Altona, 1932).

Jakob Mannhardt (1801-85), the fourth son of the above, was born Oct. 4, 1801, completed the Gymnasium course at Lübeck, living in the home of the father of the poet Emanuel Geibel, studied theology at the universities of Tübingen (the first Mennonite student of theology) and Bonn, became Mennonite pastor at Friedrichstadt in 1828, and at Danzig in 1836, and died there on May 12, 1885. In 1854 he founded the first German Mennonite periodical, the Mennonitische Blätter, which he published until 1874, at first bimonthly and later monthly, supported by his colleagues B. C. Roosen, Johannes van der Smissen, Johannes Risser, Johannes Molenaar, and Heinrich Neufeld. As a preacher his pious faith and unfailing charity won him the highest regard, which was given rarely beautiful expression on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination (Menn. Bl., 1878, 42). Neff.

Johann Wilhelm Mannhardt (1831-80), a Germanistic specialist, the oldest child of Pastor Jakob Mannhardt and Adriana Margaretha (nee Thomsen), was born at Friedrichstadt on March 26, 1831. The stories of his great-grandmother and of his mother, who was reared by her, stirred the interest of the boy in folk tales and philology, and especially mythology and folk ways and Germanic legend. He studied at the universities of Tübingen and Berlin 1851-54. In 1858 he settled in Berlin as a private lecturer at the university. In several larger works, Germanische Mythen (1858), Die Götter der deutschen und nordischen Völker (1860), and Weihnachtsblüte in Sitte und Sage (1864), Dr. Wilhelm Mannhardt contributed to the scholarly development of folklore. He was also an active co-worker on the Zeitschrift für Mythologie und Sittenkunde. He continued his study along this line when his frail and misshapen body compelled him to return to his paternal home in Danzig, where he was city librarian. By sending out questionnaires, by private research in folk tradition, by visiting the internment camps in the wars of 1864, 1866, and 1870, he unceasingly gathered material for an Urkundenbuch der Volksüberlieferungen he was planning. He also published some smaller works as the fruit of his research: Roggenwolf und Roggenhund, Die Korndämonen, Wald- und Feldkulte.

To German Mennonitism Mannhardt rendered an essential service in the time when the final struggle of the Mennonites of East and West Prussia for the preservation of their freedom from military service was in progress. In 1863 he published the valuable book, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten, in which he presented a reliable, authenticated understanding of the historical development of the Mennonite principle of nonresistance and of the effort to preserve freedom from military service.

Wilhelm Mannhardt also devoted a great deal of energy to the service of the Danzig Mennonite Church. After 1869 he was frequently asked by the church to take the place of his aged father and read a sermon. This congregation owes to him its chronicle covering the years 1862-73, which he worked out with conscientious truthfulness and insight into the problems of the decisive period when nonresistance was dropped and mixed marriages were permitted. On Dec. 25, 1880, a heart attack put a sudden end to the life of this humbly pious and modest scholar with his rich knowledge and clear vision and honest search for the truth. Er.G.

H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde. Ihre Entstehung und ihre Geschichte von 1569-1919 (Danzig, 1919) 289-94; ADB XX, 203-5.

Hermann Gottlieb Mannhardt (1855-1927), the successor of his uncle, Pastor Jakob Mannhardt, in the office of elder in the Danzig Mennonite Church, was born Jan. 14, 1855, on the family estate of Hanerau in Holstein. His father, Hermann Gottlieb Mannhardt, the youngest son of Johann Wilhelm Mannhardt, was manager of forests on the estate. His mother, Bertha Weihe, was the daughter of a pastor in Westphalia. His intellectual development was influenced by his residence with his uncle Jakob and his daily association with his cousin Wilhelm Mannhardt during the last years of his attendance at the Gymnasium (1871-75). He studied theology at the universities of Strasbourg, Berlin, and Kiel 1875-78, adopting a mildly liberal theological position. Because of a dislike for the state church system he prepared himself for teaching and then taught German and history at the girls' school conducted by his cousin Louise Mannhardt in Danzig until 1900.

After the autumn of 1878 he frequently took the place of his aged uncle in the pulpit of the church. He became a member of the church, and on Nov. 30, 1879, he was ordained a minister by his uncle, and later also elder. H. G. Mannhardt served his congregation nearly 48 years, with lasting results. On Oct. 20, 1880, he married Elise Dyck of Einlage.

H. G. Mannhardt's work in his congregation was fraught with blessing. His sermons, born of personal faith, intellectually clear, his earnest baptismal instruction, his personal contacts with many of the members, his regular pastoral visits, and his readiness to help both as pastor and as friend, bound him closely with his congregation. During the decades of his service the church grew; members of the rural churches moved into the city, and members of other denominations joined his church. A new parsonage was built in 1884, corporation rights were acquired in 1887 on the basis of a constitution drafted by him, a new church hospital was erected in 1902, a new songbook was issued in 1908—which unfortunately suffers from a too rationalistic text and melodic weakness—and the organ was rebuilt in 1914. High points of his period of service were the celebration of the quadricentennial of Menno Simons' birth on Nov. 6, 1892, for which he published a widely distributed Festschrift; the important eighth general conference of the German Conference, the Vereinigung der Mennonitengemeinden im deutschen Reich, which met in his church on April 28-30, 1908; and the celebration of the three hundred fiftieth anniversary of the congregation at Danzig as well as the centennial of the present church building on Sept. 14, 1919, for which he wrote the thoroughly authenticated, lively book, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde. Ihre Entstehung und ihre Geschichte von 1569-1919. In 1905 he published and distributed to his members and to others who attended his church Predigten und Reden aus 25 jähriger Amtszeit.

Beyond the limits of his own congregation H. G. Mannhardt served German Mennonitism with his knowledge, experience, and energetic action. He always took an active part in the conferences of the West Prussian Mennonites, sometimes as secretary, later as treasurer of the mission board, and as a member of the committee of elders. He was equally interested in the formation of a union of the Mennonites of Germany, to be based on the Gospel of Jesus Christ and the common heritage. The visit of Pastor S. Cramer (q.v.) of Enschedé, Holland, in the summer of 1884 gave the impetus for the founding of the Vereinigung (q.v.) in 1886. The initial step was taken by the Danzig, Hamburg-Altona, and Crefeld congregations. Until his death Mannhardt served as the farsighted, competent moderator of its conferences, as a member of the curatorium, as assistant moderator and secretary, on the publication committee, as pastor of the students, and as special speaker at the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the organization of the Vereinigung in Crefeld on May 3, 1911. He published an excellent account of the creation of the Vereinigung in his Jahrbuch of 1888, and a series of annual reports until after the beginning of the first world war. The rise of the Berlin Mennonite Church is closely associated with that of the Vereinigung. Pastor Mannhardt gave this organization a boost by delivering an address at the first meeting held to prepare for it on Oct. 3, 1884, in Berlin. Several times every year he held services, administered baptism, and made pastoral visits in the Berlin congregation.

On a journey to the conference of the Palatine and Hessian Mennonites he became acquainted with the brotherhood in South Germany in Kaiserslautern in 1906. He also took part in the centennial of the A.D.S. (Dutch General Conference) in Amsterdam in September 1911.

His pen he also devoted to the interests of the Mennonite Church. In the promotion of Mennonite publication he saw a means of strengthening Mennonite group consciousness. From Jan. 1, 1888, to his death in July 1927, he was an associate editor of the Mennonitische Blätter; during his lifetime he wrote for it many articles on historical and literary subjects, and on a wide variety of questions relating to Mennonite church life. To the Christlicher Gemeindekalender he contributed historical articles and two original stories. The publication of the Mennonitisches Lexikon he greeted with pleasure and wrote for it several articles on the West Prussian and Danzig Mennonites. Of his longer works mention should be made of his Jahrbuch der Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Ost- und Westpreussen (1883) and his Jahrbuch der altevangelischen Taufgesinnten oder Mennoniten (1888). Articles on Mennonite statistics in various countries and on the origin of the Vereinigung give these yearbooks their special value.

In addition to his manifold service to his church and to Mennonitism in general, H. G. Mannhardt made many public appearances in Danzig, giving addresses at various celebrations and theological and literary lectures; for many years he directed the "Literaria," a scholarly literary club in Danzig. He retained his physical and mental vigor until a few days before his death. When he died on July 16, 1927, his congregation, German Mennonitism, and many of his fellow citizens thought with honor and affection of this man, characterized by a living faith and moral earnestness as well as great intellectual gifts, yet withal retaining modesty and simplicity of character. Er.G.

H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde. Ihre Entstehung und ihre Geschichte von 1569-1919 (Danzig, 1919); Menn. Bl., 1927, No. 9, 73-80; Gem.-Kal., 1929, 36-47; ML III, 16-18.

Mannheim, most populous (pop. 254,000) city of Baden, Germany, situated at the confluence of the Neckar with the Rhine, founded by Elector Palatine Frederick (q.v.) IV in 1606. The builder was Barthel Janson, a Dutch citizen. The city was destroyed by Tilly in the Thirty Years' War, and rebuilt in 1653 by Elector Charles Louis (q.v.), who developed it into the chief commercial center of his domain. By settling Walloons and Huguenots there he made it a haven of religious toleration and liberty. On Nov. 13, 1688, it was seized by the French and burned the following March. Elector John William (q.v.) engaged Franz Timmermann, the Dutch teacher of Peter the Great, to rebuild it. Mannheim was the capital of the Palatinate 1720-78; in 1803 it fell to Baden.

In 1655 two Hutterite emissaries from Sobotiste, Jakob Amssler (q.v.) and Christoph Baumhauer (q.v.), obtained permission to establish a Hutterite Bruderhof here. The terms agreed upon stipulated that (1) their house or houses should be built of stone, be roofed with tile, and be two stories in height; (2) they should enjoy all the privileges of citizens, could receive foreigners into the brotherhood, but citizens only with the previous knowledge of the authorities; (3) they should have penal authority over their own members; (4) they were exempt from all service in the army or court, or any other pertaining to the sword; but (5) they should pay their annual rental fee and other taxes, according to the regulations; (6) for five years they should be exempt from payment of a protection fee, and beginning in 1661 pay an annual sum of 50 florins; (7) concerning civic obligations they should come to an agreement with the city authorities; (8) each of the contracting parties might terminate the agreement upon a half year's notice; in that case the Brethren should be permitted to sell their property and take their goods with them (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 492 f.). Each member over fifteen years of age was to pay a recognition fee of ten florins per year (Walter, I, 292).

According to Struve they were "poor but industrious people, who would not have agreed with all Anabaptists, especially not with those who doubt the divinity of Christ. They practiced community of goods, engaged in all sorts of handicrafts except the manufacture of instruments of war, and did not marry outside their brotherhood" (Walter, 292; from a letter written by Heinrich Clignet in 1672 to Prof. Joh. Heinrich Ottius of Zürich, author of the Annales Anabaptistici, q.v.).

According to the records of the council of Nov. 23, 1664, the Hutterian Brethren built their first houses in 1652. In 1666 there were eight families. Probably in consequence of the plague their number decreased, for in 1670 there were only four families left: Moses Wirtz, a cooper and their preacher and leader (Vorsteher), Joseph Grütmann, a potter, Abraham Zahn, a knifesmith, and Heinrich Weinwurm, a tailor. There was also a blacksmith among them. (Liselotte, the daughter of Elector Charles Louis, as a child frequently visited the Bruderhof and at an advanced age in 1718 still recalled clearly having watched them at work, "of whom one made handsome knives of fragrant wood, another was a potter, and another swung the smith's hammer.") After his death they let the smithy to an outsider, but reclaimed it in 1671, for additional brethren had arrived from Hungary. Like the Jews and the Polish Brethren (Socinians who had settled there at the same time as the Hutterites, but had remained only three years), they were not drafted for statute labor or guard duty, but instead paid an annual redemption fee. From the record of the council determining the amount of this fee, dated January 1674, we learn that there were at that time 13 families in the Hutterite settlement. In June another family moved in. Their leader was now Joseph Grütmann. The council records say of him that the brotherhood in Hungary put him in charge of the settlement, to see that the buildings were kept in good repair until they could be sold. Several members joined the Reformed Church; in 1684 Jakob Grütmann also took this step. The city records state that on Dec. 9, 1684, the brotherhood was dissolved and the property divided; its value amounted to 1,332 guilders (Mannheimer Geschichtsblätter II, 56).

It is possible that the Swiss Brethren settlement in Mannheim was older than that of the Hutterian Brethren. Definite information is lacking. Risser, the minister of the Sembach congregation, asserted that "from 1650 on, Mennonite families from the Palatinate and new ones from Switzerland moved into the depopulated city and in inconspicuous quiet formed a small congregation led by their elder; their life and civic industry was by no means a deterrent to the reviving city" (Menn. Bl., 1855, 40). The earliest Mennonite lists of the Landesarchiv at

Karlsruhe do not mention any Mennonites living in Mannheim. It is possible that they were at first exempt from the redemption fee. Heidelberg reported on Feb. 12, 1662, that there were no Mennonites in its territory, since most of them were living in Mannheim. From Dirmstein (q.v.) it is learned (May 17, 1682) that occasionally a preacher came to Obersülzen from Mannheim to hold a meeting. This is proof that there was a Mennonite church in Mannheim at that date. Ernst Müller (p. 315) mentions a letter sent by Peter Lehmann and Rudy Heusser from Mannheim to the Swiss Brethren dated Dec. 23, 1697. (In June 1697 a very destructive fire raged in Mannheim.)

On March 10, 1701, the city council received an inquiry asking whether the Mennonites were considered citizens or mere residents. The reply, dated May 6, stated that five families were granted citizenship, partly because of the substantial houses they had built and partly on the basis of their peaceableness; but since the council was aware that this procedure was displeasing to the elector they had admitted no more Mennonites the last two years.

On May 9 the city mayor inquired of the elector whether the request of another Mennonite for citizenship should be granted. He said further that the six families living there now and the twenty families living there earlier had not only built well, but had in all respects conducted themselves honestly and compatibly. In June 1702 the Mennonites of Mannheim sent a petition to the elector, requesting that Mennonites moving into the city be permitted to become citizens as heretofore without having to obtain a special concession. This petition also states that before the destruction of the city in 1689 there had been twenty families living there. On July 4, 1702, Jakob Snebly, a Mennonite citizen of Mannheim, requested and received certification of their status from the French occupation authorities, which stated that the Mennonites had complied with all their civic obligations such as statute labor and guard service.

On April 27, 1706, at the request of the city authorities, Christian Blüm drew up a list of members: there were 11 families, Christian Blüm, Johann Jakob Schnäbele, Ulrich Mayer, Hans Müller, Christian Eicher, Matth. Bonn, Paulus Enger, Martin Meule (Meile or Mellinger?), Christian Stauffer, Johann Hassert, and the widow of Johann Schüler (?). On May 14, 1706, the mayor sent this list to the elector, and asked whether more should be admitted, since they were making frequent application; also whether preference should be given those who had money to build at once. The reply was that the Mennonites now living in Mannheim should be gradually put out of the city, since they were not to be tolerated in the province. From this time on the Mennonites appear regularly in the registers, which give some interesting testimony concerning their life and status.

In 1717, 19 Mennonite families lived in Mannheim: Hans Jakob Schnebele, Ulrich Mayer, Hans Neukumet, Paulus Engers, Chr. Stauffer, Valentin Christophel, Joh. Christophel, Heinrich Christophel, Matthias Bonn, Christian Blüm, Ulrich Stauffer, Johannes Fried, Andreas Berg, Jak. Schnebele's widow, Martin Meyli (Möllinger?), Jakob Hauter, Peter Heuffendorf, Chr. Fischart's widow, Philip Noldt, Jakob Hunzinger(?).

In 1738, 23 families: Joh. Hunzinger, Christian Schuhmacher, Andreas Berg's widow, Jakob Schnebele, Konrad Geber, Matth. Baumann's widow, Peter Pletscher, Jakob Cetti, Andreas Hackmann, Jakob Eicher(acker), Jakob Graf, Konrad Gerhard's widow, Joh. Stauffer, Jakob Dahlem, David Bechtel, Nikolas Blüm, Joh. Heeussert, Sr. and Jr., Joh. Borckholder, Joh. Kohler, Peter Holl, Jakob Blüm, Karl Krämer's widow.

In 1743, 15 families: Joh. Adam Hunzinger, Joh. J. Graf, Joh. Heussert, Joh. Jak. Pletscher, Susanna Berg (a widow), Margarethe Bonn (widow), Agnes Geber (widow), Abraham Mossimann, renter on Mühlau, David Bechtel, Jakob Eichacker, Joh. Keller, Joh. Burkholder, Christian Schuhmacher, Nicolaus Bonn, Jakob Graf.

In 1752, 18 families: Jak. Pletscher, Chr. Schuhmacher, Jak. Gräf, Joh. Bühler, Joh. Borckholder, Joh. Hassert (these 6 families before 1744), David Bechtel, Adam Hunzinger, Jak. Eichacker, Chr. Eicher, Friedrich Möllinger, Mathias Bonn, Abraham Deutsch, Martin Möllinger, Chr. Neukumeter, Joh. Hunzinger, Jakob Hackmann. Most of them were distillers.

In 1759, 18 families: Joh. Georg Bechtel's widow (weaver since 1726), Chr. Neukumeter's widow, Heinrich Mayer, Joh. Hassert, Martin Möllinger, Friedr. Möllinger, Christian Schuhmacher, Joh. Schuhmacher, Jakob Hunzinger, wine merchant, J. Hunzinger's widow, Geber's widow, Matth. Bonn, Josepf Graf, Abraham Deutsch, Joh. Keller, Joh. Graf, Jak. Pletscher (artisan), Jak. Hackmann.

In 1768, 20 families: Chr. Schuhmacher, Martin Möllinger, Jak. Pletscher, Abraham Deutsch, Joh. Hassert, Joh. Keller, Joh Schuhmacher, Jak. Hunzinger, Jak. Neukumet, Jak. Hackmann, Joh. Hackmann, Dan Geber, Jak. Geber, Matth. Bonn, Friedrich Bergthold, Jak. Bechtel, Joh. Schmidt, Peter Graf, Jak. Hunsinger's mother (a widow), Dan. Pletscher's widow.

In 1732 the Mennonites numbered 35 families: there were Mennonites living outside the city on the Kirchgarthäuserhof (q.v.), Gräfenau, and Hemshof (see Friesenheim). In the early 18th century Hans Jacob Schnaebele (Schnäbeli) was preacher. Martin Möllinger was elder 1761-*ca.*72; the preachers were Johann Huntzinger, Heinrich Pletscher, Christian Schumacher until about 1772, Jakob Plätscher 1741-?, Jakob Hackmann 1741-?, and Jacob Gerber 1775-? (Naamlijst). The deacon was David Bechtel (Müller, 221).

For a long time Mannheim was a center of the congregations in the Palatinate, both East and West. Here the letters and petitions to Holland were written and the petitions to the Palatine government drawn up (Oct. 2 and 30, 1730; March 7 and May 5, 1740; May 2, 1742; Dec. 10, 1743; March 30, 1744; May 14, 1784). On Jan. 6, 1708 (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1254b; Müller, 255), the elders of the Mannheim congregation wrote a letter to Amsterdam, telling of the visit of one of the brethren to Switzerland. A letter of March 30, 1710, relates that 56 Swiss Mennonite prisoners had arrived at Mannheim from Switzerland on March 28, many of whom remained there because of sickness when the rest moved on (see Bern). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 1258.)

Great anxiety came upon the leaders of the congregation in 1742, when they were ordered to pay the withdrawal fee for some brethren who had moved out of the city. The petition they sent to the government for release from this burden states that Pletscher had gone to Eppstein in 1737, Peter Holl to Eppstein and on to Crefeld in 1741, Johann Stauffer also to Crefeld, and Jakob Cetty to Kirchheim near Heidelberg in 1738. Abraham Mossemann had settled at Mühlau near Mannheim; on Jan. 12, 1742, he was assessed the protection fee from the middle of October 1741.

By 1774 the congregation of Mannheim had apparently fallen into decline, having neither an elder nor a preacher. Preachers of neighboring congregations occasionally served at Mannheim (Naamlijst 1786).

In 1782 a certain Count Bock described a visit he paid to the Mennonites in Mannheim. Their place of meeting was a large hall. In the background was an armchair, elevated somewhat above the benches filling the room. Before this chair stood a table with a Bible on it. This was all there was in furnishings. At the entry were the words, Zum Haus des grossen Vaters.

On June 11, 1792, the leaders presented a petition to the government, requesting that the impoverished Daniel Möllinger be excused from his protection payment. On it the mayor remarked that the Mennonites never made a petition of this nature without serious cause. One of the outstanding preachers was Martin Möllinger (q.v.) (for his correspondence with Steen in Danzig, etc., see Menn. Bl., 1854, 30 and 44 f., and Gem.-Kal., 1935, 112-20). Finally the congregation was served for a time by Weydmann, the Monsheim minister. About 1830 it was dissolved. Its capital, which amounted to several thousand guilders, was given to the city poor fund and to the Protestant Church. The few members who had remained true to the faith of the fathers transferred to Friesenheim (q.v.) and other congregations.

The archives of the Reformed Church in Mannheim contain four Mennonite church record books, which are of great interest to students of family history. NEFF.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1254, 1258, 1266, 1268, 1270, 1342, 1374, 1440, 1472, 1475-82; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 492 f.; A. Brons, Ursprung, Entwicklung und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (Emden, 1912) 200; Gbl. 1904, 17; M. Göbel, Gesch. des christl. Lebens in der rhein. Kirche (1849) I, 591; II, 696; Mannheimer Gesch.-Bl. II (1901); A. Medicus, Gesch. der evangelischen Kirche in Königreich Bayern, supplement 1865; Menn. Bl., 1855, 40; Müller, Berner Täufer, 211, 315; Nüssle, Bilder und Beiträge aus und zur Kirchengesch. der Stadt Mannheim; B. G. Struve, Ausführlicher Bericht von der Pfälzischen Kirchenhistorie (Frankfurt, 1721) 692; K. F. Vierordt, Gesch. d. evangelischen Kirche in dem Grossherzogtum Baden IV (Karlsruhe, 1856) 507; W. Fellmann, "Vier Mannheimer mennonitische Kirchenbücher im Pfarrarchiv der reformierten Gemeinde Mannheim," in Gesch.-Bl. IV (1939) 57 f.; Fr. Walter, Mannheim in Vergangenheit und Gegenwart III (1907); J. Ellenberger, Bilder aus dem Pilgerleben III (n.p., 1883) 28; DB 1895, 68; ML III, 19-22.

Manson (Iowa) Mennonite Church: see Cedar Creek.

Mantelhof, a farm in the Aalen district of Württemberg, Germany, the site of numerous martyrdoms. On Jan. 1, 1531, the horsemen of Württemberg and of the provost of Ellwangen, led by provost Aichelin (q.v.), surprised Mantelhof and seized the resident farmer and his son besides 20 other persons, all of them Anabaptists. The farmer and his son were hanged on a linden tree in the neighboring village of Essingen. The farmer was let down three times, and was offered his life if he would be converted, but to no avail. The son was probably similarly treated. The others were given a chance to recant and save their lives; few did so. Fourteen of them lost their lives by being burned together with the house they were in. Beck states that 23 persons were burned at Mantelhof. The saying was current that if they had waited another day or two a large crowd of Anabaptists, perhaps 200, would have been caught at Mantelhof, for there were many of them in the desolate places of the Aalbuch. Some of them were seized by Wolf von Rechberg at Hohenrechberg and released upon payment of a fine. G.Bo.

F. L. Baumann, "Weissenhorner Historie von Nikolaus Thomä," 170 ff., in Quellen zur Gesch. des Bauernkriegs in Oberschwaben (Bibliothek des Literarischen Vereins CXXIX); Beschreibung des Oberamts Aalen (1854) 321; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 311; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 54; ML III, 22.

Manuscripts from ancient and modern times form the most important source material for the study of Anabaptist-Mennonite history. Only a little of this material is privately owned; most of it has been preserved in archives (q.v.) and libraries. After archivist Ludwig Keller had given the impetus by his books on Anabaptism, a beginning was made in collecting and examining this valuable material.

That found in Zürich, as far as it concerns the 16th and 17th centuries, has been published and utilized in the works of Emil Egli (q.v.) and by Cornelius Bergmann in his book, Die Täuferbewegung im Kanton Zürich bis 1660. A volume of Zürich Täuferakten was published in 1952, extending, however, only to 1533.

The State Archives of Bern contain court records of extraordinary scope and value. Ernst Müller has worked through most of it in his book, Die Bernischen Täufer, and more recently Delbert Gratz for his book, Bernese Anabaptists. Much that is of importance for research is contained in Vol. 80 of the so-called Unnütze Papiere, an enormous folio volume of manuscripts; likewise the volume Kirchenwesen II, 131, De Anabaptistis Varia, and the three large manuscript volumes, Kirchenwesen II, D 85, E 86, and F 87 of Abraham de Losea (q.v.). A mass of manuscript material on Anabaptist matters is contained in the Turmbücher, the Mandatenbücher, the Missivenbücher, the Täufer-Urbar, as well as the Rats- und Chorgerichtsmanuale. Various volumes of manuscripts (Kontrollbücher, etc.) and a bundle of court records from the 19th century report on the Anabaptists of that period. Much valuable material for the history of the Anabaptists is also located in the Fascicles Misc. Hist. Helv. I, II, III, VII, VIII, XI, XIII, and XIV. Much of the Bern material has been microfilmed by the Bluffton College Historical Library.

The manuscripts in the city archives of Basel have been worked through by Paul Burckhardt in his book, Die Basler Täufer. There is here a large bundle of court records, Criminalia, which deals with Anabaptist history in the 16th and 17th centuries. The materials concerning the 18th and 19th century Edward Thurneysen has covered in a general historical survey in "Die Basler Separatisten im 18. Jahrhundert," in Basler Jahrbuch, 1895 and 1896. (See also the article Basel.) The manuscripts of more recent times were copied by the theological student Peter Dirks in 1914 for the archives of the Mennonitisches Lexikon. Their value lies chiefly in the line of family history.

In 1920 the directors of the Verein für Reformationsgeschichte decided to have all the Täuferakten (court records concerning Anabaptists) published, which have been preserved in the archives and libraries of German-speaking Europe. This is being done in the series, Quellen zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer (since World War II Täufer), which is publishing the court records of Württemberg, Bavaria, Alsace, Baden, Palatinate, Switzerland, Thuringia, Saxony, Silesia, and the Lower Rhine. The first volume was published in 1930: Herzogtum Württemberg, by Gustav Bossert, Sr. (Leipzig, 1930, XVI and 1199 pages). Later volumes have appeared as follows: Markgraftum Brandenburg (Bayern I) by Schornbaum 1934; South German and Hutterite documents in Glaubenszeugnisse I by Lydia Müller 1938; Baden-Pfalz by Krebs 1951; Imperial Cities (Bayern II), by Schornbaum 1951. By these publications the rich treasures in Anabaptist manuscripts preserved in various archives and libraries in these countries will be made easily accessible. This will give opportunity and occasion to thoroughly investigate the manuscripts of the last decades of the 16th century as well as those of the 17th and 18th and will make them available for proper research. Those that have been preserved in the Generallandesarchiv in Karlsruhe, have been copied by Christian Neff and are now in the archives of the Lexikon. The records of the 16th century were utilized by Christian Hege in his book, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908). The Hesse manuscripts were published in 1951 by the Historical Kommission für Hessen und Waldeck. The Swiss documents are being published by L. von Muralt in a series called Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer in der Schweiz; Zürich appeared as Vol. I in 1952.

The exceedingly rich manuscript source material of Austrian Anabaptism was treated and listed by Robert Friedmann in a very valuable work (Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte XXVI, 1929). The manner in which he describes and evaluates the peculiar importance of these Anabaptist manuscripts, found in "books" and letters or lost, deserves the profoundest respect.

The library of the Mennonite Church in Amsterdam contains an uncommonly rich collection of important manuscripts (letters) and court records on the history of the Dutch, Swiss, and German Mennonite congregations. They are carefully listed in the Inventaris der Archiefstukken, Vols. I and II (1883-84). The records of Germany and Switzerland are contained in Vol. I, Nos. 1248-1745, Vol. II, Pt. I, Nos. 2571-2862, and Pt. II, Nos. 680-867. Their publication is earnestly desired in the interest of historical exploitation. The Historical Committee of the General Conference Mennonite Church has microfilmed most of these materials and made them available for research in America.

Some valuable manuscripts on the history of the Swiss Anabaptists and Mennonites are found in private possession. The task of collecting them and preserving them for the brotherhood has been undertaken by the Swiss Mennonites. A large part of their collection has been published by M. Pohl in the Christlicher Gemeindekalender, 1906-11, and by Christian Neff, 1929-30, under heading, "Geschichtliche Beiträge aus den Mennoniten-Gemeinden."

There is also some manuscript material of historical importance among the Mennonite families in Hesse and the Palatinate. It has in part been published in the Christlicher Gemeindekalender, 1925 ("Lebensbild von David Kaege von Offstein"), and in the Mennonitische Blätter, 1907, p. 51 f.; 1912, p. 2 f.; and in the Gemeindeblatt, 1929; most of it, reposing in the archives of the Lexikon, still awaits publication. (ML II, 247 ff.) NEFF, H.S.B.

Manz, Felix, one of the founders and first martyr of the original Swiss Brethren congregation in Zürich, Switzerland, was born about 1498, the son of a Zürich canon, acquired a thorough knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. When Zwingli came to Zürich in 1519, Manz joined him enthusiastically and became a regular attendant at Zwingli's Bible classes.

Differences of opinion soon arose when he and his associates demanded the abolition of tithes and interest. Zwingli hesitated, although he could not entirely close his mind to the Biblical basis for this demand (see his noted sermon on divine and human righteousness on June 24, 1523). Even more insistently the Brethren demanded the abolition of the Mass. When Zwingli left the decision in this matter in the hands of the Zürich city council the Brethren broke with him and henceforth held their own meetings in the home of Felix Manz's mother.

The question of baptism at once arose. Several fathers refused to have their children baptized. They were fined. On Jan. 17, 1525, a public disputation was held in the city hall of Zürich to decide the issue, with Conrad Grebel and Felix Manz representing the Brethren. Zwingli was pronounced the victor. In consequence an order was issued on Jan. 18, threatening those who would not have their children baptized within eight days with banishment from the city. Grebel and Manz were to desist from their arguing and submit to the opinion of "my lords (of the city council)."

This the Brethren refused to do. On Jan. 21 they performed the rite of adult baptism and held a communion service among themselves, thereby making their break with the Zwingli church final and establishing their brotherhood as a distinct Christian body. The movement spread rapidly through the city and the canton of Zürich. Felix Manz was among the most zealous in proclaiming the new doctrine. He was repeatedly arrested. He earnestly requested an opportunity to express himself in writing on the points in dispute, since it was impossible to do justice to the matter in oral debate. But the council refused.

The second disputation in Zürich took place on March 20, 1525. The result was again negative. The Brethren (14 men and 7 women) were imprisoned in the Hexenturm on bread and water. On April 5 they managed to escape. But they were soon captured and subjected to a severe cross-examination. Felix Manz testified that he had never rejected government, interest, and tithes. If he had taken the liberty to preach in other pastorates, he had only done what a disciple of Christ must do. Capital punishment he had denounced, as well as the use of the sword; community of goods he had not taught, but only willingness to share with the needy. Two weeks after his escape from the Hexenturm he had baptized in Embrach, and would continue to do so.

After his release Manz went to the Oberland of Zürich, especially to Grüningen (q.v.). But he did not stay here long. By the middle of May we find him with George Blaurock at Chur in the canton of Grisons, Blaurock's home. On July 18 he was seized and taken back to Zürich. The letter which the magistrate of Chur sent to the Zürich council on July 13, 1525, states:

"For a long time we have had among us one who calls himself Felix Manz. The same has created much trouble and discord among our people by baptizing old people and corner preaching, to such an extent that we ordered him to leave the city. After this he returned and did as before, disregarding the public proclamation in the church forbidding adult baptism on penalty of death, loss of honor and loss of property. Therefore we arrested him and held him a few days. But because he is an obstinate and recalcitrant person we released him from prison and because he is one of yours we have sent him to you, with the friendly request that you look after him and keep him in your territory, so that we may be rid of him and our people remain quiet, and that in case of his return, we are not compelled to take severe measures against him."

In Zürich Manz was confined in the Wellenberg for several months and then released on Oct. 7. On the next day he was already with Grebel taking part in a meeting of the Anabaptists at Bezholz. Here they were surprised by the magistrate. Grebel was seized, but Manz escaped until Oct. 30, when he was also put in prison. At the suggestion of the magistrate the third public Anabaptist disputation was held in Zürich on Nov. 6 and 8 in the Grossmünster of the city. Grebel and Manz were again the spokesmen of the Brethren. The outcome was that on November 18 the council sentenced Blaurock, Grebel, and Manz to prison on bread, water, and "Mus," forbidding all contact with the outside, "as long as my lords should see fit."

This imprisonment was not of long duration. Soon afterward we find the three leaders of the Brethren again in the highlands of Zürich, where they promulgated their doctrines more vigorously than ever. They were again arrested and subjected to a severe questioning. They held to their faith and were ready to die for it. Again they requested permission to present their case in the matter of baptism in writing, as Zwingli had already done in his book, Vom Tauff, vom Wiedertauff und vom Kindertauff (at the end of May 1525). Manz expressly stated that he had never disputed, but had only testified to his faith; the Scriptures alone had led him to his position on baptism; no Christian could strike with the sword, nor does he resist evil.

The council now resorted to severer measures. On March 7 the sentence was pronounced: "Manz, Grebel, and Blaurock, besides 15 other Anabaptists including six women, shall be placed on straw in the new tower on bread and water until they die and decay. No one may visit them or have power to change their condition, be they well or sick, without the consent of my lords." Repetition of the offense would be punished without mercy by drowning. Sooner than the severity of the verdict would indicate, the prison doors were opened. At any rate, by April 1526 the three Brethren leaders were assisting their harried brethren in Grisons and Appenzell.

In the fall of 1526 it was learned that Manz and Blaurock were in the region of Grüningen baptizing. To put an end to this activity the council applied the edict of March 7, which made adult baptism punishable by drowning. On Dec. 3, 1526, Manz and Blaurock were surprised at a meeting of the Brethren, seized, and taken to Zürich, where they were placed in the Wellenberg prison. It was Manz's final imprisonment. On Jan. 5, 1527, he was sentenced to death, "because contrary to Christian order and custom he had become involved in Anabaptism, had accepted it, taught others, and become a leader and beginner of these things because he confessed having said that he wanted to gather those who wanted to accept Christ and follow Him, and unite himself with them through baptism, and let the rest live according to their faith, so that he and his followers separated themselves from the Christian Church and were about to raise up and prepare a sect of their own under the guise of a Christian meeting and church; because he had condemned capital punishment, and in order to increase his following had boasted of certain revelations from the Pauline Epistles. But since such doctrine is harmful to the unified usage of all Christendom, and leads to offense, insurrection, and sedition against the government, to the shattering of the common peace, brotherly love, and civil co-operation and to all evil, Manz shall be delivered to the executioner, who shall tie his hands, put him into a boat, take him to the lower hut, there strip his bound hands down over his knees, place a stick between his knees and arms, and thus push him into the water and let him perish in the water; thereby he shall have atoned to the law and justice. . . . His property shall also be confiscated by my lords."

He was taken bound from the Wellenberg over the fish market to the boat. As he was being taken between the shops he praised God with a loud voice and cheerfully testified to the people that he was about to die for the truth. Meanwhile the dismal procession had reached the place of execution. It was three o'clock in the afternoon. "As he stood there with the depths of Lake Zürich below him, the blue sky over him, and the mountains with their snowy peaks in the sunshine, around him, his soul in the face of death looked out above these. As a preacher at his side spoke sympathetically to him encouraging him to be converted, he hardly heard him; but when he perceived his mother's voice on the opposite bank, together with his brothers admonishing him to be steadfast, he sang with a loud voice while he was being bound, 'In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum,' and the waves closed in over his head." He was buried in the St. Jakobs cemetery in Zürich. The Ausbund (q.v.), No. 6, has a song written by him: "Mit Lust so will ich singen." While he left no published writings, the Protestation und Schutzschrift of December 1524 addressed to the Zürich Council, attributed to Conrad Grebel by Egli, Köhler, and Bender, has been shown by W. Schmid to have been written by Manz.

NEFF, H.S.B.

E. Egli, Die Züricher Wiedertäufer zur Reformationszeit (Zürich, 1878); Mart. Mir. D 3, E 415; A. Brons, Ursprung, Entwickelung und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (Emden, 1912); Wolkan, Lieder, 8 f., 141; Menn. Bl., 1888, 9; 1894, 4; J. C. Füsslin, Beiträge zur Erläuterung der Kirchen-Ref.-Gesch. des Schweizerlandes I-V (Zürich, 1741-53); Zwingliana IX (1950); H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel (Goshen, 1950); TA Zürich; ML III, 22-24.

Maple Glen Conservative Amish Mennonite Church, Grantsville, Md.: see Casselman River congregation.

Maple Grove Mennonite Church (MC), located less than a mile north of Atglen, Pa., a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference, was organized as the Millwood congregation in 1882 with a membership of 124. The Maple Grove meetinghouse was built in 1909. The original church at Millwood, a frame structure, was enlarged in 1935 to the present seating capacity of 450. The Millwood and Maple Grove churches continued to function as one congregation until 1945, when the Millwood part withdrew to join the Lancaster Conference, while the Maple Grove Church continued under the Ohio and Eastern Conference. On Oct. 1, 1954, the membership of the Maple Grove congregation was 418, with Aaron F. Stoltzfus, Abner G. Stoltzfus, and Calvin S. Kennel serving as ministers. A.G.S.

Maple Grove Mennonite Church (MC), five miles east of Gulliver, located in Schoolcraft Co., Mich., a member of the Indiana-Michigan Conference, began as a mission outpost in 1942. It was organized as a congregation on Jan. 11, 1948, with 15 charter members. The first services were held in homes, then in the township hall and in the local schoolhouse. On May 21, 1950, a meetinghouse was dedicated. In 1955 the membership was 45, with Norman Weaver serving as bishop-pastor. N.WE.

Maple Grove Mennonite Church, Ashtabula Co., Ohio: see Ashtabula County Mennonite Church.

Maple Grove Mennonite Church (MC), located about one mile east of Belleville, Pa., was organized by "meetinghouse" Amish as a congregation in 1863 under the leadership of Bishop Solomon Byler. Services in the new building were held for the first time on Aug. 9, 1868. The congregation affiliated itself with the Eastern Amish Mennonite Conference, but is now affiliated with the Allegheny Conference. Samuel Yoder served as bishop 1864-84. Succeeding bishops were David Zook 1884-86, Michael Yoder 1886-89, Abraham D. Zook 1889-98, Michael Yoder assisted by John E. Kauffman 1898-1910, Eli H. Kanagy 1910-?, Aaron Mast 1935- . The membership (1954) is 278, with Aaron Mast as bishop and Jacob Weirich as minister.

In 1936 the Maple Grove congregation started a mission outpost at Barrville, five miles north of Belleville. It was organized as a separate congregation in 1956. A.KA., J.L.H.

Maple Grove Mennonite Church (MC), near Ellicott City, Howard Co., Md., about 20 miles southwest of Baltimore, is a member of the Lancaster Conference. The Cottage City, Md. (q.v.), congregation had begun contact in this area in 1934. In 1935 and 1937 tent meetings were held, which resulted in 15 converts. A meetinghouse was built soon thereafter. The membership in 1957 was 33, with Walter Shank as pastor and Lloy S. Kniss as bishop. Mount Airy, a former mission point of the Maple Grove church, has become an independent congregation. I.D.L.

Maple Grove Mennonite Church (MC), located two miles south of New Wilmington, Lawrence Co., Pa., was organized about 1850 by a group that had withdrawn from the Old Order Amish Church under the leadership of their first minister and bishop John Kanagy. They built the first meetinghouse (25 x 35 ft.) in 1872, remodeled in 1902 and finally removed; the present meetinghouse (36 x 56 ft.) was built in 1930. This rural church, which had a membership of 68 in 1955, belongs to the Ohio and Eastern Conference and is under the leadership of Nathan Nussbaum as pastor, and Roy Kaufman.

N.N.

Maple Grove Mennonite Church (MC), located in Topeka, Ind., a member of the Indiana-Michigan Conference, was organized with 18 charter members in May 1854 under the leadership of Bishop Isaac Smucker (1810-93). Smucker was followed by Jonathan Kurtz (1848-1930) and Edwin Yoder (1889-), who is the present bishop and senior minister. Others who have served as associate ministers were David F. Hartzler (1816-89), David Morrell (1828-1905), J. S. Hartzler (1857-1953), Andrew Yontz (1864-1938), Raymond Hartzler (1893-), C. Norman Kraus (1924-), and Ellis Croyle (1930-). The first meetinghouse was a frame building erected south of Topeka in 1856, replaced by a larger brick structure in 1879. The congregation reached a peak of 225 members in the early 1920's. In 1924 after several years of growing dissatisfaction, about half of the congregation, which then numbered 150, withdrew from the Indiana-Michigan Conference and later merged with a small congregation in Topeka, Ind., belonging to the Central Conference, now called the Topeka Mennonite Church (GCM).

The group who remained with the conference erected a frame building with a seating capacity of 300, at the south edge of town, which was dedicated in May 1925 and is still in use. The membership in 1955 was 189, largely rural. The original families came almost exclusively from the Amish settlement in Fairfield Co., Ohio. C.N.K.

Maple Hill Conservative Amish Mennonite Church, Middlefield, Ohio: see Maple View.

Maple Ridge United Mennonite Church (GCM), Pitt Meadows, B.C., was organized on Nov. 18, 1945, by Mennonites who had come from the prairie provinces since 1934. On Jan. 1, 1948, the membership was 25. Since there has been no increase from the outside, and the members are dependent on occasional employment in the peat and lumber industries, the church has grown little, and the church life has never been completely organized. It is served by preachers from other congregations, principally by A. I. Loewen, Abbotsford, who receives partial support from the Canadian Conference. Regular services in German are held on Sunday morning in a rented hall. No official membership was reported in 1954. C.G.T.

Maple River Mennonite Church (MC), one mile west of Brutus, and 14 miles northeast of Petoskey, Mich., was organized in 1883, when the meetinghouse was built by settlers who had come from Waterloo Co., Ont., in 1879 (Abraham Detwiler and Jonas Brubacher families). Abraham Detwiler and Jonathan Gehman were the first preachers. The Wisler Old Order Mennonite schism occurred here in 1886 and seriously handicapped the congregation, since both ministers withdrew with the Wisler group (which has since died out). Christian Detwiler, who was ordained after the schism, served until his death in 1917. The congregation, a member of the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference, was revived by the action of the conference mission board, which located Clyde X. Kauffman as a minister here in 1921; the congregation was reorganized that year. In 1955 the membership was 64, with Kauffman still serving as pastor, assisted by Earl Hartman. C.X.K.

Maple View Amish Mennonite Church, north of Wellesley, Waterloo Co., Ont., was organized in 1859 with John Jantzi (1806-81) as bishop by members of the Steinman (q.v.) congregation in Wilmot Township who had moved a few miles northward into Wellesley Township, and was long called the Wellesley congregation. It is a member of the Ontario A.M. Conference. Meetings were at first held in the homes until a meetinghouse was erected which was to be used only as a funeral chapel. When the house began to be used for regular worship services (1886) a group opposed to this withdrew to continue as the Wellesley Old Order Amish. They were joined by a group which withdrew the same year and for the same reason from the near-by Mornington (Poole) A.M. congregation. In 1954 the Old Order group still had three districts, with a total of 260 baptized members. In 1912 again a conservative faction broke away from the Wellesley A.M. group to organize a separate congregation, called the Lichti group after its leader, Bishop Jacob Lichti. This group built a meetinghouse a half mile east of the Wellesley A.M. church. It continues to use German exclusively, sings from the Ausbund, and has no Sunday school. Thus it is in a sense "Old Order," although it has no fellowship with the Wellesley "House Amish" Old Order group. In 1954 it had 200 members, and was called the Cedar Grove A.M. congregation.

The Poole (Mornington) A.M. (q.v.) church was an outgrowth of the Wellesley A.M. settlement. It was formally organized in 1874 although it did not build a meetinghouse until 1886. The meetinghouse was the occasion of an Old Order split paralleling that at Wellesley in the same year, called the Mornington Old Order Amish group. In 1904 a second schism occurred in the Poole A.M. congregation, led by Bishop Nicholas Nafziger, which built a meetinghouse in that year, but continues to use the German language and the Ausbund and has no Sunday school. It parallels the Lichti congregation and in 1954 had 175 members. It is locally called the Nafziger church, although its official name is Mornington. Mornington and Cedar Grove are reckoned with the Beachy Amish (q.v.) group. In 1928 a new frame church was erected, and the name Maple View was adopted to replace the name Wellesley.

Bishops who served the congregation before the use of the meetinghouse were John Jantzi, Christian Gascho, Christian Wagler, and Christian B. Zehr. Samuel L. Schultz (1883-) has served as bishop since 1941. In 1954 Samuel V. Leis, Chris S. Streicher, and Allen Y. Bender were serving as ministers. An outpost was operated at Crosshill. The total membership at the two places was 457. The congregation has been slow in adopting the English language for its services and long retained the Ausbund as its hymnal.

Thus in 1954 there were six congregations on three distinct levels, with a total of 1,092 members, the outgrowth of the original Wellesley congregation of 1859. J.C.F.

Maple View Conservative Mennonite Church, formerly called Maple Hill, was organized near Middlefield, Ohio, in 1937, under the direction of the Maple Grove C.A.M. Church. The congregation, with a membership (1956) of 107, worships in a basement church. The bishop of the Maple Grove congregation, Roman Miller, serves here. The preachers are Noah D. Miller, Eli E. Hostetler, and Mahlon Miller. S.C.

Marbach, Johann (1521-81), a German Lutheran theologian, studied at the University of Wittenberg, was called to Strasbourg in 1545, made professor of theology and president of the church convention in 1553, and died there on March 17, 1581. He was a zealous Lutheran and was often engaged in dispute with Johann Sturm, with Zanchi, the rector of the University, as well as with the Reformed clergy of the city.

Marbach made it his particular task to fight the Schwenckfelders and the Anabaptists. Against the former he preached seven successive sermons in 1556; the latter he tried to convert through church inspections. According to his statement, five councilmen met to deal with the Anabaptists pointed out by the inspectors. These councilmen, known as the Wiedertäuferherren (Anabaptist Committee), were chosen annually. Usually one or two preachers met with them. "Marbach generally came alone. Sometimes he had with him something the sectarians had written, in order to refute their doctrine. The sectarian was then given a definite period to repent; at its termination he was summoned; if he did not recant, he was banished from the city; if he returned, he was imprisoned" (Horning, 16; Hulshof, 232).

Marbach was present at the trial of the Anabaptists Veit Heilgenstein of Saarbrücken and Johannes Novesianus; because they persisted in their error they were expelled from the city. The same fate met Johannes Schlaf of Neuss (Records of the council, I and II, 1556).

In 1556 Marbach was invited by Palatine Elector Otto Heinrich to head a church inspection in his domain. It was reported that in the Neustadt Amt there were many Anabaptists and Schwenckfelders throughout the mountains, who met in woods and remote places. In Edenkoben the inspecting group converted an Anabaptist, and in Kreuznach two. In Dirmstein they disputed in vain with two Anabaptists, in Heppenheim with one who had gone to Moravia and had returned with a commission to the local brethren. At Stromberg six Anabaptists were in prison; they declared that they had left the church only because they did not believe that the immoral and ignorant local preachers possessed the Spirit of God.

In August 1557 Marbach conducted the disputation with the Anabaptists at Pfeddersheim (q.v.). He also took part in the colloquium at Worms (Sept. 11 to Oct. 7, 1557), and signed the document which the Protestant theologians issued after this debate, titled Prozess, wie es soll gehalten werden mit den Wiedertäufern durch etliche Gelehrten, so zu Worms versammelt gewesen, gestellt (Hege, 93 ff.).

The official opinion which he formulated for Landgrave William of Hesse on Sept. 1, 1569, concerning the unbaptized children of the Anabaptists, states that it is obligatory upon the state to baptize such children forcibly, even against the wishes of the parents. The marginal notes made by the landgrave on this document, however, repudiate the use of force in matters of faith (Hochhuth, 213-20).

In 1557 Marbach was instrumental in banishing three Anabaptists, Niklaus Fuchs, Wendel Haman, and the wife of Martin Spanner, when they refused to accept the Lutheran faith. Again in 1558 three Anabaptists were brought before the Anabaptist Committee and expelled. Church inspections revealed the presence of Anabaptists at four localities in the country. At "St. Oswald" Marbach learned that the Anabaptists held monthly meetings on the Murhof or in the forest of Eckbolsheim or on Lichtenberg, "numbering 50, sometimes 200, indeed, a year ago 600." The inspection of 1579 found David Zoller at Barr, Andreas Maurer at Heiligenstein, and two others at Wasslenheim (Horning, 22).

In spite of all his efforts Marbach did not succeed in eradicating Anabaptism from Strasbourg and its vicinity. His suggestion to conduct a house to house inspection in the city was rejected by the city council. Until the middle of the 19th century there was a Mennonite congregation in Strasbourg (see Alsace). NEFF.

C. Schmidt, Der Anteil der Strassburger an der Reformation in der Churpfalz (Strasbourg, 1856); W. Horning, Johannes Marbach (Strasbourg, 1887); A. Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg van 1525 tot 1557 (Amsterdam, 1905); Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt, 1908); K. W. H. Hochhuth, "Mitteilungen aus der Protestantischen Secten-Gesch. in der Hessischen Kirche," in Ztscht für die historische Theologie, 1859, 213-20; ML III, 24 f.

Marburg (pop. 24,000), a city in Hesse-Nassau, Germany, was a center of the Anabaptist movement in Hesse (q.v.) and the neighboring Thuringia (q.v.) in the Reformation period. Melchior Rinck (q.v.) was cross-examined here by Balthasar Raidt, the pastor of Hersfeld, and the theological professors of the University of Marburg. On this occasion he wrote his confession of faith on five points. In the Marburg Colloquy (1529) between Zwingli and Luther Campanus (q.v.) took part.

In 1536 four Hessian Anabaptist leaders, including Hermann Bastian, who probably stemmed from Marburg, were imprisoned in Marburg, and were kept in light confinement alternately here and at Wolkersdorf. Philip of Hesse (q.v.) requested an official opinion of various university cities. The theological faculty of the University of Marburg also sent one; it has, however, been lost. Marburg seems to have rendered a mild judgment; for a year previous Gerhard Noviomagus (q.v.) had expressed to Philip his opposition to severe penalties against the Anabaptists. This was also the position of Adam Krafft (q.v.), who had been a professor at the university and a pastor at Marburg since 1528. The prisoners were repeatedly examined. A written confession of faith was found on one such occasion with the title, Verantwortung und Widerlegung der Artikel, so jetzund im Land zu Hessen über die armen Davider, die man Wiedertäufer nennet, ausgangen sind. Finally Martin Bucer (q.v.) was called, who debated with the prisoners from Oct. 30 to Nov. 1, 1538, and succeeded in converting them.

Nevertheless there were remnants of Anabaptist groups in Hesse and vicinity for a long time after. The General Synod held in 1571 adopted a resolution with the following import: Since the Anabaptists now and again come secretly and dare to mislead the common people with their seductive teachings from the right way of salvation to destruction, the superintendents shall diligently watch for them and their meetings and conventicles, also lead them and oppose them with teaching and admonition from God's Word as much as possible. The prince ought to renew his mandates threatening all converts to Anabaptism with severe penalties, expelling those from the country, who refuse to recant.

The Synod of Marburg in 1573 recommended that the property of Anabaptists to which they fell heir after banishment be confiscated to prevent the return of such Anabaptists to poison others.

In 1575 the pastor of Alsfeld reported to the Marburg Synod that one of his parishioners had been infected with Anabaptism for fifty years and could not be persuaded to change his mind. Two Anabaptists, Martin Richter and Hans Kuchenbecker, had drawn the attention of the authorities, while the others were living quietly. Kuchenbecker had been examined at Marburg in 1577, and made a courageous confession. He was given two months to change his mind, at the end of which he was to be expelled if he persisted in his error.

On Oct. 7, 1578, the pastor Tielmann Noll was summoned before the Marburg Synod to answer charges of Anabaptist leanings. His reply clearly shows that he had received genuine inspiration from his association with the Anabaptists. He then had to pass an examination on all the articles of the Confession of Augsburg, and for a year withdraw from all social activity, or forfeit his position. After this the Anabaptists did not come to public attention, but their quiet life remained an influence for a long time to come. (See Hesse for bibliography; ML III, 34 f.) Neff.

Marcelis Goverts Gasthuis is a home for the aged at Leeuwarden (q.v.), Dutch province of Friesland, founded for the benefit of the poor members of the Waterlander congregation in 1669 by Marcelis Goverts (d. 1669). Goverts, married to Mayke Markus (d. 1664), was a member of the Leeuwarden city council and its city architect. For this reason there is some doubt whether he was a Mennonite, since at this time the Mennonites did not hold magisterial offices; but Goverts may have been an exception. The Gasthuis, located on the Stadsgracht (now Oostergrachtswal), was completely remodeled in 1766, the Leeuwarden congregation having received a large legacy from Dirk Zeper for this purpose. In 1877 a new home with the same name was built on the Noordsingel. (Leeuwarder Gemeenteblad, Dec. 1933.) vdZ.

Marck Jettyezoon, a Dutch martyr belonging to the revolutionary wing, was arrested during the recapture of the Oldeklooster (q.v.), Dutch province of Friesland, in 1535 and beheaded at Leeuwarden on April 10, 1535. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, 228.) vdZ.

Marcus Cornelisz, a bagmaker of Westkapelle, a village on the island of Walcheren (Holland), was beheaded on April 30, 1535, at Middelburg, capital of the Dutch province of Zeeland, because he refused to "make an offering at the burial of his children, as God has not commanded it. The dead have no help or ease that can be given by those living under the sun. One must confess not to priests but to God; thus the preachers have taught him, and there is no purgatory." Marcus Cornelisz had attended an Anabaptist meeting at Middelburg shortly before Christmas of 1534, where Damas Jacobsz (q.v.) of Leiden urged his listeners to march to Amsterdam and other towns to take these towns by force, but Marcus did not agree with such ideas and had left the meeting. He had been arrested before Jan. 14, 1535, and was tortured on March 8. During the trial he recanted. He was 25 years of age. (DB 1908, 8; Mellink, Wederdopers, 320, 322; ML I, 371.) Neff, vdZ.

Marcus de Ledersnijder, an Anabaptist martyr, was seized at Kortrijk (Courtrai) (q.v.) in Flanders, Belgium. In spite of torture he refused to return to the Catholic faith, and was therefore burned at the stake at Kortrijk on Dec. 12, 1559 (van Braght has erroneously 1558). He was a weaver and his official name was Marcus (Marcx) van de Gheinste. His property was confiscated. (Mart. Mir. D 201, E 583; Verheyden, Courtrai-Bruxelles, 34, No. 9; ML II, 626; III, 35.) Hege, vdZ.

Marcus de Smit (in Offer and van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror called Marcus, the brother of Hans de Smit; in the official records Marcus (Martin) de Smet), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on the Vrijdagsmarkt of Gent, Belgium, on Aug. 7, 1559, at 7:00 in the morning, with five other martyrs; some others arrested with them had suffered martyrdom shortly before. A letter by Hans de Vette (q.v.) states that this group of 12 members had been arrested at Gent on Pentecost of 1559. They are commemorated in two hymns: "Ick moet een liet beginnen" (I must begin a hymn), found in Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562 and Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1563 (No. 14), and "Een eeuwighe vruecht die niet en vergaet" (An eternal joy, which does not pass away), found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1569. (Offer, 348, 556 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 246, E 620; Verheyden, Gent, 25, No. 64.) vdZ.

Marcus(z), Pieter, was a preacher and elder of the High German Mennonite congregation meeting at the Barrevoetersteeg at Haarlem, Holland, and later of the united Flemish-Frisian-High German congregation (Vlaemschen Blok) on Klein Heiligland at Haarlem. He was a bitter opponent of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) and of Collegiant principles. As a representative of the Haarlem congregation at the Leiden Flemish conference of June 1660, he was one of the four men appointed to draw up a common confession out of the four Dutch confessions (Olyftack 1626, Jan Cents confession 1630, Dordrecht confession 1632, and Concept of Cologne), which, however, never came into being. Pieter Marcus was also one of the delegates sent by this conference to Amsterdam to depose Abrahamsz and Spruyt from their offices, without result however. Soon thereupon the "Lammerenkrijgh" (q.v., War of the Lambs) broke out, which in 1664 divided the Flemish Mennonites into Lamists (q.v.) and Zonists (q.v.). Pieter Marcus sided with the Zonists, and in 1671, when the Flemish congregation at Haarlem was also divided, he and Isaac Snep (q.v.) were in the conservative wing.

Concerning the life of Pieter Marcus no data were available. He died before 1685. vdZ.

DB 1863, 132, 137; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 345; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 72, 74.

Margaret of Austria (Margaret of Savoy) (1480-1530), a daughter of Emperor Maximilian, was a stadholder of the Netherlands, both Belgium and Holland, from 1507 until her death. Although Anabaptism did not rise in these countries before 1530, an Evangelical anti-Catholic movement, usually called Sacramentism (q.v.), arose in the last years of her government. Since it was also her task to suppress heresy, she occasionally concerned herself with heretics. On May 25, 1527, she wrote a letter to the Court of Holland at The Hague concerning the martyr Wendelmoet Claesdochter (q.v.), who is listed in Offer des Heeren (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1 b; Offer, 422-29). vdZ.

Margaret (1522-86) of Parma, the natural daughter of Emperor Charles V, regent of the Netherlands 1559-67, governing in the name of her half brother Philip II (q.v.) of Spain. Following the policy of her predecessor, Mary of Hungary, she vigorously opposed the rise of heresy, though less consistently than Philip. In general her conduct of the government lacked independence and was influenced by all sorts of moods and opinions. At first she was under the staunchly Catholic influence of Cardinal Granvelle, and absolutely refused to lighten the persecution of heretics. After his departure she expressed the opinion that it was enough to punish those who caused insurrection, held secret meetings, or possessed bad books. She asked the king to pardon the Anabaptists imprisoned at Utrecht, Middelburg, and other places, if they would recant. When the king refused to spare their lives she ordered their execution in December 1565, at the same time expressing her opinion that such measures were harmful. On Aug. 20, 1565, she wrote a letter to Count John de Ligne, Duke of Aremberg, stadholder of Friesland, urging him to keep a watchful eye on the Anabaptists and other sects. In December 1567, when Alva came, she left the Netherlands protesting against the harsh measures which he was instructed to execute against the "heretics." (ML III, 35 f.) NEFF.

Margaretha, wife of the peasant Hans of Schlüchtern (Schlüechta) in the Palatinate, Germany, one of the 14 Anabaptists who were cross-examined on Sept. 16. 1535, in the castle at Passau, where they lay in prison. She states that she had been baptized upon confession of her faith ten(?) years before by Jörg of Ingersheim (see Leserlin), and that she came from Moravia, and wished to return to the Oberland. Like her husband, she could not be moved from her faith. (ML III, 35.) W.W.

Margarethe of Heilbronn, a widow, a prisoner in the castle at Passau, Bavaria, in 1535. She confessed that she had been baptized five years previously by a preacher named Hans, who had since died. In spite of chains she remained true to her faith. (ML III, 35.) W.W.

Margenau, located on the Kurushan River, a tributary of the Molotschna River, was a village of the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, Gnadenfeld volost, Berdyansk district, Ukraine, founded in 1819. The village consisted of some 300 inhabitants and was primarily agricultural. During the famine of 1932-33, more than 50 persons died. Under the Soviets many individuals were exiled. When the German army approached in 1941, the Margenau Mennonite population was sent to Asiatic Russia. Only a few remained during the German occupation and have since reached America. (ML III, 36.) C.K.

Margenau - Alexanderwohl - Landskrone Mennonite Church was composed of Mennonites living in the villages listed in the name, Molotschna settlement, Ukraine. The Margenau church was established in 1832, in which year a church building was erected in the village of Margenau. Originally Margenau belonged to the Flemish group of the Ohrloff-Petershagen-Halbstadt church (q.v.). In 1842-74 the church was known as the Margenau-Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church. Until 1890 the Alexanderkrone Mennonite Church had been a part of the congregation. After the emigration of the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church to Kansas in 1874 the reorganized church in Russia with that name became a part of the Margenau church. In 1910, when the Landskrone group built a church, it seems to have become an independent congregation. After the Revolution, however, it was again an integral part of the Margenau church. In 1905 the Alexanderwohl group consisted of 355 members and 325 children and the Margenau church had 1,382 members and 1,492 children. (It is not clear whether these statistics include Landskrone.)

The first elder was Heinrich Wiens (1842-47), who was removed from his office when he opposed the reform efforts of Johann Cornies. For 14 years the congregation was cared for by Heinrich Töws, the elder of the Pordenau Mennonite Church. He was succeeded by Bernhard Peters (1861-87), Heinrich Koop (1887-1901), Peter Friesen (1901-7), Gerhard Plett (1907-28), and Heinrich T. Janz (1928-32). The last elder had to leave the congregation, because of the high taxes which neither he nor the congregation could pay. The congregational life gradually disintegrated because of the antireligious attitude of the Soviet government. One of the last and most impressive services conducted was the ordination of Heinrich T. Janz as elder conducted by his retiring predecessor, Gerhard Plett, who had baptized 1,543 members during his 20 years of service. The ordination took place at the church at Landskrone, on May 13, 1928. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 705; Unser Blatt III, 201; H. Dirks, Statistik, 62-63; A. A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer I (N. Clearbrook, 1954) 116 ff.; ML III, 36.

Margenau-Schönsee: see Margenau-Alexanderwohl-Landskrone Mennonite Church.

Margokerto, a former Mennonite mission station on the island of Java (q.v.), Indonesia, formerly Dutch East Indies, operated by the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association, since 1940 an independent congregation. Missions started here in 1880. The membership in 1953 was 132, not including the 229 children. The pastor is R. Nitihardjo. (Reports of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association.) vdZ.

Margoredjo, the first missionary colony of the Mennonite mission on Java, Indonesia, former Dutch East Indies, is situated on the north side of Mt. Muria, ten miles from Taju (see map in article Java). The founder of this colony was Pieter Anton Jansz (q.v.), the son of the first missionary in Java, Pieter Jansz, who had worked for many years without visible results in Japara. His son therefore tried another method, namely, evangelization by means of cultivating the land. He had recognized that the religious life of the Javanese was closely interwoven with their economic life, and that it is almost impossible for a Christian to remain true in a Mohammedan community. In 1880 he therefore sent a request to the colonial government to have a virgin forest given to his care. On Aug. 26, 1881, he received an area of 400 acres, on which he erected Margoredjo. The mission school at Japara, which his father had taken over from missionary Schuurmann, was now transferred to Margoredjo. He also built a teachers' seminary here in 1903 to train native teachers. All the native teachers in the Mennonite concession received their training here. After 30 years the seminary was closed for lack of funds.

From 1888 to 1901 Johann Fast worked with P.A. Jansz. In 1895 he built a church here, which was dedicated on Nov. 7, 1897, and a second missionary residence. In 1893 missionary Johann Hübert came to Margoredjo and took charge of the church at Kedungpendjalin (q.v.). In 1899 Johann Klaassen (q.v.) took charge of the medical work in connection with evangelism. The congregation grew in the faith. Attendance was good. The first missionary doctor was Dr. Bervoets, who operated the hospital with two nurses, H. Goosen and S. Riechert. In 1915 he took charge of the central hospital located at Kelet. From 1905 to 1937 N. Thiessen was in charge of the mother church at Margoredjo, also doing evangelistic work in the subsidiary congregations of Tegalamba, Tawangredjo, Kembang, Dukuhseti, Banjutawa, Taju, Puntjel, Bumiardjo, Udjungwatu, and Bandngardjo.

Since 1928 the Margoredjo church has been independent. Its first native preacher was Rubin. Since 1931 S. Harsesudirdjo has been the elder of the congregation, while Hardjosuwito (since 1939), Armujadi, and Martohadi (both since 1941) are preachers. In 1937 it had a membership of 1,830 souls; in 1953 the membership numbered 970 baptized members and 1,144 children.

During the Japanese occupation 1942-46 the congregation had to endure many hardships. The beautiful church of Margoredjo was destroyed by a band of nationalistic Mohammedans. After 1946 a period of new growth began. D.A., J.M.

Records of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association; Uit Verleden en Heden der Doopsgezinde Zending (n.p., 1947, 26-28); ML III, 35.

Margriet, the wife of Jan Inghels of Brugge, Belgium, was (re)baptized there in 1537. In the next year she was arrested and persuaded by the inquisitor to recant. Notwithstanding the fact that she penitently returned to the Catholic Church she was sentenced on Aug. 17, 1538, to be buried alive. Margriet was the first victim of Anabaptist persecution at Brugge. (Verheyden, Brugge, 31, No. 4.) vdZ.

Margriet Dregge, widow of Hendrik Bosbas, an Anabaptist martyr, was sentenced to death on March 27, 1536, at Antwerp, Belgium, because of Anabaptism. She was put into a sack and thrown into the Scheldt River. Her small property was confiscated. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 392, 426; XIV, 14 f., No. 152.) vdZ.

Margriet Jan Herkensdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned at Utrecht, Netherlands, on June 11, 1539. Particulars about this martyr were not available except that she was the wife of Steffen van Halteren of Holthuizen in the Bishopric of Münster, Westphalia. vdZ.

Berigten van het Hist. Genootschap Utrecht IV, 2 (1851) 139; Mellink, Wederdopers, 237.

Margriete van den Berghe, an Anabaptist martyr: see Grietgen van Lier.

Margriete van Halle, an Anabaptist martyr: see Grietgen Bonaventuers.

Margriete (Margriet), Jeroons Huysvrouwe, an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Antwerp, Belgium, on July 6, 1557, with Claerken Boucket. They were put into a sack and drowned. Margriete, whose official name was Marguerite Venneau, was the wife of Jeronimus van der Capellen (q.v.), who had suffered martyrdom at Antwerp on May 22, 1557. The name of Margriete, who died valiantly, is found in hymn No. 16 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father). vdZ.

Offer, 553 note, 565; Mart. Mir. D 185, E 569; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 434, 438, 469; XIV, 22 f., No. 249; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 71.

Margriete Willems uyt Hitland, an Anabaptist martyr, sentenced at Amsterdam, Holland, on July 10, 1535, to be hanged and strangled, which was a rather unusual way of executing women. Margriete, who was the widow of Willem de Propheet (Willem de Cuyper, q.v.), had been (re)baptized by Jan Volkertsz (q.v.) "four or five years ago," i.e., about 1531; Jan Volkertsz had also performed her marriage. Margriete was one of the Anabaptists who had sailed from Amsterdam in March 1534 en route to Münster (q.v.), but were arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.). She then was released, but soon after arrested again because of Anabaptist activity, also being charged of having contact with the Amsterdam Anabaptist bishop and leader Jacob van Campen (q.v.). It is not clear whether she recanted or not. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 108 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, 104, 147, 191, 346.) vdZ.

Margriette Wynants, an Anabaptist martyr: see Grietje van Brussel.

Maria van Beckum: see Beckum.

Maria (1505-88), Queen of Hungary, daughter of Philip I, wife of King Louis, who fell in the battle of Mohacs in 1526, was regent of the Netherlands 1530-55, governing in the name of her brother Charles V. It was during her reign that the Anabaptist movement arose in the Netherlands and its severe persecution was instituted. She is described as a very capable woman, who was at first not hostile to the Reformation. At the death of her husband she received a letter of condolence from Luther.

Melanchthon was personally acquainted with her. In 1539 Pope Paul III accused her of "Lutheranism." Nevertheless she always complied with the wishes of her brother throughout her official life. A number of persecution orders were issued, and inquisitors searched the country. The Anabaptists especially suffered relentless persecution; the order of 1535 referred primarily to them. When the Dutch court, inclined to lenience, asked the regent for instructions, she ordered the death of all the victims. (DB 1906, 21-23, 29; ML III, 36.) vdZ.

Maria of Montjoie (Monschau, q.v., in the Eifel, Germany, near the Belgian border), an Anabaptist martyr, who was drowned in 1552 after an imprisonment lasting nearly two years. She valiantly resisted all pleas and threats to give up her faith. On the way to the place of execution she sang cheerfully. She said, "I have been the bride of a man, but today I hope to be the bride of Christ, and to inherit His kingdom with Him." At the water's edge they held her two hours, hoping to persuade her to forsake the truth. She said, "I adhere to my God; proceed with what you have come here for." She died courageously with the words, "O heavenly Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit." Her death is described in a song, "Ach fröhlich will ich singen," found in the Schön Gesangbüchlein, Trier copy, No. 96; Ausbund, No. 25; Wackernagel, Kirchenlied V, 1082 f. Neff, E.C.

Mart. Mir. D 131, E 525; Wolkan, Lieder, 100-2, 136; E. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik II (The Hague, 1941) 422-24; Ernst Crous, "Auf Mennos Spuren am Niederrhein," Der Mennonit IX (1956) 10 f.; ML III, 36.

Maria Janssen, an Anabaptist martyr: see Maeyken Janssens.

Mariawohl, a village in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, South Russia, with about 250 Mennonite inhabitants before World War I. An important battle was fought here in 1920. A.Ke.

Marie Baernt Gerytsdochter, a native of Achtersloot near IJsselstein, Dutch province of Utrecht, who had been (re)baptized in the spring of 1534 by Gerrit Ghysen of Benschop in his house at Benschop. She was a daughter of Brechte Lambrechtsdochter and married to Gheryt Kievit of Benschop, who was put to death at Amsterdam in 1540 because of revolutionary activities (he had apparently robbed some Catholic churches). Marie also belonged to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism, being a follower of Jan van Batenburg (q.v.) and Appelman (q.v.), to whom she was married after the death of her first husband. She was apprehended in May 1544 and executed at The Hague on June 26, 1545, by drowning. She probably repented and returned to the Catholic Church, because she was buried in consecrated earth. Marie Baernt Gerytsdochter is one of the most striking examples of revolutionary Anabaptism, which had nothing to do with real and peaceful Anabaptism. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 328, 744 f.; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 146 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, 232, 240, 411.

Marie Kerckhoffs, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on July 27, 1573, on the Houtmarkt at Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg. Marie was a native of Maastricht and lived there; she was about 30 years of age and the mother of four children. She had been (re)baptized in a house at Maastricht by Henrick Kroch (see Krufft) from Germany together with some others, whose names she refused to tell. Even in severe torture she gave no further information. Marie was typical of the loyal Mennonite martyrs; she refused to be comforted by Catholic priests, saying that she "desired to live and die in her faith"; and that sins could only be forgiven by God, but not by priests; for this reason she did not attach importance to the Catholic sacrament of confession. She also held a low opinion of the Mass. Quietly and faithfully she spoke about her faith, and steadfastly suffered martyrdom. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik II (The Hague, 1941) 312 f., 602-4.

Marie (Marijken) 's Keysers, a daughter of Joos van Deynse, and a sister of the martyr Olyverynken 's Keisers (q.v.), had received baptism upon her faith at Gent, Belgium, in 1568 or 1569. She was arrested and died in prison at Gent, on May 10, 1573. (Verheyden, Gent, 62, No. 220.) vdZ.

Marie von der Kuhlen, an Anabaptist who was arrested in 1559 and tried at Waldfeucht, district of Millen in the duchy of Jülich, Germany. She had been (re)baptized six years before at Lichterwald in Jülich by Elder Lemken (q.v.), together with about 20 persons, whose names she did not know, all from the Dutch Maas district (now Dutch province of Limburg). It is not known whether Marie died as a martyr or not. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 302.

Marie Sioucke huysvrouwe, a Dutch martyr belonging to the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism, was arrested on April 7, 1535, when the Oldeklooster (q.v.) was reconquered. She was drowned at Leeuwarden on April 14, 1535. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, 228.) vdZ.

Marie Vlamincx (Vlemincx) (in Offer and Martyrs' Mirror called Mariken), an Anabaptist martyr, strangled and burned at the stake on Jan. 31, 1551, at Lier in Brabant, Belgium, together with Gielis van Aerde, Tanneken van Roosbroecke, and Godevaert Mertens. The Offer and the Martyrs' Mirror give 1550 as year of execution without exact date; the exact date is found in Antw. Arch.-Blad. Marie was a woman of 75; she was born in St-Truyen, Belgium. Neither in the hymn "Alsmen screef duyst vijfhondert en daertoe noch vijftich jaer," found in a number of Dutch hymnals including (No. 17) the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, nor in the account given by van Braght are there many particulars. Marie frankly confessed her faith. When she was asked whether she desired to confess her sins to a (Catholic) priest before she died, she answered that she repented the fact that she had formerly confessed her sins to mortal ears. vdZ.

Offer, 568-77; Mart. Mir. D 96 f., E 494; Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 393; XIV, 18 f., No. 199; Wackernagel, Lieder, 126; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 78; ML III, 73.

Marienburg, a city (1939 pop. 27,318) on the Nogat River in West Prussia. The castle, built in 1274, was the capital of the Teutonic Knights, falling to the Poles in 1460. In the second half of the 17th century many foreigners, including Mennonites, were admitted to the castle grounds and allowed to pursue their trades there. Their competition with the citizens caused the latter to send a complaint to the king, and after decades of strife the city took the castle in lease, and the Mennonites, who had hitherto not been granted citizenship, were now made citizens. On Sept. 13, 1772, Marienburg came again into the possession of the Prussians. It had a population of 4,575 at that time.

Beginning in the latter years of the 17th century the Mennonites held services on the castle grounds, and later in Sandhof near Marienburg in private homes. In 1906 the Heubuden (q.v.) congregation built a meetinghouse in Marienburg; services were held here every Sunday and church holiday, but there was no organized congregation. In 1940 there were 350 Mennonites in Marienburg. The group was dissolved when the Russians came in the spring of 1945 and the Mennonite population was evacuated westward. The meetinghouse was converted into a cinema. A.D.

E. Dormann and H. Eckerdt, Geschichte des Kreises Marienburg (1862, 1868); W. Hunsberger, "The Danzig Mennonite Church Buildings Today," Menn. Life IV (July 1949) 10; ML III, 36.

Marienburger Werder, a level lowland along the Baltic Sea at the mouth of the Vistula River, consisting of the Gross-Werder (large marsh) between the Vistula and the Nogat, and the Klein-Werder between the Nogat and Lake Drausen. With the Danzig Werder to the west of the Vistula and the lowlands lying north of the Vistula at Danzig and Elbing they constitute the Vistula-Nogat delta. About 160 sq. miles of cultivated land lie from 3 to 7 feet below sea level. The Marienburg Werder was occupied by the Teutonic Order in 1242 and the Danzig Werder in 1309. In the second half of the 13th century several villages were settled in the Gross-Werder by German settlers. Throughout the 14th century dikes were built on both sides of the Vistula and Nogat and most of the Werder was settled. In 1456 the Danzig Werder came into the possession of the city of Danzig, and in 1466 the Marienburg Werders passed into the possession of the Poles.

In 1520-30 the Reformation made its appearance in the Werders. Many of the peasants and dike workers accepted Lutheranism. The Lutherans as well as the Mennonites were benefited by the Confederation of Warsaw adopted in 1585 by the Prussian estates, promising mutual toleration. But by 1608 the bishop of Culm gave orders to the Landtag not to tolerate the Mennonites. Likewise the bishop of Ermland ordered in 1648 that religious liberty should be granted only to the Lutherans and should not include the Mennonites.

In 1642 the chamberlain Willibald von Haxenberg (q.v.) succeeded in extorting 80,000 florins from the Mennonites, giving the landed estates an occasion to rise to their defense. When the Mennonites appealed to King Ladislaus IV they received from him the Privilegium of Dec. 22, 1642 (Mannhardt, p. LX). In spite of recurrent hostility on the part of the Landtag at Marienburg and the parliament at Warsaw the Mennonites were able to maintain themselves in the lowlands, where good use could be made of their industry and skill.

From 1328 on, there are reports of broken dikes causing the Werders to be flooded and ruined by the Vistula and the Nogat. In 1540 and 1543 the Vistula broke through its dike and flooded the Danzig Werder. For many years most of the lower Werder remained a desolate area largely covered with water. Then came the Dutch, who offered to restore the lost territory at their own expense. On Nov. 28, 1547, the Danzig city council granted the village and estate of Reichenberg to Philippus Edzema, and granted him permission to settle it with people of his nationality (Dutch). In the same year the Dutch were granted Scharfenberg and Landau, in 1550 Wesslinken, in 1552 Schmerblock, in 1556 Breitfelde, in 1601 Schönrohr, as well as Hochzeit and Neunhuben. These villages, covering over 10,000 acres, were known as the Dutch villages. They were granted many liberties by the Danzig city council, which were maintained until 1857 in spite of the objections of the other villages.

These Dutch (Mennonite largely) immigrants attained significant success in a short time; the first five villages, which at first paid 90 marks a year, were soon paying 768 marks. Both in the drainage of the marshes and the improvement of the soil their work was of lasting importance and influence. The consequent export of grain made rapid increases. Whereas at the close of the 15th century 22,000 tons of grain were shipped via Danzig from Poland and Danzig, by 1575 Polish Prussia alone exported 100,000 tons. Their influence on cattle raising was also important, for they introduced the superior Dutch breeds of cattle and horses.

In 1582 the Mennonites made an appeal to the government to be relieved of the fee charged them for not complying with the demands of the state church regarding communion, church attendance, and infant baptism, stating that they had freely and openly admitted their faith 30 years before when they entered the country, and nothing had been said of the requirement of this crushing fee.

On March 15, 1526, the Vistula broke through its dike near Schöneberg, and flooded the lower areas of the Gross-Werder for many years, compelling the inhabitants to emigrate. In 1550 the Polish king leased the Tiegenhof area with 20 villages to Simon Loysen (q.v.) and his brothers, who then built a new center of management on the left bank of the Tiege. In 1562 they invited Mennonites from Holland to settle in this area, which was largely covered with water and overgrown with reeds. The Mennonites built dams on the Haff, Lake Drausen, and lower on the Nogat, Vistula, and the Tiege, and set up windmills to make the land arable. In 1578 Hans Loysen leased these restored lands to the Mennonites. About 1581 Ernst Weiher took this land from Loysen in payment of a debt; he signed a new contract with the Mennonites, which his widow renewed in 1601 for a period of 40 years (according to H. Donner). The Mennonites were very successful. Everywhere there were now grassy meadows, orchards, and gardens (Hartwich). The market town founded soon after 1600 by Melchior Weiher beside the castle was called Weihershof, and later Tiegenhof.

About 1565 the estates of the Teutonic Knights, which had been acquired by the Polish crown, Heubuden, Leske, Klein Montau, Thörichthof, Markushof, etc., were leased out to Mennonites. The low places in the Bärwalde region were also settled with Mennonites. In 1565 the council of Elbing parceled out the 14 sq. miles of the Ellerwald, which had been a communal pasture, and the citizens rented them to Dutch Mennonites, who began the systematic drainage and cultivation of this land. (See Farming . . . in West Prussia.)

In the 1530's many Dutch Sacramentists and Anabaptists immigrated to the lowland to the right of the Nogat, to Polish Prussia and the Danzig region. Some Mennonites also came from the duchy of Prussia, where Dutch Sacramentists had been settling since 1528. On the former Teutonic Knight estates 11 villages were settled, including Wickerau and Markushof. They built the dam on the west side of Lake Drausen, drained this lowland, and by 1631 established 15 villages here, including Thiensdorf and Augustwalde, by 1676 five more villages. Fifteen of these were probably Dutch settlements. After 1680 the river islands in the Vistula near Danzig and in the Nogat, which could be drained after the dikes had been built, were also reclaimed, an area of 110 sq. miles in 550 years, known as "Kampen," and inhabited for the most part by Mennonites.

The draining of these lands below sea level not only created new farm land, but also increased production on the higher lands by lowering the water table. Although the Dutch had the lowest, least valuable land, they improved the soil so consistently that their villages in a short time not only equaled but surpassed the more elevated villages of the Teutonic Order in the number of cattle and productivity of the soil. This settlement of Flemish and Frisian Mennonites in the Vistula-Nogat delta is the cradle of Mennonitism in Russia and of a large block of that in America.

Exact dates cannot be given for many of the Dutch settlements in the delta, for there was no formal settlement. The land was leased out by the owners to the Mennonites. Not until the law of March 2, 1850, was passed did the Mennonites receive title to the land.

The settlements of the period of the Teutonic Knights were made in the form of closed villages. Homes were separate from barns and stables; the dwelling houses frequently had the characteristic Vorlaube, and the land was divided into parcels. The settlers of the 16th century (Dutch) built isolated farms surrounded by their land, or in even rows along a dike so that the farm buildings faced the land. In the lower villages dirt embankments had to be thrown up around the houses to prevent spring floods. Dwelling houses and farm buildings were joined under one roof, sometimes forming a right angle or even a rectangle. Roofs were thatched with straw or reed.

In the southern part of the Gross-Werder in and around Marienburg the Heubuden Mennonite church has been in existence since the middle of the 16th century. In the Elbing region of the Gross-Werder in Tiegenhof and in Bärwalde, the Flemish group was organized, while the Frisians living here united in 1585 to form the Orlofferfelde (q.v.) congregation. In 1735 the Flemish group was divided into four parts because of the wide area it covered: Tiegenhagen, Rosenort (Elbing), Ladekopp (Orloff), and Fürstenwerder (Bärwalde). Each division had its own preachers and deacons; one elder served all. In the Klein-Werder the Thiensdorf congregation was formed.

On Sept. 13, 1772, Marienburg passed to Prussia, and in 1793 the Danzig Werder also. The Elbing region had been controlled by Prussia since 1702. In 1788 began the great migration of the Mennonites to South Russia, and in 1851 to eastern Russia. In 1874-92 many Mennonites emigrated from Russia, also some from Prussia, to the United States and Canada.

In 1937 there were 4,100 Mennonites in the Gross-Werder, 1,550 in the Klein-Werder, and 300 in the Danzig Werder, a total of 5,950 members. The Werder was lost to the Mennonites in 1945, when it was occupied by the Russians and all the Mennonites were evacuated. A.D.

H. Bertram, Danziger Deichverband 1407-1907, Die Eindeichung und Besiedlung des Weichseldeltas (1926); W. L. Baume and O. Kloeppel, Das Weichsel-Nogat-Delta (1924); M. Toeppen, Beiträge zur Geschichte des Weichseldeltas (1894); B. Schmidt, Bau- und Kunstdenkmäler des Kreises Marienburg (1919); C. Parey, Der Marienburger Kreis (1864); E. Dormann and H. Eckerdt, Geschichte des Kreises Marienburg (1862 and 1868); Felicia Szper, Nederlandsche Nederzettingen in West-Pruisen (Enkhuizen, 1913); Br. Schumacher, Niederländische Ansiedlungen (Königsberg, 1902); H. Donner, notes of 1735-1805; W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); Horst Quiring, "Die Auswanderung der Mennoniten aus Preussen," in Gesch.-Bl., 1954; H. S. Bender, "Von Danzig bis Elbing," loc. cit.; Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten im Weichseltal zwischen Fordon und Weissenberg bis zum Ausgang des 18. Jahrhunderts (Marburg a.d. Lahn, 1952); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1070, 1124-26, 1552-63, 1570-73, 1576, 1675, 1677, 1680, 1688, 1691-96, 1703-12, 1739-45; II, Nos. 2626, 2646, 2650 f.; II, 2, Nos. 722, 734-37, 741 f., 746, 752, 755, 798, 801, 804-8; ML III, 36-39.

Marienhafe (Marienhove), a hamlet in East Friesland, Germany, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) in 1563-65 baptized 11 persons. Since there was never a Mennonite congregation at Marienhafe, it may be assumed that the newly baptized joined either the Emderland or the Norden congregation. vdZ.

Mariental Mennonite Brethren Church, a subsidiary of the Rückenau (q.v.) M.B. Church of South Russia, was established as a schism from the Alexandertal congregation. In 1887 Heinrich Ewert (preacher of the Mennonite Church), Johann Penner, and Jakob Hain joined the Mennonite Brethren following a visit to Rückenau. Gerhard Claassen (a teacher) joined them, as well as some other members; these organized a small congregation with a church in Mariental. They were then joined in 1896 by Johann Wiebe, the elder of the Mennonite Church, who became the elder of the small congregation. In 1900 Peter Köhn of Waldheim (a graduate of St. Chrischona, Switzerland) was called to preach for them; he soon realized that this group could not exist as a Mennonite Brethren congregation, and aided in reorganizing it as an Alliance (q.v.) congregation (Allianzgemeinde), so that members could be received without rebaptism. Köhn, who was held in high esteem by all groups, also found opportunity to preach in the Mennonite church. In 1907 Köhn returned to his native town because the small congregation was unable to support him. Then Jakob Töws was ordained elder (he had also previously been a Mennonite preacher) and served until he was banished to Siberia in 1925. B.H.

Mariental, the name of two villages in Russia. The older was established in 1820 in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement in South Russia and from 1870 belonged to the Gnadenfeld district. The second village was founded in 1863 in the Alexandertal settlement in the province of Samara. In 1887 the Mennonite Brethren built a church here. In 1905 the congregation numbered 98 souls; in 1913 the membership was 250 souls. They suffered severely during the Revolution. (ML III, 39.) NEFF.

Marientaubstummenschule (Mary School for the Deaf), at Tiege, Molotschna, South Russia, was organized in 1881 and named after Czarina Maria on the occasion of the 25th anniversary of the reign of Alexander II, who granted the patent for the school under date of Dec. 21, 1881. It did not actually get started until 1885, and did not have its own building until 1890, having been conducted in a house in Blumenort owned by Gerhard Klassen, a great friend and supporter of the school. A Protestant Armenian, A. G. Ambartsumov, trained in Switzerland, was largely responsible for the idea of the school and was the first teacher 1885-91. The school was established by the Halbstadt district civil government (later joined by the Gnadenfeld district), with the moral support of the churches, and the two representatives of the two districts on the board of directors (a total of nine directors) always had to include one elder or preacher. The school in its full development had a nine-year course equal to the regular elementary school curriculum with five teachers and 40 pupils. It was supported by freewill offerings coming from all Mennonite groups in Russia, and had a small endowment fund. The Mennonite General Conference, though not directly responsible, gave it warm support. The school was a great success. P. M. Friesen said of it, "This first charitable institution of the Mennonites of Russia is a precious jewel (kostbarer Schmuck) and deserves all love and zealous support." The school was finally closed by the Soviet government.† H.S.B.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 655-57; A. Görz, "Kurzgefasster Bericht über die Marienschule für Taubstumme in Blumenort in Südrussland," in H. G. Mannhardt's Jahrbuch der Altevangelischen Taufgesinnten oder Mennoniten-Gemeinden (Danzig, 1888); ML III, 39.

Marienwerder (Polish, Kwidzyn), a town (1939 pop. 20,484), East Prussia, Germany (Polish since 1945), founded by the Teutonic Knights in 1233. In 1720 the Mennonites began to appear in the city as quietly naturalized citizens, whereas there had been scattered Mennonites in the Marienwerder Upper Lowland since 1650, and in the Lower Lowland in a closed group, which was later known as the Tragheimerweide congregation (q.v.), since 1550. In 1937 there were 78 Mennonites living in Marienwerder, including 18 unbaptized children. Services were held every fourth week in the Protestant church. In 1945, in the final stages of World War II, most of the Mennonite families were evacuated to West Germany or Denmark. (ML III, 39.) E.TG.

Marietta (Ohio) CPS Camp No. 8 was opened in June 1941 and was closed in April 1943. It was operated as a co-operative camp by the Brethren and Mennonites until May 1942, when the latter became the sole operating agency. The camp was located seven miles southeast of Marietta on the crest of a hill overlooking the Ohio River. It was the first Forest Service camp operated by the MCC, the assignment consisting primarily of work in the forest nursery. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1939) 126.

Marietta Mennonite Mission (MC), located at Essex and Porter Streets, Marietta, Pa., was founded in 1928 by the district mission board of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference. In 1951 the entire membership (40) with the minister, John Hiestand, withdrew from the Lancaster Conference to form the Congregational Mennonite Church (q.v.), which has remained unaffiliated. The deacon alone remained in the conference. No formal membership was reported in 1956. M.G.

Marijn Amare, an Anabaptist martyr: see Marijn Euwout.

Marijn (Martijne) Euwout, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Dec. 10, 1561, at Brugge, Belgium. In van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror this martyr is erroneously called Marijn Amare. She was born at Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland. Living at Brugge, she was arrested there with a large number of members on Nov. 10, 1561, when a meeting of the Brugge Mennonite congregation was surprised outside the town. Marijn and her comartyrs are celebrated in a hymn, "Genade ende vrede moet Godvresende zijn" (Mercy and peace should be to the God-fearing), found in Veelderhande Liedekens of 1569 and other Dutch hymnals and reproduced by Wackernagel. In this hymn she is called Martijne without a family name. The Bibliographie lists Marijn Amare as identical with Martijntgen Aelmeers (q.v.), but this is an error. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 288, E 655; Verheyden, Brugge, 48, No. 32; Bibliographie II No. 16; Wackernagel, Lieder, 130.

Marijntgen (Marijtgen) van Male (or Martynckin Maelbouts, Malebosch), an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on Dec. 12, 1564, at Gent, Belgium, with her sister Pierijntgen. They were natives of Thielt in Flanders and daughters of a Zegher. Other particulars are lacking. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror names this martyr twice: first as Marijntgen van Male, and then as Martijntgen Maelbouts. In neither case does he give the exact date of execution. This martyr is listed among the martyrs of Gent in a hymn found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren of 1578. The account on this martyr found in ML III is incorrect. (Offer, 652; Mart. Mir. D 301, 306; E 666, 670; Verheyden, Gent, 30 f., No. 103; ML III, 44.) vdZ.

Marijtgen (Marritgen), wife of Huyge Jacobsz Kraen (q.v.), an Anabaptist drowned on April 25, 1534, at the Hague, Holland. She was a native of Hazerswoude, Dutch province of South Holland. The account given by van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, stating that she was drowned at Haarlem in 1532, is not correct. Recent research has proved that both Marijtgen and her husband Huyge were among the revolutionary Münsterites (q.v.) who sailed in March 1534 en route to Münster; this fact seems to have been unknown to van Braght. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 34, E 441; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; Mellink, Wederdopers, 190.

Mariken, an Anabaptist martyr: see Maria Vlamincx and Maeyken Goossens.

Mariken (Marijtgen, Maritgen Adriaens), an Anabaptist martyr, was sentenced on Aug. 21, 1552, at Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland, to be buried alive. When she was led to the place of execution she prayed, "Lord, strengthen us, who suffer for Thy Word, which few are willing to do. I am not worthy to suffer for Thy name; but, Lord, Thou shalt make me worthy." Mariken and three other martyrs, sentenced to death on the same day, are celebrated in the hymn "Eylaes ick mach wel suchten" (Alas, I must make complaint), written by the martyr Adriaen Cornelisz (q.v.); this hymn is found (No. 18) in Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren and also in Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562. In this hymn Mariken is called a young woman. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror erroneously gives 1550 as the year of her death. The martyr Mariken named in hymn No. 6 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren is either identical with this martyr or with Mariken Jansdochter (q.v.). (Offer, 526, note 1, 578 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 97, E 495; Wolkan, Lieder, 61.) vdZ.

Mariken (Maeyken) Fransse, in the official records called Mariken Filiers (Filgiers), born at Gorinchem, Dutch province of South Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on June 28, 1559, because she "obstinately persists in the doctrines of the Anabaptists." The accounts of Offer des Heeren and van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror are incomplete. Mariken Fransse is commemorated in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, which was also inserted in the Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562. vdZ.

Offer, 566; Mart. Mir. D 244, E 618; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 2, 8; XIV, 26 f., No. 293; ML III, 39.

Mariken (Marrijtgen) Jansdochter, an Anabaptist martyr, sentenced to death on Aug. 21, 1552, at Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland, to be burned at the stake if she persisted in error and to be buried alive if she recanted. She did not forsake her faith and in consequence she was burned; when she was standing on the execution place, she said to the bystanders, "There is no other way to salvation," and she died with the words of Stephen (Acts 7:59), "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." Mariken Jansdochter, together with a few other martyrs put to death at Leiden in 1552, is celebrated in a hymn composed by Adriaen Cornelisz (q.v.), beginning "Eylaes ick mach wel suchten" (Alas, I must make complaint), found both in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (No. 18) and Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562. Perhaps the martyr, who is also called Mariken and is named in hymn No. 6 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, is identical with Mariken Jansdochter. (Offer, 526, note 1, 578 ff.; Mart. Mir. D 132, E 526.) vdZ.

Mariken van Meenen (Maeyken Eghels), an Anabaptist martyr, drowned at the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, on Sept. 5, 1562, with several other martyrs. Mariken, who was a native of Haerlebeke near Kortrijk, Flanders, is commemorated in the hymn "Lieve broeders, ick groet u met sanghen" (Dear brethren, I greet you with songs), found in the Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562 and Tweede Liedenboeck of 1583 and reproduced by Wackernagel. The account found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror on Mariken and her fellow martyrs is rather insignificant, and erroneously gives as the date of execution of a number of martyrs Aug. 15, 1561. (Mart. Mir. D 288, E 655; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 141, 149; XIV, 32 f., No. 364; Wackernagel, Lieder, 140.) vdZ.

Mariken Vrancken (Vrencken), an Anabaptist martyr, who was drowned at Stockheim "int Lant van Ludich" (Liege in Belgium?) together with her husband Thysken. The year of their execution is unknown, but it must have happened before 1547, in which year Metken (q.v.), Mariken's sister-in-law, gave the information concerning Thysken's and Mariken's death during her trial in August 1547 at Valkenburg, Dutch province of Limburg. Particulars about Mariken Vrancken and Thysken are unknown. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 326, 399.

Marinus van Dale, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned on Oct. 31, 1563, in the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, because he had been rebaptized and "pertinaciously persisted in the doctrines of the Anabaptists." His property, some furniture and a few tools, was confiscated and publicly sold on June 27, 1562. Hence Marinus must have been imprisoned before this date. (Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 142, 150, 162; XIV, 32 f., No. 368.) vdZ.

Marion (Junction), S.D., is a town (pop. 775, about one third Mennonites) in Turner County, in the southeastern part of the state. It was laid out in August 1879 and named after the daughter of one of the officials of the Milwaukee Railroad Co. It is on the eastern edge of a large Mennonite settlement and consequently serves as an important Mennonite trading center. The Tieszen Home for the Aged is located here. It also has two chiropractic clinics operated by the grandsons of Derk Tieszen, who came from Russia in 1874 and became well known as a "bone-setter." J.D.U.

Marion County, Kan., is located north of the Santa Fe Railroad between Emporia and Hutchinson, north of Harvey County and east of McPherson County. It has a land area of 957 square miles and a population of 16,307 (1953). The first white settlers in the county located on Doyle Creek near the present town of Florence in 1858. In 1859 the population was 74. The Santa Fe trail ran through the northeast corner of Marion County and crossed to the southwest into McPherson County. Railroads crossing the county are the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fe; and the Chicago, Rock Island, and Pacific. The primary occupation is agriculture. Some of the most significant towns are Marion (county seat), Florence, Peabody, and Hillsboro.

Marion County has a large Mennonite population. Towns with a predominantly Mennonite population are Hillsboro, Lehigh, and Goessel. The Mennonites are located primarily in the southwestern part of the county. The first Mennonites to come to Marion County were M. W. Keim and his friends from Johnstown, Pa., who bought 5,000 acres of land from Case and Billings during the winter of 1869-70. The next Mennonite settlement in the county was established by Peter and Jacob Funk in 1873, who had come from Russia via Sommerfield, Ill., and purchased land from the Santa Fe through the agent A. E. Touzalin. They established the Brudertal settlement (see Brudertal Mennonite Church). The next group to settle were the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren under the leadership of Jacob A. Wiebe, who settled west of Marion (Center), in the village of Gnadenau (q.v.) in 1874. Mennonites from Poland established the Johannestal Mennonite Church (q.v.) north of Hillsboro and the Friedenstal Mennonite Church (q.v.) near Tampa. The Alexanderwohl Mennonites from Russia settled in seven villages in the southwest corner of Marion County in 1874. In the center of the settlement the town of Goessel (q.v.) is now located. This group has spread into neighboring Harvey and McPherson counties. In addition to these groups, the Mennonite Brethren gradually concentrated in the Hillsboro area. They maintain the Mennonite Brethren Publishing House (q.v.) and Tabor College (q.v.) in Hillsboro.

The General Conference Mennonite churches in Marion County are as follows: First of Burns (q.v.), Alexanderwohl (q.v.), Goessel (q.v.), Tabor (q.v.), Brudertal (q.v.), First of Hillsboro (q.v.), Johannestal (q.v.), Lehigh (q.v.), and Friedenstal (q.v.) at Tampa. The Mennonite Brethren have the following churches: Ebenfeld (q.v.), Hillsboro (q.v.), Tampa (q.v.), Gnadenau-Lehigh (q.v.), and Steinreich (q.v.) near Florence. The Krimmer Mennonite Brethren have the Springfield church (q.v.). The Gnadenau mother church has joined the Mennonite Brethren. The M.C. group has the Catlin church (q.v.) near Peabody. (See also Kansas; ML II, 39 f.) C.K.

Marion County, Mo., is located in the eastern part of the state about 50 miles south of the Iowa state line and on the Mississippi River. About 100 Mennonites are located in the eastern and central parts of the county, two families in adjoining Rolls County. The first Mennonite settled in Marion County in the late 1880's or early 1890's, coming here from Lancaster Co., Pa. There are two Mennonite (MC) churches in Marion County: Pea Ridge, 12 miles west of Palmyra, and the Hannibal Mission Church, 1530 Lyon St., Hannibal. The Palmyra Mennonite (MC) Church was closed in 1955. The former members are now in one of the two remaining congregations. The total membership (1956) is 108. J.F.Kr.

Marion County (Ohio) Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, was founded by five Cullom, Ill., families who moved to the neighborhood of Morral in 1918-19. One member was Eli J. Christophel, a deacon. High land values and internal dissension prevented a normal congregational development. The group organized a Sunday school in 1920 and visiting ministers conducted services until 1923, when Levi L. Hartzler of West Liberty was appointed minister. He served until his death the next year. In 1923 one of the original settlers returned to Illinois. Between that date and 1927 the entire group moved away, some to Texas and some to West Liberty, Ohio. J.S.U.

Marion (S.D.) Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Turner County, was formerly known as the Bruderthaler Church and also as "'Wall's" Church. The congregation was organized with 11 members in 1893. The first church, erected in 1901, was replaced by the present structure in 1922. The membership in 1957 was 141. Ministers who have served the church are Benjamin Becker, Henry C. Unruh, D. P. Schultz, A. T. Duerksen, J. J. Gerbrandt, John R. Doerksen, C. A. Classen, and H. P. Fast. S.J.S.

Marion (Kan.) Mennonite Brethren Church, organized in 1884 by Elder Jacob Ehrlich as an affiliate of the Ebenfeld M.B. Church, was located one and one-half miles northwest of Marion, Kan. Ehrlich was succeeded by Johan J. Berg as leader. Its baptized membership remained small. As a result of some strong external influences the church decided to leave the Mennonite Brethren Conference, and affiliated with the German Baptists in 1889. A.E.J.

Marion Mennonite Church (MC), located five miles west of Howe, Lagrange Co., Ind., a member of the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference, began as a mission outpost of the Shore congregation, near Shipshewana, Ind. On Dec. 10, 1944, the Marion Sunday school was organized under the direction of the Indiana-Michigan District Mission Board, with 18 charter members under the leadership of Willard Sommers. In 1950 the group was organized as an independent congregation, and on Nov. 12, 1950, Paul W. Haarer was ordained as minister to assist Sommers. The membership in 1955 was 78. The meetinghouse, built in 1903 by the Methodist Church and sold by them to the Mennonites, is a frame structure with a seating capacity of approximately 130. P.W.H.

Marion Mennonite Church (MC) is located one mile north of Marion and five miles south of Chambersburg, Franklin Co., Pa. Among the family names associated with the early history of the congregation were Hege, Bender, Burkholder, Shank, Whitmore, Over, Gingrich, Garman, Kriner, Gsell, Snively, Stauffer, and Lesher. The first meetinghouse was built of brick at Brown's Mill, eight miles south of Chambersburg. In 1867 this church was removed to the present site, and was replaced in 1898 by the present larger brick church. For the members who were left in Peters and St. Thomas townships when the church was moved away, a church was built one mile southwest of Williamson in 1869, both churches having been served by the same ministers ever since, although steps have been taken to organize the Williamson group into a separate congregation.

The following ministers have served the church (with dates of ordination): Jacob Hege 1832, Benjamin Lesher 1850, Jacob W. Hege 1892, George S. Ernst 1898, W. W. Hege 1907, J. Irvin Lehman 1922, and Norman H. Martin 1937. J. Irvin Lehman, one of the present ministers, is a great-great-grandson of the first minister.

In 1896 a Sunday school was started, and in 1912 young people's Bible meetings. The first evangelistic meetings were held in 1904, conducted by Abram Metzler. Among the most active leaders of the church was W. W. Hege, who promulgated young people's meetings, teacher-training classes, mission study classes, and Bible conferences. The membership of the congregation in 1954 was 100 but the approximate membership of the Marion, Williamson, Pleasant View, and Pond Bank congregations, the last three formerly outposts of the Marion church, was 321. J.E.M.

Marital Avoidance, a question in the practice of the ban (q.v.), which has played an important and sad role in the history of the Anabaptist-Mennonite brotherhood, especially in Holland. As early as the conference of Emden in 1547 this question was raised, whether in the case of married couples, when one spouse has been placed under the ban by the church, all association between them must be avoided, a course that would closely resemble divorce. Adam Pastor and Frans de Kuiper answered the question in the negative, but the other elders present agreed with Menno Simons that marital avoidance was the proper method, but that instead of making rigid regulations, each case should be independently decided.

From now on the Mennonites were divided into two opposing camps in this matter. One party wanted to limit avoidance between spouses to spiritual matters (i.e., church affairs), and permit marital association on the same basis as before the banning. The stricter party, on the other hand, demanded complete separation from the person banned, which was to be observed also by married couples.

In 1550 Menno Simons replied affirmatively to an inquiry of the Groningen congregation in his appendix, "Answer to Several Questions" (Opera 1681, 474): "Whether married couples shall avoid one another on account of the ban," because the ban was a regulation adopted by the brotherhood, to which all members were bound without exception. But Menno cautioned against ruthless application of the regulation. The application should not burden the conscience of the persons concerned. Also the Wismar Resolutions of 1554 (Point 3) required marital avoidance, but added that no violence should be done the conscience in the matter. The predominant tone was still one of moderation.

But this spirit soon changed. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.), the most radical promoter of the ban, came to the fore. In 1556 he pronounced the ban on Swaentje Rutgers, who refused to consent to the avoidance of her husband on the ground that she did not want to forsake him in his spiritual need. but wanted rather to support him as much as possible. Menno Simons tried to mediate. He wrote to Emden in November 1556 when he was asked for advice, disapproving the excommunication of Swaentje Rutgers, pointing out the position of the Wismar Resolutions, and urging moderation and kindness. But in vain; nor did oral negotiations ease the situation. At the conference in Harlingen (1557) the influence of Leenaert Bouwens won. After first resisting, Menno finally consented to the severe interpretation. He is reported to have said, "I agree in everything; I accept your marital avoidance."

At a meeting in 1557 in Wüstenfelde Menno also sought to win Zylis and Lemke, the South German representatives, to favor marital avoidance. Zylis most vigorously opposed it. To him marital avoidance seemed an abomination, according to Matt. 19:5-6. Lemke, however, who remained with Menno for some time, adopted his position and offered to win his brethren in South Germany for it. But this did not happen, for Lemke became a pronounced opponent of marital avoidance. At the large conference held at Strasbourg in 1557 it was definitely repudiated. "It is still the sincere wish of those gathered here," they wrote to Menno Simons, "to the Dutch brethren, that they should not advise that a man and wife should separate on account of the ban, for it would result in more damage and offense than glory to God and the winning of souls, especially since the command of marriage is weightier than that of marital avoidance." Dirk Philips attacked the resolutions of Strasbourg in his booklet, Lieflijcke Vermaninghe of 1558 (BRN X, 249-65).

Menno Simons replied to this letter on June 11, 1558, with A Thorough Instruction and Account of Excommunication, in which he holds to his requirement of marital avoidance: "The heavenly marriage between Christ and our souls must be maintained firmly and unbroken, and . . . we may therefore not yield or deviate in the slightest to father or mother or husband or wife in any disobedience to His Word, for God our Lord will, shall, and must alone be the God of our conscience and the only Lord of our souls and not our father or mother, husband or wife."

This writing evoked a storm of disappointment among the South Germans. Zylis and Lemke replied with warmth, and Menno Simons could not refrain from replying to their reproaches in an angry tone. It is his last writing: A Thorough Reply to

Zylis and Lemke's Unmerited Malicious Calumniation (Jan. 28, 1559). In it he broke off fraternal relations with the South German brethren. In the same year Dirk Philips, Leenaert Bouwens, and other Dutch elders went to South Germany and banned their brethren who disagreed with them. Menno suffered from this strife. He is reported to have said shortly before his death, "How sorry I am to have consented to marital avoidance!"

After Menno's death Leenaert Bouwens and Dirk Philips with their followers carried the question of the ban and marital avoidance to the extreme. It is said to have occurred more than once that members of the severe party came into a house at night to take away from a banned husband a wife who was still questioning whether she should leave him or stay with him. There was no thought of yielding: "And although the banned husband pleaded and requested with tears, with his poor innocent children, with great pathetic and pitiful cries and weeping, that the unbanned mother might be permitted to stay with her poor little children, this did no good and they would not be moved to pity by such a sad situation." Many men could not discover for a long time, and some all their lives, what happened to their wives (Buruma, 42).

When the division between the Flemish and Frisian Mennonites occurred (1566-67), it sometimes happened that the husband adhered to the Frisians, while the wife belonged to the Flemish, with the result that married couples divided their money and children, went their separate ways and never reunited.

Several years later a division occurred among the Frisians on the matter of marital avoidance. Hoyte Renix, Lubbert Gerrits, Jan Heyndrixz, and Pieter Willemsz opposed marital avoidance. Lubbert Gerrits put his opinion into writing in his Short, Simple Explanations. Marital avoidance, he said, had been handed down by Leenaert Bouwens and Dirk Philips, but "if we read the Scriptures from Genesis to Revelation we find no case of its application. We will no longer do violence to the Scriptures and strive against God and God's Word."

When Lubbert was thereupon banned, he founded the party of Young Frisians. The strict party of Frisians also underwent a division on the matter of marital avoidance. The Jan Jacobsgezinden founded a party of their own in order to carry out their extreme interpretation of marital avoidance.

It was inevitable that this extreme interpretation of avoidance in marriage would lead to all sorts of disorder and offense. The author of Vriendelijcke Aenspraeck aen alle Doopsghesinde over het Stuck ofte Puynct der Echt-mijdinghe (1613) lamented: "How many families have been destroyed by marital avoidance! How many men and women have been disgraced! How many have lost their livelihood and their daily bread because the husband or wife had been punished and was unable to be at one with the congregation." "I must weep and with sad heart write this. But the Lord knows that I am telling the truth."

Hence it is not surprising that on several occasions the government intervened with legal regulations. The States of Friesland on April 8, 1597, strictly forbade the exercise of the ban which would lead to a complete separation and bring in its train other avoidance of civil and domestic life and living.

The quarrels over the question of marital avoidance resulted in a number of Dutch Mennonites, especially of the strictest branches, leaving the Mennonite Church in the 17th century and joining the Reformed Church. After 1700 marital avoidance was no longer practiced. The practice had been most strictly maintained by the Janjacobsz group (q.v.) even after all other branches had dropped it. The Waterlanders never practiced it, and the Flemish only rarely.

The Frankenthal Disputation (q.v.) of 1571 included a topic (No. 8) on the subject, "Whether Ban or Unbelief Separates a Marriage." The South German Anabaptists took a clear position contrary to the Dutch Mennonites, answering "No." The confession known as the Concept of Cologne (1591) dealt with this topic also.

In the Hutterite literature there is an interesting hint regarding a possible Hutterite practice of marital avoidance in the renowned Church Regulations (Gemeinde-Ordnung) of Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.) of 1640. Here Item III reads as follows: "It also happened that several excommunicated and shunned men lie with their wives in their beds. This [the discipline of marital avoidance] has been too little watched and heeded" (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 464). We may assume that most likely the principle had never been strictly observed among the Hutterites, and in later times was given up altogether. The ban, it was felt, cannot actually break the bonds of marital relations.

The Old Order Amish of North America still practice marital avoidance, although the strictness of the practice varies with the local traditions and the severity of the bishop. Marital avoidance was not one of the issues, however, that caused the original Amish division of 1693-97 (contrary to Neff, article Ban), although the general question of avoidance of banned persons was the major cause of the schism. NEFF, H.S.B.

Y. Buruma, Het huwelijk der Doopsgezinden in de zestiende eeuw (1911); Kühler, Geschiedenis I, passim; ML I, 526-28.

Maritgen, the wife of Hans de Vette: see Miertgen.

Maritgen (Mariken), an Anabaptist martyr: see Marie Vlamincx.

Maritgen (Adriaens), an Anabaptist martyr: see Mariken.

Maritgen Davidsdr., an Anabaptist martyr of Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland, who was drowned with two companions at Alkmaar on June 7 or 17, 1539. (DB 1909, 8, 22 f.; ML I, 397.) NEFF.

Maritgen Jacobsdochter, wife of Willem Heynricsz, was arrested on May 28, 1539, at Haarlem, Holland, and died about Sept. 22 of this year, when she was trying to escape from the St. Jans gate and crashed on the street. She was probably a follower of David Joris (q.v.). VDZ.

Bijdragen en Mededelingen Hist. Genootschap Utrecht XLI (Amsterdam, 1920) 200 f., 208, 212-14, 218; Mellink, Wederdopers, 184 f.

Maritgen Jansdochter, an Anabaptist martyr: see Mariken Jansdochter.

Maritgen Thonisdochter, of Amsterdam, an Anabaptist martyr, a follower of David Joris (q.v.), was arrested on May 29 in the house of Lambert Duppijns (q.v.) at Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland. After severe torture she was drowned there on June 3, 1539. vdZ.

Bijdragen en Mededelingen Hist. Genootschap Utrecht XLI (Amsterdam, 1920) 201, 208, 210; Mellink, Wederdopers, 184.

Maritgen van Waestene: see Miertgen.

Maritgen Willem van Damsdochter, the wife of Jan van Halteren of Haarlem, was arrested there on May 24, 1573, because of rebaptism. On September 17 of the same year she died in the St. Jans tower after she had given birth to a child. The expression found in the records, that "she died as a Christian," seems to indicate that she forsook her Mennonite faith. vdZ.

Bijdragen en Mededeelingen van het Historisch Genootschap Utrecht (Amsterdam, 1920) 201, 208, 216.

Maritgen Ysbrandsdochter, an Anabaptist martyr. She was the wife of Jan van Leyden (q.v.), and lived at Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland, where she kept the inn "Three Herrings." Here she was (re)baptized in November 1533 by Jan Matthysz of Haarlem (q.v.). In March 1534 she was one of the Anabaptists who sailed from Amsterdam en route to Münster, Westphalia, but being arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.) she was pardoned, apparently having recanted. Back in Leiden, however, she continued to gather revolutionary Anabaptists in her house, while her husband reigned in Münster as "King of Zion." In another house, also belonging to Maritgen, the Anabaptists also used to meet; here a plan was made to attack the city of Leiden (and perhaps also Amsterdam), but this project being betrayed, Maritgen was arrested on Jan. 23, 1535, and on Feb. 11, or shortly after, put to death at Leiden by burning at the stake. (N.N.B.Wb. V, 1163; Mellink, Wederdopers, 188, 195, 201.) vdZ.

Mariupol (Mariopol) Mennonite Brethren Church. Mariupol is a city on the Sea of Azov in the Russian province of Ekaterinoslav, Ukraine. Northwest of Mariupol was the Bergthal Mennonite settlement, which was sold in 1874 when the Mennonites moved to Canada. This settlement became a part of the larger Catholic and Lutheran settlement known as the Planerkolonie (q.v.), which established daughter settlements west and east in the Don River Basin. One of the villages west of the river was Neuhoffnung, where Eduard Wüst (q.v.) was the minister of a separatist movement. Through his evangelistic work Protestants and Catholics were converted.

Around 1866 baptism by immersion was introduced at Mariupol. Among those baptized were J. Fitz, Schröder, Preiss, and Liedtke, who made contact in the villages near the Don River with Heinrich Bartel, Regehr, and Abr. Cornelssen of the Mennonite Brethren. Others who were working here were Johann and Karl Foth, W. Berchthold, Leppke, and Wölk. The number of Mennonite Brethren increased.

In the 1880's many of the Mennonite Brethren emigrated to North America. Those of Lutheran and Catholic background who remained in Russia encountered difficulties in registering as Mennonite Brethren with the Russian government. The Mariupol Mennonite Brethren group, which was then primarily of non-Mennonite background, joined the Baptist Union in 1887 as the Belachvetch Church in the Mariupol district and as the Liebental Church in the Don area. Some of these Baptists came to America and joined the Ebenfeld Mennonite Brethren of Kansas and Wittenberg, S.D. In 1886 the Mariupol Mennonite Brethren Church in Russia had a membership of 300 and a total population of 538. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 427; J. F. Harms, Geschichte der Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde (Hillsboro, 1924) 67; J. A. Malinowsky, Die Planerkolonien am Asowschen Meere (Stuttgart, 1928).

Mariupol Mennonite Settlement: see Planerkolonie.

Marius (Mayer), Augustin (1485-1543), a Catholic theologian, dean of the theological school of the University of Vienna, Austria, and in the same year cathedral preacher in Regensburg, Bavaria, Germany, which was the time when Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) resigned his pastorate there. During this period Hans Denk was also in Regensburg and had some contact with Marius (preface to Eyngelegte schrifft, p. 1, reprinted by E. Dürr and Paul Roth in Aktensammlung, 584 ff.). Marius was probably instrumental in procuring for Denk a position in the local "Stift"; Denk resigned this position when he turned to Protestant doctrine (Staehelin, 428).

On Feb. 25, 1525, Marius received a call to Freising as suffragan, but remained in Regensburg over a year longer while he raised the sum he had to pay Rome for this position. In Freising he successfully attacked "false doctrine and heresy" (according to Gropp, his first biographer). In 1526 he was called to Basel to take the position of the suffragan, who had joined the Reformed Church, "in order to help to keep the sinking Catholic religion upright" (Reininger, 117).

Like Oecolampadius and his colleague Thomas Geyerfalk, Marius and his colleague Leonard Rebhan of St. Peter were commissioned to refute the teachings of the imprisoned Anabaptist leader "Karlin N." probably Karl Brennwald (q.v.), in a disputation. Oecolampadius wanted Denk also to take part in the disputation. In the entire history of the Anabaptists this is one of the few attempts to combine Catholic and Protestant forces in an effort to combat Anabaptist teaching.

Four articles were to be discussed: infant baptism, government, the oath, and discipleship (Nachfolge). The theses were drawn up by Karlin and presented to Oecolampadius and Marius shortly before the end of June 1527, as follows:

(1) Infant baptism is an abomination before God and idolatry. (2) The government is instituted by God; but if the government acts contrary to the command of Christ, it is not Christian, and obedience to it is not obligatory. (3) The swearing of oaths is forbidden; it is not permissible for anyone to swear. For what is more than Yea and Nay is of the evil one; therefore one must not swear at all, not for any reason. (4) In short, he who teaches and acts contrary to Christ is a deceiver.

Before the disputation Marius declared to the council that he could not engage in debate with Karlin in the presence of Oecolampadius, since the latter was a Freitäufer; it was known that he had permitted postponing the baptism of children until their third year (Staehelin, Briefe II, 93, note 8). Another factor may have been the decree of the pope prohibiting disputation with heretics (Anshelm, 361). Marius requested and received permission to present his refutation in writing. He later published the address he delivered before the council with his official opinion.

The disputation was not held, but Karlin explained his four theses orally to the council. The Protestant and Catholic theologians were to present their arguments within four days.

The statement made by Bullinger and later by Hottinger (Helvetische Kirchen-Geschichte III, 387), that Oecolampadius disputed with the Swiss Brethren on these questions in St. Martin's church on June 10, 1527, is an error (Staehelin, Briefe, 78).

A few days after the theologians had handed in their opinions, the council issued a mandate against the Anabaptists (July 6, 1527), ordering compulsory baptism of infants, prohibiting adult baptism and religious meetings in the forests, and setting severe penalties on lodging Anabaptist preachers (Staehelin, Das Buch, No. 49). The opinions of the theologians appeared in print, Oecolampadius' on Aug. 15, 1527 (see Basel), and Marius' three years later.

The instigation to publish Marius' refutation was made by Johann Faber (q.v.), Hubmaier's opponent and Vicar General of Constance; he was later made court chaplain and confessor to Duke Ferdinand, and in 1529 provost at Ofen. On his journey to the Reichstag at Speyer in 1529 he visited Marius, who had moved back to Freising. The book by Marius appeared there in 1530 with the title, Eyngelegte schrifft so uff anmutung eins Ersamen Raths zu Basel wider Carlin N. widerteufer D. Augustinus Marius Thompredicant und Wichbischoff überantwortet hat; it has 44 pages (copies may be found in the state library of München, Exeg. 1179, city library of Frankfurt, Misc. var. 678, No. 1, and city library of Augsburg, Th. H. Marius 1530). Marius based his reply on the statements presented to the council by Karlin, taking them verbatim from the court records. It maintains a remarkably conciliatory tone (Blanke, Corpus Reformatorum XCIII 122). He comments that Karlin, a "poor, deceived Anabaptist," has not correctly understood the Holy Scripture, on which he bases his doctrine, recognizing the dead letter but not the spirit, and admonishes Karlin to "lay aside his errors and to desist from his erroneous interpretation of the doctrine of Christ."

Marius sent his reply to Johann Faber on March 31, 1529, asking him to present it to Cardinal Matthias Lang (q.v.) of Salzburg and to Bishop Conrad von Thüngen of Würzberg, whom he was to meet at the Reichstag in Speyer (Staehelin, Briefe, 300). The latter two are known to have been very severe in their opposition to the Anabaptists; in both Würzburg (q.v.) and Salzburg (q.v.) Anabaptists had been put to death for their faith. This booklet apparently drew the primate's attention to Marius, for on April 24, 1529, Bishop Conrad of Thüngen recommended Marius to the Würzburg chapter as cathedral preacher, offering a considerable sum from his own purse toward Marius' salary (Birkner, 87). Marius was well informed on the teachings of the individual reformers, and for this reason the bishops were glad to have his service (Birkner, 110).

In May 1529 Marius entered his position as cathedral preacher, and in 1536 he was appointed suffragan of Würzburg. At the Reichstag in Augsburg in 1530 he was one of the Catholic theologians who drew up the refutation to the Confession of Augsburg. HEGE.

J. Birkner, Augustin Marius (Munich, 1930); R. Reiniger, Die Weihbischöfe von Würzburg (Archiv des Historischen Vereins von Unterfranken und Aschaffenburg XVIII, Würzburg, 1865); E. Staehelin, Das Buch der Basler Reformation (Basel, 1929); idem, Briefe und Akten zum Leben Oecolampads II (Leipzig, 1934); Dürr and Roth, Aktensammlung zur Gesch. der Basler Ref. II (1933); Val. Anshelm, Berner Chronik VI (Bern, 1833); Fritz Blanke, Corpus Reformatorum XCIII; ML III, 40 f.

Marken-Binnen, a hamlet in the Dutch province of North Holland, where from early times Anabaptists were found. They soon formed a congregation of the Waterlander branch, but being rather conservative it in 1674 joined the Zonist (q.v.) conference. Its membership was always very small. With the neighboring congregations of Krommeniedijk, Uitgeest, and Knollendam it formed the union of "the four congregations," in which, however, each of them had a great measure of independence. From about 1675 Marken-Binnen had no preachers of its own, but was served by those of Uitgeest and of Knollendam. In 1678 it contributed 28 guilders to the needs of the Swiss Brethren in the Palatinate and in 1726, 33 guilders for the Lithuanian Mennonites. After the congregation of Uitgeest had died out about 1750, Marken-Binnen was served by Knollendam until Marken-Binnen itself was dissolved. The Naamlijst of 1815 stated that this had happened, but it seems that the seven remaining members of Marken-Binnen did not unite with the congregation of Knollendam until 1828. Then in 1829 the old meetinghouse of Marken-Binnen was sold. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 892, 1164, 1180; II, 2, Nos. 227 f., 242; Naamlijst 1815, 107; DJ 1837, 4; DB 1907, 37, 45, 46 ff., 72-76; 1918, 50; ML III, 41.

Markham, in York Co., Ont., is a town (pop. 3,000) approximately 20 miles northeast of Toronto. Mennonites have lived in this area since 1803. Some of them reside in town but most live north and east of town. Seven Mennonite churches with 323 members are located in this area. Four are members of the Ontario Mennonite Conference (MC), namely, Widemans, Cedar Grove, Almira, and Hagerman's with a membership of 218. Three are Wisler or Old Order Mennonite, namely, Almira, Reesor, and Altona, with 105 members. In addition, the United Missionary Church has two congregations with 264 members in the area of Markham and Gormley, and the Brethren in Christ (Tunkers) have (1957) 162 members in the Markham district, in two congregations, Vaughn and Heise Hill. (ML III, 41.) P.H.Gr.

Markham (Alberta) United Missionary Church had 37 members in 1953, with M. L. Baker as pastor.

Markirch (French, Sainte-Marie-aux-Mines), an Alsatian town in the Leber Valley (Dep. Haut-Rhin), near the junction of three departments, Haut-Rhin, Bas-Rhin, and Vosges. There were Anabaptists in the Markirch Valley in the early years of the movement, as is indicated in a complaint made by the mining association to Count Egenolph III on May 29, 1561. It is directed against the "Anabaptists, Schwenckfelders, and divisions of these: Bilgerer (from Pilgram Marpeck?), Gabrielites, Sattlerites, and the like." This would indicate that the first Anabaptists here came from Strasbourg. They were quite numerous and lived on remote farms as well as near the town. They were possessed of a strong missionary zeal; the document mentioned above complains that "they creep into the houses everywhere, teach and preach without a calling, surround the common people with their subtleties." It points out the danger to which they expose the country by opposing military service.

But the count was not to be moved to expel them, not even when the chancellery at Ensisheim on July 5, 1562, ordered him in rather rude terms finally to take serious steps to get rid of Anabaptists, Sattlerites, and the like. This period of calm lasted until the Thirty Years' War. In the terror of 1635-36, the population was nearly wiped out by hostile attacks, hunger, and plagues. The survivors moved to quieter regions, so that the country lay desolate. Traces of these refugees are found in the Münster Valley and in Strasbourg. The records of the church convention of Dec. 9, 1640, mention a Jakob Mangold, an "Anabaptist Schwenckfelder, who has recently come from Markirch, where this sect has long had its synagogue." Does this mean that the Anabaptists in Markirch had built a church? Other records state that they met in a forest between Markirch and Schlettstadt. Tradition confirms this; the spot is still known.

By 1643 there were again Anabaptists in Markirch, this time Swiss Brethren refugees from Switzerland. Parson Jean le Bachelles reported that 12 families had settled there, who had elders come from Switzerland to serve them for communion, baptism, and weddings. Toward the end of the century the Swiss also brought with them their divisions. Jakob Ammann (q.v.) went to Markirch in person to put his way through. A meeting for the purpose of reaching an agreement with the followers of Hans Reist (q.v.) was held at Markirch on Nov. 9, 1697; here Ammann also wrote the letter to his opponents in Switzerland in 1700, confessing that he had grievously erred. He also worked vigorously to acquire for his brethren the privilege of exemption from military service and the oath.

These privileges and the prosperity soon achieved by the Brethren aroused the envy of the people. Complaints reached the court at Paris. In 1712 Louis XIV ordered the expulsion of all Anabaptists from Alsace. Count Christian II of Birkenfeld, who had married the last heiress of Rappoltstein, was an officer and a favorite of the king; hence he was compelled to execute the king's orders, however reluctant he might be. He gave the exiles certificates showing that they had lived honorably, been industrious, lived in peace and harmony with their neighbors, and had been forced to emigrate solely on account of their religion. Thus 500-600 persons emigrated from Markirch to Montbéliard and Lorraine, which were not under French dominion at that time.

Very soon the disastrous consequences of this withdrawal became apparent. Many fields lay waste and the count's revenues declined. An appeal was made by several noblemen of Alsace to permit a limited number of Mennonites to settle in the valley, which was granted. Because the number was limited, most of their children had to leave the country when they were grown. Nevertheless the congregation remained rather large. Jacob Goldschmidt was its elder for a long period, until about 1804. In 1789, at the election and ordination of an elder by the elders of Montbéliard, Colmar, and Salm, a total of 128 votes was reported. During the 19th century there was a steady decline. Many joined the Reformed and Lutheran groups, largely because they had to emigrate from the community. Emigration also took place to the interior of France, where many were lost to Catholicism, and also the emigration to America depleted the congregation.

Meetings were held in the homes of the members. In the present century few remained; they met in the Weiler Valley. In 1938 they met in Chatenois (Kestenholz). The congregation was served by outside ministers. It has now completely died out. The nearest living Mennonite congregation is Le Hang (q.v.). P.So.

D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Goshen, 1954) 38, 46, 85, 87 f.; ML III, 41 f.

Markstay Mennonite Mission (MC), located near Sudbury, northern Ontario, was opened in 1936 by Walter McDowell and Arthur Gingrich under the Ontario Mennonite Mission Board, the first impulse to it having been given by Linford Hackman. The work had periods of progress and decline, but never developed into a strong congregation. In 1954 the total membership was 7, although by 1948 over 75 had professed conversion and 22 had been baptized as members. At various times outposts have been established and summer Bible schools and Sunday schools conducted at such places as Mountville, Whitefish, Nairn, and Virginiatown near Kirkland Lake. (ML III, 42.) A.Gi.

Markushof, a village (pop. 650) in the Klein-Werder of Marienburg, formerly West Prussia, Germany, was settled by Dutch colonists in the early 17th century or even earlier, probably mostly by Mennonites. They suffered severely from many hardships; repeatedly Markushof was flooded by the Vistula River (very severely on April 21, 1681, and in 1737). In these calamities they were financially supported by the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs. In May 1724 a number of Mennonites expelled from Lithuania (q.v.) temporarily settled near Markushof, among whom was Elder David Penner. On Jan. 31, 1744, a conference of several West Prussian congregations was held at Markushof to face the new situation when the King of Prussia had granted freedom of religion to the Mennonites. The Mennonites living at Markushof belonged to the Frisian congregation of Thiensdorf (q.v.), but in 1791-1890 Markushof was the seat of an independent congregation.

In 1790, after 12 years of strife, about 400 persons, with four preachers and five deacons, withdrew from the Thiensdorf congregation, which had a membership of 2,000 (including children). The smaller group and the congregations of Orlofferfelde and Danzig wanted to continue to permit mixed marriages between members of the Frisian and Flemish groups, which had been allowed in the Frisian churches until 1772, and to accept the children of these marriages as well as others who wished to join by baptism. The larger part of the Thiensdorf congregation and four other Frisian congregations rejected this position. On April 21, 1791, the papers of the division were signed. The smaller group then built a church in Markushof, in which Elder Heinrich Donner of Orlofferfelde preached the first sermon on Christmas Day. In 1792 Johann Sperling, the first elder of the congregation, was ordained by Donner.

The membership remained at about 450, including children. The baptized membership in 1852 was 288, and in 1887, 292. The elder of the Markushof congregation then was Heinrich Wiehler (from 1860) and the preachers were Cornelius Wiehler, Hermann Pauls, and Franz Wiehler. Differences began to disappear and some co-operation became possible. In 1865 Thiensdorf built a new church. Elder Siebert of Markushof invited Thiensdorf to use his church during the building. The preachers of the two groups then preached on alternate Sundays, and in the autumn communion was observed on two Sundays served by both elders together.

On March 25, 1888, the Nogat River broke through its dam near Jonasdorf, and seriously damaged the Markushof church. Then the Mennonites of Holland, Hamburg-Altona, and Danzig raised a considerable sum to be given for a new church on condition that the Thiensdorf and Markushof groups merge and build a church at Preussisch-Rosengart instead of Markushof, which is near Thiensdorf. On March 4, 1890, the united group adopted the name Thiensdorf-Markushof. The old church was repaired to the extent that services could be held in it until the dedication of the church in Preussisch-Rosengart on June 14, 1894. A.D., vdZ.

Felicia Szper, Nederlandsche Nederzettingen in West-Pruisen gedurende den Poolschen tijd (Enkhuizen, 1913) 121, 125, 171 note 3; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1571-79, 1649, 1666, 1679, 1683, 1688, 1696; II, Nos. 2626, 2635, 2650; II, 2, Nos. 735, 808, 856 f.; Mannhardt, Jahrbuch 1883, 17, 19; 1888, 12; ML III, 43.

Marlboro (N.J.) was the location of CPS Unit No. 63, established at the New Jersey State Hospital in 1942. Unit 63, Mennonite administered, was the first CPS unit to be placed in a New Jersey state institution. An 82-page history and report of the unit published by the CPS men is entitled p. r. n. The MCC conducted a psychiatry and Christian service school at this hospital in February 1945. The unit was closed in 1946. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 221-22, 313-14.

Marlette (Mich.) United Missionary Church had 13 members in 1954. B. H. Surbrook was its pastor.

Marne Brotherhood, a name given to one of several congregations which formed a certain union found in the northeast part of the Dutch province of Groningen, commonly called "De Marne." In this region (according to G. E. Frerichs, DB 1906, 44 f.) Menno Simons may have found shelter after he had left the Roman Catholic Church in 1536. About 1640 Jan Luies (q.v.) is said to have been the elder of the Marne Brotherhood; soon afterward this congregation was divided into five congregations, Houwerzijl, Ulrum, Leens, Kloosterburen, and Vliedorp, all belonging to the Groningen Old Flemish branch. In 1816 the remnants of these congregations were united into one congregation, viz., Mensingeweer (q.v.). Repeatedly, but very severely in 1717, the Marne region was struck by floods. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 1977 f.; Tegenwoordige Staat der Vereenigde Nederlanden XXI (Amsterdam, 1793) 310-18; Groningsche Volksalmanak 1918, 1-21; 1921, 6-13.

Marnix, Philips van: see Aldegonde.

Maronier, Jan Hendrik, b. 1827 at Rotterdam, d. 1920, a Remonstrant preacher successively at Zevenaar, Leiden, Utrecht, and Rotterdam, wrote an excellent biography of the Remonstrant Jacobus Arminius (q.v.), Jakob Arminius (Amsterdam, 1905), and Geschiedenis van het Protestantisme . . . 1648-1789 (Leiden, 1907), besides a number of smaller works including some opposing the Roman Catholic Church, and of particular interest, Het inwendig Woord (Amsterdam, 1890), which treats Hans Denk and the Mennonites of Holland. "Menno Simons did not know the doctrine of the inner word (q.v.), nor did Dirk Philips." Hans de Ries acknowledges in addition to the Scriptures "another unwritten Word of God." With the exception of Nittert Obbesz there is no trace of opposition to the doctrine of the inner word, states Maronier (page 221). (ML III, 43.) vdZ.

Marpeck (Marbeck), Pilgram (d. 1556), author and leader of the South German Anabaptists 1530-56.

I. Introduction. Concerning the life and work of this man, the most important of the German Anabaptists in the middle of the 16th century, little was known until very recently. This is understandable, for the great Geschicht-Buch of the Hutterian Brethren did not record his name, nor do the abundant hymns of the Anabaptists name him, although more recent investigation has revealed numerous contacts between Marpeck's circle and the Hutterites in Moravia. Indeed Marpeck's great work, the Verantwortung, his reply to Schwenckfeld's Judicium, which in turn was a reply to Marpeck's Buch der Bundesbezeugung, or Vermahnung, was first found and noted by them, and as was proved very recently, they even used Marpeck's book as the basis for decision in debatable questions. What a pity it is that this work in the ensuing time was to sink away into oblivion, so much the more so since it is precisely this work that has called to attention the existence of a third great Anabaptist book of the same period, the knowledge of which had likewise vanished from the later Anabaptists. The book referred to is the Testamentserläuterung, which is one of the most important of the works preceding Marpeck's great work and was probably written under his leadership and supervision by a close circle of fellow believers.

As a result of recent research the Anabaptist world of today is the recipient of three Anabaptist books that have been hitherto almost unknown; first the Bundesbezeugung, which will be briefly referred to in this article as the "Baptism booklet" of 1542; second the Testamentserläuterung (Testament Explanation); and third the Verantwortung (Answer) to Schwenckfeld's Judicium (Critique) concerning the baptism booklet. We become acquainted with these men who collaborated with Marpeck in his work, and who after its completion subjected it to a critical survey, after which it was released for general use ("to each and all who will have it"). These men were Pilgram Marpeck, Leopold Scharnschlager, the leader of the Swiss Brethren in the Grisons, Sigmund Bosch, Martin Blaichner, Valentin Werner, Antoni Müller, and Hans Jacob, several of whom are also known as the authors of hymns.

II. Marpeck's Origin and Education. Pilgram Marpeck was a native of Tirol, Austria. This could be gathered from his language and way of writing even if there were no record in the Tirol court records. His family lived in prosperity at Rattenberg on the Inn in the 15th and the beginning of the 16th centuries. Records in the government archives show that Jakob Marpeck, who is mentioned under the date of Nov. 23, 1489, as a judge at Rattenberg, was a member of this family. Likewise under Aug. 10, 1494, a Heinrich Marpeck is named as judge at the same place, who served until 1502. He was in the city council, in 1511 was the mayor, and in 1514 was still in the council. The family coat-of-arms shows a bird on a sphere.

Pilgram Marpeck attended the Latin school in Rattenberg. Thus he received a "scholarly education," which can be discerned in his writings, which contain not only numerous Latin words but also a Latinized sentence construction. He united with the miners' brotherhood of Rattenberg as one of the last to do so, as is shown by an old notation of Feb. 26, 1520, which also records that he was married by that time. This disproves the assumption by Gerber that he had been a cleric. The Tirolese authorities would not have given him the office of mining judge, to which he was called on April 20, 1525, if he had been a renegade monk or cleric. Two years previously, on Feb. 24, 1523, he had been a member of the Rattenberg outer council and after June 11, 1525, also a member of the inner council.

In the 1520's Marpeck had the reputation of being a competent mechanic or engineer in the mines of the lower Inn Valley. His annual salary as mine judge amounted to 65 pounds, and he received an additional 3 pounds for court dress. As a private contractor in the mining business he delivered ore from Schneeberg and Gossensass to Kitzbühel in 1520. When he received the office of mine judge, he loaned to the state treasury the sum of 1,000 guilders, which were put to his credit. This indicates that he was in good financial circumstances. He owned two houses, which were assessed for a tax of 3 florins for the "Turkish Tax," as was also his daughter's property. The Gilg (Egidius) Marpeck who on this occasion was taxed 2 florins and according to Josef Beck was also an Anabaptist was doubtless a close relative.

His good financial status put Pilgram into a position to undertake the education of three orphan children and to make journeys to South Germany.

When Marpeck became an Anabaptist is not clear, but on Jan. 28, 1528, he was removed from his position as mine judge; the reason was certainly that he refused to "investigate" (aid in catching) Anabaptists as requested by the authorities in Innsbruck. The Anabaptist preacher Leonhard Schiemer had been executed in Rattenberg as a martyr two weeks earlier, and Hans Schlaffer likewise on February 4 of that year. It seems most probable that Marpeck was influenced by these missionaries, although he had probably previously attended some Anabaptist meetings conducted by a certain Paul in near-by Kitzbühel and in the Münichau Castle, whose owner, Helena von Freiburg, favored the movement (Marpeck later had connections with her). This could have been in November and December of 1527, since a report of such meetings was given to the authorities in Salzburg on December 9 of that year. But although there is no evidence as to Marpeck's baptism, he must have been an Anabaptist at least in conviction when he fled from Rattenberg soon after his dismissal from his office, which he turned over to his successor on February 3, for his property was confiscated. But it is possible that he was not baptized until he was in Augsburg.

Marpeck's sacrifice of his position must certainly be connected with his ideas about the office of judge. He himself reported concerning his religious experiences thus (paraphrased): "Educated in the papacy by God-fearing parents, he turned from this and became a proclaimer of the Wittenberg Gospel. But when he found that in the places where God's Word was preached in Lutheran terms a carnal freedom was felt, it disinclined him somewhat, so that he could not find rest with the Lutherans. At that time he accepted baptism as a testimony of his faith, in this looking only upon God's Word and command."

It is known that this was in general the course of Anabaptist development in Tirol. When Marpeck became suspected of being an Anabaptist who could not be tolerated in the country, he found it advisable to leave his home, leaving behind all his possessions. In 1529 he received his inheritance. His property, in accord with the mandate of April 1, 1528, which stipulated that the possessions of people of other creeds who "had left and become fugitive," must be confiscated into the state treasury, was inventoried and the order given to the authorities at Rattenberg to confiscate all of Marpeck's property; it was in the first place to be used for the education of the three orphans. But this was not done; for soon afterward it was transferred to Christoph Philip von Liechtenstein, the manager of the castle and the bailiff of Rattenberg, who valued it at 400 guilders, whereas it had been valued by other persons at 3,500 guilders.

III. Marpeck's Residence in Strasbourg. Connection with the Lutheran and Reformed Churches. Johannes Walch, who was deacon in Nürtingen in 1578 and was later removed from his office on account of inclinations to Anabaptism, reported that Marpeck first went to Augsburg after his expulsion. In October 1528 he arrived at Strasbourg, where he soon became the leader of the Anabaptists there. Here there was a strong church movement. Men of various religious parties collected here (though not all at one time), including Kaspar Schwenckfeld, who later became Marpeck's opponent, Melchior Hofmann, Sebastian Franck, whose Paradoxa were popular, Johannes Bünderlin of Linz, once a leader of the Anabaptists of that place, Jakob Kautz, Wilhelm Reublin, Jakob Wiedemann of Memmingen, personalities who had a good reputation in Anabaptist circles. They held their meetings in the home of the notary Fridolin Meiger and in the houses of Lukas Hobelmacher and Klaus Bruch. Foreign and native Anabaptists assembled here, of whom the former group was supported by the common treasury. Marpeck had first settled in Steintal, where he worked for a salary in the city forest, about 25 miles southwest of Strasbourg, just south of Schirmeck. He lived here with his wife, and in his house Anabaptist meetings were held.

In 1530 Marpeck moved into the city itself, where he had numerous friends, patrons, and followers who honored him like a god (numinis instar). An excellent intellect, blameless Christian conduct, acquaintance with the Scriptures, an earnest character who did not regard temporal possessions, he in the beginning became a ward of Capito, Bucer, Zell, and Blaurer. The Strasbourg clergy were full of his praise and lauded his intellectual gifts. His courageous zeal was proved in many situations. The total citizenry of Strasbourg profited from his presence; for he built for the city the extraordinarily complex water system and wood floating flumes in the valleys of the Ehn and Brerisch (Steintal) in Alsace, and of the Kinzig and Murg in Baden, whereby Strasbourg, which was poor in wood, had access to the wealth of the Black Forest.

To be sure, public opinion soon changed. Marpeck was inconvenient to the clergy. He contradicted them and boldly expressed his opinions. Then they accused him of having led many good hearts into error by his violence, of being unfit for the office of Christian preaching and for the management of a church for the sanctity of which he was working, indeed of being unusable, a stiff-necked heretic, who like all sectarians was lacking in love, to which the Holy Scriptures admonish so urgently. On Aug. 17, 1531, Bucer wrote to Blaurer that this Pilgram was intent on his own pleasure and his own supposed knowledge; otherwise he and his wife were of unblamable conduct.

Known to the government as an obstinate heretic, namely, as an opponent of infant baptism (which he called a sacrifice to Moloch, a robbery of souls and murder) and then as a man who, according to reports, was misleading the good citizens and to whom well-meant arguments meant nothing, Marpeck was imprisoned. Capito's intercession, and probably still more the fact that he was needed for the city's water works engineering, restored to him his freedom, without his having given the required oaths to renounce Anabaptist company and doctrine.

At the beginning of December 1531 Marpeck requested of the council permission for a public debate with the clergy, but he was granted only a colloquium before the assembled council and the "committee of twenty-one," the public being excluded. The date set was Dec. 9, 1531. In 23 articles Marpeck presented his doctrine, corresponding to the two booklets which he had previously published, but which were suppressed by the council on the suggestion of the censors. Bucer was his opponent. Marpeck defended adult baptism vigorously. Only he who received it (he argued) might be a member of the kingdom of God; among the Catholics on the one side, and the Bucer following on the other, more dissension and envy were felt than divine zeal. He accused Bucer and his followers, "that they did not preach freely under the Cross of Christ but under the protection of the princes and cities." One should therefore not be surprised that the Word of God was bearing no fruit; even at that day there was no Christian order in Strasbourg.

Bucer replied with more loquacity than thoroughness and was repeatedly criticized by Marpeck, especially when he admitted that he had called upon the government for support and when he compared circumcision with baptism (Zwingli's "symbol of initiation"). The decision of the council was that it had perceived from the charge of the clergy that Pilgram was mistaken in this matter and therefore commanded that if he persisted in his opinion and was planning to overthrow infant baptism, which the council did not consider unchristian, and to set up a separate church, this must not be permitted; in this case he must leave this city and region not to return unless he abjured his error; in the contrary case he would be dealt with in a manner that one would rather escape. The document bears the date of Dec. 18, 1531.

Two days later Marpeck notified the council that he would leave the region. But if, impelled by the Spirit of God, he should be led thither again he would endure what God would send him. Since he would not be able to sell his little household in a short time he asked for a period of grace of three or four weeks, then requested the payment of the credit that he still had with the council for the wood floating from Einbach (Black Forest). He was then granted a period of two weeks to prepare for his departure, but at the same time it was made clear to him that the council was displeased by his saying "that infant baptism is not proved with divine Scripture." Therefore Pilgram left, but not without having asked the people of Strasbourg to reflect on the things of God, in order that the city might be preserved in the future from the shedding of blood in matters of faith, that it might therefore end the persecution of these pitiable people who had no place of refuge. He finally gave the council a copy of Bucer's talk at the disputation and his reply, in order that they could see that it was not his, but God's will that was bidding him leave. The city informed Countess Elisabeth of Fürstenberg on Dec. 18, 1531, that they had dismissed Pilgram Marpeck, her overseer in the forestry at Einbach, "on account of obstinate insistence on his erroneous opinion," and had put in his place two men skilled in trade and in forestry. To be sure, they were also suspected as Anabaptists, but since they kept their convictions to themselves and did not disturb anyone with them, she might tolerate the two.

A third disputation with Marpeck was held before a special commission of the Council on Jan. 18, 1532, but the verdict remained unchanged: Marpeck had to go. Thus Marpeck left Strasbourg in January 1532. Bucer and Blaurer expressed themselves with very frank satisfaction over this fact. Blaurer wrote to Bucer on Jan. 24, "Your report concerning Marpeck will be dear and useful to all our people, but still more your earnest reply to his nonsense. Share it with us. An evil of this kind usually sticks obstinately with people who have once been spotted by it, but superstition knows how to deceive simple people by a pious bearing." On Feb. 2 Bucer replied to Blaurer's words with flattery. Not all of Blaurer's friends were happy with Marpeck's withdrawal. His own sister Margarete had taken a deep interest in him and Bucer was now zealously engaged in changing her opinion.

It might have been expected that Marpeck, like so many of his Tirol countrymen, would go to Moravia. Perhaps, however, the unfavorable reports that he had received from there a year earlier kept him away. In the Moravian Anabaptist group there had been violent dissension in the winter of 1530, which threatened its very existence and resulted in a division into two wings. It was Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.) who allegedly rebelled against the elders "on account of offensive misconduct of the ministers (Diener)," and left Austerlitz with his following, going to Auspitz. On Jan. 26 he wrote a long report about this to Marpeck. Apparently there were older connections between the two. Reublin spoke of the love which he had always had for Pilgram, and mentioned a writing by his brother-in-law Kaspar Schueler which he had sent to Pilgram. These statements by Reublin must always be compared with the corresponding statements of the Hutterite Geschicht-Buch, to get at the real truth. Reublin did not leave a good memory in Moravian Anabaptist circles. Whether his reports affected Marpeck or not, the Geschicht-Buch does not show any incidents that imply any later connections with Marpeck.

Until recently the whereabouts of Marpeck from the time he left Strasbourg in 1532 until his controversy with Schwenckfeld in 1542-44 was unknown. The discovery of the Kunstbuch codex (see below) containing numerous letters of Marpeck and his circle has cast considerable light on his movements. He apparently traveled widely. In 1534 he was back in Strasbourg but had to flee again. On Dec. 4, 1540, he wrote a letter from near Ilanz in the Grisons (Switzerland) to the "dear ones" near Strasbourg in the Kinzig and Leber valleys. In 1541 he probably made a trip to Moravia to visit the Hutterites. On Aug. 15, 1544, he wrote a letter from Chur in the Grisons to the churches in Württemberg. Most likely he spent at least 1540-44 in the Grisons, and possibly some of the time 1532-40. In late 1544 he moved permanently to Augsburg. Kiwiet and Fast believe that the Vermahnung (1542) and the first part of the Verantwortung (1542-44) were written in the Grisons.

IV. Marpeck and Schwenckfeld. Schwenkfeld's Attitude to the Anabaptists. Marpeck's connections with the Silesian nobleman Caspar Schwenckfeld von Ossig extend back to the time when both lived in Strasbourg. Schwenckfeld expressed himself very differently at different times concerning the life and teaching of the Anabaptists. His views are found in the excellent book by Ecke. Only the most important ought to be stated here. In the 1550's Schwenckfeld wrote, "What horrible errors I have heard from the Anabaptists when I was among them I would rather tell you by mouth than in writing" (Ecke, 203). He named the leaders and told only evil things about them; i.e., about Ludwig Hätzer, Balthasar Hubmaier, and others whom he knew personally. But the intimate contact which he himself had in Strasbourg and probably also later with Marpeck, whose frank Anabaptist opinions he knew, proves that he thought differently about Anabaptism and the Anabaptists at that time and therefore took them under his protection.

Something of the earlier friendly relationship between the two is echoed in the open letter which Marpeck wrote Jan. 31, 1544, to Schwenckfeld (Verantwortung, 55). Mindful of the old friendship he vigorously expressed his displeasure concerning the present unexpectedly hostile attitude of Schwenckfeld toward him. He wrote, "I would not have thought it of you that you would behind my back send letters into the world against me, and without asking or informing me would make charges against me, since you in the earlier days dealt with me so much in matters of faith. You are now doing it too since the first letter I sent you from Ulm. Now you have composed a whole book against me and selected in particular 38 articles 'how I shall hold them concerning Christ,' and sent them out everywhere so that I must defend myself about them toward many who know my teaching."

Marpeck complained further that Schwenckfeld had associated with Valentin Ickelsamer (q.v.) and that the two had worked against him. Ickelsamer is known not only as a religious polemicist but especially also as one of the oldest German grammarians. Entangled in the quarrel between Carlstadt and Luther he later adhered to Schwenckfeld, and in 1542, when Schwenckfeld's polemics with Marpeck were beginning, he published a letter which Schwenckfeld had sent to him during a severe illness: His (Schwenckfeld's) prayer had saved his life. It is necessary to consider this grammarian here because Marpeck speaks of him in his large book. As far as Schwenckfeld is concerned his procedure against Marpeck was so much the more spiteful because Marpeck had in earlier days supported him.

Marpeck wrote that he was not aware that in all his life he had ever done an evil deed to Schwenckfeld, much rather he had wished and done him all kinds of good.

Concerning the origin of Schwenckfeld's hostility to Marpeck there is information in an Olmütz (Olomuce) manuscript (Sign. III 19), which refers to a letter that Marpeck wrote to Helene Streicher in Ulm and which greatly excited Schwenckfeld. It reveals, as do also allusions found in Marpeck's Verantwortung, that Schwenckfeld had expressed a negative opinion of the Anabaptists in Anabaptist circles (Schwenckfeld's propaganda against the Anabaptists is also seen from his 54th Rede in Marpeck's Verantwortung, 171-73). Thus it is learned that the zealous Anabaptist Magdalena Marschalk von Pappenheim was "tempted with unfathomable things" by "false prophets," with writings that contained untruths and slander of the Anabaptists and especially of one of their brethren. It is probably safe to assume that Marpeck is meant. Helene Streicher, Schwenckfeld's friend, expressed herself similarly. She sent to Marpeck a writing that contained a number of charges which had been made by their opponents against the Anabaptists, charging that the Anabaptists held to externalities instead of holding to the spirit of Christ's teaching, "whether it be baptism or whatever it may be." Under such circumstances the Anabaptist brotherhood proceeded to place into the hands of its members a confession of faith which gives the testimony of their doctrine in 25 large sections, the Vermahnung.

V. Marpeck's Vermahnung (called the Bundesbezeugung or baptism booklet of 1542). In 1542 a book of 200 pages appeared, which in accord with the custom of the time bore the somewhat long-winded title: Vermannung; auch gantz klarer gründtlicher un(d) unwidersprechlicher bericht zu warer Christlicher . . . puntssvereynigung allen waren glaubigen frummen und gutthertzigen menschen zu hilff und trost mit grund heyliger schrifft durch bewerung warer Tauff und Abendmals Christi sampt mitlauffung und erklärung irer gegensachen und Argumenten wider alle vermeynte Christliche Pündtnus so sich bissher un(d) noch under dem nammen Christi zutragend. Neither the author nor the place of its publication is named. The document is signed by "the believing (christgläubig) comrades of the covenant of the tribulation that is in Christ." In Marpeck's Verantwortung, the last of the three Anabaptist writings which are closely interrelated, this writing is also called the "booklet of the sign (Bezeugung) of the covenant" or briefly the Baptism booklet, probably mostly because most of it deals with the problem of baptism.

In our day this book has been a bibliographical rarity, for only two copies were known, one in the British Museum and the other in the Württemberg state library in Stuttgart. Christian Hege performed a valuable service when he published it in the book commemorating the fourth centennial of the founding of the Mennonites (1925), since this booklet by Marpeck for reasons stressed in the introduction to the edition of Marpeck's larger work, the Verantwortung, was the first one for a long time in which the South German Anabaptists defended their teaching in print. That it was also of great significance for its content is clear from the sharp condemnation it was given by its opponents. Even though the author's name is not stated in the book, the contemporaries had no doubt about who it was. Caspar Schwenckfeld thought there were two authors; one was undoubtedly Pilgram Marpeck, who was probably assisted by Leopold Scharnschlager.

The modern publisher of the Taufbüchlein has described its contents and importance with the following words (paraphrased): "The Vermahnung is an exposition and a suggestion for the congregations on the right use of baptism and communion. It, however, rejects all supersensory (übersinnliche) meaning, but it makes the highest demands of its members in respect to their position of faith and their moral conduct. With baptism Marpeck demands a penitent frame of mind, a believing submission to God through Christ, obedience to the will of God. Communion is simply a memorial meal and is held 'for the renewal, strengthening and comfort of the soul, and for nothing else.' The members are to examine themselves earnestly to see whether they stand in the right love toward friend and foe and whether their love for Christ is strong enough that they would be able to give up their lives for Him. Partaking of the Lord's Supper with open sinners is unworthy, if they have not been rebuked with a brotherly rebuke, since otherwise the innocent partakes of the sin of the guilty. The Anabaptists always kept referring to his concept of a pure church, when an attempt was made by the state church to compel them to transfer their membership. Their objections often had the consequence that the Protestant clergy decided to introduce 'church discipline'" (Gedenkschrift, 182).

Marpeck's argumentation, Hege adds, is evidence of a thorough knowledge of the Bible and a keen thought process, and is in many cases supported by excellent figures of speech. The language of the book is gentle, and contrasts strongly with the harsh tone found in the works of most of the reformers. The impression it made in its own circles must have been so much the more significant, since even an opponent like Schwenckfeld, though against his will, is compelled here and there to give it recognition. Although the problem of baptism is treated with particular detail, the chapter on infant baptism and the treatment of original sin should also be pointed out. He expounds his views as follows: After Peter (page 215) had admonished the people they grew anxious in heart and asked, What shall we do? Be converted, he replied, be sorry for your sins and let each one be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of his sin, and thus you shall receive the gifts of the Holy Ghost. Because the children who cannot talk are still unknowing and cannot be converted and have also not yet been perverted by their own carnal reason, they cannot receive any forgiveness of their sins in baptism, because they do not have any knowledge or guilt concerning their sins, either before God or in themselves. Therefore the baptism of infants is a mere work of mockery before God.

VI. Schwenckfeld's Judicium Concerning the Baptism Booklet of 1542 and Marpeck's Reply. About

Schwenckfeld's attempt to win favor for his own teaching in Marpeck's circles there is information in this reply which Pilgram Marpeck addressed to Helene Streicher, Schwenckfeld's friend, and hitherto probably also Marpeck's friend, which is now printed as a supplement to the first part of Marpeck's Verantwortung to Schwenckfeld's Judicium (pp. 179-88).

Helene Streicher, entirely taken in by Schwenckfeld's teaching, wrote to Marpeck, "Since Christ's word and teaching are spirit and life, one must rise to it and must not make earthly elements, baptism or anything else, a condition for salvation." Marpeck referred her to the Scripture, that no Christian may refuse a demand of the Lord. Since Christ has commanded baptism the believer must hold himself to the command. We need "the physical elements" according to the Word and command of Christ, without denying the inward working of the Spirit. The true believer knows only of one baptism, namely, the baptism of the Lord, of the washing away of sins in the blood of Christ, i.e., through spirit, water, and blood, "which serve as one." "Of course where spirit and life do not follow in this physical use of the elements, the elements probably will remain only mere elements"; here Paul's statement in I Cor. 3 applies, "Neither he who waters nor he who plants is anything, but he who gives the growth. The external should not be separated from the inward, as it is imagined today."

These words are a rejection of Schwenckfeld's doctrine as shared by Helene Streicher, and thus also of other opinions of Schwenckfeld's, suggesting that the Anabaptists had no true knowledge of Christ. In conclusion Marpeck wrote to her, "Please accept this my writing out of a sincere intention; I could not leave my opinion unrevealed to you. You told me that you could not be of our opinion. Know that I cannot accept yours either." This letter, said Walpurga Marschalk von Pappenheim, was sent by her Aunt Magdalena to Mrs. Streicher in Ulm. When it reached Schwenckfeld, Walpurga wrote, he became heated and wrote against "Brother Pilgram and Miss Magdalena." In the Judicium is found what moved him. It is probably to be expected that Schwenckfeld would not leave Marpeck's booklet on baptism without a critical faultfinding, but it was not to be expected that this would turn out to be so bitter and hate-filled as is the case. First it must be said, that the Judicium also makes an attempt to distinguish between the Anabaptists (concerning whom many good things are granted) and their leaders.

The Judicium attack on the baptism booklet has been passed down in two forms. First in the Wolfenbüttel manuscript (V, 33), "Uiber das new Büchlein der Taufbrüder im 1542 Jare ausgangen Judicium," and second in those extracts with which Marpeck preceded his 100 answers (Schwenckfeld's Reden).

In Marpeck's circles the Judicium was very disturbing, for Schwenckfeld's opinions were clearly revealed. This can also be gathered from Schwenckfeld's instruction to see to it that the Judicium would not fall into other hands than those of the Anabaptists, "so that it may be of benefit to them and that they can accordingly correct their errors; for I hope that many finally will come to the truth and become better acquainted with Christ, the reigning king of heaven."

The propaganda of this document did not remain concealed from the Anabaptists; it induced them to issue an immediate reply, the writing of which was also taken in hand at once and of which at first only the first part, finished by Jan. 1, 1544, was given to the public. In it only the first of the seven points charged against them by Schwenckfeld is treated. Therefore Marpeck also apologized at the end of the first part, "that they had allowed this one part without the completion of the other to be issued; this happened on account of the haste, so that our fellow members and other goodhearted people will not be overtaken by such false erroneous spirits and be prejudiced or taken unawares, and if one of them might already be entangled he could loose himself from the entanglement." The second part would then produce what was still lacking. For each of the 100 Reden by Schwenckfeld there is a reply by Marpeck, of which replies 54 come in the first part, which is 206 manuscript pages in length, about one fourth of the entire book.

Marpeck preceded his work with an open letter to Schwenckfeld which contains really bitter comments about people who play themselves up as removers of splinters without seeing the beams in their own eyes. He wished for Schwenckfeld a knowledge of himself, without which any other knowledge is vain. After the dealing they had with him and the warnings sent to him they had not expected such a proceeding against them, and now he had even forged together 39 articles, "as I allegedly had them from Christ, so that I must apologize to all who know my confession of faith. It is this that compels me to reply."

And now Marpeck proceeds with the individual points. First he defends himself against the charge of incompetence, that the composers of the baptism booklet were much too presumptuous, that they considered all who did not agree with their baptism as not being Christians. We say, that those who are not baptized according to the order of the Lord we do not have to judge or condemn. As they are outside they do not concern us. Every true believer, however, must obey the commands of the Lord, even in detail. We confess the baptism of Christ as a baptism of a rebirth and the washing away of sins. It issues from the teaching, "No baptism without preceding teaching, without the accompanying Gospel and faith."

With the 17th Rede Schwenckfeld begins the condemnation of the baptism booklet, which he finds fault with in almost all its parts. The whole contrast in the concept of the problem of baptism Marpeck crystallized in his prayer in his reply in the 34th Rede of Schwenckfeld: "O Lord, see how this generation attempts to destroy your own baptism. . . . You command baptism and so it is reasonable to keep it for the sake of your command as well as for the sake of the one for whom it is commanded. With their reason, which you have condemned, they separate your water bath into parts, the water from the word, in order to do away with your command under the pretext of not permitting the external water to be made a requirement for salvation. Even if we did not understand why you have commanded baptism we would obey for the very reason that you have commanded it, just as Peter once did when he let you wash his feet." The 46th Rede contains the texts where all the Bible citations are assembled which speak against Schwenckfeld. There is sharp antithesis between the demands of the Gospel and what Schwenckfeld does. When Schwenckfeld speaks of baptism he separates indivisible baptism into parts, accuses it of being a water baptism thought up by man, and accuses us of calling the element that is water the narrow gate to the kingdom of heaven, whereas we mean the whole inward and outward work of the only baptism, to which all matters ordained of the Lord belong and wherein they have their origin through true faith.

VII. The Second Part of the Verantwortung and the Testamentserläuterung. Before the contents of the second part of the Verantwortung are considered it should be once more stated that the first part was worked out hastily and that therefore some details had to be supplemented and especially a stronger apparatus of Biblical proof citations for single points had to be assembled. So it happens that the second part of the Verantwortung in its entire presentation bears a different face than the first. Not only does it go more deeply into individual points and treat anew what Marpeck had already said, but it also has a much greater amount of proof material from the Holy Scriptures.

In the study of the two parts with regard to their sources it must be obvious that in the second part when it deals with Bible citations, they often refer to the Testamentserläuterung, where one may find many more citations on a matter than his presentation contains, whereas in a similar case in the first part not a single reference is made to this source, not even where one should have unquestionably expected it. For this no other explanation can be found, but that in the years 1542-44 when they were just working on a refutation of Schwenckfeld's accusations this book "called the Testamentserläuterung" was not available and was not to be finished until the conclusion of the first part, and indeed was prepared for the purpose of creating a broader area of defense. From the citations which are made in the second part of the Verantwortung the existence of the book could be ascertained. It is in fact still extant in two libraries, in Zürich and in Berlin. Its full title is Testamenterleutterung. Erleutterung durch ausszug aus Heiliger Biblischer schrifft. tail und gegentail sampt ains tails angehangen beireden zu dienst und fürderung ains klaren urtails von wegen underschaid Alts und News Testaments unnd ire beder Sündtvergebung, Opffer, Erlösung, Gerechtigkait, Gnad, Glauben, Gaist, Folck unnd anderm, so grundtlich lautter und nutzlich nie ersehen genant Testamenterleutterung. No place and year of publication are given. It is an octavo volume with over 800 pages of text, and a further 11 pages with title, preface, and index. Kiwiet has now shown that it was finished in May 1550 (dissertation, p. 77).

The foreword announces the purpose of the book: Since there are widely divergent views on the question of the distinction between the Old and New Testaments, between the Mosaic assembly and the new church, some saying that the sufferings of Christ are retroactive into the Old Testament and also had already delivered a forgiving of sins to eternal life in the Old Testament as it is now in the New (which agrees with Schwenckfeld's preaching), but others (like Marpeck and his circle) deny this and say that this (reconciliation to salvation, redemption, comfort, etc.) is found in the Old Testament only figuratively, but not in essence; neither is the spirit of divine promise for eternal life there, but all this was only promised. The Fathers, i.e., the believers in the old covenant hoped to receive all this only through the Incarnation of Christ, His suffering, His death, and His resurrection; therefore the Testamentserläuterung presents the total material from the pure text of the Holy Scripture, in order that each one who hungers for the truth may form a judgment for himself. What reason would there have been, say those on one side, for Christ after His death to have had to descend to hell and proclaim the Gospel there among the dead and the spirits, if "the [Old Testament] Fathers" had already had possession of forgiveness to eternal life?

Thus the foreword presents further motives which we find again collectively in the Verantwortung. All the citations concerning forgiveness of sins, reconciliation, redemption, salvation, comfort, etc., are presented from the Bible and indeed first from the old and then from the new covenant, wherein now a hungry man "may refresh himself as in a garden of roses or on a flowery meadow in the splendor of colour." And here the foreword goes on to say, the period before Christ's Incarnation is designated with the word "yesterday" and those of the new covenant with "today." The foreword then explains the word "Wesen" and "wesentlich" (essence and essential); to the Anabaptists these words mean that "yesterday" prefigured, but the "today" accomplished, things for eternal life which were not present "yesterday" but were to be expected only in the future, as Paul says in Col. 2: "These things are a shadow of that which was to come, but the 'Wesen' is Christ."

Finally there are in the foreword explanations as to possible understandings of certain individual verses: "And it is to be noticed where 'yesterday' and 'today' 'Wesen' is promised. One should pay attention to the words which are 'today' and which cannot be figures and thus refer to 'yesterday's' time. There are also promises for 'tomorrow,' that is, for Christ's return from heaven. Consider these places in the Old Testament which speak of future affairs as of the present as if they had already happened, which were of course still to be fulfilled." The author promises himself great benefit from the book, because here matters of revelation are explained with clear judgment and understanding of the Scripture.

The name of the author of the Testamentserläuterung is not given: We discover that several persons took part in composing it. They conceal its authorship, because many people ask more about the author than about the truth and consider further whether he is of high [Schwenckfeld] or low [Anabaptist] rank, or they ask what faith he is, and accordingly buy the books. The author therefore has referred the reader only to the Word of God and left his own name unstated partly also for this reason that he did not "collect" the book without co-operation.

The very fact of the unusually frequent citation [92 citations by name] of the Testamentserläuterung by Marpeck when it was a matter of proving something, leads to the conclusion that the book originated in Anabaptist circles. The citation never occurs in a polemic intention, but always in agreement. For example when Red und Antwort 73 says: "Our testimony is this, also especially in the book called the Testamentserläuterung . . ." or in Red und Antwort 79: "We have a great collection of right clear Scripture against it; for this one may merely read in the Testamentserläuterung . . . ." In Red und Antwort 81: "More is proved in the Testamentserläuterung; in that same book one should also read all the articles concerning 'today's' 'Wesen.'" Briefly stated: the assemblage of Bible citations corresponds exactly with the trend of the Verantwortung. The Testamentserläuterung, like it, always refers to it as a source book for proving and strengthening a fact, as a work that stands immediately after the Bible and which one cites as one wants to draw more Bible verses, as if one wanted to say, "There our proofs are found." Finally the numerous citations of the Testamentserläuterung agree verbatim with the Verantwortung. They formed an essential preparatory work for the second part of the Verantwortung.

In the light of the above it is clear that the second part of the Verantwortung was written after May 1550. Kiwiet's careful study has shown that it had two authors, having been begun by Marpeck (d. 1556) and finished by Scharnschlager, the date of finishing being March 1558. The transition from Marpeck to Scharnschlager is clearly evident in the difference in style and structure, as well as in the fact that Marpeck cites various sources, while Scharnschlager cites only Schwenckfeld. The Scharnschlager section occupies pp. 409-578 in the printed Verantwortung; it was without doubt written after Marpeck's death in 1556. The second part of the Verantwortung was delayed in circulation among the brethren (it was never printed, only copied) because of the necessity (following the unity achieved among the Anabaptists at the Strasbourg conference of 1555) of securing the approval of the brethren "in all lands" so that it might stand as their common testimony. A copy, for instance, was sent to Moravia. Kiwiet holds (p. 79 f.) that it was not released for general circulation until 1571.

VIII. Schwenckfeld's Judicium Concerning the Second Part of the Taufbüchlein and Marpeck's Reply. Pilgram Marpeck had sent the first part of his Verantwortung, which he had just finished, to Schwenckfeld (Verantwortung, 50); "but," says a notice in the Zürich manuscript, "concerning it he, Schwenckfeld, never gave an answer. And so he has died." The date "1571" is struck out. But in his Judicium Schwenckfeld had after all shown the way that Marpeck must go. We now wish, says Schwenckfeld (Verantwortung, 129), to look at the other points also and see what they write about original sin and especially about the Word of God, the church, communion, and sonship to God, also about the faith and spirit of the patriarchs and prophets, and we want to give our best judgment to them about these points.

Concerning original sin, says Schwenckfeld, they do not hold, as the church teaches in agreement with the Holy Scriptures, that "it is a corruption of human nature since Adam's fall in which all men are conceived and born, but rather that sin has its origin and inheritance in the knowledge and the understanding of the good; but that the inheritance becomes effective only when they can distinguish between good and evil, which Schwenckfeld calls an old Pelagian error long since refuted by the church. Marpeck rejects this view on the basis of the Bible and the example of Christ: original sin becomes effective only in the understanding of good and evil which became a part of human nature in Adam and Eve only after they had eaten of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil contrary to the prohibition of God. In this sense all men inherited it, but neither original sin nor real sin are reckoned so by God until the knowledge of good and evil is present, so that man out of his fleshly nature forsakes the good and does the evil." One should let the children live upon the promise of Christ until one can teach them and they can believe, confess, and desire it. The Lord did not give in vain the sayings of Christ that we should become like children. Accordingly, says Marpeck, the Moravian congregation included the following declaration in the 16 articles which they adopted several years back, namely, that children before the age of reason have no sin except the inherited tendency to sin, which does not affect the salvation until it breaks out in actual sin. Therefore baptism is not ordained for them.

Schwenckfeld denies that men become children of God by faith and consequent baptism. But, answers Marpeck, if that is so then Paul (Gal. 3) would be condemned, who attributes the sonship of God to faith and baptism, as also the Lord Himself says, "He who believes and is baptized will be saved." But who will be saved if not the children of God? If Schwenckfeld gives consideration to what sonship means, we have long ago considered it. We call him a child of God who believes the Gospel from his heart and experiences the working of the Holy Spirit so that he desires baptism. And if Schwenckfeld says that the Anabaptists had no conception of the Word of God, we answer that we stand on I Peter 1 and on the Saviour who has Himself and through His apostles proclaimed the Gospel word. He who hears these words and believes them he will be born as a child of God, and such words will become spirit and live in him by faith and by the Holy Spirit.

In the 71st section Schwenckfeld laments, without going into detail, "that no Christian can be a magistrate or worldly ruler, nor can assume authority over cities or countries or people since such authority belongs to earthly rulers and not to true Christians." In answer Marpeck first gives the correct statement of the Anabaptists as follows: that since the kingdom of Christ is not of this world no true Christian dare have authority over cities, countries, and people (as earthly rulers), nor exercise defense or use force, since this belongs to the earthly and temporal rulers and can only lead to results such as happened in the Peasants' War. Our understanding is that true Christians have no commandment in the Gospel to exercise any power such as that of the worldly arm in the kingdom of this world. We should like to know, says Marpeck, "on what basis in the Evangelical Scriptures and the Christian conscience he would advise a true Christian to frivolously enter into such worldly government or office, and whether, after he is not such, he should conduct the affairs of this world according to God's commandment without abuse, and how long his conscience would keep him in such governmental office if he would not desire to suffer damage to his soul." Marpeck's teaching clearly is not directed in any way against the worldly authority, as the opponents of the Anabaptists claimed.

In the matter of the church, as discussed in this connection, there is no fundamental exposition of the concept of the church but rather a fixing of the foundation on which it stands, and this is not Peter, as Schwenckfeld accuses the Anabaptists of saying, but the Lord Himself who produced in Peter his confession.

A favorite topic of Schwenckfeld is his teaching concerning the men of the old covenant, the patriarchs and prophets, who he claims were already Christians. He says that the Anabaptists are guilty of a serious error in that they will not admit that the fathers, patriarchs, and prophets are Christians, children of God, and friends of God, like us. Against this teaching of Schwenckfeld Marpeck teaches, in harmony with the statements and references in the Testamentserläuterung, that the fathers who believed the promises of God died in hope of the incarnation of Christ and went to Hades, received there from the Lord grace, comfort, salvation, peace, and redemption, and were reconciled (Eph. 4:11 and I Peter 3:4). The faith of the fathers included the future incarnation of Christ, but they were not because of this Christians.

Schwenckfeld introduces the discussions of the communion with the statement that here, as in the matter of baptism, one must ask whether the Anabaptists have the right understanding of it and the right practice. He denies both. Marpeck takes up the debatable interpretation of the words of institution of the communion which is given by Luther, Zwingli, and others and says, we have written about this in our testimonies so clear and without any fog or darkness that all of those who are taught of the Spirit agree with us. If, however, Schwenckfeld writes that our communion service is based upon works not its use of bread and wine, like water and baptism, and a commitment to obedience, we answer: Christ gave His disciples bread to eat and wine to drink and would not command them to dispute about it. Our understanding of the Lord's words is that everything depends upon the interworking, making alive, and making pious by the Holy Spirit. What the pious believers produce by their faith is God's work. Bread and wine and water are and remain material elements and are not a part of the essence, but are only commanded to be used and so it can not be shown (as we are accused) that we make the creature into God and God into a creature. We confess that the Lord gives food and drink to the soul and the inner man by His holy flesh and blood, and that the nourishment of our spirit and our soul must be only spiritual. Bread and wine cannot be food and drink for the soul, but are used as a memorial for proclaiming the death of Christ and as a thanksgiving to Him. How can Schwenckfeld accuse us of not knowing anything about the spiritual food? We will not obscure the secret of a communion but rather reveal it, but without the hair-splittings of this Judicium.

Schwenckfeld's own writings refute his attitudes. For this purpose the Verantwortung gives extensive extracts from Schwenckfeld's writings in five chapters, dealing with the following subjects: "von der leiblichen Stell," of the knowledge of Christ, of the worship of Christ, of the communication of Christ, of the word and creaturehood of Christ, of a clear report, after such extracts from Schwenckfeld's book against Bucer had already been given as an appendix to the 89th Red und Antwort.

The question which receives the most thorough discussion is the incarnation of Christ. While Schwenckfeld presents Jesus primarily as the Saviour in His glorification, Marpeck emphasizes the Ecce homo. The suffering Redeemer had died for mankind, but he emphasizes that the two aspects are not to be separated. If one should separate the humanity of Christ from His deity, all comfort and hope for humankind would be gone, "since He is to be our faithful Mediator, High Priest, and merciful Advocate." "And so they say that the humanity (flesh) of Christ, which is now in and with the Word of God, is our refuge, yea of all sinners. Without this no man could be saved or come to the eternal God."

In the latter portions of the Verantwortung Marpeck treats again the doctrine of the communion and the essence of the church and gives an overview of everything, not without once more touching upon the basis of Schwenckfeld's bitter attempt, who does not want to be considered to be Anabaptist, since he sees how such people are slandered, persecuted, and crucified. But for this very reason his teaching is not from God nor from His Word and he therefore cannot be a servant of God.

Herewith the polemic between the two men comes to an end, of whom the one presents Christ chiefly in His glory, the other crowned with thorns, smitten and hanging on the cross as the Saviour of mankind, of the poor and the oppressed. Marpeck apparently did not expect a reply to his book, although he calls out to Schwenckfeld, "Just write the world full of books against us." This Schwenckfeld did not do. He had difficulty, indeed, to meet the arguments of the Anabaptists, who had anchored themselves in the words of the Bible by the use of Testamentserläuterung. In Schwenckfeld's extensive correspondence Marpeck's name appears only rarely, and then only in such fashion as to indicate clearly his bitterness against this Anabaptist leader.

IX. Effects of the Verantwortung. The most recent studies of Marpeck's book have shown that it was not given to the public without the testing of the elders of the entire church. Only after the approval by the elders, whose names have been preserved through the attentiveness of a noble lady, Walpurga von Pappenheim, could believers secure copies. Because of the size of the book probably not many were able to take advantage of the privilege. But the larger congregations, even beyond South Germany, very likely possessed it. And when uncertainty or difference of opinion about some point of doctrine arose among the members of the church, the Verantwortung was called upon for the decision on which one could take his position. A proof of this is found in the Olmütz manuscript, which also contains the text of the Verantwortung. Two brethren of the church in 1571 disagreed concerning the question "about the Holy Scriptures and the dead letter through which spirit and life come." On this occasion a number of Anabaptists were called in and given an explanation of the matter from the pen of the former (by then dead) co-worker of Marpeck, Leupold Scharnschlager. The document was the "Unterscheid," in which the following appears: "Dear Brethren, I think you have noticed in the 4th chapter of the 96th Antwort of the book of the Verantwortung against Schwenckfeld's Judicium, how this passage is used against Schwenckfeld. It is my opinion that the word 'letter,' as it is used in Romans and in II Corinthians, refers to the Old Testament, and not to the New, which contains the spirit which is able to make alive and the grace through faith. For this reason it behooves us not to give the name 'dead letter' to the Holy Scriptures of the New Testament, since such Scripture, which calls itself the Holy Scripture which speaks, according to II Peter 1, of the holy man of God and of the holy Gospel, is written and inspired by the Spirit of God. The Holy Scripture itself is the spoken word of God, and for this reason I would not call it a dead letter, but would call it the Holy Scriptures, as it calls itself." Now if we look in the 4th chapter of the 96th Antwort (concerning the Word of God) we find the following: "That the invisible spiritual content, meaning understanding and sense of the Holy Scriptures and of the outwardly preached word . . . is the word to which the Holy Scripture gives honor and power as God's natural almighty word, which is spirit and life, yea God Himself."

X. Marpeck's Later Years and Death. From 1544 until 1556 Marpeck's name appears on the tax books and the building records of the city of Augsburg in Bavarian Swabia. There he secured employment as an engineer. His first assignment was the improvement of the city water system, the aqueducts. He built waterways for the floating of rafts of wood (Pilgerholz). From 1546 until his death his salary as a city employee (Stadtwerckmeister) was 150 florins per year. From as early as 1545 Marpeck's activities as an Anabaptist elder were a matter of annoyance to the city authorities, and he was sent a number of warnings to desist therefrom. But somehow he managed to retain his position until his death in 1556. Known warnings to Marpeck, either from the mayor of Augsburg or the Council, are dated July 16, 1545, May 6, 1550, Sept. 26, 1553, and Sept. 25, 1554. Marpeck was paid quarterly on the Ember days. The first three payments for 1556 are entered in the Baumeisterbuch in a normal manner, but under the payment date of Dec. 16, 1556, for Marpeck is the notation, "Is dead."

Loserth, J.C.W.

XI. Marpeck and His Group in the Light of the Newly Discovered Kunstbuch Codex. An entirely new light is thrown on Marpeck's role in the history of Anabaptism by the discovery in July 1955 in the Bürgerbibliothek in Bern, Switzerland, of a large manuscript codex of 370 pages, copied for the most part by Jörg Maler, who finished it on Sept. 4, 1561, and gave it the title Kunstbuch. It contains 42 documents originally written between 1527 and 1555 (only seven written before 1540, and all of these in 1527 except one early 1528 and one in 1530). All but two of the 37 documents of 1540-55 were written either by Marpeck (16) or Leopold Scharnschlager (6) or members of the Marpeck circle. A complete analysis of the contents of the documents was given by Heinold Fast in ARG, the abstract of which is herewith presented in full as a quotation:

"The earliest writings of the collection do not belong to the Marbeck circle, but they seem to have had an influence on it. Some of them are known from other sources and published by Lydia Müller in her Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter (Leipzig, 1938). The authors are Hans Hut, Lienhart Schiemer, Hans Schlaffer, and others. Their theological thinking centered around the discipleship under the cross which led them to martyrdom. Fast derives the main themes of this piety from Thomas Müntzer, though he is aware that it was not the war-waging Müntzer who found his followers among the Anabaptists, and that his spiritualism and eschatology were strongly moderated by them. It is probable that Marbeck was converted to Anabaptism by the impression made by the martyrdom of Schiemer and Schlaffer in the vicinity of his home town in the Tyrol. Fast raises the question how far this may indicate an influence of their theology on Marbeck. The presence of a letter by Hans Has suggests an influence also by Lutheran ideas. And a tract by Christian Entfelder, a pupil of Hans Denk, leads to the question of Marbeck's dependence on mystical thinking. The paper does not intend to give definite answers to these questions. After it has sketched the theological thinking of Marbeck in part four, it repeats it in detail in part five. The stress lies on part three and its survey of Marbeck's activities in striving for the unity of the different Anabaptist groups.

"The survey follows the places to which Marbeck paid his visits or wrote his letters: Strassburg and its surroundings, the Grisons, Württemberg, Appenzell, St. Gall, Moravia, and Augsburg. Everywhere the Anabaptists had been split into parties shunning and fighting one another. The Marbeck circle seems to have been a separated group, too. It is not always clear when the separation began and how long it existed. But in the forties it is most definitely to be seen in Appenzell as well as in Moravia. In Appenzell the Marbeck group opposed the so-called Swiss Brethren, in Moravia the Hutterites. The questions at stake were the ban and community of goods. Marbeck advocated a less rigorous attitude with respect to both. In his view the radicalism of the Swiss Brethren in Appenzell and of the Hutterites did not agree with the freedom of the gospel. It was also the cause for the splitting of the Anabaptist movement. Marbeck consistently fought for a reunion of the separated groups. His success was limited to winning smaller circles for his own party. Among them was Jörg of Augsburg, called Maler, the later transcriber of the codex. The Anabaptist synods at Strassburg 1554/55 seem to have shown better results in uniting the movement. They also must have grown out of the endeavors of Marbeck. The new material does not refer to these events, but the author points to other publications (Kiwiet) which make the relationship probable."

Kiwiet's study has led him to the conclusion that Marpeck and his followers constituted a distinct group among the German Anabaptists, differing from the Swiss Brethren. On the other hand, they also differed clearly from the Spiritualists. Kiwiet claims an origin for the Marpeck group independent of the Swiss Brethren with Hans Denk as their founder. He also claims that Denk was not a Spiritualist and thus rehabilitates Denk as a full Anabaptist. His conception of the Marpeck group and of Marpeck's role in Anabaptist history can best be given in his own words (from an unpublished paper scheduled to appear in MQR for October 1957):

"Until recently the only possible distinction between Anabaptists seemed to be the radical and the moderate type of an Anabaptist. With such a division Denck was usually grouped among the radicals, while Marbeck was put together with the Swiss Brethren among the moderates. These categories prevented a clear insight into Anabaptist history. Another questionable point was the eschatological and spiritual (in distinction from spiritualistic) tendencies among many Anabaptist groups. Mennonite scholars had no explanation for these tendencies as they clearly were not present among the Swiss Brethren. Because of these just mentioned tendencies some church historians still persisted in claiming a dependence of the Anabaptists on Thomas Müntzer. A study of Marbeck and Hans Denck gives the explanation of the other type of Anabaptist, which also originated free of Müntzer, although it shared with him the eschatological and spiritual interest which was common to many theologians in South Germany.

"Within the field of Anabaptist history it is very interesting to notice the origin and development of these two main movements within Anabaptism, one having the Scriptures as its principle, the other having love and obedience as its center. Both discovered the free church from a different angle, one from Bible study and the other from theological considerations. These two types of Anabaptists provide a Scriptural as well as a theological foundation for the free church principles.

"Within the ecumenical discussion about the meaning of the church Marbeck provides very valuable material. He not only gives an exposition of a free church theology, but he also has related his teaching to that of the Catholics, the Lutherans, and the Spiritualistic circles. In all three of these areas the discussion is still very relevant; the discussion with Rome, the discussion about the value and future of the state churches, and the problem of ever rising free circles who incline to give up all historic church forms. As far as I know, Marbeck is the only one in church history who has presented us a thorough free church theology."

Another significant recent discovery is that by Frank Wray (first published in ARG, 1956), who has shown that much of the Vermahnung is in fact a translation (from the Low German) and revision of a significant part of Bernhard Rothmann's Bekenntnisse van beyden Sacramenten, Doepe unde Nachtmaele der predicanten tho Munster (Nov. 8, 1533). That this pre-Münsterite writing could be used and accepted by the Marpeck group proves on the one hand that the pre-Münsterite Anabaptists in Westphalia were good Anabaptists, and also that there was some literary exchange between the Middle German and South German groups. H.S.B.

Johann Adam, Evangelische Kirchengeschichte . . . Strassburg (Strasbourg, 1922); Johann Wilh. Baum, Capito und Butzer (Elberfeld, 1860); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Gustav Bossert, Jr., "Nebenkirchliche Bewegung," Blätter für württembergische Kirchengeschichte (Stuttgart, 1930) 1-41; C. A. Cornelius, Gesch. des Münsterischen Aufruhrs II (Leipzig, 1860); Ernst Correll, "Anabaptism in the Tyrol," MQR I (October 1927); Karl Ecke, Schwenckfeld, Luther und . . . apostol. Ref. (Berlin, 1911); H. Eels, Martin Bucer (New Haven, 1931); Robert Friedmann, "Täufergemeinschaften in Mähren," Archiv für Ref.-Gesch., 1931; Samuel Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); Camille Gerbert, Gesch. der Strassburger Sectenbewegung, 1524-35 (Strasbourg, 1889); A. Hulshoff, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg (Amsterdam, 1905); E. E. S. Johnson, Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum VIII (Leipzig, 1927); Ludwig Keller, "Marbeck," ADB XX (Leipzig, 1884); L. Keller, Monatsheft der Comenius-Gesellschaft V (1896) 311-13; Walther Köhler, in RGG III; J. ten Doornkaat Koolman, "Graubünden," ML II; J. Loserth, "Wiedertäufer in Tirol," Ztscht . . . für Tirol u. Vorarlberg (Innsbruck, 1895) 279-88; idem "Marbeck," ML III; idem, "Studien zu Pilgram Marbeck," Gedenkschrift (Ludwigshafen, 1925) 134-78; idem, "Pilgram Marbeck, sein Leben u. sein Werk," Quellen u. Forschungen . . . (Vienna, 1929) 1-60; A. H. Newman, History of Antipedobaptism (Philadelphia, 1897) 189-249; Horst Quiring, "The Anthropology of Pilgram Marbeck," MQR IX (1935) 155-64; T. W. Röhrich, "Strassburgische Wiedertäufer," Ztscht für die histor. Theologie (Gotha, 1860); Friedrich Roth, Augsburgs Reformationsgesch. III (Munich, 1907); Chr. Aug. Salig, Vollst. Hist. der Augspurgischen Confession III (Halle, 1735); Traugott Schiess, "Ilanzer Schulmeister," Bündnerisches Monatsblatt (Chur, 1916) 73-89; Paul von Stetten, Gesch. der . . . Stadt Augsburg I (Frankfurt and Leipzig, 1743); J. C. Wenger, "The Life and Work of Pilgram Marpeck," MQR XII (1938) 137-66; idem, "Pilgram Marpeck's Confession of Faith," MQR XII (1938) 167-202; idem, "The Theology of Pilgram Marpeck," MQR XII (1938) 205-56; idem, "A Letter from Wilhelm Reublin to Pilgram Marpeck, 1531," MQR XXIII (1949) 67-75; idem, "Pilgram Marpeck's Summary of His Confession of Faith," MHB IX, 3; W. Wiswedel, "Die Testamentserläuterung," Blätter f. württemberg. Kirchengeschichte XLI (1937) 64-76.

Original copies of Marpeck's Taufbüchlein, the Vermanung of 1542, are in the British Museum, the Budapest University Library, and the Stuttgart State Library. This book was reprinted in the Gedenkschrift, 1925. Original copies of Marpeck's Testamentserläuterung are in the Zentralbibliothek of Zürich, and in the Preussische Staatsbibliothek, Berlin (now Marburg). This work has never been republished. Manuscript copies of the Verantwortung, the reply to Schwenckfeld, are in the Zürich Stadtbibliothek, in the Bayerische Staatsbibliothek at Munich, and in the Studienbibliothek of Olmütz, Czechoslovakia. Loserth transcribed and published the Verantwortung in Quellen u. Forschungen zur Geschichte der oberdeutschen Taufgesinnten im 16. Jahrhundert. Pilgram Marbecks Antwort auf Kaspar Schwenckfelds Beurteilung des Buches der Bundesbezeugung von 1542 (Vienna and Leipzig, 1929); Heinold Fast, "Pilgram Marbeck und das oberdeutsche Täufertum. Ein neuer Handschriftenfund," Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte XLVII (1956) 212-42; Jan J. Kiwiet, "Pilgram Marbeck, sein Kreis und seine Theologie" (unpublished doctoral dissertation, University of Zürich, 1955); Frank Wray, "The Vermanung of 1542 and Rothmann's Bekenntnisse," Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte XLVII (1956) 243 ff.; Lydia Müller, Glaubensbekenntnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter (Leipzig, 1938; ML III, 25-34.

Marquardt, Hans, of Wissenhorn, an Anabaptist leader, was a chaplain in Constanz, Germany, about one year, then for three years Protestant preacher in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, joined the Swiss Brethren, and became an effective leader. He was very likely for a while in Memmingen (q.v.) and Moravia (q.v.). In the summer of 1532 he went to St. Gall, where his sermons had a large following. Here he was captured. After an arrest of eight days he was granted a disputation which lasted three days. With no small skill he defended his views against the mayor Joachim Vadian (q.v.) and the Reformed preachers, Dominicus Zili, Christoph Schappelar, and Jakob Riner. What he said concerning the oath, infant baptism, and the government is not without significance. He was expelled from the city, and all trace of him is lost. NEFF.

E. Götzinger, Joachim von Watt (Vadian): Deutsche historische Schriften III (St. Gall, 1879) 455 ff.; ML III, 43.

Marquette (Man.) Mennonite Brethren Church was organized on July 15, 1934, as a branch of the North End M.B. Church of Winnipeg. The church is a member of the Manitoba Provincial and the Canadian District Conferences. In 1954 the baptized membership was 22, with Isaak Penner as leader, and John Klassen assistant. H.NE.

Marri Tiene, an Anabaptist martyr, who is not named in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. She is named in acrostic in the song, Met menschlijcke tongen niet. (Wolkan, Lieder, 80.) NEFF.

Marriage, the most intimate form of fellowship between man and woman, with the family (q.v.) the most ancient human institution, took various forms in the ancient world, was transformed and made sacred in Christianity as unbreakable monogamy. Marriage was taken by Paul (Eph. 5) as a symbol of Christ's union with the church, and was to be only in the Lord. The relation between husband and wife was to be one of profound Christian love and mutual service, grounded in the relation of each to Christ. It was to be kept absolutely pure. Jesus taught that the indissoluble union of one man with one woman was an original part of God's creation, and could be broken only by adultery (Matt. 9). The equality of man and woman in the church and in the Christian faith as taught by Paul (Col. 3) had a powerful elevating effect upon the status of woman in marriage and in society. Nevertheless the patriarchal type of marriage and family life continued to be dominant among Christians in the Middle Ages and on into modern times. The developing ascetic ideal of monasticism, by which celibacy was elevated above marriage as holier and preferable, interfered with the full realization of the Christian ideal in marriage. In the Middle Ages also the church developed the sacramental concept of marriage, which contributed to the absolute control of marriage by the church, with prohibited degrees of consanguinity.

The Reformers, while doing away with monasticism and celibacy, also abolished the sacramental concept of marriage. Luther especially pointed to its secular elements. Various ends were to be served. Households were considered fiscal units in the political structure of society. Marriage was a worldly business, so that Christians might even marry unbelievers (Luther, Vom Eelichen Leben, 1522). Anabaptist sentiments were truly in contrast to external interpretations of this sort. In Anabaptist tradition the marriage bond has always been valued as a mystical association and form of piety. This view and Anabaptist-Mennonite insistence on the community-bound order and service of the marriage union in Christian fellowship contributed in its way to the opposition against ecclesiastical controls. Their objection applied to Roman Catholic canon law as it did to later Protestant state church interference.

The Anabaptist emphasis upon personal choice and responsibility in matters of religion on the one hand, and upon strict obedience to the teachings of Christ and the New Testament on the other, strengthened measurably the moral character of marriage. By its consecrated view of life Anabaptism obliterated the sacramental marriage concept. It placed obedience to Christ in the first place, with three significant consequences: (1) because of the separation of the true (Anabaptist) church from the world and all other Christian groups, marriage was restricted to members of the group alone; (2) in case a marriage partner did not follow the spouse in joining the Anabaptists, some felt it would be right and necessary to separate from or even divorce the unbelieving partner, since otherwise there would be an "unequal yoke with unbelievers" (although this was by no means universal); and (3) the Anabaptist missioner felt obliged to leave his family to go on missionary tours if sent by the church. All of these attitudes and practices were subject to severe criticism by opponents in the state churches.

More severe, but unwarranted criticism was directed against the Anabaptists with the frequent charge (Zwingli the first) that they practiced communism of wives, or at least were guilty of gross immorality. These charges were pure inference from the purported Anabaptist teaching of community of goods and arose before Münster (1534-35), and even before the Hutterite communities were established (1528-35).

The Münsterites (1534-35), however, introduced polygamy; but, except for the "King," Jan van Leyden, they were not guilty of the gross immorality which the vivid imagination of their contemporaries and later writers often attributed to them. The Münsterite regulations about marriage were clear and severe. According to the "Twenty-one Münsterite Articles," marriage with unbelievers (i.e., non-Münsterites) was strictly forbidden. Believers were to have a "new marriage," which of course opened the door to separation from "unbelieving spouses." Strict marital fidelity was required. Adultery, also seduction and rape, were punishable by death. Detmer has shown that the introduction of polygamy, although based on the example of the patriarchs and kings of the Old Testament, was due to Jan van Leyden's own personal decision, and that he had to break the opposition of the better elements and the preachers by long days of disputation. It was not a real part of even radical Münsterism. The apocalyptic mood in Münster, which recognized Jan van Leyden as a prophet, gave him great authority. He himself began the polygamy. He prophesied that the people of God must multiply, and enforced the rule that all men and women of proper age must marry and reproduce. The decline of the number of men in Münster made it easy (and necessary if the rule of all marrying was to be obeyed) for polygamy to be practiced.

Another dark case of a different sort which was wrongly exploited by Justus Menius (q.v.) was that of the "Blood Friends" (Blutsfreunde aus der Wiedertaufe) of Northwest Thuringia and near-by Hesse of 1550, which occurred in the latter days of Anabaptism in Thuringia. Led by Ludwig von Tüngeda this small group renounced the regular Anabaptist basic doctrines of baptism and the Lord's Supper, and declared that the true sacrament consists in the fleshly mingling of the brethren and sisters who are united with Christ, which they called "Christerie." Wappler (Thüringia) has shown that it is completely false to consider these apostates as a party of Anabaptists, since they had openly repudiated the main Anabaptist teachings. The Thuringian and Hessian Anabaptists, as Wappler and others have shown, maintained high standards of marriage ethics.

Marriage Among the Mennonites; The Marriage Problem in the "Separated" Organized Congregation; Forms of Courtship. It would be incorrect to call Menno Simons the most outspoken "ethical prophet" of Anabaptism merely because (1) in the stately series of his writings the most conspicuous place is occupied by his rejection of the lumping together of the peaceful Anabaptists with the warlike apocalyptic Anabaptists of Münster, and (2) Menno at the same time teaches the absolute principle of the suffering church. Much rather does his ethical significance lie in the fact that it was under his essential influence that the first congregational organizations arose. It was he who began to order the widely scattered groups according to a unified direction in a world of persecution. The strongly pietistic spirit that sets in with him is no longer borne and upheld by the mighty idealism such as that of the High German Anabaptists. Historically Menno's writings are an honest attempt to prove the innocence of those oppressed by suspicion, and so he is concerned in presenting the true concept of those first Mennonites about marriage: how they base it entirely on the New Testament. "Every age has its own liberty and usages. Concerning marriage we are directed by the Lord Himself, not to the liberty and usage of the fathers . . . but to the beginning of creation, to Adam and Eve. . . . So we too teach, use, and consent to no other marriage, . . . namely one man and one woman. . . . They are one flesh and they shall not part from this and from one another . . . except for adultery. . . ." "Concerning the shameful vice that we are said to have our wives in common . . . the God-fearing would rather die ten deaths than do such a thing." Menno's contemporaries, such as Adam Pastor, wrote in the same vein.

But it was not this polemic that became historically significant for the Anabaptist position on marriage. Separation from the world, which was still stressed, even if no longer in the first fullness of conviction, took on a certain new stamp. No longer does immoderate enthusiasm stream into the congregations—it was in general broken under the armed resistance of the intolerant public powers. The separation of the congregations from the world in those places where in a sense their existence was assured, meant certainly a selection of those most purified in the Anabaptist concept of Christianity. Very soon this development into which original Anabaptism had been pushed from without and within, was bound also to determine the question of the marriage of members of the congregation.

Martyrdom, then as later, created and inspired a conjugal fellowship of consecration unto suffering and death. Here and there, however, groups of Mennonites could establish themselves in refugee settlements or otherwise shielded settlements. Under such less disturbed auspices marriage and its prerequisites were given a more elaborate interpretation and specific directions. As a possible gateway into the religious community marriage was now placed under conditions designed to preserve permanently the purity and resolute "separation from the world" of the congregations. Adam Pastor expresses himself (I Cor. 7:39) very precisely in this sense: that one is not to enter into a marriage with persons who are not of the Lord's house (i.e., outside the brotherhood): "That one take for marriage not a renegade partner who is without God but a believing partner who adheres to God." Dirk Philips stresses the importance of this marriage of the mind. He sets the congregation as the judge of one of the most essential problems which was to disturb the future of Anabaptism-Mennonitism for a long time to come. The ground to control the matter decisively grew out of the congregation's right of discipline. It lay in the hands of the "Diener" (elders and lay preachers), who were economically relatively independent of the congregation. This position, energetically defended by Menno, elevated the rules about marriage set by the congregation to a considerable height, guaranteed for the very reason that church discipline had been by that time made a basic regulation.

Under the penalty of the ban, marriage was to be concluded in the presence of the congregation and by its commissioned ministers. They examined the couple to be married, obligating them to the most important articles concerning marriage. Wedded thus "within" the congregation, marriage would undoubtedly be concluded "in the Lord." The fact that they had been married "before God and His holy church" was often enthusiastically affirmed in the confessions of Anabaptist martyr couples. "Outside marriage," i.e., marriage with an "unbelieving person in the world," is a later development fraught with much conflict.

Dirk Philips' last writing and one of considerable influence (Van die Echt der Christenen, 1569), deals with the marriage of Christians on a Scriptural basis. In general the Mosaic law (Deut. 7:3 ff.) is also cited by him, in order to confirm marriage with believers as an absolute goal. This regulation was applied with heroic and inexorable Anabaptist moral severity. When it was violated, reconciliation of the offender with the congregation was granted only when the unbelieving partner was "recognized," i.e., was received by baptism into the brotherhood. If this did not happen, the partner who wanted to be reconciled had to "desist from" the unbelieving partner. The Flemish branch (including Dirk Philips) took a position similar to that of the Frisians. They "do not accept those who were married outside the brotherhood however long and sincerely they lament, seek, write, ask, and beseech, but all their life long have to remain separated from their brotherhood, or the unbelieving one with whom one is married must become believing or die." The Waterlander branch did not share this stern concept, having accepted the Wismar resolutions (1554) with their freer spirit: "The persons who marry outside the congregation shall be excluded and avoided until they show an upright and Christian life before God and the brethren; then after a period of trial they shall be received again."

It is conspicuous that "mixed marriage" was always considered as a conflict from within, as a threat to purity, but not as a threat to the existence of the brotherhood. Such a fear did not seem to exist; at least it was not expressed. The concept, spread particularly by the fanatical David Joris, that the marriage of true believers would finally bring forth the kingdom of God, had apparently found a convinced following in the very circles of Menno. Wherever it arose there was, however, no thought at all of the dangers mentioned above. In general, the following contradictory views of marriage can be observed among the Dutch Anabaptists:

(1) One position was the absolute marriage law of the severe Frisian type, oriented according to the Old Testament, in which marriage was allowed only among church members. Not until later did the custom develop of acceptance into fellowship only after they have been rebaptized. At first the expulsion of offending members was relentlessly carried out and this law applied even and precisely against members of less strict congregations.

(2) A second position was a moderated marriage law oriented according to the New Testament, definitive in the sense of the resolutions of Wismar and Strasbourg (1555 f.), represented especially in the Waterlander branch, by which persons marrying outside the brotherhood were again received after giving evidence of "upright Christian life before God and the brethren," and were excluded only until such evidence was produced.

The Concept of Cologne, a document of unification of some (Young) Frisians and High Germans of 1591, to be sure, still breathes the old severity of concept, but also speaks against a ruthless solution and thus approaches the New Testament marriage law: "We confess also out of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament that no freedom is left to a believer to marry anyone except one who has become with them through faith a member of the body of Christ and a brother or sister. . . . Transgressors . . . are worthy of punishment before the congregation and one shall have no brotherly unity with them [to be excluded from communion], unless one feels a worthy fruit of penitence and repentance; they are to be admonished to observe faithfully their marriage vow, neither to leave their spouse nor to conclude a second marriage."

The Dordrecht Confession of 1632 breathes the spirit of the Old Testament law as it does in other points where it represents a violently dominating reaction toward all previous efforts of unification on the basis of milder premises. It says: "Like as the Fathers had to marry among their brotherhood or race, so also believers of the New Testament are permitted no other freedom than to marry among the elect race and spiritual brotherhood of Christ, namely those who are already united with the brotherhood as one heart and one soul, have received one baptism and stand in one brotherhood, faith, teaching, and life, before they are united through marriage." Such unions were then called "marriage in the Lord."

In the Amish congregations in America, among the Mennonites in Switzerland and France, and among the Mennonite Brethren in Russia this last concept has prevailed in part to this day. In the negotiations for unification between the Amish and Mennonites in the Palatinate in 1873 a basic stipulation was made that marriage between members of these congregations shall not be opposed by either group. The West Prussian rural congregations practiced the marriage law oriented by the Old Testament until the end of their existence. Thus Article IX of the confession of faith of the Mennonites of Prussia of 1895 says: "When a member marries outside our branch this act is considered a voluntary separation out of our brotherhood. The position of the Gemeindeverband (q.v.) is more moderate. In the case of mixed marriages in the congregations composing it, if the promise to raise the children as Mennonites is not given, the Mennonite partner is considered as excluded from the congregation."

For a considerable part of the Mennonites the confession of Cornelis Ris of 1766 is valid; it became definitive for the Mennonite congregations in Russia, for some urban congregations of North Germany, as well as for the Mennonite congregations of the Palatinate and Hesse. The spirit of its marriage law, completely oriented according to the New Testament (Article XXXI), is as follows: God also controls human marriages "but in such a way that human freedom is not annulled thereby, be it that He institutes it graciously according to His kindness, or be it that He legally permits it in disfavor and for punishment." Marriage is therefore to be "an affair in which man is permitted to proceed in his freedom in so far as God's holy requirements do not limit it; as this is clearly shown in the prohibition of marriage with unbelieving persons. . . ." Further examples are cited from the Scriptures. Incidents of divine displeasure are pointed out, where the evil and the dangers of carnal marriages in which one follows only the impulses of nature are presented. "Therefore it is exceedingly important that whoever wants to enter the state of matrimony shall examine himself well and not decide before he is convinced in faith and with a good conscience that in this decision he is pleasing the Lord Christ. Those who marry thus can with reason hope that it is taking place in the Lord. . . ." If a marriage is thus begun, "the man who is the head of the wife, . . . shall be a worthy image of Jesus Christ in his relationship toward his church . . . the wife will become blessed through bearing of children, her seed will be blessed, and all things will serve them for the best. But to be happy herein we consider it necessary in so far as it is at all possible, to remain in one's own religious brotherhood, in order to avoid the many unpleasant consequences that usually arise out of differing education, manner of living, and points of view in the teaching of children and other things, which is often discovered too late. . . ." For young people it is proper and useful to ask advice of parents, besides God and close relatives, and to obey them, "but all in the fear of the Lord."

In more recent times there were other reasons than purely religious strivings for preventing marriages outside the brotherhood. In West Prussia release from military duty for Mennonites was limited to those who, for example, could prove that they had for several generations occupied land without military duty. Anyone who married outside the brotherhood lost his Mennonite right to release from military duty. On the other hand the Prussian state also prevented the increase in the number of Mennonites by prohibiting transfer of membership from other groups to the Mennonites. The congregations maintained themselves at a definite limited number. With the repeal of the privilege of release from military duty the greatest part of the congregations of West Prussia were quite ready to permit marriage with members of other Christian creeds. On the other hand it is known that Swiss Anabaptists in the principality of Montbéliard about 1710 married Calvinists in order to be able to stay in the country. To what extent the regulation of the authorities that change in creed be affirmed by an oath was effective (for the Anabaptists who had only apparently become Calvinistic) is unknown.

Two closely related motives determined the nature and manner of courtship by withdrawing the right of the individual to choose his marriage partner and transferring it to the elders or other ministers of the congregation; for the guarantee of a marriage of faith on the one hand, and for the preservation of the moral purity of the congregation on the other hand. "Youths and maidens shall not go about together too freely," says the introductory sentence of the second article of a resolution of a conference of Frisian congregations which had to be announced annually between 1639 and 1716. Another motivation also effective as a pattern was the formal adoption of customs out of the holy Scriptures as was inherent in Anabaptist Biblicism. This was most pronounced among the former Swiss Anabaptists in the Vosges area of France. Their courtship was accomplished in a most complete analogy with Genesis 24. In the place of the servant who went out for Abraham to win a wife for his son, the deacon ("the Steckelmann") mounted a horse for his mission even if the bride's house was the very next one. Then the traditional customs were repeated, such as presenting a drink, gifts, etc. And the result of the commission was indicated by the attitude expressed by the bride. This drastic usage of Biblical imitation has never been found in any other group than in this remote one in the Vosges region.

In all the Anabaptist-Mennonite groups of whatever religious and ethical shading, there was at least the custom that preachers or elders functioned as commissioned wooers. He who did not accept this arrangement was subject to church discipline. This custom was practiced most severely in those places where mixed marriage was opposed with the sharpness of the Old Testament law. Carel van Gent reports from the Flemish congregations that about 1600 among them the arrangement of weddings was diligently and dictatorially exercised by the ministers. In the Flemish and Frisian congregations at Danzig the stipulations seem to have been less sharp; there the courtship was not exclusively the affair of the leaders. In 1765 it was announced to the brotherhood that the ancient, praiseworthy habit of using two men to make the proposal of marriage, who after a week or two of time granted the prospective bride for reflection returned for the decision, had fallen into decline. The practice that some bridegrooms proposed for themselves, and others even became engaged without the knowledge of their parents, was punishable. (See Umbitter.)

The decision concerning the so-called "obstacles to marriage" was in the hands of the church or secular authorities, but it was not only conditions of a religious kind which were also decided in the congregations. Thus there was almost everywhere a prohibition of marriage of cousins. There was no lack of efforts to renew this prohibition. The great conference at Groningen in 1683, which argued for two days concerning granting an exception, is well known. Almost half of the over 100 preachers out of 29 congregations had "with concern" voted in its favor. The decision was then left to the congregation concerned. Also the Ibersheim (Palatinate) conference of 1805 had the question of the marriage of cousins on its agenda, but came to no conclusion. At that time the prohibition had already been frequently disregarded.

Relations between the fiances generally were kept under the severity of church discipline. In harmony with the Mosaic laws offenses against chastity were to be punished as adultery.

The equating of the engagement vow with the marriage vow had already very early given rise to difference of opinion, especially between Adam Pastor and Dirk Philips. The latter was more lenient, saying, "Not the mere vow alone binds the marriage, because things may lie concealed which cause the marriage vow to be ineffective." He recognized the need that there be an inclination and attitude of the heart, but "they shall not be married earlier than is favored by the Lord and His church." That the brotherhood would recognize only a marriage concluded before it and through it was already a strictly executed demand of the Swiss Anabaptists. The solemn modesty of Mennonite marriage customs is pictured in travel accounts out of various Mennonite areas. Another common phenomenon of the Mennonite congregations was early marriage. It is interesting to note, for example, that the enlargement of the area of the city of Crefeld in 1738 was caused in part by this fact. A new building plan was recommended to the king on account of the prospective increase in the number of households, most of whom at that time were Mennonite.

The Anabaptist-Mennonite Attitude on the Indissolubility of Marriage; Divorce; "Marital Avoidance" as a Problem of Church Discipline.

The command of Jesus (Matt. 5:32) which names adultery as the only possible ground for divorce becomes a point of judgment repeated in all the Mennonite creeds. The Wismar resolutions give the unfaithful one the right to return to the spouse upon repentance and reform. In the case of "premeditated" (mutwillig) adultery, the innocent party might marry again after consultation with the congregation.

An increasingly serious question was whether unbelief entering into the marriage did, after all, part the marriage. The booklet, Concerning Divorce ("Von der Ehescheydung auss den worten Christi . . ."), attached to the Confession of Schleitheim (1527) says nothing more than that divorce may be based singly and alone on adultery. But it was precisely unbelief that had a decisive effect on a wide circle of South German Anabaptists.

Considering the well-organized and politically isolated communities of the Hutterian Brethren, it seems inevitable that the unbelief of a marriage partner must be recognized as a reason for divorce. About 1550 this was considered as justified, especially in consideration of the need for training children in the "true faith." Now it is very evident that this severity had its source in the threat to the communistic system (Gemeinschaft) imposed by an unbelieving partner. For unbelief means certainly a criticism of this "Gemeinschaft," which was indeed the very heart of the faith of the Hutterites. Divorce was allowed, then, for protection and for resistance. "The believing partner is not obliged by conscience to cling to a renegade from the faith and from the community. If he nevertheless associates with such an one he becomes unclean and ceases to be in the brotherhood." The later compromise also has meaning in this sense: that a living together of believing and unbelieving marriage partners is permitted "only outside and near the brotherhood." In the case of danger to the believer in such a case the shepherds and guardians of the "Lambs of Christ" could then point him back to the brotherhood.

It was inevitable that there where the preservation of the pure "community of the saints" (Gemeinschaft der Heiligen) was striven for with full earnestness, church discipline also began to shape marriage fellowship. But then there could be no more serious consequences of inward and outward division than those phenomena which attended the conflict concerning theory and practice of "marital avoidance" (Ehemeidung). It meant nothing less than that the faithful spouse had to avoid all communication with a marriage partner who had been punished by the brotherhood. The question of being received back again was to be decided by the brotherhood. At times the wedding was repeated. Furthermore children were to be taken away from parents who had both been excluded. Marital avoidance had an effect so much the more ruthless since that punishment of expulsion could be simply the consequence of any offense that had been vainly warned against repeatedly. This kind of divorce for the reason of unbelief was a phenomenon peculiar to Hutterites. The regulation regarding marital avoidance had no connection with it. A reference in the Gemeindeordnungen of 1640 (Ehrenpreis) which were to reform certain lacks, shows that the regulation was finally evaded in practice.

Among the Dutch Mennonites the conflicts about marital avoidance were most violent in the middle of the 16th century. At the Emden conference of 1547 Adam Pastor and François (Frans) de Kuiper rejected the application of marital avoidance, whereas Menno Simons wanted to see it applied (though not as a severe general rule). "See to it that in this matter you do not try to bring any one farther than he is taught in his heart by God: In his conscience is able . . . to bear and to feel." This is in agreement with Point 3 of the Wismar resolutions. But Menno Simons was not able to put his milder point of view across. Leenaert Bouwens, who actually expelled a woman who wanted to stand by her expelled husband at least spiritually, defeated him and also Dirk Philips.

The High German circles resisted as early as the Anabaptist conference at Strasbourg in 1557: "It is still the sincere wish of the Brethren assembled that they would like to advise that man and wife should separate for reason of the ban, for then more damage and sin would follow than praise to God and the winning of souls." Menno, who had yielded to the influence of Bouwens, based his reply on the heavenly marriages between Christianity and our souls which are to be maintained unbroken. Therefore neither father nor mother, neither husband nor wife, may yield to any disobedience against his word even in the least. God alone should be the master of our conscience, and not our father or mother or husband or wife. Zylis and Lemke, the delegates of the "High Germans," opposed him in person and in writing, basing their argument on the word of the Lord (Matt. 19:5, 6) repudiating marital avoidance as an abomination. In Menno's reply to Zylis and Lemke he complained about this. The break between the High German and Low German Anabaptists was accomplished. Menno is said in his last days to have deeply lamented this fact. The High Germans remained steadfast in their rejection of the effectiveness of church discipline on marriage. In the Frankenthal disputation of 1571 the Mennonites answered the questions whether the ban and unbelief separates a marriage: "We believe that nothing may part a marriage but adultery. But if the unbelieving one for the sake of the believing one wants to part, as Paul says in I Cor. 7, I let them part. But we believe that the cause for the parting shall not lie in the Christian."

Buruma reports the consequences which the harsh position of Bouwens and his associates produced after Menno's death in Holland. Those who favored banning entered at night the homes of those who had been banned and took the marriage partner away from the screaming children. "Many a man could not for a long time, others throughout their lives, find out what happened to their wives." Then the divisions began. Among the Frisians Lubbert Gerrits represented the opinion, which was soon to become dangerous to him, that the Scriptures from Genesis to Revelation contain no confirmation of marital avoidance. Then when he was banned, the party of the Young Frisians formed itself about him, who "no longer wanted to fight against the Word of God." In the older Frisian party the Jan Jacobs group was formed in order to maintain the most severe position in marital avoidance.

In the last decade of the 16th century gradually a general moderation set in. The Concept of Cologne (1591) rejected marital avoidance. The economic consequences of the practice of marital avoidance were lamented in an anonymous document of 1612, the Vriendlijcke Aenspraeck: "How many households have been ruined by marital avoidance! How many lost their sustenance . . . because the husband or the wife was penalized and could not go along with the congregation to communion!"

The state soon set itself in opposition to such damage to family life. In 1597 the States of Friesland prohibited the execution of the ban which usually entailed complete divorce, and other avoidances in civic and domestic relationships.

It has not been sufficiently investigated whether the division of the Swiss and Alsatian Mennonites into Amish and Reist branches was caused in part because of the requirement of marital avoidance, but thus far no evidence has been found to that effect. At any rate that division (1693-97) revolved around separation according to I Cor. 5:11. Jakob Ammann thought that the "true Christian order was lost to some extent" in this point in the Swiss churches. Footwashing and avoidance were, at least until 1800, special practices of the Amish, who took them along to America. Among the Old Order Amish in America to this day marital avoidance is practiced, though it is relaxed in the milder groups.

Marital avoidance among Mennonites is one of the most peculiar events in the history of Christianity. It meant really a temporary separation, although the defenders of the use of avoidance specifically repudiated this argument. In addition to religious doubts concerning marital avoidance, the danger of adulterous acts was warned against which might break the marriage completely. In general, no definite influence of marital avoidance upon the development of the laws of divorce can be proved.

The Anabaptist-Mennonite Marriage and the Legal Demands of "State and Church." Typically Political-Legal-Religious Conflicts and Their Solution. Only in the occasional struggle in behalf of nonresistance, is there a record comparable with the matter of marriage in the history of religious intolerance of Anabaptist Mennonitism in faith and matters of conscience. Out of the abundance of the facts, to date little investigated, only several typical phenomena regarding intolerance by the state regarding marriage will be presented.

In Zürich, the original Anabaptist area, all means were tried to subdue Anabaptist obstinacy. As early as 1526 an Anabaptist "register" was introduced for people who refused to have their children baptized. A regulation soon followed according to which only those marriages solemnized in the church were to be valid. When the Anabaptists did not concern themselves about this, the government declared the children of marriages not thus solemnized in church as illegitimate and deprived them of their rights of inheritance. This regulation was valid for a long time. Even in 1614 one of the Anabaptist leaders (Hans Landis) was sentenced to death partly on this basis, because he resisted the government by a marriage independent of the government. Bergmann shows that the Anabaptists, through their "solemnizing of marriage," brought about an extensive reform. Until the Zwinglian reformation and after it, marriage was considered legally valid merely by the spouses living together. But then the great morals mandate of 1530 (which was to remove the cause for Anabaptist criticism) ordered a "going to church" before marital association.

Concerning the canton of Bern, Ernst Müller reported similar developments. Even in 1661 when the Anabaptists were called to account for their refusal to have their marriages solemnized in the church they answered, "This isn't necessary." The fact that the authorities regarded their marriages as a concubinage and withdrew the inheritance rights of the children did not trouble them. As late as 1810 the council of Bern invalidated a marriage performed by a Mennonite preacher. The legal rights of domicile, relationship, and inheritance have recently again been made dependent on the proclamation and solemnizing of the marriage by the local state church pastor.

The unconcern with which the Swiss exiles, e.g., in the Palatinate, "allowed themselves to be married in their small conventicles," evoked angry attention on the part of the Reformed Church Council of Heidelberg. One of the first court documents (1655) regarding Mennonites protests that "one very recently dragged a woman into his house under the pretense that she was his wife, although nobody knew where and how they were married." Then the Church Council expected that the Elector would soon prevent such offensive evils. But reports increased, stating that the Anabaptists, in disregard of the mayor and the pastor, without previous proclamation, and contrary to the law of the country, performed marriages. In 1662 an electoral mandate was issued requiring that those who had let themselves be married without a proclamation were to be fined three guilders, and future cases 18 guilders. Soon afterwards this penalty was reduced to 12 guilders, i.e., factually a fee was set at this sum. Somewhat more light on the marriage laws affecting the Palatine Mennonites in the early 18th century is found in connection with the negotiations in the case of several (very few) transfers to the "tolerated religions." "Mixed marriages" did not occur, i.e., "before errors were renounced" no Anabaptist person was permitted to be married to a member of one of the tolerated religions. The result was that among the Mennonites it had actually become a custom to persuade the clerk of the court (Oberamt) to produce proclamation certificates on the basis of which they could perform their own marriages. At least there are no official records of obligations on the part of the pastor, although there were protests against the infringement by "Oberamt" proceedings. A generally valid Palatine regulation for Mennonite marriage affairs seems not to have existed. In general here, too, the ecclesiastical power interest retreated behind the financial interest of the state. Also the distribution of the Mennonites over many areas, each with differing laws of marriage, put them into a varying legal situation though nevertheless into a favorable one. The Mennonites were treated uniformly only in matters of separation such as the Reformed marriage law at Heidelberg. But a strict Mennonite church discipline, and the effort to handle legal problems as much as possible within the brotherhood, prevented such cases from occurring.

In the Margraviate of Baden-Durlach the Anabaptists emigrating from Bern (after 1710) found more tolerant conditions than in the Palatinate. In 1729 it was decided that marriages were to be announced to the Oberamt which was to conclude the marriage contract after an examination; this was to be done in writing in the presence of a state church pastor. The pastor thereby was merely to say: "God bless your marriage, and be mindful of your duty," and to abstain from all ceremony and prayer. Under like conditions the Anabaptists were free to be married in a church in any case by a Protestant clergyman. But they seem not to have taken advantage of this privilege.

A "most submissive petition" presented by the Mennonite congregation of Hochberg in 1747 shows graphically how even these mild regulations did not fit the Mennonite religious customs. The fact that they were to be asked officially whether they were thinking of marrying one another "contradicted their regulations, which are ordered only according to Divine Scriptures." "He who was seeking a wife would name to the elders of the congregation the person in whom he had confidence. These should then act as fathers who advise their children. If no serious objections arose it was then decided when the persons in question must make their declaration before the whole congregation. Thereupon after the weal and the woe of the married estate is presented to them from the Word of God they are asked if they are minded to marry one another." If a free "yes" should follow on both sides, then a minister would immediately perform the wedding ceremony in the name of God. Up to this moment the two could still leave one another, "although in such a case the withdrawing party is not without censure of the congregation in order thereby to prevent all libertinism." Against this custom received from their fathers the official decree was in absolute contradiction. "We must previously lead our newly betrothed persons into the chancellory and there have their finished betrothal reported officially before it has actually happened; since a real betrothal on their own authority without reference to the congregation is not free to them, they may not even call it a betrothal." A matter so sacred should be handled only before God; therefore the helpmeet would be sought for them by the congregational leaders. The presenters of the petition added that in their brotherhood no vagabond and unknown people would be married, but only such as were incorporated into their meeting. In this manner all disorder would be prevented. The repeated Mennonite proposal that "immediately after the marriage some of the leaders of our brotherhood obediently announce themselves to the electoral Oberamt and answer all questions concerning the newly married orally or in writing," was "once and for all" rejected by the authorities. Nevertheless within the jurisdiction of Baden-Durlach certain valuable rights of custom were granted to the petitioners. The marriage regulation prescribed to them was applied in only a few localities. Usually an official marriage certificate was drawn up for a small fee, and the time and place of the wedding announced to the clerk. A part of the Mennonites of Baden thus actually enjoyed the right of "civil marriage," more than a century before its general introduction within the German Empire. In marriage affairs the Protestant marriage laws were valid for all the Mennonites of Baden, to be sure. But in the first decade of the 19th century a ducal decree accorded the Mennonites equality and fully released them from any connection with the established church. In so far as at first the marriage registers were kept for the Mennonites by the pastors, the latter performed this duty as state officials and not as church officials. Soon thereafter Mennonite church officials were allowed to keep the records of births and deaths of their members. In the cases of marriage they had to testify to the secular authority the age of the betrothed persons. The betrothed had to appear within the courthouse, and upon a fee received official consent to let themselves be married in their own manner. It is noteworthy that in 1804 in the neighboring (Austrian) Breisgau "six Anabaptist fathers" were denied equal status with their brethren by the government of Baden. Soon the Peace of Pressburg transferred Austrian Breisgau into Baden. The Mennonites in the territories of the Palatinate, etc., owe the benefits of freedom and tolerance principally to the French Revolution of 1789. (See Emancipation.)

In Prussia the entanglement of the Mennonites in obligations to pay church fees was solved much more slowly. The edict of 1789 concerning the future establishment of the "Mennonite concerns" ordered taxes which were paid, in part at least, until the revolution of 1918. Until the Civil Marriage Laws of 1875 were established it remained the legal duty of the state church pastor to keep marriage records, as for instance in Danzig. The Crefeld Mennonites owe their release in 1738 from state church taxes and the right to proclaim marriages themselves, to the mercantile interests of the Prussian king, especially his friendship for the von der Leyen industrialists. In Neuwied the Mennonites did not object to the proclamation of their marriages in the Reformed Church, nor was any obstacle put in the way of the performance of Mennonite weddings.

In the Netherlands, noted for its tolerance, the Mennonites had for a long time little freedom in this respect. The Reformed state church held the sole right of performing valid marriages. To the extent that Mennonite congregations claimed the right to perform legal marriages independently, they were compelled to conform to the state law. Only in a few cities such as Dordrecht, Leiden, Haarlem, and Vlissingen, did the respect for the Mennonites socially gradually give them independence. The first to receive the right for their own fully valid marriages were the Frisian congregations. In Groningen and Overijssel as late as 1601 the right of inheritance was denied to all couples married outside the Reformed Church. Meanwhile, however, the right of performing marriage ceremonies was gradually granted to other creeds. A necessary condition was notification to the magistrate. On Sunday at the city hall the couples of the religions "that were only tolerated" were to present themselves—Catholics, Mennonites, Jews, etc. There a legal marriage consent was then given with the words of the sheriff: "God bless your marriage, don't forget the poor." The strict groups of the Mennonites had the congregational ceremony precede the civil ceremony. Sections of the more liberal groups recognized the official civil marriage of its members without a proclamation or ceremony of their own.

A comparative study of the laws which concerned the legitimacy of Anabaptist and Mennonite marriages up till the time of the recognition of civil marriages could proceed in a unified way in the following manner. First, one would test the legal status in comparison with the degree of freedom of conscience, i.e., the extent to which freedom of conscience had become a positive legal right. Of necessity, in this connection, the actual relationship between the church and the state would need to be clarified. It is by no means the case that the so-called separation of church and state, which on the whole did determine the relationship between the state and the Mennonite congregations, guaranteed freedom of conscience. Thus for example in Prussia the Mennonites were invited for economic reasons, and were "tolerated" in a sort of "law of separation," often, however, under strong objections by the church. Corresponding to these on the side of the state were the efforts for the preservation of the greatest extent of religious unity possible. The relatively tolerant Prussian General Law of 1794 still contains the obligation for the members of merely tolerated religious societies to have their marriages recorded by the privileged churches. A degree of consideration is given the Mennonites in that they were assigned to churches most closely related to them (Lutheran or Reformed). The incorporation of official records of the marriages of the adherents of non-state church groups in the records of the state churches is the main point; the fees charged were another element. Freedom of conscience and religion, as far as it concerned marriage law (marriage obstacles, laws of divorce), found a guarantee in the general laws of Prussia to this extent that the adherents of all creeds were considered equal. In the Palatinate and Baden-Durlach a customary right of Mennonite marriages is to be noted, the grounds of which have not yet been clarified, which recognizes no interference by the state church. The ecclesiastical marriage laws, however, remained unaltered. The attainment of full recognition and equalization by the Mennonites was slow in progress. The law of the German empire of Feb. 6, 1875, recognized the purely civil nature of the registration of marriages, and thus eliminated any control by or favor to the state church.

In 1653 the English Anabaptist "Independents" achieved the same principle. The tolerated continental Mennonites strove for religious independence and responsibility, while subjecting themselves to the regulations of the dominant church concerning the laws of marriage. In the 1870's when there was a struggle in Germany concerning an obligatory civil marriage some of their leaders, especially the West Prussian Mennonites, had some doubts about the introduction of civil marriage laws. The fear of a depreciation of marriage which seemed to be increasing was countered by the favorable experience of the Palatine Mennonites who were subject to the civil marriage regulations of the code of Napoleon. Soon, however, the West Prussian Mennonite congregations decided to consider members as excommunicated who were married only according to civil law. For some time, in consideration of changed circumstances, the Mennonite congregations there were advised to use the marriage formula of the Protestant church synods.

Fundamentally the Anabaptist-Mennonite view of marriage reflects and represents the concern for the voluntary "community of the saints." In this perspective marriage is seen as its germ cell. It is cared for and cultivated as a religious "Gesinnungsehe," a community of the spirit. Marriage and the family are submitted to rules of conduct arising from the New Testament and are also dedicated to the principles of the Sermon on the Mount. The example of persecuted and martyred couples and families has, from the beginning of Anabaptist-Mennonite history, testified to their religio-ethical traditions, discipleship, and discipline. Issues of various kinds sprang from contacts and conflicts with the "world." Insistence on a community-bound Christian fellowship in marriage and family caused strong congregational measures for protection and preservation, including orders of separation (marital avoidance).

The Anabaptist-Mennonite marriage concept, positions, and conflicts in relation to it, the customs and folklore of many cultural backgrounds constitute other (external) aspects of study and evaluation.

Marriage and family life within the full scope of the Anabaptist-Mennonite movement still awaits its historian. Archival and other documentary records, numerous monographic including biographic inquiries are now put at the disposal of researchers into expanded or new fields as at no other moment in historiography. Important criteria testing the essence of pertinent principles have been provided in H. S. Bender's classic Anabaptist Vision. Here then are the prerequisites needed to overhaul, to construct, and to reconstruct an edifice of world-wide Anabaptism's contribution in the history of Christian culture.

As these remarks are to stress that which is genuinely meaningful in the concept, status, and custom of marriage in Anabaptism, reference is also made to Robert Friedmann's signal work on the Hutterian brotherhood. He has assembled and studied nearly all the essential sources. The article Ehe (ML I) in some little measure gave attention to the central role of the Hutterites. Friedmann's separate treatment of the views and practices of their Haushaben society is a deeply appreciated substitution for my endeavors in the early 1920's. Finally, it should be said that the above article deals chiefly with the European continent. The original study touched on the English Anabaptist influence on religious and secular developments. Irvin Horst's discussion of the Anabaptists in England (ME II) has opened the way for a thorough exploration of the Anglo-Saxon significance of the view of marriage, the family, and laws pertaining to the status of women.

Mennonites in North America. The European Mennonite immigrants to America brought with them their well-established marriage ideals and practices. But since the restrictions and regulations imposed by the state churches in Europe upon the "sects" were not imposed in the new free world of Pennsylvania and the other states of the United States and the provinces of Canada into which the later immigrants came and to which internal migration took place, there was a noticeable evolution in regard to marriage. While the prohibition of outside marriage was long maintained, it has now disappeared among most Mennonites of all branches; it is still maintained in all the most conservative groups, and even in such a progressive group as the Bergthal Mennonite Church in Manitoba. In practice most marriages are within the group, but where more outside marriages take place, weakening influences upon essential Mennonite doctrines and practices have been observed. Courtship customs have likewise changed to free selection of partners through a period of relatively free and unchaperoned courtship.

High standards of marriage fidelity and lifelong monogamy are maintained, with divorce almost unknown and separation rare. Marriage laws vary from state to state, and also in the Canadian provinces, but the European custom in some countries of having a civil and a religious ceremony is unknown. Everywhere a religious ceremony performed by a clergyman is permitted, and in fact a civil marriage is almost unknown among Mennonites. In earlier days, in certain regions, such as the province of Ontario, Mennonite ministers seldom secured the right to perform marriage ceremonies, so that Mennonites frequently went to authorized clergymen of other faiths for the ceremony. In Ontario also the publishing of the banns (advance announcement in the church of the intent to marry) was long required. This custom was long prevalent in the 18th and 19th centuries among both Mennonites and Amish in the eastern states, and is still followed by the Old Order Amish. Prohibition of marriage between cousins has at times been the subject of church regulations in various Mennonite groups. Among the Old Order Amish the rule is still maintained that only bishops may perform a marriage ceremony. This has been true among other groups as well, but in modern times it is common to permit ministers without the full bishop or elder authority to perform the marriage ceremony. (See Divorce; Family; Marriage, Hutterite Practices; Marital Avoidance; Mixed Marriage; Weddings.) E.H.C., H.S.B.

Y. Buruma, Het huwelijk der Doopsgezinden in de zestiende eeuw (Amsterdam, 1911); Ernst Troeltsch, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches (N.Y., 1936); Marianne Weber, Ehefrau und Mutter in der Rechtsentwicklung (Tübingen, 1907); A. Hegler, Geist und Schrift bei Sebastian Franck (Freiburg, 1892); Müller, Berner Täufer; H. Detmer, Bilder aus den religiösen und sozialen Unruhen in Münster während des 16. Jahrhunderts: III, "Uber die Auffassung von der Ehe und die Durchführung der Vielweiberei in Münster während der Täuferherrschaft" (Munster, 1904); Wappler, Thüringen; Adam Pastor, Unterscheit tuschen rechte leer unde valsche ler (1552), reprinted in BRN V, especially chapter 12, against "Veelheit der Wynen"; S. F. Rues, Tegenwoordige Staet der Doopsgezinden of Mennoniten in de vereenigde Nederlanden (Amsterdam, 1745); A. Michiels, Les Anabaptistes des Vosges (Paris, 1860); C. Bergmann, Die Täuferbewegung im Kanton Zürich bis 1660 (Leipzig, 1916); H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919); G. E. Lenski, "Marriage in the Lutheran Church, A Historical Investigation" (unpublished doctoral dissertation at the American University, 1936), contains material on the Anabaptists; H. W. Schraepler, "Die rechtliche Behandlung der Täufer in Württemberg, Hessen, Baden, Kurpfalz und der deutschen Schweiz in den Jahren 1525 bis 1618" (unpublished doctoral dissertation at Tübingen University, 1956) contains a section entitled, "Die Auffassung der Täufer von der Ehe und die sich daraus ergebenden Probleme"; Hans Hillerbrand, "Die täuferische Auffassung von dem Staat" (doctoral dissertation at Erlangen University, 1957) contains a chapter on the Anabaptist attitude in marriage.

Marriage, Hutterite Practices. In general the Hutterites had an ascetic outlook on life; in fact were it not for their acceptance of marriage their way of life could best be characterized as "monastic." Marriage, however, was to them a part of their principle of absolute obedience to the commandments of God. As God once had ordered His chosen people to multiply and be fruitful, all His children are to accept this "ordinance" of procreation and act accordingly. "God, however," wrote Ulrich Stadler in 1536, "will wink at our marital work . . . on behalf of the children and will not reckon it upon those who act in fear and discipline." Naturally, emotional engagements of any kind in things connected with marriage were completely ruled out. Courtship and romance simply did not exist among the old Hutterites, and even among the Brethren of today are more or less frowned upon, although the general practice in selecting of the spouse was changed substantially about one hundred years ago. In former days the wife was called by the husband only "marital sister" (eheliche Schwester).

Peter Riedemann (q.v.), in his Rechenschaft unseres Glaubens of 1540, has a special chapter "Concerning Marriage," in which he expressly declares that the two partners must not come together through their own action and choice but in accordance with the will of God. "One should not ask his flesh but the elders that God might show through them what He has appointed for him. This then one should take with gratitude as a gift from God . . ." (100). One case is known, in 1541, where a young man had asked a girl to marry him without previously consulting the elders of the church. This was considered such a break with the rules of the church that this marriage was never realized (Riedemann, 25th epistle).

The practice of choosing a spouse was indeed peculiar with the Brethren and extremely impersonal. Two reports of this practice have been given by outside observers. In 1578 Stefan Gerlach, a professor at the University of Tübingen, came to Moravia to visit his sisters, who had joined the brotherhood some years previously. He now wrote in his Konstantinopolische Reisebeschreibung what he saw and heard. "On a certain Sunday of the year the elders call all young people together and place the boys on one side and the girls on the other side such that they face each other. Two or three boys are then suggested to each girl, one of whom she has to accept. Of course they are not really compelled, but on the other hand there is not much chance to act against the counsel of the elders" (Bossert, 1107). According to Christoph Erhard (q.v.) (p. 12) such matching took place only once a year and was done exclusively by the elders.

In 1612 the Polish nobleman Andreas Rey de Naglovitz visited the colonies in Moravia and wrote about them to a friend in France in a letter in Latin, in which he also described the Hutterite marriage practices, only he reversed the procedure; namely, each young man was given a choice of three girls (whom he had possibly never seen before) and he had to accept one of them as the will of God, "whether young or or old, poor or rich" (as Riedemann had written in his Rechenschaft). Should, however, one of the two absolutely refuse such a partner, then he or she had to wait for another six months. Apparently by 1612 this practice was performed twice a year (Hruby, 129).

The wedding itself was performed apparently right after this matching meeting so as to exclude any period of courtship. (Today among the Brethren such a period lasts as a rule hardly more than four days, say from Thursday to Sunday, when the wedding takes place.) At the wedding meal the bridegroom used to sit with the men, and the bride with the women, and it was only after the meal that the couple was led to their assigned room (Stube or Oertel) in one of the big community houses (see Bruderhof).

During the 17th century these practices began to decline as in general the common life deteriorated. There had been some opposition to the former strict method of matching, and the young people asked to be told before the meeting with whom they were to be mated. Thereupon Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.), the outstanding bishop of the brotherhood in Slovakia, assembled all the elders in Sobotiste in 1634, and gave them a Gemeindeordnung concerning matching, a sort of renewed regulation of this important brotherhood function. He first referred to Abraham who had sent his servants to Mesopotamia to get a wife for his son Isaac, and so forth. As in all other areas of life so also in this area of selecting a spouse all self-will should be subdued. Whatever is done in the brotherhood should be done in accordance with the will of God (Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 214-18).

The Hutterites continued such strict practices, in part at least, until far into the 19th century. (As for an unpleasant disagreement in this matter which led to a three-year period of shunning, see Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 284.) But during their stay in South Russia things were radically changed, strangely enough, not by a decision of the elders but apparently by a fiat of the great sponsor of the Hutterites in the Molotschna district, Johann Cornies (q.v.), the Mennonite trustee of the government. This change must have happened around 1845. D. H. Epp in his book on Johann Cornies (1909) reports in detail the event which eventually led to changes of great consequences. A young girl was about to be compelled to marry a man whom she did not want in any case. She then fled from her confinement and ran straight to Cornies begging him for help. Cornies quickly realized the precarious situation and at once put the girl on some distant farm and at the same time prevailed upon the Hutterian Brethren to abandon altogether the former practice (Epp, Johann Cornies, 146-52). Apparently the brotherhood accepted this advice (as the practice had been most unpopular anyway by that time), and ever since young people may decide for themselves whom they want to marry. To be sure, much strictness remains, and the elders and parents have to approve any such choice before one can speak of engagement. Only a few days after their approval the wedding will take place. There is no room for courtship within the brotherhood, just as there is no room for divorce. But as a rule these marriages are very successful and the two partners share their life in mutual respect and love. Today the couple receives not only one room but usually a small house or a few rooms in a bigger house in anticipation of a growing family. R.F.

Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch; F. Hruby, Die Wiedertäufer in Mähren (Leipzig, 1935); TA Württemberg; D. H. Epp, Johann Cornies (Ekaterinoslav and Berdyansk, 1909); Peter Rideman, An Account of Our Religion, Doctrine, and Faith (London, 1950); Chr. Erhard, Historia . . . der Münsterischen Wiedertäufer (Munich, 1580).

Marritgen Jans: see Marytge(n) Jan de Gortersdochter.

Marritgen Nadminx, an Anabaptist martyr from Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, who was drowned at Amsterdam on May 21, 1535, with eight other Anabaptist women. According to van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror these martyrs were thrown into the water at night, with heavy stones around their necks. The statement (DB 1909, 20) that Marritgen left Alkmaar on Jan. 21, 1536, and was executed on May 25, 1536, with 25 comartyrs is incorrect. The official records show that the date of execution given by van Braght is correct. Only the name is written inaccurately; it should be Marritgen Nannincxdochter. She had been (re)baptized just outside the town of Leiden, Holland, in the spring of 1534 by Adriaen Leertouwer (Adriaen Lourisz, q.v.). The trial records make clear that she had nothing to do with revolutionary Anabaptism; she was very aggressive against the Catholic Church. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 413, E 764; Grosheide, Verhooren, 67, 70; Mellink, Wederdopers, 145, 172, 189; ML III, 197.

Marschalck (Zoller), Haug (1489-1535), a personality long shrouded in obscurity, a writer of popular literature, of considerable influence in the early days of the Reformation through his broadsides. He was a soldier, serving first in the imperial army, entering the service of the city of Augsburg, Germany, as a soldier in 1508; in 1519 he was in the expedition against Ulrich of Württemberg, took part in the Peasants' War in 1525, and marched against the Turks in 1529. He died in 1535 in Augsburg.

Marschalck adopted the new Protestant doctrine with enthusiasm and defended it with his broadsides. But when he realized that it did not produce the expected fruit he turned away in disappointment. In his booklet Spiegel der Blinden this is clearly expressed. "We have not yet received full vision, although the light is breaking through everywhere. . . . The Wittenberg preachers are on the right road; too bad that so few take heed to their words, and still fewer take their admonitions to heart. . . . We should seek Christ alone, trust in Him alone, and call upon Him alone without any mediator. And we should love our brethren and do good. Even the teachers and preachers of the new doctrine walk before the mirror of the blind in consequence of their lack of constancy; they are probably worried about the decrease of the breadbasket. . . ."

These are ideas with which the Augsburg Anabaptists occupied themselves. It is possible that he was acquainted with Eitelhans Langenmantel. In his booklet Der Blindenführer he presents views that coincide with those of Hans Denk. But there is no evidence that he joined the Anabaptist circle. Neff.

K. Schottenloher, Philipp Ulhart (Munich, 1921) 37 f.; Otto Clemen, "Haug Marschalck, genannt Zoller, von Augsburg," in Beiträge zur Bayrischen Kirchengesch. IV; F. W. Roth, "Wer war Haug Marschalck, genannt Zoller von Augsburg?" in loc. cit. VI; ML III, 43 f.

Marshallville Reformed Mennonite Church, located at Marshallville, Wayne Co., Ohio, had 22 members in 1948. The first members moved here about 1820, but no meetinghouse was built until 1860. J.L.K.

Marten Goudsmid (Merten Goltsmeth; official name, Martin Berchmans) of Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, belonged as early as 1528 to a group of opponents of the Roman Catholic Church, apparently Sacramentists (q.v.); later he joined the Anabaptists; in 1533 he used to receive Anabaptists in his house and read the Scriptures to them. Then his traces are lost. He probably left the Anabaptists soon after. vdZ.

DB 1917, 119 (No. 105) 188; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 75, 77, 81 f., 102, 217.

Marten Jansen, an Anabaptist martyr: see Maerten Jansz Corendrager.

Marten of Vilgraten: see Marthin of Vilgraten.

Martens, a Dutch Mennonite family, of whom there are still a number of descendants. Marten Martens of Sexbierum, a blacksmith at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, living there from about 1720, was married to Jitske Hendriks, a daughter of Hendrik Klazes, Mennonite preacher at Leeuwarden. Of their 12 children, the youngest, Sibrant Martens (1741-1816), educated in the Collegiant (q.v.) orphanage "D'Oranjeappel" at Amsterdam, became a Mennonite minister. He served the congregations of Hijum, Friesland, 1776-83, Noordeind van Graft en Rijp 1783-84, and 1784-1816 Friedrichstadt on the Eider, then belonging to Denmark, now Germany. He was married to Elsje Woudbeek. Of their three sons, Marten Martens (d. 1852), after training at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, was minister of the congregation of Holwerd, Friesland, 1798-1849. He wrote Feestrede of Dankbare uitboezeming op het eerste Eeuwgetijde der Kweekschool . . . (Groningen, 1836), a rhymed sermon held at Holwerd. A number of letters which he wrote to his father while he was a student and soon after, and which contain important information on this period of Dutch history and on the seminary, are now in the possession of the author of this article. Marten Martens was married to Amelia Johanna Brouwer, a daughter of Petrus Brouwer, Reformed minister of Blija near Holward. (This Petrus Brouwer was of Mennonite descent; one of his ancestors was Minne or Menno Brouwer, who was about 1640 a Mennonite preacher in Kollumerland, Friesland, and who, according to a family tradition, was a grandson of Menno Simons, his mother being a daughter of Menno Simons.) It is not clear whether Hero Martens of Hijum, who in the early 18th century was a preacher of the Mennonite St-Annakerk-Biltzijl congregation, belonged to this family. Whether E. M. Martens-Dupuy (Amsterdam, 1841-1931), who was a warm promoter of missions and friend of the Gemeetedagbeweging (q.v.), belonged to this family is uncertain.

There have been a number of Dutch preachers bearing this name, who are known not to have been related to this Martens family: Reinier Martens, ca. 1610 at Molkwerum, Cornelius Martens, elder of the Groningen Old Flemish congregation at Bierum ca. 1625-d.85, Berend Martens, elder of the Ukowallists (q.v.) in the province of Groningen from 1653.

A widespread Martens (Martensz, Martensen, Martin, Mertens) family, probably not related to these families, but undoubtedly of Dutch descent, was found in West Prussia (Thiensdorf, Orlofferfelde, Rosenort, Elbing, Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Fürstenwerder, Heubuden, Danzig, and Königsberg) and later also in Russia and America. In 1930 Heinrich Martens, from Russia, was the leader of the Mennonite emigration to Brazil (q.v.). Simon Martensz (d. ca. 1612) was a Mennonite elder at Danzig. vdZ.

Martens family papers; Reimer, Familiennamen, 113; DJ 1850, 45 f.; DB 1874, 70; 1879, 3, 9, 10, 13, 87, 92, 111; 1895, 107, 115; 1919, 125, 139-41; 1917, 61; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 1942, 2026, 2925.

Martens (Martenss, Martensen, Martin, Martins, Mertins, Mertens), a Prussian Mennonite family name, which is recorded as early as 1619. The early Dutch form "Marten" is the equivalent of the German and English Martin, as a given name. The added "s" was attached to indicate that the bearer was a son of "Marten." The name occurred in the congregations at Danzig, Thiensdorf, Orloff, Rosenort, Elbing, Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Fürstenwerder, Heubuden, and Königsberg. From Prussia the name was transplanted to Russia. B. H. Unruh lists many with this name in the Chortitza and Molotschna settlements. Abraham Martens (q.v.), Johann Martens (q.v.), Johann Johann Martens (q.v.), Jacob Martens (q.v.), and K. K. Martens (q.v.) were outstanding leaders in Russia.

From Russia the name was transplanted to North and South America. J. G. Rempel lists Abram A. Martens and Wilhelm G. Martens as ministers (GCM) in Canada. J. H. Lohrenz lists Franz W. Martens (q.v.), Henry A. Martens, and Jacob J. Martens as outstanding M.B. leaders. Heinrich Martins was a leader of the first Witmarsum settlement of the Mennonites in Brazil, later living at Blumenau. C.K.

J. G. Rempel, 50 Jahre Konferenzbestrebungen, 1902-1952; Reimer, Familiennamen 113; J. H. Lohrenz, The Mennonite Brethren Church (Hillsboro, 1950) 310 ff.; B. H. Unruh, Die niederländisch-niederdeutschen Hintergründe . . . (Karlsruhe, 1955).

Martens, Abraham, was ordained in 1893 as the leading minister in the Lugovsk (q.v.) Mennonite Brethren Church of Neu-Samara. B.H.

Martens, Franz (1869-1942), a Mennonite elder, was born in Hutterthal near Melitopol, South Russia. He was a public school teacher for 17 years, and chairman of the district (volost) school board for 17 years. He was elected minister of the Nikolaifeld (q.v.) Mennonite Church in 1894 and elder in 1902. His attempts to reform the traditional church practice in regard to baptism, communion, and church discipline led to his resignation from the Nikolaifeld church and the founding of the Orloff Evangelical Mennonite Church in 1907, of which he was elder until 1924, when he left for Canada. He died in Kitchener, Ont., Jan. 21, 1942. G.L.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 724-27; G. Lohrenz, Sagradowka (Rosthern, 1947) 73-76.

Martens, Jacob (1870-1920), an elder of the Memrik (q.v.) Mennonite Church, was born at Tiegenhagen, Molotschna Mennonite settlement in South Russia, in 1870. He attended the Halbstadt Zentralschule, became a member of the Ohrloff-Halbstadt Mennonite Church, and married Katharina Janzen in 1891. For a while he resided at Ohrloff, Zagradovka settlement. In 1900 he moved to the Don Basin and in 1905 purchased a farm in the village of Kalinovo of the Memrik settlement. He was elected chorister (Vorsänger) and in 1910 elected and ordained minister. After the death of Elder P. Janzen, Jacob Martens became the elder of the Memrik Mennonite Church in 1919. In February 1920 he died of typhoid fever. He was an outstanding farmer, minister, and promoter of education. C.K.

H. Goerz, Memrik (Rosthern, 1954).

Martens, Johann (b. June 7, 1875), of the Chortitza Mennonite settlement, Ukraine, where he attended the Zentralschule and the normal school. For thirteen years he taught the elementary school, and was also the Oberschulze. During the Revolution he was ordained as a minister and in 1924 he became the elder of the Schönwiese Mennonite Church, Alexandrovsk. In 1929 he had to leave his home and in 1930 he and his wife with two children were exiled to Bogoslov, near Sverdlovsk in the Ural Mountains. In 1936 they were permitted to return to the Ukraine, but in 1938 Martens was arrested and imprisoned in Zaporozhe, and then exiled to northern Russia. No further word has been received from or about him. C.K.

A. A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer I (North Clearbrook, 1949) 97.

Martens, Johann Johann (1885-1935), was the son of Johann Martens, a minister of Olgafeld, Fürstenland Mennonite settlement, near Melitopol, Ukraine. He was chosen minister and then elder of the Fürstenland Mennonite Church. In 1926 he emigrated to Canada, where he served as minister and elder of the Mennonite churches at Eyebrow and Fitzmaurice, Sask. He died May 5, 1935. C.K.

A. A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer II (North Clearbrook, 1954) 456.

Martens, Kornelius K. (1880- ?), Russian Mennonite Brethren teacher and elder, was born Nov. 15, 1880, in Wernersdorf, Molotschna, South Russia, the oldest of the five children of Kornelius Johann Martens and Helena Wolf Martens. After his father's death his mother married David Huebert of Margenau, who had four sons. To this second marriage eight children were born. On July 3, 1903, K. K. Martens married Sarah Friesen, a daughter of Julius Friesen of Waldheim, Molotschna. They had eight children. Of these Kornelius and Sarah were teachers, Tusnelda a physician, and Elfriede a nurse. After the death of his first wife, Martens married (July 6, 1934) Anna Klassen, a daughter of David Klassen of Ekaterinoslav. Martens received his education in the Zentralschule in Gnadenfeld, the Normal School in Halbstadt, and the University of St. Petersburg, besides much private study. He was a member of the Mennonite Brethren Church. In 1914 he was ordained for the ministry and later he became the elder (bishop) and leader of the M.B. Church of Sparrau.

After completing his course at Halbstadt Martens taught a village school in Siberia for three years. In 1903-12 he taught school at Ignatyevo; he founded a Zentralschule in Nikolayevka. Following that he continued his education in St. Petersburg (1912-14). In 1914-22 he served as teacher and rector (principal) of the Gnadenfeld Zentralschule. During the time of his residence in Gnadenfeld he was also inspector of the schools of the volost of Gnadenfeld. For two years he was the "Oberschulze" of the volost. In 1922 he was forced to resign from his teaching and rectorship, because he refused to join the Communist organization. He then moved to Grossweide, where he began farming. While he resided there, he became a member of the Church Commission (KfK), having been elected at the General Conference (Bundeskonferenz) in Moscow in 1925. He was elected as editor, treasurer, and secretary of the Mennonite paper Unser Blatt (q.v.), which was published in Melitopol. For this paper he wrote a number of valuable articles. His other writings could not be published, because the printing of Christian books was prohibited at that time. Only a few of his poems, such as "Die letzte Nacht im Vaterhause" and "Die alte Weide," have found their way into some of the American papers. Martens also had an active part in the work of the printing association "Raduga" of Halbstadt. In the cause of nonresistance he was one of the official representatives of the Mennonites.

In 1930 Martens and his family were forced to leave their home in Grossweide and to seek refuge in various villages. Two years later he was asked to teach German and Latin at the University of Stalino, Donbass. On Aug. 6, 1937, he was arrested and after one year he was sentenced to a ten-year exile in Siberia. Shortly before the arrest he said, "Soon my turn will come and my whole crime is that I have faithfully served my Lord and Saviour." Since 1938 no information has been received from or about him. His three daughters, Sarah, Tusnelda, and Elfriede, believe that he has died. G.D.H.

Martha Baerts, an Anabaptist martyr, was secretly beheaded on Nov. 20, 1560, in the Gravensteen castle at Gent, Belgium, with Soetken van den Houtte and Lynken Pieters. Martha was a native of Oudenaerde in Flanders. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror gives her name simply as Martha, and erroneously gives Nov. 27 as the date of her death. (Mart. Mir. D 277, E 646; Verheyden, Gent, 27, No. 76; ML III, 44.) vdZ.

Mart(h)in (Marten) of Vilgraten in Tirol, Austria, an Anabaptist martyr, who was beheaded with Caspar Schuester (q.v.) of Schöneck in 1538 at Michelberg in the Puster Valley. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror gives the place of execution as Ries near Brixen in the Flucht Valley and names both men twice, viz., for 1528 and 1538. Both martyrs wrote several songs. The only known one was "Merckt auf und nemt zu Hertzen, Wie Gott will suchen heim," No. 33 in the Ausbund, also found in the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, p. 87, together with "Erzürn dich nicht, o frommer Christ," by Kaspar Schuester. NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 135; Wolkan, Lieder, 142, 171; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 187; Mart. Mir. D 19, 43, E 429, 449; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914); ML III, 44.

Marti, Jakob, was an elder of the Swiss Brethren, who together with the elders Peter Ramseier and Peter Oberli made a trip to the congregations of Swiss descent in the Palatinate in 1742, visiting the congregations of Freudenberg, Weierhof, Rauhof, and Schafbusch-Niederrödern. They tried to bridge over some differences among the Palatine Mennonites, which had been caused by the spirit and obstinate attitude of Elder Abraham Zeisset. But they did not apparently succeed, for in 1766 Marti again stayed in the Palatinate, this time together with Ramseier and Niklaus Knör. But peace was not restored until Oct. 14, 1782, at a conference on Himmelhäuserhof. Marti was not present at this conference, having probably died before. Delbert Gratz lists him not as an elder but as a deacon. He was a native of Sumiswald in the Emmental and lived at Büderichgraben. vdZ.

Müller, Berner Täufer, 212 f.; Delbert L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 80.

Martijn Pietersz, beheaded at Rotterdam, Holland, on Dec. 22, 1534, had attended Anabaptist meetings at The Hague, and had also planned to go to Münster, Westphalia, in March 1534, but did not actually go. He had been (re)baptized in April 1534; thereupon he visited Haarlem, Flanders, and the Dutch province of Zeeland; he also repeatedly stayed in Amsterdam. He was arrested in December 1534 at Rotterdam and put to death, not for Anabaptism, but for pocket-picking. There would be no reason for naming him here except for the fact that his confession gives very valuable material concerning the spread of Anabaptism in the Netherlands in 1534. (Mellink, Wederdopers, 208, 223 f.; DB 1905, 171.) vdZ.

Martijne (Martijntje) Amare: see Martijntgen (van) Aelmeers.

Martijnken (Martijntgen) Meere, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Aug. 9, 1573, at the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium, with two other women. Martijnken, the sister of the martyr Calleken Meere (q.v.), was a native of Wyncle in Flanders and unmarried. These three women were gagged to prevent them from speaking to the crowd gathered around the execution place. This fact or something else displeased the bystanders, and they nearly created a riot. Soldiers then began to clear the market place. (Verheyden, Gent, 64 f., No. 229.) vdZ.

Martijntgen (van) Aelmeers, an Anabaptist martyr, known under different names: Martijne Amare, Martijntgen (van) Aelmeers, Martincke Aelmaers. She was a young unmarried woman, who was executed with six others at Hondschoote (q.v.) in Flanders, Belgium. Particulars of the execution are lacking, but it probably occurred on April 20, 1563. This martyr is listed twice by van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror: (a) D 297, E 655, where she is called Martijntgen Aelmeers; and (b) D 298, E 655, where her name is Martijne (Martijntgen) Amare. Bibliographie II, No. 16, wrongly identifies her with Marijn Amare (Marijn Euwouts), but this martyr died at Brugge in 1561. Martijntgen Aelmeers was the sister of the martyr Nicasen van Aelmeers (q.v.). Until recently no particulars were known, the date of the execution usually being assumed to have been April 20, 1563. The records published in the Jaarboek show that her name was Martijnken Alcmaers, and that she was a daughter of Loys Alcmaers. She was a native of Steenwercke in Flanders, and the execution took place on March 23, 1562. vdZ.

Jaarboek van het Central Bureau vor Genealogie VIII (The Hague, 1954) 78, 83; Bibliographie II, No. 16.

Martijntgen Maelbouts: see Marijntgen (Marijtgen) van Male.

Martin, a family of Swiss descent widely represented in the Mennonite Church (MC). The progenitor of many of these Martins was David Martin, who arrived in Pennsylvania in 1727 and settled in what is now the Weaverland area of Lancaster County. Many of his descendants still live in that area, while others have moved farther west in Pennsylvania, and to other states, as well as to Ontario. More than a score of Martins served in the ministry of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference in the first two centuries of the life of the family in Pennsylvania. Martins worthy of note in the Lancaster area are Henry Martin, a bishop at Weaverland from 1809 until his death in 1825; Jonas Martin who became a bishop in 1881 at Weaverland and who led a schism from the conference in 1893, the so-called Martinites (Old Order Mennonites); Abraham L. Martin, of the Pequea district of the Lancaster Conference, ordained bishop in 1921 and active for many years; Elmer G. Martin (1894-), bishop at Mellinger's since 1946; C. Z. Martin (1893-), minister since 1923 at Columbia. In 1954 there were 16 ministers in the Lancaster Conference bearing the name Martin, and only 14 in the rest of the Mennonite Church (MC), viz., Ohio, Ontario, Virginia, Maryland. A. D. Martin (1878-1913) was a Mennonite preacher at Scottdale, Pa., and for a number of years was in charge of the Mennonite Book and Tract Society work, as well as serving as secretary-treasurer of the Mennonite Publishing House.

The Old Order (Wisler) Mennonite schism in Waterloo Co., Ont. (1889), was led by Bishop Abraham Martin (1834-1902), ordained bishop in 1867, who served at the Martin meetinghouse. Many, probably most, of the ministers in the Waterloo Old Order group have been Martins. In 1954 two of the three bishops of the group were Martins, and four of the remaining nine preachers.

The leading historian of the family was Isaac W. Martin (1861-1954), but his genealogical studies are at this writing not yet published. J.C.W.

Martin Box Chapel, a Mennonite Brethren mission in the Ozarks, located near Marshall, Ark., had its beginning with the extension work of the Southern District Conference together with daily vacation Bible school work of Tabor College. In the summer of 1946 a corps of workers, under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. David Richert, were sent into this field, and the work was well received in the various communities. In the spring of 1947, Mr. and Mrs. Richert were requested to take over the work on a full-time basis. The pastor (1957) is Ed Hinz. A.W.E.

Martin Old Order Mennonites. Aaron Martin, born Aug. 30, 1918, in Lancaster Co., Pa., joined with the Jacob Stauffer group in eastern Snyder Co., Pa., but in 1945 led one of the two-way schisms in that congregation. Martin was ordained to the ministry after this schism, June 4, 1945, and four weeks later bishop. In 1950 the group had 28 members and used the meetinghouse a few miles west of the Susquehanna Trail. Further divisions, a total of four in seven years, have reduced the group to small fractions each with a bishop, minister, and deacon, all using the same meetinghouse at different times. I.D.L.

Martin Old Order Mennonite Church, located three miles north of Waterloo, Ont., was organized ca. 1824. Its meetinghouse, built in 1848, was long the center of the large Mennonite settlement in Woolwich Township, north of Waterloo Township. It was named "Martin's" probably because the site of four acres was on the farm of pioneer Peter Martin and had been reserved by Henry Martin in 1824 for the purpose of a meetinghouse and burial grounds, even though the land was not actually purchased (by the "Mennonite Society of British North America" according to the deed) until 1848, when the meetinghouse was erected. The meetinghouse was long the only one north of Waterloo and served all the Mennonites in Woolwich Township.

In 1889 the Old Order schism created a serious break in the Ontario Mennonite body. The bishop at Martin's at that time, Abraham Martin, led most of his congregation in his refusal to accept the newer methods of church work (Sunday school, etc.) which had been accepted by most of the Ontario Mennonite congregations, and made Martin's the strongest unit in the Ontario Old Order group (which included smaller groups at Selkirk-Rainham and Markham). In 1925 a schism in the entire Ontario Old Order group resulted in an almost half-and-half division at Martin's. The new progressive group, which permitted automobiles and telephones, joined with a similar group at Markham to form the Waterloo-Markham Conference. In 1955 this group had at Martin's 150 members with Amsey M. Martin serving as bishop, and Urias Martin as preacher. The more conservative group had some 200 members, with Addison Gingerich as bishop and Daniel B. Martin as minister. The two groups use the meetinghouse on alternate Sundays. The meetinghouse is an excellent example of the older style of architecture and interior arrangement and furniture. In 1900 it was enlarged to 42 x 64 ft. J.C.F.

Martin von Neck, an Anabaptist martyr: see Nauk, Martin.

Martin du Petitz (Petis), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Oct. 21 or 22, 1551, at Antwerp, Belgium, with Peter Bruynen (q.v.) and three others. Martin was a native of Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders and a chairmaker by trade. He was sentenced to death because he "had been rebaptized and persisted in his heresy." Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror mentions him as "another brother," not giving his name. vdZ.

Offer, 177, note 1; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 405, 415, 417; XIV, 18 f., No. 206; DB 1864, 99; Mart. Mir. D 128, E 498.

Martin (Maerten) van der Stra(e)ten, an Anabaptist martyr, born about 1534 at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, was burned at the stake at Gent, Belgium, on Dec. 4, 1572; his wife Beliken de Jaghere (q.v.) also died as a martyr at Gent, on March 17, 1573. Martin had received baptism on his faith at Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland. By trade he was a maker of felt hats. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror contains six of his letters. Three of them Martin wrote to his wife, who was his fellow prisoner, comforting her and admonishing her with the words of Scripture and the Apocrypha to have patience and endurance in her suffering. The fourth letter was written to Anna Servaes, the fifth to Servaes Jansz. In the sixth he wrote words of admonition and comfort to Adam v. L. and his wife. These letters all contain exhortations and admonitions to keep the faith; personal information in them is scarce. Incidentally the information is given that Martin and Beliken had married three years before; the marriage had been performed in the congregation. In the letters Martin also sent greetings in the name of Adriaen, Hansken, Margriet, Lou, and Dingentgen, all imprisoned with them. The identity of Adriaen, Hansken, Margriet, and Dingentgen is easily established; they were Adriaen Rogiers, Hansken van Oudenaerde, Grietgen van Sluys, and Dingentgen van Hondschoote. Lou could not be identified. (Mart. Mir. D 623, 631-40, E 954-60; Verheyden, Gent, 59, No. 205; ML III, 44.) vdZ.

Martin Taelman, an Anabaptist martyr, of whom little is known. He was an old man, born at St.-Maria-Horebeke in Flanders, and living in Brugge, where he worked as a ropewalker. He was burned at the stake on March 25, 1572, at Gent, Belgium. (Verheyden, Gent, 58, No. 203.) vdZ.

Martin, Thoni, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Grönenbach, Bavaria, Germany, which belonged to Kempten. Because of his faith he was led to his death on Oct. 23, 1593, at the advanced age of 80 years. He was accompanied by a Catholic clergyman to the site of execution, which was set up before the court of the abbey. While the clergyman was urging the steadfast Martin to recant, the church prince angrily opened his window and shouted to the executioner to lay the head of the obstinate heretic at his feet. W.W.

Haggenmüller, Geschichte der Stadt und der gefürsteten Grafschaft Kempten II (1847) 107 f.; Wiswedel, Bilder II, 58; ML III, 44.

Martin (Maerten) van de Walle, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Oct. 15, 1558, at Brugge, Belgium, with three other men. Martin was a silk-weaver, a native of Gent, and 33 years of age. He had been (re)baptized in 1551 at Antwerp by Gillis van Aken (q.v.); later he lived at Gent, and from 1557 at Brugge. Meetings of the congregation were sometimes held in his home, attended by members from the city and from the country. Martin apparently was a widower; he left two children. The martyr Jan van de Walle was his brother. (Mart. Mir. D 202, E 569; Verheyden, Brugge, 46, No. 28.) vdZ.

Martindale (Pa.) Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Lancaster Conference, formerly called Fairview, had a meetinghouse on the northeast corner of the town square by 1854. In 1848 the widow of Christian Zimmerman gave a tract for burial purposes west of the town, which became the location of a new meetinghouse in 1886. The Old Order Mennonite schism of 1893 in this area resulted in two branches, both using the meetinghouse, and after 1926 three used this commodious stone house, since the O.O.M. group had a schism. The meetinghouse still has the singing table and a table on the floor for a pulpit. After the 1893 division the Mennonite (MC) congregation was very small, and was cared for by the ministers of the Weaverland congregation. This small group became the especial care of I. B. Good and the membership grew. In 1948-49 a 60 x 86 ft. brick meetinghouse was built northwest of the town, the O.O.M. groups retaining the old house. In 1954 the membership was 266 with John D. Burkholder and Alvin Martin as ministers. I.D.L.

Martindale Old Order Mennonite Church, Lancaster Co., Pa. After the Martinite (Wisler) division of 1893 the new group continued to worship in the stone meetinghouse built in 1886 by the Mennonites of the Lancaster Conference (MC), of which they were then a part; in fact, there were very few left in the parent body in this congregation. The one Zimmerman cemetery, located south of the church, continues to be used by them. The Lancaster Conference and the O.O.M. both used the same meetinghouse, and after the division of 1926 into the Groffdale and Weaverland conferences, all three groups used it. By 1949, with the Lancaster Conference membership built up (279 in 1956), they built a new church to the north, leaving the old building for the two conferences.

The two groups continued to grow under their own ministers. The Groffdale Conference, earlier under Joseph Wenger as bishop, now Aaron Z. Sensenig as bishop, and Harry H. Martin as minister, is a part of the Weaverland circuit with George G. Horst also as minister. The membership is about 275. The Weaverland Conference with 160 members is in charge of Joseph O. Weaver, bishop, and John B. Weaver, minister. Martindale and Weaverland are in a circuit too. I.D.L.

Martindale (Groffdale) Old Order Mennonite Conference is the result of a schism in 1926 in the Weaverland O.O.M. (q.v.) Conference, which had broken from the Weaverland Mennonite Church (q.v.) in 1893. The 1954 membership was reported to be 1200 in round numbers, meeting in meetinghouses, with Aaron Z. Sensenig as bishop. They still share the use of the Weaverland O.O.M. meetinghouse. They represent the most conservative O.O.M. group in Lancaster County and separated from the Weaverland group on the issue of the use of automobiles, which they reject. They use German almost exclusively in preaching, have no Sunday schools, and reject most modern conveniences. I.D.L.

Martine (Martijntken) Dhanins, a daughter of Joost (Jan) van Sleidingen, a member of the congregation of Gent, Belgium, died there in August 1573, while in prison because of her faith. Her sister Janneken, arrested with her, suffered martyrdom at Gent on Aug. 17, 1573. (Verheyden, Gent, 64, No. 228.) vdZ.

Martin's Mennonite Church (MC), with its present meetinghouse in east central Wayne Co., Ohio, about three miles southeast of Orrville, was founded by Lancaster County Mennonites in 1834. William Westheffer and Henry Martin were the first ministers. The congregation erected a log meetinghouse in 1835. Being rather conservative, the congregation did not organize a Sunday school until 1880. The congregation of 197 (1955) members, with Stanford Mumaw as pastor, is a member of the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference. Earlier the Pleasant View (q.v.) and Martin's congregations were counted in a sense as one congregation with alternating services in the two meetinghouses but a joint ministry. In 1930 the connection severed and each became a fully independent congregation. The Wisler schism of 1873 cost heavily in membership at both Martin's and Pleasant View, the County Line-Chestnut Ridge (q.v.) O.O.M. congregation having been formed from this schism. J.S.U.

Martin's Creek Mennonite (MC) Church, located two miles north of Berlin, Holmes Co., Ohio, a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference, was organized in 1860 by former members of the Old Order Amish in this community, the first settlers having come in 1824. The first meetinghouse, 25 x 48 ft., was erected in 1875, its second in 1906, when the membership was about 200, which was remodeled in 1955 to seat 550. The first bishop was Fred Hague, who was followed by Jonathan Zook, Fred Mast, and Joseph Mast. After a period of nonresident bishops, D. D. Miller, who is now (1956) serving, was installed as bishop-pastor. He is assisted by Warren Miller. The membership in 1955 was 357. The congregations at Berlin (1939) and Millersburg (1956) have been organized out of Martin's Creek. In addition the Flat Ridge Mission Church, 10 miles south of Newcomerstown, is sponsored by the Martin's Creek congregation. H.S.B.

Martins, Heinrich H., Elder of the Busau Mennonite Church, Crimea, Russia, b. February 1860 at Brodske, Prussia, d. Oct. 17, 1905, at Montanai, Crimea. He was baptized in 1880, married Anna Friedrichsen in 1886, was elected minister in 1893 and elder in 1901. Of his twelve children four preceded him in death. He was a very effective minister during his brief term of service. C.K.

H. Dirks, "Nekrolog des Aeltesten der Busauer Gemeinde Heinrich Martins," Menn. Jahrbuch, 1905/6, 84; "Die Geschichte der Busauer Mennonitengemeinde," Unser Blatt, May 1927, 236 ff.

Martinsburg Mennonite Church (MC), a member of Allegheny Mennonite Conference, located on the southern outskirts of Martinsburg in the Morrison's Cove area, Blair Co., Pa., dates back to 1790 when Mennonites migrated to this area from eastern counties and Virginia. The original settlers included families with the names of Rhodes, Kauffman, Snyder, Shank, Newcomer, Stoner, and Bassler. In the early days, a log building was used for worship and school purposes. In 1853 a new frame church was erected about one mile east of the present building. This was used until 1916, when a brick building was erected on the outskirts of Martinsburg.

Because the congregation was scattered another meetinghouse was built about three miles south of Martinsburg in 1900, known as the Pleasant Grove Church. Church and Sunday-school services were alternated between these two places until 1945, when Pleasant Grove was abandoned. This congregation established a mission station at Ore Hill in 1902, and took an active part in the opening of Altoona Mission. The congregation at Roaring Spring, about five miles west of Martinsburg, where a meetinghouse had been erected in 1898, was at first a part of the Martinsburg congregation. In 1912 it seceded to join the General Conference Mennonite Church.

The earliest ministerial help for these people came from Huntingdon County. The first resident minister and bishop was apparently Frederick Rhodes, who was ordained about 1840. A prominent leader was Abram Metzler (1862-1924, ord. bishop 1906). In 1956 the bishop is D. I. Stonerook and the pastor Clyde Fulmer, with a membership of 86. Ministers ordained at this place now serving elsewhere include Henry B. Ramer (1901), Duchess, Alberta; Isaac Metzler (1913), bishop at Accident, Md.; Clayton F. Derstine (1914), bishop at Kitchener, Ont.; and A. J. Metzler (1924), bishop at Scottdale, Pa. E.C.B.

Ammon Kaufman, "Martinsburg Mennonite Church," Southwestern Pennsylvania Conference News, March-April 1948.

Martinshof, a large farm near Bad Rappenau in the district of Sinsheim in Baden, Germany, which was acquired by Mennonites in the middle of the 18th century. A Mennonite congregation was organized here, closely associated with Bockschaft. The two were served by the same preachers. According to an entry in the Protestant church books at Treschklingen, one of the first weddings of this congregation was performed at the Martinshof on April 24, 1768 (Jakob Krehbühl and Katharina Plötscher). This congregation was served in the last decades of the 18th century by Elder Abraham Zeisset (q.v.) of Hasselbach; preachers of the Martinshof congregation then were Hans Kaufmann and Hans Bechtel. In 1862 the farm changed ownership and the buildings were removed. The site is now in a bare field. The Mennonites here then met in Bad Rappenau (q.v.). HEGE.

K. Noll, Geschichte von Rappenau (Rappenau, 1907) 172 f.; Dutch Naamlijst; Menn. Gesch.-Bl. 1936, 23; ML III, 44.

Martyr Books, The martyr's death suffered by thousands of Protestants made the deepest impression on their world. Relatives, friends, acquaintances, and fellow believers regarded them with unbounded grateful esteem. The letters they wrote in prison, their confessions of faith, their letters of farewell, the poems they composed, went from hand to hand and were read with enthusiasm. Descriptions and songs which described their steadfast faith in the grip of torture and death found enormous sale. Soon the desire arose to collect these testimonies into one book, in order to preserve them for posterity.

Thus the first book of martyrs came into being in 1552 with the title, Historien der Heyligen auserwöllten Gottes Zeugen, Bekennern und Märtyrern, so in angehender ersten Kirchen Altes und Neues Testament, zu jeder zeyt gewesen sind, written by Ludwig Rabus (q.v.) of Memmingen. Among others it contains descriptions of the death of Hendrik of Zutphen (Dec. 11, 1524), Willem of Zwolle (Oct. 29, 1529), and Leonhard Kaiser (Aug. 16, 1527); a second edition was printed in 1571-72.

In 1554 the first edition of J. Crespin's (q.v.) noted book, Le livre des martyrs depuis Jean Huss jusqu'en 1554, came out and went through many revised editions. The translations and excerpts made by Christoph Raab, published in 1582 and 1591 at Herborn, and by Paulus Crocius, Grosses Märtyrerbuch und Kirchenhistorien, published at Bremen in 1607, 1617, 1682, and 1722, also deserve notice. (Concerning John Fox's Book of Martyrs of 1559, see John Fox.)

On March 18, 1559, Adriaen van Haemstede (q.v.) finished his book at Antwerp titled: De Gheschiedenisse ende den doodt der vromer Martelaren die om het ghetuyghenisse des Euangeliums haer bloedt ghestort hebben, van den tyden Christi af, tot den Jare M.D. LIX toe, byeen vergadert op het kortste, Door Adrianum Corn. Haemstedium, a book which was of influence on the martyrology of the Dutch Mennonites, and also contains a few accounts of Mennonite martyrs.

Another (non-Mennonite) martyrbook deserving mention is the Groot Christen-Martelaersboeck Ghenoechsaem vervattende een kerckelycke Historie van den Opgangh, Voorgangh en Ondergangh der vervolgingen, etc., by Abraham Philippus Mellin, preacher at Anthonypolder (Dordrecht, 1619). It is refuted by De ontledinge van dry verscheyden niew ghereformeerde Wederdoopers door Arnoudt van Gelouwe (q.v., Antwerp, 1656).

The first Anabaptist-Mennonite martyr book is the important Dutch collection, Het Offer des Heeren (q.v.), which was published in 1562 with the title, Dit Boec wort genoemt Het offer des Heeren, om het inhout van sommighe opgheofferde kinderen Godts: De welcke voortgebracht hebben wt den goeden schat haers harten Belijdingen, Sendbrieven ende Testamenten, dewelcke sy metten monde beleden, ende metten bloede bezegelt hebben, Tot troost ende versterckinghe der Slachtschaepkens Christi, die totter doot Geschict zijn, Tot lof, prijs ende eere desgeens diet al in allen vermach, wiens macht duert van eewicheyt tot eewicheyt, Amen. By 1599 it had gone through 11 editions (n.p., printed either at Emden or Amsterdam). In all editions a collection of songs was added (first edition, 1563), which has the title, Een Lietboecxken, tracterende van den Offer des Heeren, int welcke oude ende nieuwe Liedekens wt verscheyden Copien vergadert zijn, om by het Offerboeck ghevoecht te worden, want het van eender materyen roert als van verraden, vanghen ende dooden, aengaende der Slachtschaepkens Christi, die de stemme haers Herders Jesu Christi getrouwelyck gehoorsaem zijn gheweest totter doodt toe. . . . This first edition contains 25 songs, the first of which treats the sufferings of Christ and the others the death of the Anabaptist martyrs during 1526-61. It is the oldest hymnal of the Dutch Mennonites, and was much used in church services along with three other hymnals, Veelderhande Liedekens, Nieu Liedeboeck, and Tweede Liedenboeck. The complete Offer (with Lietboecxken) was reprinted in the edition of 1570 with a valuable scholarly introduction and notes, edited by S. Cramer in BRN II (The Hague, 1904). Both before and after the publication of the Offer des Heeren a number of small booklets were published containing letters, accounts of trials and executions, and hymns of martyrs. The first of the Anabaptist martyrbooks is the small booklet giving an account of the martyrdom of Michael Sattler and his associates at Rottenburg (Württemberg) under the title Ayn newes wunderbarliches geschicht von Michael Sattler zu Rottenburg am Neckar sampt andern 9 mannen seiner lere und glauben halben verbrannt und 10 wyaber ertrenkt, 1527 (copy in the Wolfenbüttel Library). Another account of the Michael Sattler martyrdom appeared about the same time as an appendix to the Brüderliche Vereinigung of 1527. These booklets were published not later than 1533. Dutch revised editions appeared in 1560 and 1565, and the story was included in Het Offer and by this route got into the Groot Martelaarsboek (Big Martyr book) and following martyr books. The "Testament" (letter of farewell) and a hymn written by Anneken Jans (q.v.), put to death at Rotterdam in 1539, were published in the very year of her death. A rhymed account of the suffering and death of the ladies of Beckum (q.v.), put to death at Delden in 1544, was published in Low German by 1545 and soon after in Dutch. A somewhat larger collection of Anabaptist martyr material concerning Thomas von Imbroich (d. 1558) and Soetken van den Houtte appeared about 1565 and concerning Reytse Aysesz about 1577. The Mennonite Library at Amsterdam has a volume of 1577 (repr. 1584) containing letters of Jacob de Keersmaecker, Hendrick Alewijnsz, Joost Verkindert, Thys Joriaensz, and Herman Timmerman, another volume of Jan Woutersz (1579), one of Christiaen Rycen or de Rycke (1588), and one of Joos de Tollenaer (1599).

Further collections of martyr stories, made especially by Jacques Outerman (q.v.) and Joost Govertsz (q.v.), led to the first genuine Mennonite book of martyrs, published in 1615 at Haarlem by Hans de Ries (q.v.) and the Waterlander Mennonites. The printer was Jakob Pouwels Houwaert and the publisher Daniel Keyser at Haarlem. Its title was Historie der martelaren ofte waerachtighe getuygen Jesu Christi die d'evangelische waerheyt in veelderley tormenten betuygt ende met haer bloed bevesticht hebben sint het Jaer 1524 tot desen tyt toe waerby oock gevoecht syn haer bekentenissen, disputatien ende schriften uytdruckende haerl. levende hope crachtich gelove ende brandende liefde tot Godt ende syne heylige waerheyt. The preface states that the book lays no claim to exhaustiveness, and that further stories were still to be collected for later publication.

The Old Frisians, led by their elder Pieter Janszoon Twisck and Syvaert Pietersz, had the work reprinted at Hoorn in 1617. This edition is exactly like the Haarlem edition, except that the foreword is different, and a confession of faith with 33 articles has been added, also 41 additional martyr stories, with 21 listed in an appendix. Ten stories were omitted, as well as a disputation of Herman van Vlekwijk because of its Arian content. The title of this edition reads Historie der warachtighe getuygen Jesu Christi . . . sint het Jaer 1524 tot desen tijt toe.

Thus the Old Frisians had produced a work that they called the great book of sacrifice. But they completely overlooked the fact that the Haarlem book contained accounts of some martyrs who held false views of the humanity of Christ. In order to correct these errors they printed a new edition in 1626 at Hoorn omitting the questionable passages. The martyr stories listed in the appendix of the first edition were inserted in chronological order and seven more added, two of them in an appendix. Otherwise this edition is like the 1617 edition. This edition has a somewhat modified title, Historie van de Vrome getuygen Jesu Christi . . . .

In reply to the charges which the third edition raised against the editors of the first, Alenson (q.v.) published his Tegen-Bericht, defending Hans de Ries and his co-workers. This led to the fourth edition of the book, which was published in 1631 at Haarlem by the press of Hans Passchiers van Wesbusch with the title, Martelaers-Spiegel der werelose Christenen t'zedert anno 1524. Not including the foreword and introduction, which cover 56 pages, and the table of contents, which contains 6, the book has 864 pages. In many of the copies a page was inserted with the title, Onnoselheydts peyl van't Munsters onheyl, a repudiation of any relationship with the Anabaptists of Münster, and in some copies an appendix was bound in, containing the confessions of faith by Hans de Ries and Lubbert Gerritsz in forty articles. De Hoop Scheffer thinks that Hans de Ries supervised this edition and adopted the additions in the Hoorn editions of 1617 and 1626. Several martyr stories of the 1617 edition taken from the chronicles of Curtius were omitted here, and persons mistreated but not killed are given separate treatment. Only four new accounts are added; there is also a short note on several martyrs previously mentioned.

The foreword of the 1631 edition is a masterpiece of style. It recounts the heroic steadfastness of the martyrs in the face of pain and death, praises their oral and written statements, and finally refutes the arguments of their judges in justifying the death sentence. The first Reformation martyrs treated in the book are Hans Koch and Leonhard Meister in 1524; the last Anabaptist martyr is Hans Landis, 1614.

The last and most significant martyrbook of the Dutch Mennonites is the Martyrs' Mirror by Tieleman Jansz van Braght (q.v.): Het Bloedigh Tooneel der Doops-gesinde en Weereloose Christenen, die om het getuygenisse Jesu hunnen Zaligmaker geleden hebben en gedoodt zijn, van Christi tijdt af, tot dese onse laetste tijden toe, verzameld uit verscheidene geloofweerdige Chronieken, gedenkschriften en getuigenissen. It was published at Dordrecht in 1660; the second and last Dutch edition, which was published in Amsterdam in 1685, was illustrated with over 100 etchings by Jan Luiken (q.v.). In this edition the words "of Martelaarspiegel" were added after the word "tooneel" in the title. The foreword of the first edition says that the author had originally intended to reprint the Groote Offerboeck of 1631, with the addition of only a few recently discovered martyr accounts. Actually it turned out to be an entirely different book. Part I contains the history of the Christian martyrs from the time of Christ to 1600, arranged by centuries, each century being concluded with a history of baptism. The confessions of faith are valuable: of 1627 (23-27), of 1630 (27-32), of 1632 (32-37), and the one consisting of 33 articles (385-432). The second part deals with Mennonite martyr history. (For information about later editions see Martyrs' Mirror.)

Güldene Aepffel in Silbern Schalen (European editions without place in 1702 and 1742, American edition at Ephrata in 1745, 519 pp.), though not an abridgment of the Martyrs' Mirror, contains martyr stories, testimonials, letters, and confessions of the martyrs Michael Sattler, Thomas von Imbroich, and Susanna van Houte. Isaak van Dühren's Geschichte der Märtyrer oder kurze historische Nachricht von den Verfolgungen der Mennonisten (Königsberg 1787, reprints Königsberg 1788, Stuttgart 1863, and Winnipeg 1939), 169 pp., contains three parts, the first of which (Verfolgungen . . . von den Catholiken) reported on 102 Dutch martyrs and is taken from van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. The other two parts (Verfolgungen . . . von den Lutheranern and Verfolgungen . . . von den Reformirten) are based on various sources, including Mathesius, Gottfried Arnold, Gerber, Crespin (see van Dühren).

The 1831 (Philadelphia, Pa.) German edition of John Fox's Martyr Book (Allgemeine Geschichte des Christlichen Marterthums), which includes in the title the following: "Vermehrt mit vielen wichtigen Nachrichten über die späteren Verfolgungen der wehrlosen Taufgesinnten und Anderen, in Deutschland," includes "Verfolgungen der Mennoniten," pp. 787-934, a condensation of the full text of the van Braght book.

The importance of the books of martyrs must not be underestimated. They have been instrumental in stirring and keeping the interest of Mennonite churches and have at various times won warm friends for the presentation of Mennonite history.

A careful bibliographical report of all editions of Het Offer and the other Dutch Mennonite martyrbooks was published in Bibliographie des Martyrologes Protestants Néerlandais (The Hague, 1890). NEFF.

Martyr Hymns: see Song Writing.

Martyrdom, Theology of. In 1933 the German church historian Ethelbert Stauffer (of Palatinate Mennonite parentage) published a study in the Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte (III, 1933, 545-98), entitled "Täufertum und Märtyrertheologie" (English translation under the title, "The Anabaptist Theology of Martyrdom" in MQR XIX, 1945, 179-214), which soon became a minor classic in the ongoing discussion of interpreting the essence of Anabaptism and its implied "theology." Stauffer's thesis is briefly as follows: In the period of post-canonical Judaism (since about 175 B.C.) a new viewpoint impressed itself on the then flourishing apocryphal literature: the idea that suffering and martyrdom for one's faith are the very meaning of the happenings of history, for a double reason: (a) they represent a causal necessity in the great fight between the divine and the satanic order. The great Adversary does not allow a pure realization of God's plan, at least not in this present aeon or world period. (b) Such suffering, however, serves at the same time a very great purpose: it ushers in the new aeon. Death becomes victory, martyrdom is an expiating sacrifice, and Satan will be overcome only by such nonresistant suffering. That was the teaching of Dan. 3 (the three men in the furnace) and of the Second and Third Book of the Maccabees (e.g., the story of the mother and her seven sons). In short, the apocalyptic, pre-Christian literature offers this double justification of martyrdom: causally it is inescapable, and teleologically ("what for") it is absolutely meaningful.

The New Testament continued this apocalyptic trend even further; the Cross becoming the very center not only of salvation but also the vindication of all martyrdom for conscience' sake. In fact the idea of Nachfolge or discipleship (q.v.) would almost be without meaning if it were not connected with such earthly tribulations. The believer's conflict with the "world" is the surest indication that the disciple is true to the master, testifying for another reality and preparing for the coming of the kingdom. Two figures of speech soon became generally accepted: the disciple must become a "soldier" [occasionally also called a "knight"] of Christ who "fights the good fight" to the bitter end, and secondly, baptism is called death just as death is a sort of baptism by blood. This remarkable "theology of history" may be found with many writers of the first centuries after Christ (sometimes called the period of the "Church under the Cross"), and received its final formulation in the famous Church History of Eusebius (q.v.), a favorite later on with the Anabaptists.

Stauffer now claims that this "theology of martyrdom" (which he occasionally also calls appropriately the "apocalypse of martyrdom") is the "hidden sanctuary or crypt of Anabaptist Christianity" (MQR, 205). It is the very core of Anabaptist thought, its "theology of history," and the final directive toward the narrow path of renouncing the world and accepting conflicts and death, if need be. The true Christian must suffer in this world, but in so doing he is preparing for the kingdom of God which might come at any time (i.e., when the number of martyrs is full). The "suffering church" is the true church of God throughout all history. In documenting his thesis, Stauffer could refer to an outstanding array of original source material: Conrad Grebel's famous letter to Thomas Müntzer of 1524, Balthasar Hubmaier's Taufbüchlein of 1525, with its motto "Die Wahrheit is untödtlich," Menno Simons' tract Of the Cross of Christ (of 1556), the Hutterite Chronicle with its long list of martyrs and its special register of all these witnesses to truth, and finally the numerous martyrs' books (q.v.), ending with van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror of 1660. The Ausbund and the Hutterite Lieder, as well as the numerous Dutch Mennonite hymnals, likewise contain ample material in this regard; in fact all evangelical Anabaptists are one in this basic outlook, theology, vision, or whatever this position might be called. A summary of the main ideas of Stauffer's essay follows.

(1) "The path of martyrdom of the people of God through history." The 45th hymn of the Ausbund (by Hans Büchel) has the characteristic title: "A new hymn in which a disciple laments because he met tribulations for the sake of God's Word; but the Lord answers kindly by telling him how He has fared in this world." This hymn very well reflects the mood and outlook of a typical Anabaptist believer. He is supposed to have "the patience and faith of the saints" (Rev. 13:10; see Gelassenheit), understanding that he is one in an endless tradition of fighters for God who thus challenge the prince of this world, and reach victory only through the Cross. Menno Simons' great tract Of the Cross explains this necessity in so many words: expect the Cross and be glad, for suffering (for the sake of Truth) is the sign of election. Letters and hymns produced on the eve of execution abundantly show this generally accepted attitude and faith, for which God is more real and concrete than anything else on this earth.

The Cross is the measure and the center of all Anabaptist "theology of martyrdom." No escape into a religion of either pure inwardness (like Pietism, q.v.) or of pure spiritualism (like the Spiritual Reformers, q.v., or later the Quakers, q.v.) appears possible from this point of view. "The Anabaptist apocalypse of martyrdom is the testimony of a theological realism to which God is more real than anything called world" (MQR, 204). In the great controversy between Pilgram Marpeck and Caspar Schwenckfeld, for instance (to Stauffer apparently not yet known), the distinction is well formulated: while Schwenckfeld seeks the "halo of glory," Marpeck knows that the disciple will find nothing but a "crown of thorns" (Marpeck, Verantwortung, 160).

(2) "The apocalyptic interpretation of persecution." The new world epoch or aeon, the kingdom of God, which began with Jesus Christ, stands altogether under the sign of the Cross. However, Christ's disciples possess also the great promise of the "Holy Remnant" (as the prophets of old called it); they will inherit the kingdom and will see how those who once persecuted them now will find their bitter reward, namely, closed doors to the new and shining realm. The martyr stands in the center of a battle of two aeons (see, e.g., the Ausbund, 78th hymn); life is nothing but "the warfare of the Cross" (Menno Simons), which must be carried out to its very end. The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the coming aeon, martyrdom is actually victory over the victor. And this triumph was foretold long ago in Rev. 1:7, "They shall see whom they have pierced."

At this place a word of caution might be appropriate. Although the basic theology of the Anabaptists seems to have centered around this idea of the two aeons (the "City of God" vs. the "City of the Devil"), it would yet be erroneous to assume that the Anabaptists were radical believers in apocalypses, such as adventists or millennialists. Nothing is further from their thought. They almost never speculated about "the end" (with perhaps the exception of Melchior Hofmann, q.v., and to some extent Hans Hut, q.v.). At all times they were more concerned with the narrow path to be walked on than with the goal to be expected. Of course, this path receives its meaning and justification from this particular "theology of history." In a sense they felt that their walking the narrow path and their obedience to God's commandments realized already in the here and now some aspects of the coming aeon. That becomes especially clear in Stauffer's third section of his study,

(3) "Baptism, Confession and Defenselessness." Anneken of Rotterdam's moving "Testament to her infant son" (1539, Mart. Mir. D 48-50, E 453 f.) serves as a fine illustration that the life and death of an Anabaptist receives its deeper meaning alone through this "theology of martyrdom." Baptism is the sealing unto suffering and death. Conrad Grebel said the same in his letter to Thomas Müntzer. Occasionally martyrdom is called "the dubbing of the retainer of Christ." It is always understood as the Bundessiegel, the seal of the covenant of God with His people.

Confessions with Anabaptists are something basically different from the formulated creedal systems (called Confessions of Faith) of the established churches. For the Anabaptists they are rather testimonies in the old sense of being statements of the "confessors of faith," that is, expressions of their concrete and substantial faith. "I shall testify with my blood," said a martyr in the early days, "what I have taught and confessed with my mouth."

Defenselessness, nonresistance, and "Gelassenheit" are then the natural consequences of such a martyr attitude. Compare Menno Simons' pertinent passages in his tract Of the Cross (Works, p. 184 f.). The disciples of Christ are sent out like sheep among wolves (Grebel), and must accept their fate with true yieldedness to the will of God. It is taken for granted that no Anabaptist can ever wield a sword. Naturally, he will be obedient to the authorities of this world as long as no conflict arises with his own conscience. Beyond that he is bound to deny such obedience since he is bound to a higher authority. Actually, he is already living in a world of a different dimension, and therefore stands under its laws rather than under those of this world.

Critical Evaluation. When Stauffer's article was published in 1945, the editor of the Mennonite Quarterly Review, Harold S. Bender, wrote a lengthy editorial (178) in which he claimed that in a certain sense this "theology of martyrdom" is no "theology" at all. This set of ideas certainly moves the disciple to his fight, but it does not tell concretely what he is fighting for. "We must look elsewhere for a statement of the positive contents of the faith for which the Anabaptist bleeds and dies." Thus Stauffer's study gives us the background or mood of the Anabaptist movement rather than its very theme. If genuine Anabaptist theology is to be recovered, our search has to go on until a proper formulation of the positive contents is found. H. S. Bender's own suggestion of a "theology of discipleship," to be sure, may find a somewhat similar criticism, namely, that discipleship, likewise, is not really a "theology" in the proper sense of the term. But it seems that in the background of both discipleship and martyrdom there may easily be found a common denominator which gives meaning and content to both. And that is the dualistic idea of the "two realms" (or cities): that of God and that of the prince of this world. Tentatively one could call this idea the "theology of the kingdom" (q.v.). It is true that the Anabaptists rather seldom developed this theme; yet it is still their basic outlook. Only upon such an idea of two different dimensions of the world (or of human existence) will the idea of martyrdom assume meaning, answering the eternal question, "Why is it that the just (or the saint) must suffer at all times?" The Christian answer will always have an eschatological if not a downright apocalyptic aspect. It is the philosophy of history of the Christian, or (from another angle) his dynamic theology of salvation.

In general, it may be said that the idea of the suffering church (or the church under the Cross) is a part of the very core of the Anabaptist genius, without which the entire problem of evangelical Anabaptism cannot be understood nor can it be properly demarcated against related Christian movements such as Pietism and Spiritualism. (See also Concerning a True Soldier of Christ; Eusebius; Gelassenheit.) R.F.

E. Stauffer, "The Anabaptist Theology of Martyrdom," MQR XIX (1945) 179-214; H. W. Meihuizen has published a number of important studies on the theology of the martyrs as found in the Offer des Heeren: "De Geloofswereld onzer Martelaren, voor zover die af te lezen valt uit het Offer des Heeren," in Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad V (1951) Nos. 35-50; see also Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 247-69; A. Orley Swartzentruber, "The Piety and Theology of the Anabaptist Martyrs in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror," MQR XXVIII (1954) 5-26, 128-42.

Martyrs, derived from the Greek martys (witness), are blood witnesses; i.e., persons who, clinging to their convictions, suffered the blood penalty. Usage has limited the word in general to apply only to those who suffered a violent death for their convictions. Socrates was, for instance, a pre-Christian martyr.

The Christian martyrs are blood witnesses, who suffered violent deaths for the sake of their Christian faith. This concept of martyrdom presupposes that the penalty was not applied for insurrection or any other crime, but was based on the victim's religious faith. There are martyrs in this sense only where religious persecution reigns. This was the case in the early centuries after Christ until Constantine's recognition of Christianity. The first Christian martyrs were the victims of Jewish persecution (Stephen, Acts 7, and James, Acts 12). An incomparably larger number found death at the hands of the pagan government of the Roman Empire.

1. Christian Martyrs in the Christian State. When the Catholic Church, with the aid of the government, developed into a strong organization, martyrdom did not cease, as one might suppose. Instead, the large church, having won recognition, now applied the very methods of suppression which it had formerly suffered, to all extra-ecclesiastical groups that refused to recognize its creed, its power politics, and its lax moral standards. There were therefore martyrs at once among the heretics (q.v.), or those who in general opposed the prevailing church doctrine. The first victim of this kind was Priscillian together with six others in 385, who were publicly executed at Trier. The Donatists (q.v.), against whom Augustine counseled violent measures, had many martyrs. To a much larger extent this was true of the Waldenses (q.v.) and Albigenses (q.v.), especially after the Inquisition was instituted as a permanent ecclesiastical court, operated with state aid, which caused a terrifying number to lose their lives far into the Reformation, including also Lutheran and Reformed "heretics."

The real martyr church of the Reformation period and long after was the Anabaptist. The development of this movement in the first centuries after its inception cannot be separated from this fact. There was no religious movement that was so radically suppressed at that time as the Anabaptist movement. Catholic and Protestant government and clergy with few exceptions attempted to exterminate it by the same methods.

2. Executions in Catholic Countries. In the Catholic countries the Inquisition was in full authority. It was expressly recognized by the temporal government, which offered its arm to carry out its verdicts. Numerous state regulations threatened every Anabaptist with death. Members of the two large Reformation parties were also threatened with severe punishment, but the full severity of the law was not always applied. "In Bavaria and in Austria and also in the domain of the Swabian League not only their supposed connection with Lutheranism, but also adult baptism per se and the assumption that they were the originators of the Peasants' War and born revolutionaries brought the most cruel punishment upon them. Whereas in Austria the death penalty was not always carried out against the Lutherans in consideration of the nobility, there was no such deterrent against ruthless measures for Anabaptists, such as imprisonment, torture, beheading, drowning, hanging, and burning, usually without a proper trial" (K. Müller, II, 1, p. 332). Precisely in these Catholic lands the Anabaptists were often more numerous than the Lutherans or Reformed. The latter frequently were afraid to promote their doctrine without state protection, whereas the Anabaptists, who were almost nowhere tolerated, spread rapidly everywhere as a movement whose center of gravity lay in the laity.

3. Blood Witnesses Under Protestant Government. It is a conspicuous fact that there were Anabaptist martyrs also in Protestant countries. One would have expected that there would be no room for the persecution of dissenters in places where protest against Roman tyranny was so strong. But the Anabaptists were even here by no means tolerated. They were therefore the only martyrs in these regions. There were, to be sure, voices raised to oppose this kind of suppression of religious convictions and to warn of the danger inherent in it. Luther was at first of this opinion. Other reformers also wanted God's Word to be the sole judge in religious matters. But when this method did not accomplish their aim they took another course (see Punishment). In the Netherlands, after Roman Catholicism had been largely replaced by Calvinism, no Mennonite was put to death. In the Southern Netherlands (now Belgium) executions ceased at the end of the 16th century, because Mennonitism had been nearly extirpated.

4. Reasons for the Persecution. What were the real reasons for this course of action against the Anabaptists? The sentence passed on Anneken Heyndricks (q.v.) in Amsterdam in 1571 may show us what the "capital crimes" were. A verbatim excerpt from the criminal records of the city, which is given by van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 538, E 874), follows:

"Whereas Anneken Hendrik's daughter, alias Anna de Vlaster, formerly citizeness of this city, at present a prisoner here, unmindful of her soul's salvation and the obedience which she owed to our mother the holy church and his royal majesty, as her natural lord and prince, rejecting the ordinances of the holy church, has neither been to confession, nor to the holy, worthy sacrament for six or seven years since, (but has dared) to go into the assembly of the reprobated sect of the Mennonists, or Anabaptists, and has also held conventicles or meetings at her house; and has further, about three years ago, forsaking and renouncing the baptism received in her infancy from the holy church, been rebaptized, and then received the breaking of bread according to the manner of the Mennonist sect, and was married to her present husband in Mennonist manner, at night, in a country house; and though she, the prisoner, has, by my lords of the court, as well as by divers ecclesiastical persons, been urged and repeatedly admonished to leave the aforementioned reprobated sect, and she nevertheless refuses to do it, persisting in her obstinacy and stubbornness, so that she, the prisoner, according to what has been mentioned, has committed crime against divine and human majesty, as by said sect disturbing the common peace and welfare of the land, according to the import of the decrees of his majesty, existing in regard to this; which misdemeanors, for an example unto others, ought not to go unpunished; therefore, my lords of the court, having heard the demand of my lord the bailiff, seen the confession of the prisoner, and having had regard to her obstinacy and stubbornness, have condemned her, and condemn her by these presents, to be, according to the decrees of his royal majesty, executed with fire, and declare all her property confiscated for the benefit of his majesty aforesaid. Done in court on the 10th of November, in the year 1571, in the presence of the judges, by the advice of all the burgomasters, in my knowledge, as secretary, and as was subscribed: W. Pietersz."

This sentence is typical of many. It contains a long series of charges raised against the Mennonites: neglect of public church attendance and confession, communion, participation in Mennonite services, adult baptism and communion "in the Mennonite manner," marriage within the brotherhood, and stubborn resistance toward conversion attempts.

All of this deals with purely religious matters. But adhering to this faith made one suspect politically and was labeled as disobedience not only to the church, but also to the state. This shows how closely hand in hand the state worked with the church. In its cross-examinations the state used the clergy, who frequently engaged in lively dispute with the Mennonites. But in order to induce the state to take aggressive action, great stress was put on the political danger and on the religious obligation to take action against that sort of "blasphemy."

This verdict is also of legal interest, in that it illustrates how the violation of the regulations and mandates against the Mennonites could at all times be the incontestable basis for severe action against them. The fact that the injustice was of earlier date, that is, before the passing of these mandates, which bound the conscience and which in every instance overstepped the boundaries of state authority, was consistently ignored.

In very many instances punishment was made easier by applying all sorts of slander and false generalizations without examination. There was no hesitation in attributing the grossest excesses to these people, who actually insisted very earnestly on moral conduct. The events in Münster, with which the quiet Anabaptists had nothing in common, were applied without distinction to all Mennonites. The few aberrations, which accompany any movement, were considered characteristic of the entire movement. The chronicle of the Hutterian Brethren (Wolkan, 187) contains this passage on the subject:

"On all sides many slanders and evil words were given out about them, and obvious lies, as that they had goat feet and ox hooves and that if they gave people a drink from a small bottle, the people would have to act as they did. The lie was also circulated that they had their wives in common, that everything was in confusion. Likewise that they kidnaped children and ate them, they were accused of stealing people and of breaking up marriages, because frequently one party of the marriage left the unbelieving party who would not follow, and go to the brotherhood. Yea, they were called Anabaptists, garden brethren, deceivers, sectarians, revolutionaries, fanatics, and the most terrible things."

Special efforts were made to dispose of the leaders, in the hope that the movement could thus be smothered. Most of these died a violent death, as Felix Manz, Michael Sattler, Balthasar Hubmaier, Hans Hut, George Blaurock, Eitelhans Langenmantel, and others. But owing to the priesthood of the believer, which they held and practiced, the loss of their leaders was not sufficient to stop the movement. To be sure, the absence of their influence may have contributed to the rise of radical elements here and there, who were guilty of excesses which a thoughtful leadership would have prevented (Münster).

5. Modes of Execution. The methods of execution offer a picture of inhuman cruelty. The intention was that they should have a deterrent effect on the populace. Torture was often applied, principally to extort from the victims information about their brethren, where they stayed and where they met, or to force them to recant. The Hutterian chronicle has a graphic description of these methods (Wolkan, 184):

"Some were racked until the sun could have shone through them, so that some were torn and died, some were burned to ashes under the name of heretic, some roasted on pillars, some torn with glowing tongs, some locked into houses and all burned together, some hanged to trees, but some executed with the sword, killed and cut to pieces. Many were gagged or had their tongues tied so that they should be unable to speak or defend themselves, and were thus led to death. . . . Like lambs they were led to the slaughter in droves and murdered according to Satan's kind and nature. . . ."

In the execution of the Anabaptists and Mennonites medieval methods of capital punishment were maintained. The following practices were used to put the victims to death; in most cases burning at the stake both for men and women; sometimes the victims were not burned alive but were first strangled; in the Netherlands occasionally a little sack of gunpowder was placed around the martyr's neck to shorten the death struggle. When a "heretic" recanted, he nevertheless was put to death; in these cases men were usually beheaded and women drowned. But martyrs who remained loyal were sometimes also beheaded or drowned. It was the instruction both of Charles V and Philip II, that male heretics were to be decapitated and females drowned, but often men were drowned and women beheaded. Sometimes the victims were executed by being hanged. In a few cases also women martyrs were buried alive. It is not clear whether these awful practices were regulated after a certain method. Apparently the mood of the judges was decisive as to the method of execution.

The executions took place publicly; but in the course of time there were a large number of secret executions, because the crowds gathered around the execution places often showed sympathy with the victims and not seldom revolted against the executioner, the officers, and the Catholic priests, who were always present. Secret executions were numerous at Antwerp and Gent, Belgium.

6. The Number of the Anabaptist Martyrs. The number cannot be determined with any certainty. Documentary evidence has been preserved only in part, some of it probably intentionally destroyed. In the "Anabaptist hunts" in the territory of the Swabian League and in the Netherlands as well as in other regions where regular trials were dispensed with, there was most likely no record of even the names or number of victims. Nevertheless an attempt has been made to determine the number from oral and written sources. For the Netherlands, Samuel Cramer has conservatively set the number at 1,500 (DB 1902, 150 ff.). He based this figure on the fairly complete records of Antwerp and Gent, estimating the number in the other provinces on this basis, which should yield a sufficiently reliable result. W. J. Kühler also surmised that the number of martyrs was at least 1,500 (Geschiedenis I, 270); N. van der Zijpp (Geschiedenis, 77) is of the opinion that the number of martyrs in Belgium and in the Netherlands should be estimated as at least 2,500, on the basis of his studies on Mennonite martyrdom in the Netherlands. The best collection of data on the fate and testimonies of the martyrs is found in the Martyrs' Mirror (q.v.) by Tieleman J. van Braght, who lists about 800 Anabaptist martyrs by name. A larger number is given in summary form, because data and names were lacking. This ENCYCLOPEDIA gives brief articles on all known martyrs.

For South Germany the list in the Hutterite Geschicht-Buch is of particular importance. According to the list given in Beck (q.v., pp. 278 ff.) the number of martyrs up to the year 1581 was 2,169. But the numbers given for the individual districts do not agree with this figure, totaling only 1,396. It is not clear how this difference is to be explained. (For Tirol the list of 1581 gives the number as 338, whereas a government declaration of Nov. 11, 1539, set the number of Anabaptists executed at over 600. —Hege.) Wolkan presents a list that deviates in some instances from the above, and gives a total of 1,580 martyrs by 1542. Beck has on page 310 an additional list that was found on Julius Lober (q.v.) in 1531, listing 390 martyrs.

None of these lists can claim to be exhaustive; in Beck all the executions recorded in the court records in Switzerland, and in Wolkan some of them, are lacking, nor can they offer absolute reliability, since they are sometimes based on oral information, as in the case of the 350 in Alzey (see Palatinate) and the 600 who were said by Sebastian Franck to have been executed at Ensisheim (q.v.). Nevertheless the total must not be underestimated, and would probably exceed rather than fall below 4,000.

The first Anabaptist execution was not perpetrated in 1527 (Felix Manz, q.v.), as has hitherto been asserted, but in 1525 when Eberli Bolt (q.v.) died at the stake in Schwyz. Bolt was an Anabaptist, but was executed in a Catholic canton for being a Protestant.

7. Steadfastness and Courage of the Anabaptists. Steadfast and willing to endure the supreme sacrifice, most of the martyrs went to their death with cheerful countenance and with a prayer on their lips. Men and women, occasionally children, were unwavering in their loyalty to their faith. Naturally they did not push themselves into martyrdom. But they did not purchase their freedom by denying their convictions, which were based on God's Word, when they were in the hands of their persecutors. Neither skilled argument, nor severity, nor kindness confused them. "Many were promised great gifts and wealth if they would recant, or splendid benefices, or power and office. Others were asked to say only a little word as desired of them, and they would be released. But they would not accept dishonorable release. Some were told merely to utter an oath, indeed only a small oath, to gain their release. . . . With many they dealt strangely, . . . day and night with great cunning and slyness, also with many sweet and smooth words by monks and priests, . . . with much false doctrine and testimony, with much threatening . . . and slander, also with lies and terrible reviling, but this did not cause them dismay" (Wolkan, 185 f.). There were, however, a considerable number of recantations.

8. What Was the Source of Their Strength? Full of admiration, indeed frequently full of consternation, the people and sometimes the executioners witnessed the steadfastness and the courage of the martyrs. Whence came the strength to endure all this? This question is raised in many writings of the Reformation period, and its answer was not always easy. Luther, who had once thought quite differently concerning the Inquisition and the execution of John Huss, saw in their joy a delusion of hell; likewise did Faber of Heilbronn (see the significant quotation in the article Faber). Justus Menius (q.v.), the passionate opponent of the Anabaptists, could hardly conceal his amazement at the courage of several Anabaptists, nevertheless he explained it as impudence and foolhardiness. "For it can very easily happen that such a desperate, hard-hearted man in his damnable unbelief is as stiff and defiant, indeed much stiffer and more defiant than a holy, pious Christian in his true faith. . . ."—"The whole world has of course seen with what brash frivolity the poor people died, who were executed . . . at Rheinhardsbrunn" (see Kolb, Andreas) (Der ander Teil, 314).

The Anabaptists had a different idea of the source of their strength. "They could freely say with the holy apostle Paul: Who can separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? Rom. 8:35. But they found and showed it to be true that according to the testimony of the apostle, neither death, nor life, nor things present, nor things to come, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus. Through this love they overcame all things and performed glorious deeds beyond the power of man" (Mart. Mir. D 542, E 356).

The martyrs had the unshakable certainty of being on the right road, which God had unequivocally shown them in the Holy Scriptures. Their knowledge of the Bible, revealed in their trials and other oral and written expressions, is amazing. During their persecution they had learned that this life cannot be the final fulfillment. Hence they saw even in a martyr's death the transition to a fuller and richer life. "Their holy spirit regarded the things that happen in the world as a shadow, assured of better things. Thus they were taught by God not to know anything, nor to seek anything but the eternal heavenly possession alone" (Beck, XXI).

Furthermore the martyrs lived in the conviction that true followers of Christ must necessarily draw upon themselves the hatred of the world. As they took all the sayings and demands of the Bible seriously, so also did they regard the experiences of Jesus and the apostles in the world, which they foretold for all true Christians. All expressions of principle concerning martyrdom refer to Christ's suffering and death as Lord and example to the church. Martyrdom was for them the inevitable consequence of witnessing to the truth. Nowhere is this so clearly expressed as in Menno Simons' booklet to his oppressed brethren, Of the Cross of Christ. Since the truth evokes hatred and persecution, therefore these are evidence of walking in the truth. Thus the temptations of martyrdom serve to make the victims so much the surer and firmer in their conviction. The assurance that even in suffering they were in communion with Christ gave them joy and called forth thanks for being counted worthy of suffering death for His sake.

But in spite of all their courage and steadfastness the martyrs were free of fanaticism. Of the letters printed in the Martyrs' Mirror many are written to wife, children, or relatives. They do not treat the natural bonds of marriage and family with contempt. They commend their dear ones to the loving care of the brotherhood, and mention how difficult it is to leave them alone. This feeling comes to graphic expression in a letter written by Hendrik Verstralen (Mart. Mir. D 542, E 877): "The only and eternal God . . . keep you, my dearest wife and sister in the Lord, my flesh, my bone, the dearest among all creatures on earth. For this I have confessed more than once before the lords, if the whole world were mine, I would give it, if I could keep my wife and children with a good conscience; but for the Lord's sake I must now contrary to nature forsake everything—the spirit must overcome the flesh. O my Janneken, my lamb, how hard it is for me to part from you and the children! Oh, how deep you are buried in my heart; which is now a great conflict for me; may the Lord help me to gain the victory, so that the crown of life may be prepared for me with all the elect saints of God, who have forsaken everything for the Lord's sake."

The petition for strength to endure, found in this letter and repeated in many others, is a sign of the sobriety of the martyrs, as is also their prayer for forgiveness of sins. They did not share in the error that a martyr's death would in itself assure God's grace or be of special merit. The wish for martyrdom therefore was far from their minds. They did not consider it treason to the cause to avoid the catchpolls as long as possible. Menno himself by no means walked carelessly into the arms of those who had set a price upon his head.

Because they were fully aware of the seriousness of death for Christ's sake they did not hesitate to urge upon their judges the responsibility for their wicked conduct. Like the voice of an Old Testament prophet sounds the cry of Hans Blietel (Blüetl, q.v.): "Repent, reform, and desist from your unrighteous, wicked, and vicious life; for if you do not do this, the eternal God will visit you for your sins, and He shall require the innocent blood at your hands, and punish you for it" (Mart. Mir. D 72, E 473 f.).

The frequency of martyrdom in their time and the prophecies concerning it in the Bible convinced them that the end time was approaching. Persecution of the truth in itself they regarded as evidence that the power of Antichrist was at work, and so it is not surprising to find that they viewed their persecutors as representatives of Antichrist, an idea that Luther expresses frequently in relation to the papacy.

9. The Effects of Martyrdom. The consequences of the martyrdom of the Anabaptists are of enormous significance. First of all this is true for the movement itself. The blood of the martyrs was the seed of the Anabaptist congregations. "Persecution contributed greatly to the spread of Anabaptism. The believers, driven from city to city, everywhere laid the foundation for new beginnings. Everywhere the simple manner of proclamation, the touching cohesion of the members among themselves, the earnest and strict life of the adherents, the thousands of joyous and simple martyrdoms, the wonderful poetry that grew out of the bloody persecution and constant danger of death, and the feeling that this condition was the seal of true Christianity, were extremely effective" (K. Müller, 333). In precisely those places where the movement was met with the greatest tolerance, as in the realm of Philip of Hesse, it was soon extinct.

Martyrdom gave Anabaptist literature its strongest incentives, especially in hymnology (q.v.). (See Het Offer, Lietboecxken, Ausbund.)

Toward the outside martyrdom was the most effective propaganda for the new movement. The man of the common people, with his natural sensibilities, was not blinded by the artificial attempts of the judges to justify their conduct.

One of the last formal executions was that of Hans Landis (q.v.) on Sept. 20, 1614, at Zürich. Nevertheless many other Mennonites died in the following years as a result of bad treatment in prison. These must be included at least indirectly among the martyrs. The last martyr in the Netherlands died in 1574, and the last in Belgium in 1597.

Growing scruples against the death penalty for heretics, the obvious ineffectiveness of the severe measures, frequently also political necessity, led to the abandonment of the death penalty. At that point Mennonite history ceases to be martyr history. Toleration and complete religious freedom were by no means achieved, at least not in many countries. Once more under the Communist rule in Russia hundreds of Mennonites are estimated to have perished. It was, of course, not persecution for their Mennonitism, but punishment for being Christian is usually given a political veneer. But "God knows how many lost their lives in Russia, according to the verdict of the Soviet merely as reactionaries. But their rejection of much that a government separated from God asked of these alleged reactionaries stemmed from their inner relationship to God" (Kroeker). (See the article Martyrdom, Theology of.) P.S.

K. Müller, Kirchengeschichte II (Tübingen, 1911, II, 2, 1919); Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; J. Kroeker, Das Bekenntnis der russischen Märtyrerkirche (Berlin, 1936); Mart. Mir. passim; Der ander Teil der Bücher D. Martin Luthers (Wittenberg, 1551); A. Orley Swartzentruber, "The Piety and Theology of the Anabaptist Martyrs in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror," MQR XXVIII (1954) 5-26, 128-42; I. M. J. Hoog, De Martelaren der Hervorming in Nederland (Schiedam, 1885); Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 245-77; N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 59-77; ML III, 44-49.

Martyrs (Russia). The suffering of the Mennonites behind the Iron Curtain (1917-) has been called "martyrdom." A. A. Töws collected materials on this subject and published them under the title Mennonitische Martyrer der jüngsten Vergangenheit und der Gegenwart (2 vv., 1949 and 1954). Certainly never since the days of the 16th-century persecution of the Anabaptists have their descendants suffered so severely as they have under modern Communism since its establishment in 1917. Hundreds have been executed and many thousands have perished in prisons, slave labor camps, and concentration camps (q.v.). Although much has been done to gather the accounts of the suffering, the death, and the witness of this most recent "martyrdom" among Mennonites, no systematic study exists along these lines. Considerable material has been collected in addition to the two volumes by Töws. The Canadian Mennonite periodicals contain much information, as do also the numerous books which have been published by Mennonites and non-Mennonites dealing with this question. Much more should be done to obtain all possible information from those who have escaped the death of "martyrdom" and are now living in Western Europe, Canada, or South America. Most important for a systematic study of this question would be an investigation of the accounts by survivors in Russia, to obtain information about the number that perished, details about their suffering and death, and the testimony and results of their death.

One of the basic questions arising in the investigation of the martyrdom of Mennonites or any other religious group behind the Iron Curtain is the degree to which their suffering has been due to their faith in God. Did they originally not, above all, suffer because they belonged to a certain social and economic group, regardless of their religious affiliation or convictions? Many of the Mennonites who died during the early days of the Revolution were well-to-do individuals of the bourgeoisie, the prosperous class, which according to the Marxist theory had to be liquidated in order to usher in the classless society of a social utopia. Though these revolutionary Marxists were as a rule also antireligious, they were in most cases annihilating an enemy on a political and economic battlefield. That these sufferings were borne with the courage and the testimony of a Christian in many cases is a fact and is to the credit of those who had enjoyed days of prosperity and now with Job experienced the presence of the Lord in a more real sense while they were led through the valley of death.

The real antireligious persecution came later with the liquidation of the "kulaks" in 1929 ff. Lenin relaxed the original plans of socializing the country overnight. After his death Stalin proceeded with collectivization and the liquidation of the kulaks (i.e., those who would possibly be opposed to the collectivization, etc.). Many thousands of Mennonites were sent to concentration and slave labor camps in 1933-38. Some were executed. Among these kulaks were many ministers and other sincere Christians. Simultaneously the organized church life of the communities was checked by taxing ministers and church buildings so heavily that services had to be discontinued. Again many ministers and faithful church members were imprisoned and exiled. Also many of the Mennonite teachers, who were accustomed to express their Christian convictions daily in their classroom work, were deprived of their position or exiled. The teachers as a class suffered possibly just as much as the ministers. In fact, since in many instances they combined these two professions, many a teacher was dismissed because he was also a minister. No one will ever be able to measure the cup of suffering endured for the sake of their faith by these two professions, which were hit hardest during the trying years. But again we cannot simply label all the sufferings they endured as 100 per cent religious martyrdom. Former economic status, social and cultural affiliations, and at times their German background were probably counted against them as much as their deeply rooted Christian convictions.

Some of these who were well-known leaders and confessors and are known to have died as a result of the suffering inflicted upon them during these trying years are D. J. Classen, H. H. Dirks, A. A. Dück, B. B. Dyck, H. H. Ediger, S. S. Ediger, H. H. Funk, A. A. Klassen, Johann Martens, K. K. Martens, J. A. Rempel, J. J. Wiebe, etc. Biographies of these and others are included in the ENCYCLOPEDIA.

C.K.

Bethel College Historical Library, Displaced Persons File; Der Bote 1923- ; Die Mennonitische Rundschau, 1923- . A. A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer I (Winnipeg, 1949), II (North Clearbrook, 1954); D. Dalin and B. Nicolaevsky, Forced Labor in Soviet Russia (New Haven, 1947).

Martyrs, Anonymous. There were a number of Anabaptist-Mennonite martyrs whose names have not been preserved, and about whose fate, testimony, and sufferings nothing is known. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror occasionally mentions large numbers of anonymous martyrs. Delbert Gratz (Bernese Anabaptists) mentions eight martyrs whose names are not known, executed at Bern, Switzerland, in 1530-32. Concerning a few of these pious anonymous persons there is some information.

A man from Vueren (Veurne, Furnes in Belgium?) was executed there and died loyally for his faith. This happened (according to the Dutch martyrbook of 1615) in 1553. He was commemorated in the hymn, "In bitterheyt der sielen, claghe ick dit jammer groot" (In bitterness of soul I lament this great distress). This song, No. 11 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, was very popular among the Dutch Mennonites and was sung until the 18th century. It has been included in a number of Dutch hymnals, including Veelderhande Liedekens of 1569 and also Stapel's Lusthof der Zielen (q.v.), until the last (7th) edition of 1743. (Offer, 547-50; Wackernagel, Lieder, 139; Wolkan, Lieder, 62, 78.)

Verheyden mentions some anonymous martyrs at Gent, Belgium. On Aug. 27, 1568, a man was burned at the stake outside the Muyde-poorte. Another martyr, a native of Merendree, was burned on Feb. 6, 1569, in the territory of Gent St-Pieters, and two others on Aug. 2, 1569, on the Vrijdagsmarkt. A woman was also burned at the stake on Oct. 3, 1569. (Verheyden, Gent, 48, No. 153; 51, No. 169; 53, Nos. 175-76; 55, No. 181.)

Génard reports on the following anonymous martyrs at Antwerp, Belgium: a Mennonite man, burned at the stake on Oct. 12, 1569, because "he persisted in his false creed" (Antw. Arch.-Blad XII, 420; XIV, 70 f., No. 787); another Mennonite man, burned at the stake on the market place on Sept. 10, 1571, while "persisting in his false opinions" (ibid. XIII, 77; XIV, 86 f., No. 971); an unknown woman, burned at the stake on May 18, 1573, on the market place of Antwerp, because of her Mennonite opinions (ibid. XIII, 111; XIV, 90 f., No. 1020). Willem Bax mentions two women who were executed at Gangelt, near Millen, in 1556 and a man who was drowned in the neighboring Waldfeucht about 1558. vdZ.

Delbert Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1954) 20 ff., Nos. 5, 6, 9, 26, 27, 30, 31, 33; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik . . . II (The Hague, 1941) 364 f.

Martyrs' Mirror. In 1660 a stately volume of 1290 pages appeared, entitled Het Bloedig Tooneel Der Doops-gesinde, En Weereloose Christenen. Die/om het getuygenisse Jesu hares Salighmaeckers/geleden hebben/en gedoodt zijn/van Christi tijdt af/tot dese onse laetste tijden toe. Mitsgaders, Een beschrijvinge der H. Doops, ende andere stucken van den Godsdienst, door alle de selve geoeffent. Begrepen in Twee Boecken. Zijnde een vergrootinge van den voorgaenden Martelaers-Spiegel, uyt vele geloofweerdige Chronijcken/Memorien/Getuygenissen/etc. Door T. J. V. B. Gedruckt tot Dordrecht, by Jacob Braat, Voor Jacobus Savry, woonende in 't Kasteel van Gendt. In 't Jaer 1660. The author was Tieleman Jansz van Braght (q.v.), the elder of the Flemish Mennonite congregation at Dordrecht. The preface of the book is signed "Dordrecht July 23, 1659." The Introduction contains in succession (1) a note of the printers to the readers; (2) a note of van Braght to his "dear friends and companions in Jesus Christ, our Saviour"; (3) a general address to the readers; (4) a short summary of the book; (5) a treatise, "The true church of God and its Origin, Expansion and Immovable Stability Through all Centuries"—in this section are found the three major confessions of the Dutch Mennonites; viz., the Olyftacxken (q.v.) of 1627, that of Jan Cents (q.v.) of 1630, and the Dordrecht Confession (q.v.) of 1632; (6) a treatise concerning the ungodly and false church; (7) a laudatory poem by Cornelis van Braght, entitled "Martyrs' Crown for Jesus Christ the Saviour and those Nonresistant Crossbearers who Follow in His Train."

Van Braght's martyr book, usually called in Dutch the Martelaersspiegel, i.e., Martyrs' Mirror (this word actually appears first in the second edition, 1685) is divided into two parts. Part I, containing 450 pages, followed by an index, deals with Christian martyrdom from the time of Christ to 1500, although in its last chapter (pp. 397-408) a number of later martyrs are found, who like Christian Gasteyger and Thomas van Imbroek (q.v.), whose confession is inserted here, suffered because of their rejection of infant baptism. Part I concludes with a "confession of faith according to the Holy Word of God" in 33 articles. Part II (840 pp.) contains (1) Preface, (2) Introduction, and (3) three laudatory poems, followed by an index and the accounts of the Anabaptist and Mennonite martyrs, beginning with Hans Koch and Leonhard Meyster (these two men were, however, not Anabaptists). In this part van Braght deals with 803 named martyrs, 613 of whom were executed in the Netherlands and Belgium, and 190 in other European countries. Besides these a large number of anonymous martyrs are mentioned.

At the outset van Braght, as he writes in the Introduction, only intended to re-edit the Dutch martyr book of 1631, amplified by some new material, but gradually it became clear to him that the work should be entirely rewritten. Van Braght's sources were: first the existing Dutch martyr books, in particular the Martelaersspiegel of 1631. But the number of martyrs was increased by the studies he made in other works of church history, and by information he secured from archives, e.g., those of the cities of Dordrecht and Amsterdam. He also received valuable information from Switzerland and Germany. Hence he was able not only to verify and to add to previous information and to insert a large number of official documents with authentic court sentences, but also to give accounts of many martyrs hitherto unknown.

Of course, the masterly work of van Braght is neither complete nor without error. He did not do scholarly work in the method of modern historiography, and too often he uncritically inserted accounts without checking them. There are mistakes, both in the names of the martyrs and in the dates of their execution. Some martyrs are named twice. The question has arisen whether van Braght may have falsified history. This accusation was made by Christian Schotanus in Van de Gronden der Mennisterij (Leeuwarden, 1671), while Hermann Haupt called the Martyrs' Mirror a prejudiced book, composed mostly from impure sources (DB 1899, 72; ML III, 53). W. Wilde, a Dutch Roman Catholic, attacked van Braght in two papers published in Studiën (1877, 1-88; 1894, 270-332) and in Zonderlinge Critiek (Amsterdam, 1900). (See DB 1899, 70-72; 1900, 192-210.) Also Karel Vos (DB 1917, 161, 170-74) and recently A. F. Mellink (Wederdopers, 419 and passim) accused van Braght of partiality. But Samuel Cramer proved (DB 1899, 65-164; 1900, 184-210) that van Braght, though sometimes too unsuspecting and naive, and a few times careless, may in general be called reliable. Those who criticized van Braght and accused him of omitting a large number of Anabaptists who were executed, forget that van Braght only wanted to list such martyrs as gave testimony to a Biblical faith and held the strict nonresistant principles. For this reason he excluded all those Anabaptists put to death because of their religious convictions who had contacts with or were influenced by the Münsterite or other revolutionary principles, though occasionally a few Münsterites were inserted in the Martyrs' Mirror, of whose real opinions van Braght was not aware. The fact that van Braght, a champion of Trinitarianism and averse to all kind of Unitarianism, did not do justice to a martyr like Herman van Vlekwijk (q.v.) is a shortcoming in his work, which is, however, excusable not only on the basis of his personal convictions, but also by the fact that the martyr book of 1626 had likewise omitted a few sentences from the accounts of some anti-Trinitarian martyrs. The same explicable imperfection may be noted concerning the doctrine of the Incarnation. In summary it may be said that van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror is a reliable, trustworthy book, as has been stated not only by Cramer, but also by other outstanding historians like Ludwig Keller, Chr. Sepp, J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, F. van der Haeghen, Adolf Fluri, L. Knappert, and W. J. Kühler.

The second edition of van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror was published in 1685 at Amsterdam by Hieronymus Sweerts, Jan ten Hoorn, Jan Bouman, and Daniel van den Dalen. This second edition was not edited by van Braght, who died in 1664, but by an anonymous unknown editor. The title of the second edition was slightly modified, reading Het Bloedig Toneel of Martelaers Spiegel der Doopsgezinde of Weereloose Christenen, etc. The text does not differ from that of the first edition, except for small additions. Only a few documents were added in Part II, and a summary account at the end of this part, concerning the persecutions in Switzerland in 1671. This new edition is noteworthy for its 103 illustrations (49 in Part I, 54 in Part II), the beautiful etchings of Jan Luiken (q.v.).

The first German edition of van Braght's book was translated and published in 1748-49 in the cloister at Ephrata, Pa., in an edition of 1,300 copies, 1,512 pages. The prior of the cloister, the learned Peter Miller of Alsenborn near Kaiserslautern, was the translator; in addition 14 other cloister brethren were also engaged in this work: 8 in the print shop and 6 in the paper mill. The title was as follows: Der blutige Schau-Platz oder Märtyrer-Spiegel der Tauffs Gesinnten oder Wehrlosen Christen, die um des Zeugnuss Jesu ihres Seligmachers willen gelitten haben, und seynd getödtet worden, von Christi Zeit an bis auf das Jahr 1660. Vormals aus unterschiedlichen glaubwürdigen Chronicken, Nachrichten und Zeugnüssen gesammlet und in Holländischer Sprach heraus gegeben von T. J. V. Braght. Nun aber sorgfältigst ins Hochteutsche übersetzt und zum erstenmal ans Licht gebracht. This edition adds a list of Swiss Brethren martyrs executed in Bern 1529-71, copied from the Tower-book by Hans Lorsch in 1667 and preserved by Christian Kropff. It appears in all later English and German editions. In connection with the last martyr listed, Hans Haslibacher, of 1571, a portion (stanza 21 to the end) of the "Haslibacher Lied" was reprinted from the Ausbund.

The Ephrata edition was published by the Franconia Conference Mennonites (MC) with the definite purpose of strengthening the nonresistant faith of the church in the face of the rising threat of war. In 1745 the leaders of the church wrote to Amsterdam, requesting help in translating and publishing van Braght's great work. "As the flames of war appear to mount higher, no man can tell whether the cross and persecution of the defenseless Christians will not soon come, and it is therefore of importance to prepare ourselves for such circumstances with patience and resignation, and to use all available means that can encourage steadfastness and strengthen faith. Our whole community has manifested a unanimous desire for a German translation of the Bloody Theater of Tieleman Jansz van Braght, especially since in this community there is a very great number of newcomers, for which we consider it to be of greatest importance that they should become acquainted with the trustworthy witnesses who have walked in the way of truth, and sacrificed their lives for it."

In 1780 a reprint of this edition of the Martyrs' Mirror was made in Pirmasens (Palatinate). To the Ephrata title was added the following: Nachwärts von der Brüderschaft zu Ephrata in Pensylvanien ins Deutsche gebracht und daselbst gedruckt worden, Anno 1748. Nunmehro von der vereinigten Brüderschaft in Europa nach obiger Uebersetzung und Druck aufs neue zum Druck befördert. A peculiarity of this edition is the anonymity of most of the copies, whereas some have on their title page this statement: "Nunmehro von etlichen der Brüderschaft nach obiger Uebersetzung und Druck aufs neue zum Druck befördert. Pirmasens, Gedruckt bey Johann Friedrich Seelig, Hochfürstl. Hof- und Canzley-Buchdrucker 1780." These "several of the brethren" were no doubt Amish Mennonites who lived in the vicinity of Pirmasens. According to a letter written to Peter Weber (q.v.) on Sept. 16, 1778, in Kindenheim, most of the work of putting out this edition was done by Elder Hans Naffziger of Essingen. This edition included the etchings by Jan Luiken; 1,000 copies were printed.

The book was very widely used in the Palatinate, especially by the Amish. It served in many instances as a devotional book. This was also true of the Mennonites in Switzerland and Alsace-Lorraine (Michiels, Anabaptistes). In the German language the book came out in the following American editions: Lancaster 1814; Philadelphia 1849 (Shem Zook); Elkhart 1870; Scottdale 1916; and Berne 1953. English editions appeared in Lampeter Square, Pa., 1837 (J. D. Rupp, translator); London, England, 1853 (Hanserd Knollys Society); Elkhart 1886 (J. F. Sohm, translator); Scottdale 1938 and 1950.

J. B.(out) edited an abridgment of van Braght's 1685 edition under the title, 'T merg van de Historien der Martelaren, published at Haarlem in 1699 (reprints at Amsterdam 1722, 1736, 1769). Another abridgment (120 pp.), translated by Peter Miller (Theophilus), was published at Ephrata, Pa., in 1745 under the title Das Andenken einiger heiligen Märtyrer, apparently as a foretaste of the edition of the full volume which followed in 1748. L. D. G. Knipscheer published in 1953 at Amsterdam a small collection entitled Verhalen uit de Doopsgezinde Geschiedenis.

The 105 etchings which the noted artist Jan Luiken supplied to the 1685 edition of the Martyrs' Mirror were published as a collection in the book Théatre des Martyrs (n.p., n.d.) and reprinted in Schouwtooneel der Martelaren (Amsterdam, 1738). They were used in the Pirmasens German edition of 1780. The original copper plates were in the possession of a Dr. Schmidt in Munich in 1924, where they were examined by H. S. Bender.

vdZ., H.S.B.

Hans Alenson, Tegen-Bericht op de Voor-reden vant Groote Martelaer Boeck, BRN VII (The Hague, 1910) 139-266; DJ II (1840) 102 f.; Chr. Sepp, Geschiedkundige Nasporingen II (Leiden, 1875) 9-136; A. Brons, Entwickelung und Schicksale der altevangelischen Taufgesinnten oder Mennoniten (Emden, 1912) 219-25; Pirmasenser Geschichtsblätter XI, No. 1; A. Michiels, Les Anabaptistes des Vosges (Paris, 1860); A. Fluri, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Bernischen Täufer (Bern, 1912); J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, "Onze Martelaarsboeken," DB 1870, 45-90;

S. Cramer, "De geloofwaardigkeit van van Braght," DB 1899, 65-164; idem, "Nog eens de geloofwaardigkeit van van Braght," DB 1900, 184-211; S. W. Pennypacker, A Noteworthy Book (Philadelphia, 1881); L. A. Miller, Konkordanz zu dem Märtyrer-Spiegel (Arthur, 1918); F. Pijper, Martelaarsboeken (The Hague, 1924); Gerald C. Studer, "A History of the Martyrs' Mirror," MQR XXII (1948) 163-79; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 2287; ML III, 49-53.

Martyrs' Synod. In Augsburg (q.v.), Bavaria, Germany, a center of the Anabaptists in the 16th century, the leading figures of the movement met on Aug. 20, 1527, in a conference that was of great significance in the history of the brotherhood. Because a large number of the delegates died a short time afterward as martyrs, this meeting has been called the Martyrs' Synod.

Previous to this meeting there was only one general statement issued by the movement as a whole, namely, at a meeting on Feb. 24, 1527, at Schleitheim (q.v.), in the canton of Schaffhausen in Switzerland, where representatives of the Brethren agreed on a statement of doctrine and practice regarding the points in which they were at variance with Zwingli's state church. It laid the foundation for bridging over the differences between the Swiss and South German groups. Whereas the Schleitheim decisions were written down and later published, the Augsburg synod left no written statements. But there are several documents written by Anabaptist leaders of that time, which throw some light on the nature of the meeting and its religious position, such as Jakob Dachser, Hans Denk, Oswald Glait, Balthasar Hubmaier, Eitelhans Langenmantel, and Sigmund Salminger.

From the scant information from other sources it is clear that a definite program had been arranged and carried out. Those present expressed a firm determination to proclaim the doctrines and ethical principles they had accepted as right, and not to be deterred from it by persecution and danger of death.

More than 60 representatives came from South Germany, Switzerland, and Austria. Hans Denk (q.v.) was most likely present. The others present whose names are known were Hans Beck (q.v.) of Basel, also called Beckenknecht; Eucharius Binder (q.v.) of Koburg; Burghard Braun (q.v.), also called Burkhart of Ofen; Jakob Dachser (q.v.), a former Catholic priest of Ingolstadt; Leonhard Dorfbrunner (q.v.), formerly a Teutonic Knight of Nürnberg; Jakob Gross (q.v.) of Waldshut; Hans Gulden (q.v.) of Biberach in Franconia; Lukas Haffner of Augsburg; Siegmund Hofer; Hans Hut (q.v.) of Haina in Franconia; Jakob Kautz (q.v.), formerly a Lutheran preacher in Worms; Hans Kiessling (q.v.) of Friedberg near Augsburg; Gregor Maler (q.v.) of Chur; Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.) of Augsburg; Hans Leupold (q.v.) of Augsburg; Joachim März (q.v.) of Franconia; Marx Mayer (q.v.) of Alterlangen near Nürnberg; Hans Mittermaier (q.v.) of Ingolstadt; Georg Nespitzer (q.v.) of Lauingen, also called Jörg of Passau; Leonhardt von Prukh (q.v.); Sigmund Salminger (q.v.), a former Franciscan monk of Munich; Peter Scheppach, an artist of Augsburg; Leopold Schiemer (q.v.), a former Franciscan monk of Judenburg; Hans Schlaffer (q.v.), a former priest of Upper Austria; Leonhard Spörle (q.v.); Ulrich Trechsel (q.v.); Thomas Waldhausen (q.v.), a former Catholic priest of Grein, hence also called Thomas of Grein; Jakob Widemann (q.v.) of Memmingen; Andreas Widholz (q.v.), a guild master, in whose house services were held (Keller, Apostel, 218; Keller, Staupitz, 325 f.; Keller, Reformation, 426-28; Nicoladoni, 107; Neuser, 27).

Some of the important leaders were not present: Hubmaier was in Moravia; Pilgram Marpeck was still at Rattenberg on the Inn; Georg Blaurock was wandering in the mountains of Switzerland; Felix Manz had been martyred by drowning on Jan. 5, 1527, in Zürich, and Michael Sattler at the stake on May 21, 1527, in Rottenburg on the Neckar; Conrad Grebel had died of the plague in Maienfeld, Grisons, in the summer of 1526.

The conference appointed missionaries, who went out in all directions in two's and three's to all the countries where their fellow believers lived, to teach, comfort and strengthen them, or to build new brotherhoods. Their speech was so impressive that frequently a few hours sufficed to establish a new congregation (Cornelius, II, 49). Of their converts they demanded an upright life; when a brother sinned, he was to be admonished, and if he was in need he should be aided by the brethren; anyone who was unwilling to do this should not request baptism (Wiswedel, II, 50). Their opponents were surprised by the rapid spread of the movement. Unable to understand it, they asserted of some of the preachers that they carried little flasks of a magic potion, which they passed around through the audience to put a spell upon them (see Hans Hut; also Wiswedel, II, 178).

Hans Denk, Gregor Maler, and Hans Beck were sent to Basel and Zürich (Röhrich, 33); Ulrich Trechsel and Peter Scheppach to Worms and the Palatinate (Röhrich, 33); Hans Mittermaier, Leonhard Schiemer, and Leonhard Dorfbrunner (Nicoladoni, 107) to Upper Austria; Georg Nespitzer to Franconia (Keller, Reformation, 429); Eucharius Binder and Joachim März to Salzburg; and Leonhard Pruckh and Leonhard Spörle to Bavaria. None of these evangelists were able to work long; some were apparently seized in the rising wave of persecution before they reached their assigned field.

As soon as the Augsburg authorities learned of the synod, they took steps toward wiping out the movement. Urban Rhegius, the head of the local Protestant clergy, on Sept. 6, 1527, published a booklet, Wider den neuen Tauforden, with an addition, Notwendige Warnung an alle Christ-gläubigen durch die Diener des Evangeliums in Augsburg. Already on Aug. 24, 1527, the city council had made arrests and applied torture (Keller, Reformation, 428), and used the extorted statements to warn other governments of these messengers; on Sept. 16 they sent a message of this kind to Ulm (Roth, Reformationsgeschichte I, 264), and on Sept. 20 to Strasbourg (Röhrich, 32) and Nürnberg (Schornbaum, 39).

By this measure the suppression of Anabaptism in German-speaking regions was given a new impetus; political charges went hand in hand with attacks on their doctrine. Even before the meeting of the synod a number of polemics had been issued against them; Zwingli, Oecolampadius, Bucer, Johannes Eck, Johann Landtsperger, Konrad Schmid, and Johannes Bader had written such booklets. In 1527, following the synod, and in 1528, other polemics were published by Wenzeslaus Linck, Andreas Althamer, Johann Faber, Ortolf Fuchsberger, Thomas Venatorius, and again Urban Rhegius. Melanchthon now also took up the fight against the Anabaptists.

At the same time a new general persecution was inaugurated by the temporal authorities. In the last quarter of 1527 and the first half of 1528 not a month passed without a decree or mandate having been issued (see Mandates). The most cruel was the decision of the Swabian League passed at Augsburg on Feb. 22, 1528, authorizing a band of four hundred armed horsemen to hunt the Anabaptists and bring them to headquarters. All who would not recant were burned at the stake without trial, those who did recant were beheaded; women were executed by drowning (Kühn, 1016 and Schornbaum, 117). Two weeks after this decree was passed Joachim Helm, a citizen of Augsburg, wrote: "It is such a misery, that the whole city of Augsburg is saddened. They are daily beheading some, at times four or six, and at times ten persons" (Archiv für Ref.-Gesch., 1916, 154).

The first martyrs among the participants at the synod were Joachim März and Eucharius Binder, both of whom died at the stake in Salzburg on Oct. 27, 1527. Leonhard Spörle was executed on Nov. 12, 1527, at an undesignated place. Hans Hut was suffocated by a fire in his cell at Augsburg, Dec. 6, 1527. Leonhard Dorfbrunner was burned at the stake at Passau in January 1528. Leonhard Schiemer was beheaded on Jan. 14, 1528, at Rattenberg on the Inn, and his corpse burned. Hans Schlaffer was beheaded on Feb. 4, 1528, at Schwaz in Tirol, Eitelhans Langenmantel on March 11, 1528, at Weissenhorn near Ulm, one of the four headquarters of the Swabian League. Thomas Waldhausen was burned on April 10, 1528, at Brno in Moravia; Hans Leupold was beheaded on April 25, 1528, at Augsburg. Hans Mittermaier was executed in 1529 at Linz, and Jakob Widemann in 1535 at Vienna.

Other participants in the synod were victims of the strains of persecution. Hans Denk died of the Plague at Basel in November 1527. Several preachers languished in prison in Augsburg, until, broken in body and soul, they recanted in order to gain their release, as was the case with Jakob Dachser, Sigmund Salminger, and Jakob Gross.

Two other participants in the synod, who were seized several years later in Franconia, recanted in the face of death and were released under oath not to return to the region after making a public confession in church. George Nespitzer renounced his faith in Brandenburg on Aug. 21, 1530. Marx Mayer was arrested at Creglingen near Ansbach in June 1530, and was sentenced to death in accord with a decision of Margrave George (Schornbaum, 189). But the mayor and the council of Ansbach made a protest on Aug. 13, claiming that the decision of the margrave was not valid in this case, since the prisoner could not be charged with sedition (Schornbaum, 191). Mayer recanted and was released. But he then joined the Puschenhamer (q.v.) group, misguided followers of Hans Schmied, who based his doctrines on dreams. Against them the margrave had issued a mandate on June 20, 1531 (Schornbaum, 270 f.). Marx Mayer was beheaded on July 6, 1531, as an adherent of this group, whose teachings were not at all like those of the Anabaptists (see the sentence in Schornbaum, 327-29).

It is worth noticing that in spite of the cruel persecution, no Anabaptist took recourse to violent resistance, nor was there evidence of a planned attack against the government in all the cross-examinations even on the rack. The prophecies concerning the punishment of the persecutors, which Hans Hut at first proclaimed, and which were interpreted as revolt against the temporal government, he soon abandoned (Schornbaum, 188). Nor were they construed as criminal by the authorities when they learned that they were repeated only in the circle of intimate friends (Schornbaum, 191.)

Although several delegates fell from their faith under the severe pressure of persecution, nevertheless the other participants in the synod were faithful shepherds of the congregations entrusted to them. Some of the writings of these martyrs are still unpublished, and are found in various archives: Hans Hut (Vom Geheimnis der Taufe), Eitelhans Langenmantel (Vom Nachtmahl des Herrn), Hans Schlaffer, (Beck, 64; excerpts in Beck, 651-53 and Wiswedel, II, 191-201), Thomas Waldhausen (Beck, 66 and Keller, Reformation, 434), and Leopold Schiemer (Beck, 62; excerpts in Wiswedel, II, 174-86).

Some scholars have doubted that the meeting known as the Martyrs' Synod ever took place, and J. J. Kiwiet goes so far as to call it a fiction of Ludwig Keller. Walter Fellman (Hans Denck Schriften, 17 f.) gives probably the best analysis of what actually happened, based on the latest research. Several meetings were held, the chief one on Aug. 24, 1527, in the house of Mathias Finder, a butcher. It was at this meeting that the missioners were delegated. One meeting had been held two or three days before this at the house of Gall Fischer, a weaver, one of the deacons of the Augsburg Anabaptist congregation. In these two meetings both Denk and Hut were present, with about 60 others. A third meeting was held in the house of Konrad Huber, also a deacon of the Augsburg congregation, where Hut was present, but Denk absent. Hut calls this latter meeting a "council." Although none of the sessions was a synod in the formal sense that a body of delegates deliberated and adopted binding resolutions, yet there was a consideration of certain points at issue and at least a sort of agreement, in addition to the appointment of missioners. In this sense the term conference would be justifiable.

Fellman holds that the conference consisted largely of representatives from the areas where Hut had been preaching, i.e., mostly south and east of Augsburg. Denk was not the presiding officer, as Keller supposed. The major theological point at issue was Hut's chiliastic teaching. He had, among other things, prophesied the second coming of Christ to take place in the spring of 1528. The conference decided, with Hut's agreement, to drop certain of the concrete details of the Hut prophecy, but approved the central idea of the return in 1528. Fellman holds that the urge to send out missioners was based on the concept of the near return of Christ and the urgency of strengthening the congregations and inaugurating a vigorous evangelistic campaign before the end. At least some of the decisions of the conference are reported in the "Epistle of Hans Hut," sent with some of the missioners, which has been published by Lydia Müller (Glaubenszeugnisse, 12). Hege, H.S.B.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; C. A. Cornelius, Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs II (Leipzig, 1860); Chr. Hege, Pilgram Marbecks Vermahnung, reprint from Gedenkschrift zum 400-jährigen Jubiläum der Mennoniten (1925) 178-282; L. Keller, Ein Apostel der Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1882); idem, Reformation; idem, Johann von Staupitz u. die Anfänge der Reformation (Leipzig, 1888); Joh. Kühn, Deutsche Reichstagsakten unter Kaiser Karl V. VII (1935); J. Loserth, "Studien zu Pilgram Marbeck," in Gedenkschrift zum 400-jährigen Jubiläum der Mennoniten (1925) 134-78; idem, Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte der oberdeutschen Taufgesinnten im 16. Jahrhundert (Leipzig, 1929); W. Neuser, Hans Hut (Berlin, 1913); A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin von Linz . . . (Berlin, 1893); T. W. Röhrich, "Zur Gesch. der strassburgischen Wiedertäufer" in Ztscht für die hist. Theol., 1860; Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Reformationsgeschichte II (Munich, 1904); TA Bayern I; Wiswedel, Bilder II; Walter Fellmann, Hans Denck, Schriften, Part II, Religiöse Schriften (Gütersloh, 1956); J. J. Kiwiet, "Hans Denk and His Teaching" (B.D. dissertation, Baptist Theological Seminary, Rüschlikon, Zürich, 1954); Lydia Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter (Leipzig, 1938); ML III, 53-56.

Mary, name of many Dutch martyrs, spelled in different ways: Maeyken, Maria, Marie, Marijtgen, Mariken, Maritgen, Marritgen, Marytgen, and Mayken.

Mary Joris, an Anabaptist martyr, who, "removed from her husband and children," was sentenced to death with Joriaen Simons (q.v.) and Clement Dirks (q.v.), and languished in chains in Haarlem, Holland. Since she was pregnant the execution was postponed until she should be delivered; but she died in prison before it happened (1557). Joriaen, Clement, and Mary are celebrated in a hymn, "Hoort toe ghy Christen scharen" (Hear, ye multitudes of Christians), inserted in Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562 (re-edited by Wackernagel), while Mary's name is also found in the hymn "Hoort vrienden al hier in dit aertsche dal" (Hear all ye friends in this earthly dale), hymn No. 20 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. According to the Bibliographie this martyr was probably the wife of the bookseller Dionys, who was also arrested but escaped from prison, and her name was Mary (Maritgen) Servaes. This surmise is based on S. Ampzing's history of Haarlem; but this book is not very reliable. Neff, vdZ.

Offer, 257, note 1, 590; Mart. Mir. D 178, E 563, 565; Wackernagel, Lieder, 133; Wolkan, Lieder, 79; Doopsgez. Lectuur 1856, 339; S. Ampzing, Beschryvinge . . . der Stad Haerlem (Haarlem, 1628) 449; Bibliographie II, 717, No. 397; ML II, 435.

Mary-Martha Home, located at 437 Mountain Avenue in Winnipeg, Man., was established in 1925 and is an outgrowth of the Winnipeg city mission of the Mennonite Brethren Northern District Conference. Since 1948 it has, however, been supervised by the Manitoba Provincial Conference of the M.B. Church. At first rooms were rented, but in 1933 a house was purchased providing a home for Mennonite girls working in the city. Anna J. Thiessen was matron of the home 1925-47. Other workers who have assisted are Sarah Warkentin (Mrs. J. Voth), Elizabeth Unruh (Mrs. I. Friesen), Lena Isaak (Mrs. G. Sawatzky), and Tina Friesen. A. B. Peters has for 12 years conducted the preaching services in the home. The purpose of the home is to give spiritual aid to the girls, assist them in finding employment, and to provide for them a home while in the city. Since 1925, 2,200 girls coming from various Mennonite churches have been placed and helped. At present (1949) there are 12 in the home and 117 are on the list who are working in the factories or homes of the city, but are connected with this home. The Dorcas Circle, organized in 1929, arranges for the girls to do handwork for mission or relief and for visiting the sick. Martha Thiessen has been matron since 1947. G.D.H.

Mary Martha Girls' Home (GCM), located in the city of Vancouver, B.C., was founded in 1935 by the General Conference Mennonite Church to gather for spiritual guidance and care the large number of Mennonite girls working in this city. This service is rendered by the pastor of the Mennonite (GCM) Church. An experienced girl serves as matron of the Home. At the beginning, approximately 45 girls made use of the Home but this number soon increased considerably. Then for a period the number decreased greatly until it rose during the new immigration, which started toward the end of the 1940's. On Thursday the Home is full of life, because then the girls working in the private homes have their weekly half-day off. They enjoy social as well as spiritual fellowship, as the pastor then leads in an hour of Bible study, which is always well attended. Sunday is observed in a similar manner, but then the girls share in the worship with other Mennonites in the near-by church (located at 659 East 52nd Avenue). This Home has proved a great blessing for the girls, as well as for the churches as a whole. (See also Bethel Girls' Home in Vancouver.) The first superintendent of the Home was J. H. Janzen, 1935-37, with his wife as matron. In 1937-46 J. B. Wiens, the pastor of the Vancouver G.C.M. church, was superintendent, with his wife as matron. In 1945 Tina Lehn became the matron, with the J. B. Wienses as spiritual advisers. J.B.W.

Mary Oth, an Anabaptist martyr, a widow, from Rees in the territory of Cleve, Germany, was drowned on June 11, 1539, at Utrecht, Netherlands, together with nine other women. Particulars are lacking. She may have been a follower of David Joris (q.v.). vdZ.

Berigten Historisch Genootschap Utrecht IV, 2 (1851) 139; Mellink, Wederdopers, 237.

Maryboro Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, in Maryboro Twp., Wellington Co., Ont., lying adjacent to Waterloo County on the northwest. Several Mennonite families moved here after the middle of the 19th century. By 1872 the Mennonite Conference

(MC) of Ontario supplied a minister every eight weeks; meetings were held in the home of Jacob Good. Families attending were Dan Geiger, Andrew Thaler, William Beisel, Solomon Sitler, Jacob Shantz, David Eby, Isaac Cressman, Michael Schantz, Isaac Clemmer, Menno Heckendorn, John Heckendorn, and Weavers. By 1891 communion was served annually with appointments at four-week intervals. Ministerial help supplied for neighboring Wallace also served here. Cheaper land attracted the settlers, but interest declined as new congregations arose. By 1903 regularity of appointments ceased as several members returned to Waterloo County. J.C.F.

Maryboro United Missionary Church was located five miles west of Moorefield, Ont. In September 1949 the Ontario Conference decided to move the church building to the town of Palmerston, Ont. At that time the membership was 14 with H. R. Priddle serving as pastor. H.R.P.

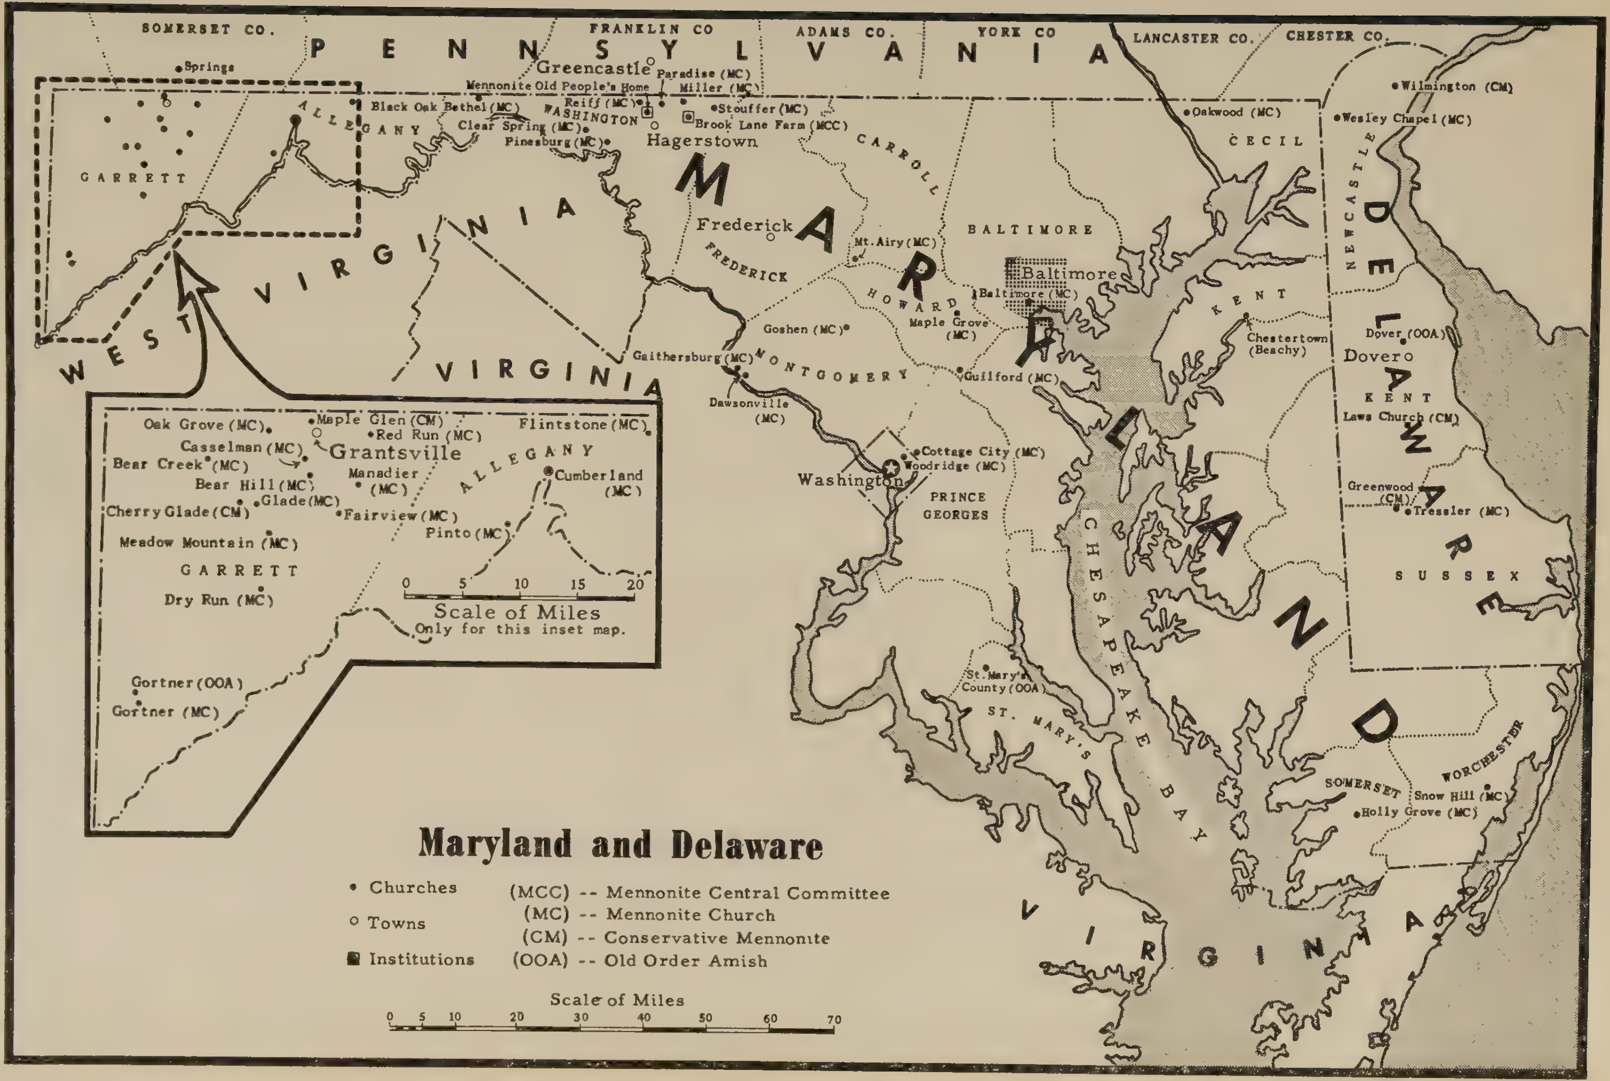
Maryken (Mariken), an Anabaptist martyr, who (Mart. Mir. D 664, E 983) was executed with Hans van Munstdorp and three other martyrs at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1573, is apparently identical with Maeyken Wens (q.v.). vdZ.

Maryland, a state (pop. 2,343,000), one of the original colonies, lies on the southern border of Pennsylvania, extending for almost four fifths of the length of Pennsylvania. The total of almost 2,000 baptized Mennonites in the state belong to the Mennonite Church (MC), including one Conservative Mennonite congregation, except for a small Old Order Amish congregation in St. Mary's County and one in Garrett County, with a total of 171 members. The two old original Mennonite communities in Maryland (Washington County and Garrett County) lie immediately south of the Pennsylvania border and are extensions of the Mennonite communities on the Pennsylvania side.

(1) Washington County, Md., bordering Franklin County, Pa., first received Mennonite settlers of Lancaster County, Pa., background shortly before the Revolutionary War, the oldest congregation (Miller) near Leitersburg, the second (Clear Spring) near Clear Spring in 1810, and the third (Stouffer) near Edgemont in 1820. From these have grown two later congregations (Paradise, 1897; Maugansville Home, 1923) and three mission stations (Pinesburg, 1923; Flintsone, 1925, just across the border in Allegany County, and Pondsville, 1954). These nine congregations, with a total of 831 members, constitute about one half of the Washington County, Md., and Franklin County, Pa., Conference (organized in 1790), which is closely related to the Lancaster Conference and is very conservative in customs, practices, and activities. It has one institution, the Mennonite Old People's Home at Maugansville, Md., founded in 1923. The Brook Lane Farm Mental Hospital, operated by the MCC, is located near Hagerstown, but is not under the conference. In the same county is one congregation, Black Oak Bethel near Hancock, founded in 1953, which belongs to the Ohio and Eastern Conference.

(2) The second original settlement was made in Garrett County as an integral part of the Amish settlement in southern Somerset County, Pa. The Maryland side center of the settlement is Grantsville, which began in a small way about 1770. This area is in the valley of the Casselman River and so has long been called the Casselman Valley district. The original settlement here was Old Order Amish, founded quite early, and largely built up by immigrants from Hesse and Waldeck in 1830-60. Since numerous Amish families from here moved westward to Holmes County, Ohio, and Johnson County, Iowa, before 1860, the community never grew large. Furthermore it ultimately became almost totally Conservative Amish (q.v.) or Beachy Amish (q.v.), with the exception of those who joined the Mennonite (MC) congregation called Springs, whose meetinghouse is located just two miles across the border in Pennsylvania, and which has been built up largely of transfers from the several Amish groups in the community. This congregation in turn began to establish Mennonite (MC) outposts in Maryland, which by 1900 had resulted in the organization of three congregations, Casselman (first meetinghouse 1889), Oak Grove (first meetinghouse 1900), and Glade near Accident (first meetinghouse 1908). The Conservative meetinghouses at Maple Glen and Cherry Glade were built in 1881. About 60 miles southwest of Grantsville an Old Order Amish settlement was started about 1850 near Gortner, not far from Oakland. By 1898 a Mennonite (MC) congregation had been established here, called Gortner. The last new settlement, formed from the Springs congregation, was that which resulted in the Pinto congregation (1927), about 15 miles south of Cumberland. From Pinto a mission church was established in Cumberland in 1952. Seven other Mennonite (MC) mission points were established in the area around the older churches in northern Garrett County 1935-55. All of these Mennonite congregations and missions in Garrett County and Allegany County belong to the Allegheny Conference (MC). A total of twelve congregations and missions had 417 baptized members here. The Conservative congregation had 230 members, although part of the membership lived across the line in Pennsylvania. A children's home conducted by this congregation and the Conservative Conference for many years was closed in 1950.

In Eastern Maryland in the past 30 years nine mission stations have been established by the Lancaster Conference with a total membership of 178, one at Cottage City (1927), Maryland, at the eastern edge of Washington and one in Baltimore (1952). On the eastern shore of Maryland are two congregations of the Ohio and Eastern Conference, Holly Grove near Westover in Somerset County (1919), and Snow Hill (1953) in Worcester County near the Atlantic Coast, the two having a total membership of 109. A Beachy Amish congregation has recently been established near Chestertown across the Chesapeake from Baltimore, with 30 members. An Old Order Amish settlement was established in St. Mary's County near the James River in 1950. Mennonite and Amish membership in Maryland is distributed as follows: Washington County-Franklin County



Maryland and Delaware

SOMERSET CO.
FRANKLIN CO
ADAMS CO.
YORK CO
LANCASTER CO.
CHESTER CO.
PENNSYLVANIA
Springs
Greencastle
Paradise (MC)
Mennonite Old People's Home
Miller (MC)
Black Oak Bethel (MC)
Reiff (MC)
WASHINGTON
Stouffer (MC)
Brook Lane Farm (MCC)
Clear Spring (MC)
Pinesburg (MC)
Hagerstown
ALLEGANY
GARRETT
CARROLL
Oakwood (MC)
CECIL
Wilmington (CM)
Wesley Chapel (MC)
NEWCASTLE
MARYLAND
DELAWARE
Frederick
FREDERICK
Mt. Airy (MC)
BALTIMORE
Baltimore
Baltimore (MC)
HOWARD
Maple Grove (MC)
Goshen (MC)
KENT
Chestertown (Beachy)
Dover (OOA)
Dover
KENT
Laws Church (CM)
WEST VIRGINIA
VIRGINIA
Gaithersburg (MC)
MONTGOMERY
Dawsonville (MC)
Guilford (MC)
Cottage City (MC)
Woodridge (MC)
Washington
PRINCE GEORGES
Greenwood (CM)
Tressler (MC)
SUSSEX
CHESAPEAKE BAY
St. Mary's County (OOA)
ST. MARY'S
SOMERSET
Snow Hill (MC)
Holly Grove (MC)
WORCHESTER
VIRGINIA
Oak Grove (MC)
Maple Glen (CM)
Red Run (MC)
Flintstone (MC)
Casselman (MC)
Grantsville
Bear Creek (MC)
Manadier (MC)
ALLEGANY
Cumberland (MC)
Bear Hill (MC)
Glade (MC)
Cherry Glade (CM)
Fairview (MC)
Pinto (MC)
Meadow Mountain (MC)
GARRETT
Dry Run (MC)
0 5 10 15 20
Scale of Miles
Only for this inset map.
Gortner (OOA)
Gortner (MC)
• Churches
○ Towns
■ Institutions
(MCC) -- Mennonite Central Committee
(MC) -- Mennonite Church
(CM) -- Conservative Mennonite
(OOA) -- Old Order Amish
Scale of Miles
0 5 10 20 30 40 50 60 70

Conference 9 congregations with 831 members, Allegheny Conference 12 with 417, Lancaster Conference 9 with 178, Ohio and Eastern Conference 3 with 159, Conservative Conference one with 230, Beachy Amish one with 30, and Old Order Amish 2 with 71, a total of 37 congregations or missions with 1,916 members. H.S.B.

Marytge(n) Jan de Gortersdochter (Maritgen Jans), the mother of the Anabaptist leader David Joris (q.v.), was arrested at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, in January 1539 (not 1538 as stated in G. Brandt, Historie der Reformatie I, 134). She recanted ("abjuring her rebaptism") and was after some trials beheaded at Delft, shortly before Feb. 26, 1539. (DB 1917, 160 ff.; Mellink, Wederdopers, 215 f.) vdZ.

Marytgen Davidsdochter from Leiden, Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned on June 7, 1539, at Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, with three other martyrs, because she had been (re)baptized. Mellink is of opinion that she was a follower of David Joris (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 748; DB 1909, 8, 22; Mellink, Wederdopers, 173, 204.) vdZ.

Marytje Simons, of Gouda, Dutch province of South Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, was sentenced to death on July 3, 1542, by the Court of Holland and burned at the stake at The Hague that very day or the following, because "she had been rebaptized and calumniated the Holy Catholic Church." (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 247, 747.) vdZ.

März (Mertz), Joachim, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Bamberg, Germany, was won to Anabaptist doctrine by Hans Hut (q.v.) and baptized by him in a village near Koburg in the summer of 1526 together with Eucharius Binder (q.v.). Like Hans Hut he was an Anabaptist missionary, at first in the region of Königsberg in Franconia and the valleys of the tributaries of the Main. In the statements made by the prisoners he was usually named with Hans Hut, and seems to have accompanied him on his journeys. Early in 1527 he was in the region of Bamberg (Wappler, 239), Nürnberg, and Augsburg (Wappler, 245), and later in Passau. From here he went to the Martyrs' Synod in Augsburg with Hans Hut, Eucharius Binder, and Georg Nespitzer (Roth, 232), and there was commissioned to evangelize in the region of Salzburg (Roth, 232 and 234). But their work was of short duration. They were imprisoned in Salzburg with Binder, and burned at the stake on Oct. 25, 1527. HEGE.

A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin von Linz und die Oberösterreichischen Täufergemeinden in den Jahren 1525-1531 (Berlin, 1893); Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Reformationsgeschichte I (München, 1901); Wappler, Thüringen; ML III, 57.

Maskowitz (Moskowitz, Moskowice; Czech, Mackovice), a village near Znaim in southern Moravia, annexed to the Frischau parish. The owner of Frischau, Peter Certorejsky of Certorej, called the Anabaptists into his territory, to settle in four desolate villages. In Frischau they built their first Bruderhof in 1531; this was soon followed by another at Maskowitz. It had a more difficult lot than most of the Hutterite settlements. Some of its leaders are known. Hans Schlegl died here on Feb. 21, 1587; Walser Hasenfelder on Aug. 9, 1590; Paul Iltzmüller on Feb. 15, 1591, and Leonhard Reuss on Nov. 20, 1591; all of them were preachers.

The quarrel between the son of their patron and the Frischau Hutterite settlement in 1597 soon involved the Maskowitz Brethren as well. The baron, knowing the Brethren to be in his power, did not adhere to the promises made by his father both orally and in writing, and imposed an intolerable amount of robot work on them, so that they were unable to keep up their own work in the Bruderhof and in the fields. Besides this, he roughly mistreated them, knocking out the teeth of one of them. He also confiscated their horses for military service. When the Brethren made gestures of leaving, he promised to improve their conditions, but never kept his promise; indeed, in a period of 21 weeks they had only two days free of robot work. The Brethren finally gathered their possessions to leave; Certorejsky took from them all their goods, causing them a loss of 5,000 florins, and drove them from the Frischau Bruderhof, not sparing the sick or aged. The Maskowitz Bruderhof remained, and in 1598 the baron, aware of the damage he had done himself, recalled the exiled Frischau settlers.

In the war with Bocskay (q.v.) a regiment was raised in the region of Znaim; in 1605 Maskowitz suffered 18 weeks of great expense and trouble in consequence. In the following year troops passing through inflicted all sorts of violence on them, and took away their horses. In the spring of 1609 three companies of Hungarian troops lodged in the Maskowitz Bruderhof for two days and nights, followed by two more companies, causing much trouble and consuming great amounts of goods.

The chronicles of the Hutterites record that in the spring of 1608 Berka instigated an attempt to convert them by force. Two companies of horsemen surrounded the Bruderhof for two hours awaiting word from Brno; they withdrew in haste when word reached them of Berka's defeat there. In 1611 new troops were raised, again injuring Maskowitz as well as other Bruderhofs. Nevertheless Christian Steiner, having served as preacher for over 30 years, died in peace on Nov. 5 of that year.

In the Moravian rebellion at the beginning of the Thirty Years' War the Maskowitz household suffered indescribable hardship. On July 22, 1619, it was plundered by Dampierre's troops; "By Oct. 15 it had been attacked 30 times and robbed of anything that could be found; in addition to much other movable property, much grain, flour, several barrels of wine, four horses, twelve oxen, and an entire herd of hogs; they also seized two brethren, tortured them, cut off the ear of one, in order to extort information about money and other things." A list of martyrs states that in 1619 Peter Klein, an old man, was cut down and Konrad Spör was shot down. The next year brought more oppression. On March 24 imperial troops fell upon Maskowitz at three in the morning, plundered everything, drove away the cattle and stock, and finally set fire to the house. Scarcely had the house been rebuilt, when new troops came. Most of the Maskowitz brethren did not await them, but in the second half of December 1621 fled into the region of Pausram, Austerlitz, and Nikolsburg; a part of them returned and met misfortune; on Jan. 6, 1622, imperial troops of Walloons, French, Spaniards, Neapolitans, Kroats, and a Fugger band from Swabia broke in. They stripped the inmates of their clothing, and drove them, some of them stark naked, out into the wintry cold. Several Brethren were senselessly tortured to make them reveal their hidden money. "With the sisters that they seized they dealt horribly." The Fugger band was guilty of the worst behavior in these days. Finally a French commander restored order to the extent that the brethren could again venture out to cook and bake. The soldiers took all their horses. On April 22 another band attacked them. The horsemen of Löbl, who had received heavy contributions from the brotherhoods at Kromau and Eibenschitz, now plundered Maskowitz, hauling away 18 loads of goods. In an attempt to come by the reputed wealth of the brethren, a vain attempt was made to lure the Maskowitz elder, Michel Kocher, to Nikolsburg.

After the issuance of the mandate of Sept. 28, 1622, Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein (q.v.) personally directed the expulsion of the Hutterites from Maskowitz. They had to leave "with empty hands," leaving all their cattle, grain, and larger pieces of equipment. They managed to take away secretly very little, with some help from the soldiers. Most of the people of the two Bruderhofs of Maskowitz and Olekowitz, led by the preachers Michel Kocher, Thoman Wilhelm, and Albrecht Grob, "in very bad weather" moved to their brethren in Transylvania (q.v.). (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 57 f.) P.De.

Masontown Mennonite Church (MC), located one mile east of Masontown, Fayette Co., Pa., a member of the Allegheny Conference, is perhaps the oldest organized Mennonite congregation west of the Allegheny Mountains. Mennonites settled in the region about Masontown around 1790. Jacob Newcomer was the first minister of this group. Peter Longeneker, formerly of Berks Co., Pa., was the first resident bishop. This congregation was under the supervision of the Lancaster Co., Pa., bishops some time before the Southwestern Pennsylvania (now Allegheny) Conference was organized in 1876. J. N. Durr (q.v.), who was largely responsible for the organization of the conference, was ordained to the ministry here at the early age of 18 in 1872 and to the office of bishop at the age of 20. Nicholas Johnson, the third bishop, is given the credit for conducting the first Sunday school in the Mennonite Church (MC) in the United States. This service was held on the upper floor of a springhouse on his farm in 1842. The present brick meetinghouse, the third one built, was erected in 1871, with a seating capacity of 200. The first was a log church, a half mile north of the present site, which was also used for school purposes. The second meetinghouse was a frame building about one mile east. The membership in 1956 was 138, with Paul M. Roth as pastor. Other ministers who served this congregation were Walter Campbell, A. J. Metzler (present bishop), Lloy A. Kniss, Elmer D. Hess, J. A. Brilhart, Ed. Miller, S. F. Coffman, Christian Deffenbaugh, David Johnson, and Joseph Bixler. P.M.R.

Masonville (Pa.) Mennonite Church (MC), Manor Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., is one of the older Lancaster Conference congregations. A meetinghouse was built here in 1760, long known as Bachman's because it was built on land donated by Christian Baughman. In 1893 a new brick meetinghouse was erected on near-by land and the name changed to Masonville. Christian Kauffman (1765-1840) was one of the first bishops in the immediate area. The congregation was a part of the Manor circuit. In 1954 Christian K. Lehman was bishop with Benjamin Miller as preacher. The membership was 162. Slackwater, formerly an outpost of Masonville, is now an independent congregation with 26 members and Frank K. Garman as pastor. I.D.L.

Mast (Mest, Maust, Moist), an Amish Mennonite family, was planted first in Berks-Lancaster counties, Pa., during the colonial period by immigration from Switzerland or the Palatinate, Germany, and by the first quarter of the 19th century six lines were established, with a large offspring at the present time. Three of these lines are quite numerous in Mennonite circles throughout the United States. Jacob Mast (arrived in 1737), Jacob Mast (arrived in 1750), and Abraham Mast with two brothers, Jacob and Christian, arrived here in America after the colonial period, which had closed in 1776, when it was no longer required for all male persons above 15 years of age to be marched from the ship to the courthouse to sign their allegiance to the King of Great Britain.

Among the outstanding representatives of the family have been the following: bishops (MC) Jacob Mast (1738-1808), John P. Mast (1826-88), Frederick Mast (1856-1932), John S. Mast (1861-1951), Emanuel A. Mast (1856-1932), Isaac S. Mast (1874-1955), Daniel E. Mast (q.v., 1848-1930, OOA). Russel Mast is a pastor (GCM) at Freeman, S.D., John L. Mast (MC) a minister at Belleville, Pa., and Aaron Mast (MC) a bishop of the Belleville congregation. Fifteen others, mostly Old Order Amish, were serving as bishops and ministers in 1954. Among those using the spelling Maust were bishop Sherman (Upland, Cal., M.C.) and preacher Earl J. (C.A.M.) of Pigeon, Mich. C.Z.M.

C. Z. Mast, A Brief History of Bishop Jacob Mast and Other Mast Pioneers, and a Complete Genealogical Family Register (Elverson, Pa., 1911); Henry J. Otto, Decendants of Jacob D. Mast from the Year 1832 to 1952 (Nappanee, 1952); Moses C. Mast, Mast History of Eli D. Mast and Rebecca (Miller) Mast and Their Descendants (Cadwell, Ill., 1952).

Mast, Andrew J., was born in Holmes Co., Ohio, June 10, 1873. Because of his father's early death he was reared in the home of his uncle, Andrew Mast, who was an Amish minister. About 1894 he went to Arthur, Ill., and then to Gibson, Miss., where a small Amish colony was just being started. There he was married on Oct. 26, 1896; on Oct. 24, 1897, he was ordained to the ministry and on June 4, 1899, bishop of the colony. Five years later he with his family moved to Arthur, Ill., where he served as bishop until his death on March 17, 1949. He was an outstanding and very influential Old Order Amish leader. L.A.M.

Mast, Daniel E., an Old Order Amish leader, was born in Holmes Co., Ohio, on Oct. 16, 1848, and died at his home near Hutchinson, Kan., on Sept. 29, 1930. He was baptized into the Old Order Amish Church in Holmes County in 1867. In November 1870 he was married to Catherine Miller, who died 16 years later. A few months later, in April 1886, a widower with eight children, he moved to the vicinity of Hutchinson. In October 1888 he married as his second wife Elizabeth Stutzman, who died in a little over five years. As his third wife he married Elizabeth Kauffman of Oregon, who died 25 years later. He then married Barbara Helmuth, who preceded him in death by six months. He was the father of 16 children.

Mast was ordained deacon in 1891 and minister in 1914. In his early married life he tried to arouse an interest in the Amish churches in Holmes County to start Sunday schools, but sentiment was too strong against them. Later in Kansas he took an active interest in the Sunday school as long as health permitted. He was very influential in his church as deacon and minister.

During the time of his ministry he visited nearly all the Old Order Amish churches in North America, his main themes being "Salvation Through Christ," and the "New Birth Through the Holy Spirit." Nearly all his conversations in visiting were spiritual, often getting a spiritual conversation started before the team was fully unhitched. When the Herold der Wahrheit (q.v.) was started in 1912 he took an active interest in writing and took advantage of the opportunity to spread out among the churches his deep knowledge of the Word of God; he had written many articles ahead at the time of his death. Most of his writings are printed in a 784-page book, Anweisung zur Seligkeit (Baltic, Ohio, n.d., ca. 1930). A selection was printed in English in Lessons in the Sermon on the Mount (Weatherford, Okla., 1953). L.A.M.

Mast, Jacob (1738-1808), was born in Switzerland. He migrated to America an orphan boy in company with his four sisters and younger brother John. All were in the care of their uncle Johannes Mast and landed in Philadelphia, Pa., on Nov. 3, 1750. Their first abode in the new world was in the vicinity of Hamburg, Berks Co., Pa., where the Amish had founded their first organized congregation in America by 1749. In that year Bishop Jacob Hertzler arrived from Switzerland and became their first leader. During 1754-64, "the years of bloodshed" in Berks County, when the Indians returned to reclaim the land, the Masts were driven from their home in 1760, and found refuge at the headwaters of the Conestoga, where Jacob Mast in 1764 took out a warrant for land comprising 170 acres for 325 pounds, situated in Caernarvon Twp., Berks Co., Pa.

Jacob Mast was married at the age of 25 to Magdalene Holly, who had accompanied him on his voyage to America. To this union were born 12 children, all of whom married and had offspring. In 1786 he succeeded Jacob Hertzler as bishop, the second Amish bishop in America and the first ordained here. He was one of the charter members of the present Conestoga Mennonite (MC) Church near Morgantown, which became the first permanent Amish Mennonite church in America. His manuscripts indicate a fair education for the times. The record of his public sale of personal property shows that he owned a goodly number of books.

As bishop, Mast presided over the following congregations in Berks County: Northkill, Maiden Creek, Tulpehocken, and Conestoga; in Chester County, one congregation Goshen, where a meetinghouse had been built near Malvern; the earliest in Lancaster County was in the vicinity of Compassville, and White Horse; these were also under his oversight. He died in 1808 and was buried on his farm. C.Z.M.

C. Z. Mast, A Brief History of Bishop Jacob Mast and Other Mast Pioneers, and a Complete Genealogical Family Register (Elverson, Pa., 1911).

Mast, John P. (1826-88), was born near Elverson, Pa., and was a lifelong resident of Caernarvon Twp., Berks Co., Pa. He was a great-grandson of Bishop Jacob Mast (q.v.) and was himself an able and faithful leader in the same district where his great-grandfather had served for 22 years. As a preacher he was practical and eloquent. He drew his lessons from everyday life and had a wide acquaintance in Amish Mennonite circles in both the United States and Canada. He was married to Anna Zook, but had no children. He was ordained to the ministry in his thirties by a unanimous vote from his congregation. He died June 11, 1888. His name was for many years a household word throughout his community. C.Z.M.

Mast, John S. (1861-1951), a leader in the Amish Mennonite (MC) church in Lancaster-Berks Co., Pa., b. Nov. 30, 1861, in Caernarvon Twp., Berks Co., Pa., d. Jan. 3, 1951, on his home farm. He was a son of John M. Mast and Rebecca Stoltzfus. His early years were spent on his father's farm and in the community. At the age of 17 he attended Miss Bertolet's private school in Morgantown. He was married in 1885 to Christiana Zook. To this union three children were born, two of whom died in infancy. Christian Z. Mast, the historian of the Conestoga Valley, was a surviving son. On May 6, 1894, Mast was ordained to the ministry. He rendered over fifty years of active service in the pulpit and was an active participant in the work of the Ohio-Eastern A.M. Joint Conference. In the early 1900's he began a wide ministry as a speaker in Bible conferences. He was elected to the office of bishop by vote of his congregation and ordained in 1908. The following churches were in his charge: Conestoga at Morgantown, Pa., Millwood and Maple Grove at Gap and Atglen, Pa.; Long Green, Md.; Westover, Md.; and Mattawana, Pa. His ability to speak in both German and English took him as an evangelist into different parts of the United States and Canada. C.Z.M.

Mastenbroek, Fenna (1787-1826), of Sneek, a daughter of Pieter Mastenbroek and Janneke ten Cate, was the Mennonite author of many books and articles in periodicals, now all forgotten, which in the 19th century were very popular. She wrote particularly for women; among her books are Lectuur voor vrouwen (2 vols., Groningen, 1815-16), Zedelijke verhalen uit den Bijbel, voor vrouwen en meisjes (2 vols., Sneek, 1822), and De kunst om gelukkig te worden. Een geschenk voor jeugdigen (The Hague, 1826).

A Mennonite Mastenbroek family, not related to that of Sneek, is found in Ouddorp. (Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 239; N.N.B.Wb. III, 825 f., DB 1890, 116. vdZ.

Masuria (Mazuria, Mazury, Masuren), now Olsztyn, Poland, a lake area in the southeastern part of the former German province of East Prussia, one of the territories early settled by Anabaptist refugees from Holland. The little extant information indicates that they settled primarily in the vicinity of Johannisburg about 1535, but were soon compelled to leave their homes there. Hege.

G. Sommerfeld, "Die Beziehungen Georgs des Frommen, Markgrafen von Ansbach, zu seinem Bruder, Herzog Albrecht I. von Preussen," in Ztscht für Kirchengesch., 1911, 105; ML III, 58.

Matheeux Maurisz (Mattheeuw Marinissen), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on March 13, 1572, at Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland. (DB 1908, 17, erroneously gives 1569 as the year of execution.) Matheeux and his wife Magdalene Jansdochter lived at Middelburg, outside the Langevyle gate of the city. Matheeux, 43 or 44 years of age, had been (re)baptized about 1559. Both he and his wife, who suffered martyrdom on the same day, are said "to belong to the sect of the Mennonites." vdZ.

W. te Water, Kort Verhaal der Reformatie van Zeeland (Middelburg, 1766) 148; ML III, 61.

Mathesius, Johannes (1504-65), a Lutheran theologian, pastor of the miners at Joachimsthal in northern Bohemia from 1545 until his death. He was one of the most zealous literary opponents of Anabaptism in the second half of the 16th century. Approximately 1500 of his sermons have been handed down in manuscript, among them 17 sermons on Luther's life. These sermons were delivered in 1562-64, and represent one of the first biographies of Luther. However, because of the intermittent nature of his connections with Luther, not all of the material on the reformer was derived from personal experience as was formerly generally assumed, or from his notes on Luther's table talks (Tischreden, delivered in the summer and fall of 1540). Rather he adapted to his records numerous transcripts from other manuscripts and "changed not only the text but also the content of Luther's speeches; indeed on occasion he even perverted them to a contrary meaning" (Volz, 148).

In these sermons on Luther he also enlarged in a derogatory way on the Anabaptists, whose suffering he had observed in 1526-27 as private tutor at the Odelzhausen castle between Augsburg and Dachau on the Glon River in Bavaria, and also in 1528-29 with Zacharia Weixner, a pastor in Bruck on the Amper. He labeled their doctrine as "Turkish and devilish madness" and their ministers as "apostles of the devil. It is as if the devil has stirred up an ungodly and seditious rabble." These characterizations indicate his manner of fighting. He did not bother to gather evidence for his defamations. In addition he charged the most prominent Anabaptist leaders, Balthasar Hubmaier and Hans Denk, with teaching revolt and horrible unchastity. Other preachers he accused of monkish hypocrisy and witchcraft, through which they deluded the common man, as he had seen in numerous examples on the Lech and on the Glon. There the rabble allowed themselves to be rebaptized and "drowned in droves." He gives the knowledge and abilities of the Anabaptists no mean testimonial, when he says, "The bishops and their scholars, and those who hold to Antichrist, were much too weak and unlearned to refute the Anabaptists with definite Scripture and show the people the right way."

On the historiography (q.v.) of the Anabaptists Mathesius exerted a malicious influence through his false assertions, since his writings on Luther were widely circulated. His representation was copied uncritically by later historians (see Anabaptisticum) and for centuries greatly injured the reputation of the Mennonites. Not until recent research was developed could his unfounded accusations be refuted. Hege.

G. Loesche, Johannes Mathesius, Ausgewählte Werke III; Luthers Leben in Predigten (2d ed., Prague, 1906); H. Volz, Die Lutherpredigten des Johannes Mathesius (Leipzig, 1930); ML III, 58 f.

Matheus Sauvaige, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on March 3, 1535, at the market place of Antwerp, Belgium. He was a gunsmith, born at Loreynen (?). Other particulars are lacking. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 318; XIV, 12 f., No. 135.) vdZ.

Mathijs Baseliers, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake with three others on May 20, 1573, at Antwerp, Belgium, because he had been (re)baptized, had attended forbidden meetings (of the Mennonites) and had held such meetings in his house. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 113, 115, 176; XIV, 90 f., No. 1024.) vdZ.

Mathis (Mathies, Matthiesen, Mattis, Matis), a Mennonite family of Dutch descent, found in West Prussia, Germany. In the Danzig-Neugarten congregation (Frisian) the name is found from 1680. They were especially found in the Heubuden (q.v.) congregation. Jakob Mathis was a preacher of the Heubuden Old Flemish congregation 1745-62 and Peter Mathies 1757-65. In 1796 and following years some of them moved from West Prussia to Russia. vdZ.

Reimer, Familiennamen; Naamlijst; B. H. Unruh, Die niederländisch-niederdeutschen Hintergründe der mennonitischen Ostwanderungen (Karlsruhe, 1955) passim, see Index.

Mathisz (Matthysz), Hughe: see Mattheissen, Hugo.

Mathys van Castele, an unknown Anabaptist martyr, who was beheaded at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1535 (exact date unknown). (Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 367; XIV, 14 f., No. 146.) vdZ.

Matrei, a village in Tirol, Austria, between Innsbruck and the Brenner Pass, where the Anabaptist movement found many adherents in the 16th century. Many of them emigrated to Moravia. In 1544 two persons who knew the plan of an Anabaptist family to migrate but did not reveal it were fined 50 florins. Others were called to account for sheltering and feeding Anabaptists. A considerable emigration to Moravia took place in 1560 (see Hans Mändl). HEGE.

G. Loesche, Archivalische Beiträge zur Gesch. des Täufertums und des Protestantismus in Tirol (Vienna, 1926) 30; ML III, 59.

Mats, a Mennonite family found in Westzaan and Zaandam, Dutch province of North Holland. Arian Cornelisz Volger (1) of Akersloot in North Holland, who died in 1609, is said to have belonged to the Catholic Church; while he was still a young man, he went to Alkmaar to buy a vest, and came back with a Bible; soon after, he joined the Mennonites. His son Jan Ariansz Volger (2) settled at Westzaan and changed his family name to Mats (the reason is not known). Aerjan Jansz Mats (3), the son of (2), became a preacher of the Frisian Mennonite congregation of Westzaan and Zaandam until 1667. His son Klaes Aerjansz Mats (4), d. 1694, was a preacher of the "Oude Huys" (Frisian) congregation of Westzaandam and Westzaan 1681-ca. 94. Other members of this family were deacons of the Mennonite congregations of Zaandam and Westzaan until the 20th century.

Most members of this family were wood dealers and shipowners. In the early 18th century they moved from Westzaan to Zaandam and greatly contributed to the prosperity of this town. Gradually the Mats family, which by marriage was related to many well-known families of Zaandam and the Zaanstreek (Zaan district) like Schoen, Duyvis, van Gelder, Ouwejan, Rogge, Corver, and van de Stadt, came to great wealth. So for example Jacob Dirksz Mats (about 1716-53), a grandson of Klaes Aerjansz (4), equipped a fleet of seven sailing vessels ("Groenland-vaarders") for whaling near Greenland. vdZ.

S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 189-200; J. M. van Gelder, Stamboek der familie van Gelder (Amsterdam, 1899) 193 ff.

Matschidl, Michael (Kleinmichel), a Hutterite chosen as deacon in 1539, and as preacher in 1542, was captured at Ortenburg in Carinthia, Austria, with his wife Lisel and Hans Gurtzham (q.v.). After a cross-examination, in which they acquitted themselves with credit, they were taken to Vienna. Here they were put into a prison with Hans Staudacher (q.v.), to the great joy of both. After Staudacher's execution, concerning which Matschidl wrote a letter on Dec. 5, 1546, in Moravia, he and Gurtzham remained in prison three years. Then a fire broke out, and the prisoners were freed. Matschidl and his wife reached Moravia uninjured, and he died there in 1553 at Altenmarkt. He wrote several epistles, which are preserved in Pressburg. NEFF.

Mart. Mir. D 73, E 474; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 167 f.; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 205 f., 259; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 267 f.; ML III, 59.

Matschilder, Michiel: see Matschidl, Michael.

Matsqui (B.C.) Mennonite Brethren Church, a member of the Canadian Conference since 1945, when it was organized with 71 charter members who had settled at Matsqui. The leader and minister was A. D. Rempel. A building was remodeled into a church; in 1947-49 the congregation met in the basement of a new church. Together with three neighbor congregations it maintains a Bible school and a private high school. The disastrous flood of May 1948 covered the homes of the members and also caused the death of one church member, Cornelius Isaaks. In 1954 the membership was 185, with G. A. Konrad and Johann F. Klassen as ministers in charge. G.A.K.

Mattawana Mennonite Church (MC), near Mattawana, Pa., a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference, was formerly called the River Church. Amish families, Hooleys and Yoders, from Lancaster and Berks counties, Pa., settled along the Juniata River near Lewistown as early as 1793. When the congregation was organized is not known, but in 1818 the ministers were Christ King and Christ Yoder, and Daniel Stutzman was deacon. In 1840-68 there were no resident ministers, the church being served by ministers from Kishacoquillas Valley. Outstanding personalities in the history of this church were Michael Yoder (1831-1923), ordained to the ministry in 1868 and bishop in 1885, and Shem Zook (q.v., 1798-1880), an author, publisher, and educator. The first meetinghouse was built in 1871, at which time the congregation affiliated itself with the Eastern Amish Mennonite Conference. The congregation has remained small. Other resident ministers were John S. Yoder, John E. Kauffman (bishop), Samuel K. Yoder, Harry E. Kauffman, and Milo M. Yoder. In 1954 the membership was 127, under the ministry of Samuel Kauffman bishop, and Ross Metzler and M. M. Yoder ministers. J.A.H.

Mattheissen (Matheisen, Mathysen, Mathisz), Hugo, a Dutchman, who in 1562 leased from the city of Danzig, West Prussia (then Poland), a large tract of swampland in the Danzig Nehrung to reclaim and cultivate it. Probably he was a "locator," i.e., he leased the land to rent it out to immigrants, who usually were Dutch Mennonites. His name (Hugo Matthias) is found in a letter of 1569 written to the city of Danzig by King Sigismund of Poland. About 1550 he was a preacher of the Danzig Anabaptist congregation. This was stated by Jan van Sol (q.v.) in his confession before the judges of Brussels in 1550. He related that Hughe Matthyszoon had formerly been a weaver at The Hague, Holland, and had preached at Amsterdam and 's Hertogenbosch, and that he had been a copperplate engraver and during his first years in Prussia a peddler. vdZ.

F. Szper, Nederl. Nederzettingen in West-Pruisen (Enkhuizen, 1913) 45 f., 50, 236 f.; DB 1917, 135; Horst

Penner, Ansiedlung mennonitischer Niederländer im Weichselmündungsgebiet (Weierhof, 1940) 5; MQR XXIII (October 1949) 235; Gesch.-Bl. VII (1950) 22.

Mattheus Bernaerts (Mattheus or Matthijs van Linken), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake at Gent, Belgium, on Dec. 4, 1572, with three other martyrs. Mattheus was 40 years of age and a native of Meenen in Flanders. He had been baptized by Elder Leenaert Bouwens and was "a minister of the church of God, in the Word of the Holy Gospel, and also in the deaconship to provide for poor needy members of Christ" at Gent. Mattheus and his three companions died faithful. He left a will to his three small children, in which he makes a beautiful, Biblical confession of his faith, and admonishes them to abstain from the evil works of the world and to lead an honorable godly life. "O my dear children," he concludes, "neglect not to thank your Lord and God before eating and drinking; and when you lie down to sleep and when you arise, upon your knees, with folded hands, entreat Him for His grace." He added two short prayers, one to be used before and the other after meals; these are excellent models. (Mart. Mir. D 619-23, E 947-51; Verheyden, Gent, 59, No. 207; ML I, 196.) NEFF, VDZ.

Mattheus Jacobszoon: see Jacobsz, Mattheus.

Mattheus Keuse (Kuese), an Anabaptist martyr, b. at Roesselare, Flanders, a tailor 31 years of age. In 1567 he left the town of Gent in Belgium because of fear of persecution, since his child had not been baptized. After a stay in the Netherlands, leaving his family behind at Dordrecht, he returned to Flanders, but on his way to Gent he was apprehended at Brugge. Here, remaining loyal to his Lord, he was burned at the stake on Aug. 7, 1573 (not 1574 as is stated in Mart. Mir.). (Mart. Mir. D 676, E 992; Verheyden, Brugge, 62, No. 69.) VDZ.

Mattheus Pottebacker (Mattheus de Smidt or Smet), an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded with two other martyrs on Nov. 9 (or 4), 1559, in the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium. Mattheus had been (re)baptized by Gillis van Aken (q.v.). His name is found in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), found in the Dutch hymnals Nieu Liedenboeck of 1562 and Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (No. 16) of 1563. VDZ.

Offer, 567; Mart. Mir. D 262, E 633; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 5, 10; XIV, 26 f., No. 302; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72; ML III, 385.

Mattheus de Smidt, an Anabaptist martyr: see Mattheus Pottebacker.

Mattheus de Vik (Mattheeuws de Vick, de Vicht, de Vecht), an Anabaptist martyr, arrested with Christiaen Langedul, Cornelis Claesz, and Hans Symonsz on Sunday morning, Aug, 10, 1567, at Antwerp, Belgium, while attending a meeting. After imprisonment and torture they were sentenced to death at Antwerp on Sept. 13, 1567. At the place of execution they addressed the bystanders and Mattheus said: "Citizens, that we suffer here, is for the truth, and because we live according to the Word of God." Thereupon his words were drowned out by the roll of soldiers' drums, and the victims bound together two by two, after having been strangled by the executioner, were burned in their little huts of straw, thus giving a striking testimony of their faith. VDZ.

Mart. Mir. D 345, E 704; Antw. Arch.-Blad IX, 460, 462; X, 66; XIV, 46 f., No. 524.

Mattheus Wens was a Mennonite of Antwerp, Belgium, a mason by trade and a deacon of the congregation. His wife Maeyken Wens (q.v.) was apprehended and put to death at Antwerp on Oct. 6, 1573. While she was in prison Mattheus wrote her a letter, and Maeyken wrote her reply on the back of the same sheet and returned the letter. This letter, a unique martyrs' document and the only extant autographic letter of a martyr, is now in the Amsterdam Mennonite Archives. Maeyken's letter is found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror; that of her husband was published by S. Cramer in DB 1904, 119 f. VDZ.

Matthias (1557-1619), Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, the son of the only Hapsburg leaning toward Protestantism, Maximilian II, educated as a Catholic and devoted to the church. In 1593 he was appointed governor of Austria by his brother Rudolf II. In this capacity he requested his councilors on July 5, 1600, to work out an opinion on how to expel the Anabaptists who managed mills, estates, and dairy farms in the country. The answer given on July 17 pointed out how seriously "food was taken from the Christian population" by the competition. They noted that "they had often advised how to rid the land of this kind of sectarian people and offensive intentional enemy of the Christian religion," and recommended absolute eradication (copies of these documents are in the national archives in Vienna). Thereupon Matthias induced Rudolf to issue the mandate of March 23, 1601, for Lower and Upper Austria. He argued that his brother had reported to him that in both regions there were Anabaptists who were injuring native industry by illegally engaging in crafts; besides, it was not known what they did with the money thus acquired. He therefore gave orders to expel all Anabaptists immediately, making use of the police if necessary. Landowners who continued to employ Anabaptists should be fined 500 ducats (copy in the Patentsammlung des Haus-, Hof- und Staatsarchivs in Vienna).

When Matthias, at the request of Rudolf, supported the Counter Reformation in Hungary, the rebellion headed by Bocskay (q.v.) broke out, which caused severe damage to the Hutterite Bruderhofs situated in Slovakia, especially those in Lewär, as well as several in Moravian territory, where the troops were mustered (see Maskowitz). The treaty of peace concluded between Bocskay and Matthias on June 23, 1606, put an end to these oppressions.

The quarrel between the Hapsburg brothers soon involved the Moravian Hutterites in renewed suffering. In order to assume the government assigned to him by the archdukes and to depose his brother, who was sinking into insanity, Matthias drew up an army, which was joined by Hungarian troops, and he frequently quartered them on the Hutterian Bruderhofs. Also the troops acquired in Moravia liked to lodge in the Bruderhofs. The treaty of June 24, 1608, ceded to Matthias the government of Hungary, Austria, and Moravia; on Nov. 16 the Pressburg Reichstag elected him king of Hungary. In the following year Matthias again turned his attention to the Anabaptists, who had been taken back by the barons of Lower Austria. He asked the authorities to report on what had previously been done about them and especially what had been done to those coming from Germany (copy in the national archives for Lower Austria in Vienna).

The Passau attack on Bohemia was followed by the mustering of new troops in Moravia, causing the Bruderhofs of Maskowitz, Stiegnitz, Olekowitz, and Niembschitz considerable hardship. Matthias marched to Bohemia, from which archduke Leopold had to retreat with his Passau troops, and was crowned as king of Bohemia on May 23. On June 13, 1612, Rudolf died, and Matthias was elected as emperor at Frankfurt.

The Moravian diet decided on Aug. 15, 1612, to assess each of the Hutterite Bruderhofs 100 florins (Pamatkenbuch in the Moravian national archives in Brno). Matthias had been represented at this diet by his younger brother Maximilian, who had a clock made by the Priebitz Bruderhof, which was famed for its clocks. In September 1613 Johann Dionysius von Zierotin, the negotiator, informed the archduke that his clock was finished, and would cost 170 florins, because the Brethren had made an identical clock for Cardinal Dietrichstein for that price. (Copy in the Zierotin archives in Blauda.)

It is reported that the emperor ordered the Dominican prior Stallhofer to expel the Hutterites from Zierotitz and Gaiwitz, and that this was done (from a manuscript in the Moravian archives in Brno). Beyond this incident the Brethren had peace during the remainder of Matthias' reign. In Slovakia they even rebuilt their Bruderhofs in Sobotiste and Protzka. On Aug. 18, 1618, the diet at Brno in the presence of archduke Ferdinand decided to assess the Moravian Bruderhofs a war tax of 50 florins in addition to the current 100 florins. Not long after, Matthias died, and the destruction of the Moravian Hutterite settlements set in. P.De.

A. Gundely, Rudolf II. und seine Zeit (1862-65); F. Krones, Handbuch der Geschichte Oesterreichs . . . (1878 f.); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; M. Uhlirz, Handbuch der Geschichte Oesterreichs (1927-30); ML III, 59 f.

Matthias van Balck (Matthias Belkensis): see Matthijs van Balk.

Matthias Servaes von Ottenheim (Kottenem, Kottenheim), an Anabaptist martyr, was born in 1536 in the district of Mayen, near Coblence, Germany. He was a linen weaver. His wife, Aeltgen (Adelheid) van Tongeren (in the bishopric of Liége), apparently did not understand German, for in one of his letters Matthias asked for a Dutch New Testament for her. Servaes was baptized at Andernach, Germany, and lived for a time at Brohl. His simple manner won him the respect and affection of his fellow believers. He was ordained a preacher of the Anabaptists by Zelis from the Eifel, an itinerant Anabaptist preacher, who courageously cared for his brotherhood in the time of persecution. He was distinguished by his natural eloquence and noble character. Preaching and baptizing he traveled with Heinrich von Krufft, a Jülich Anabaptist, through the regions of the lower Rhine. "Heinrich Krufft and Servaes are the chief preachers who are accustomed to teach their people and baptize around Gladbach, Dülken, Süchteln and the vicinity in many villages. He could not tell where Krufft lived, for Krufft does not stay long at a place. Meetings were held between Gladbach and Viersen in a stone quarry," we read in the confession of Thies von Dülken.

In 1565 Servaes was in Cologne to minister to the sorely tried church there. In the midst of severest persecution the Cologne Anabaptists had continued their meetings. But one evening their place of meeting was betrayed and all attending were captured. There were about 56 persons, Servaes among them. They were taken to the Bayen tower, where their names were recorded. When they were asked who their preacher was Martin Servaes freely acknowledged his calling. The trial was directed chiefly against him. With deceit and cunning, with beseeching and threatening they beset him; to learn the names of other Anabaptist preachers they placed him on the rack; with the severest torture they sought to learn who had ordained him and to obtain information which would lead to the detection of others. But "I pressed my lips together, yielded myself to God, suffered patiently and thought of the Word of the Lord: Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friends," he writes in noble humility and simple heroism. During his imprisonment he engaged in several discussions with Cassander (q.v.), an important Catholic scholar. His faithfulness to his convictions deeply impressed Cassander as well as others who disputed with him. Eberhard, the Bishop's chaplain, is said to have kindly commended him to the Lord, he writes in a letter. "And if we were where the duke wishes, we would be free." The judges became more lenient and kindly in feeling. "The affair would probably be all right," they observed, "if it would not finally end in revolution." Thus the quiet meetings of the Anabaptists were considered seditious and illegal. Their steadfast devotion to their faith was in the eyes of the authorities an obstinate adherence to heresy which merited death. This is expressed in an old tower chronicle of Cologne, which records of Servaes, "Anno 1565, on Saturday, the thirtieth or last day of June, Mattheis Servays of Cottenheim, preacher and baptizer, by vocation a linen weaver, Hermann von Daverkhausen, and Jost Böterknap, a tapestry weaver of Brussels, all three Anabaptists, because of their obstinacy and also because they held secret meetings at night contrary to law . . . , and because they have repeatedly administered baptism contrary to imperial mandates, further because they stubbornly persist in their heretical faith and rebaptism, will not desist from their error nor listen to pious admonitions, have been delivered from the Cunibert tower to the duke and the bailiff according to custom." A great crowd is said to have assembled at the site of the execution. The hymn written to commemorate his death describes the crowd and the pity felt by some that he should die for such a deed. Servaes had pardoned his enemies, and suffered martyrdom happy for the privilege of giving his life for the glory of God.

The nobility of his character is seen in the letters he wrote in prison to his family, his brethren, and the members of his church. Concerning this epistle Goebel says, "They are true pearls of Christian life and on a par with the most beautiful testimonies of Protestant martyrs. Where do we find in them, breathing as they do the peace of God, and the spirit of conciliation, any seditious, traitorous ideas that threaten temporal authority? Besides practical admonitions to his fellow elders Servaes writes a happy confession of his Biblical faith. Patiently he bears his bonds to the glory of the heavenly Father. Yea, he is willing to endure even greater suffering, not to secure his place in heaven, but to the greater honor of God. It is not fanaticism, which probably also makes superhuman endurance possible, that speaks from his open letters, but the peace of a heart that hopes soon to enter into the heavenly home."

His death is sung in the hymn, "Hinweg ist mir genommen," that names Heinrich von Krufft in acrostics; it is No. 1095 f. in Wackernagel, Kirchenlied V, and No. 24 in the Ausbund. Another hymn, beginning with the words, "Mit Angst und Not ruf ich dich an," and spelling the name of Servaes in acrostics, was written by him (Wackernagel, No. 665, and Ausbund, No. 41). Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror contains 10 letters by Servaes, all written in prison and addressed as follows: one to H. K. (i.e., Heinrich Krufft); one to his brother; one to I. N.; one to the congregation of Cologne; one to his mother, his brother Johann, his brother-in-law Leonhard, and his two sisters; one to his wife, who was also in prison; one to I. N. and his brethren; one to his wife Aeltgen; one to F. V. H.; and one to Maria West. O.H.

Rembert, Wiedertäufer; Wolkan, Lieder, 49, 91, 100; M. Goebel, Gesch. des christlichen Lebens in der rheinisch-westphälisch-evangelischen Kirche I (Coblenz, 1849) 217; Wackernagel, Kirchenlied; Mart. Mir. D 327-43, E 688-703; BRN VII, see Index; DB 1868, 45-48; E. Crous, "The Mennonites in Germany Since the Thirty Years' War," MQR XXV (October 1951) 237; Der Mennonit IX, No. 1 (January 1956) 11; Leonhard Ennen, Geschichte der Stadt Köln IV (Cologne and Neuss, 1875) 816-20; ML I, 338 f.

Matthijs van Balk (Matthias van Balck, Matthias Belkensis, or Maes de Schoenmaker), probably a native of Balk, Dutch province of Friesland, was a leader in the revolutionary wing of Anabaptism. After the fall of Oldeklooster (q.v.) in March 1534 he fled from Friesland to Ommelanden, Dutch province of Groningen, where he met with other revolutionary leaders like Jan van Batenburg (q.v.), whom he won over to his group. About his activity during the Münster (q.v.) period nothing is known. In the summer of 1536 he was among the Anabaptist leaders who met at Bocholt (Boekholt), Westphalia, where he defended the Münsterite principles of force and polygamy against Jan Matthijsz van Middelburg and Jan Smeitgen van Tricht. He is said then to have been of an advanced age. Here his trace is lost. vdZ.

K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 41; DB 1917, 120 (No. 119), 138; 1919, 193; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 201; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index.

Matthijs (Matthijsz, Matthysen), Hans, was from about 1580 an elder of the High German Mennonite group at Haarlem, Holland, who later joined the Waterlander congregation. It seems that he was present at the disputation (q.v.) held at Leeuwarden in 1596 between the Reformed minister Ruardus Acronius (q.v.) and the Mennonite Elder Pieter van Ceulen (q.v.); for in a letter dated Leeuwarden, Dec. 14, 1596, and addressed to the noted Waterlander Elder Hans de Ries (q.v.), then at Emden, Germany, he wrote about this dispute, of which he expected little result. In 1608 he played a somewhat unclear role in a quarrel caused in the United Waterlander-High German congregation of Haarlem by the controversies of Leenaerdt Clock (q.v.) and Denijs van Hulle. Concerning his person and activity there is little information. A letter found in the Amsterdam archives (II, 2, No. 656) seems to indicate that he was living at Leeuwarden in 1612, an elder of the local congregation. In 1613 he published Brief om overghelevert te worden aen de leraren der Vlaemscher Mennoniten . . . (Haarlem, 1613). In the same year he was one of the delegates at the Waterlander conference held at Workum, Friesland, to consider disciplinary measures against Rippert Eenkes (q.v.). If the name Hans Martens, found in a report of 1618 (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, 662), refers—as is probable—to Hans Matthijs, he was still living in 1618 and active in solving the matter of Rippert Eenkes. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 476, 493, 527; II, Nos. 1358, 1362 f.; II, 2, No. 656; DB 1864, 41, 51, 53 f.; 1897, 112; 1903, 59 f., 64.

Matthijs van Lind, an Anabaptist martyr: see Tijs (Thijs) van Lind.

Mat(t)ijs Olbrantsz: see Thijs Olbrants.

Matthysz, Hughe: see Mattheissen, Hugo.

Mauer: see Meckesheim.

Maugansville, Md., population 700, is an unincorporated village in the northern part of Washington County, three miles northwest of Hagerstown. Mennonites (MC) live in and around the village. The Reiff (q.v.) Mennonite Church is located two miles to the northwest, while the Paradise Mennonite Church (q.v.) and the Miller Mennonite Church are situated east of the village, the latter church two miles from Leitersburg. These three churches had a combined membership of 564 in 1954. The Mennonite Old People's Home (q.v.) is located near Maugansville. M.K.H.

Mauhadih Mennonite Mission Station (GCM), India, was opened on Jan. 11, 1911, by P. J. Wiens. The address is Mauhadih, via Champa, M.P., India.

Mauhadih is located about 25 miles south of Champa, which lies on the Bengal-Nagpur railroad line, 400 miles west of Calcutta. The first small house of worship was built of sun-dried brick in 1911. This was replaced by a spacious, burnt-brick church in 1920. The congregation was organized in 1915 or 1916. The Indian pastor of the church in 1949 was Samson Walters. There are 159 baptized members and 134 unbaptized children. During 1918-38 the boys' orphanage and middle school were located in Mauhadih. In 1937 there was a devastating flood. Fearing a recurrence of this, the school was moved to Jagdeespur, about 30 miles south. In 1954 the Mauhadih mission station was moved to a new location on higher ground, about two miles northeast of the old site. Here in New Mauhadih there is a primary school with over 100 children. There is also a dispensary under the supervision of the medical staff of the Champa Christian Hospital. New Mauhadih is chiefly an evangelistic station seeking to bring the Gospel to the approximately 355 villages in that area. A.E.I.

Maulbronn, a city and district of Württemberg, Germany, where the Anabaptist movement found many adherents in the 16th century. Its spread was facilitated by the forests on the border between Württemberg and the Electoral Palatinate. Only one martyr is known in the region; in 1529 Georg Baumann of Bauschlott was put to death, because after recanting he had rejoined the Anabaptists (Beck, 32 and Wolkan, 59). Most of the Anabaptists escaped persecution by emigrating to Moravia to join the Hutterian brotherhoods, who carried on an active evangelization around Maulbronn well into the 17th century. Frequent searching parties for the Anabaptists failed to disclose them.

A Hutterite preacher, Matthias Binder (q.v.), who was visiting his mother in Frickenhausen, was imprisoned in Maulbronn on April 15, 1573, and was kept here for a long time. The prison of the Cistercian monastery at Maulbronn was apparently a favorite of the authorities, for there were prisoners here from all parts of the country. On June 2, 1573, orders came from Stuttgart to the abbot to fasten Binder by a chain or otherwise in the cell that had been occupied in 1567-69 by Blasius Greiner (q.v.) and others, and to put them on small rations (Bossert, 371). The abbot tried unsuccessfully to win Binder for the church or at least to extract from him a promise to stay out of Württemberg (Bossert, 374-76; Wolkan, 383). He was then taken to the prison of Hohenwittlingen (q.v.). From prison in Maulbronn he wrote two letters to the brotherhood in Moravia which were published by Bossert (369-71, and 373-74).

While Binder lay in prison in Maulbronn, the Hutterites sent other missionaries to Maulbronn, whose sermons were heard by large audiences, especially in the Bretten forest. Orders were accordingly issued to the foresters on July 21, 1574, from Stuttgart, to keep a sharp lookout for these meetings, especially for the leaders, and to turn them over to the authorities; a reward was promised for capture, and punishment for carelessness or for aiding them to escape (Bossert, 418).

During those years the migration to Moravia from Maulbronn became rather extensive. To thwart it the authorities directed the abbot and the bailiff of Maulbronn not to grant permission for the sale of property, unless the seller could prove that the place to which he was going had nothing to do with the Anabaptists. If the people mentioned their poverty and the prospect of better nutrition, they should be advised against going to Moravia and promised that they would not be allowed to starve in Maulbronn (Bossert, 417). In spite of these measures the emigration to Moravia continued; sometimes the refugees left all their property behind (Bossert, 422 and 499); nor could the forest meetings be prevented. In July 1596 attendance at an Anabaptist service was punished by a day in prison and a small fine (Bossert, 687), and in 1607 with three days in prison; whoever sheltered a preacher had to atone with eight days in prison and a fine of ten guilders (Bossert, 793).

The scope of the emigration to Moravia can be estimated from the fact that by 1613 Anabaptist property to the value of 25,593 florins had been confiscated; i.e., nearly half of the amount confiscated by the order of 1571 in the duchy of Württemberg. This amount is evidence that the Anabaptists valued their faith above their possessions. Hege.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Bossert, TA Württemberg; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 61.

Maurer, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, from Flass, a village in Tirol, Austria, Bozen district, was taken to Gufidaun (q.v.) with six other brethren, including Christian Alseider and Valtin Gsäl (q.v.) and executed there in October 1533. In prison they wrote several letters to their brethren, two of which have been preserved. Neff.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 108 f.; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 75; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Loserth, Anabaptismus, 510; H. Amman, Die Wiedertäufer in Michelsberg (Programm, Brixen, 1896); Mart. Mir. D 33, E 444, where the date is erroneously given as 1536; ML III, 61.

Maurer, Wendel, an Anabaptist martyr, executed in 1581 at Bretten, Germany. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 279; ML III, 61.)

Maurice (Moritz) (1521-53), Duke and Elector of Saxony, Germany, the son of Henry the Pious (q.v.), who introduced the Reformation in Albertine Saxony, succeeded his father to the duchy in 1541, attained to the electorship after the Schmalkaldian War, in which he fought on the emperor's side in spite of his sympathetic interest in the reformers, then deserted the emperor, compelled the signing of the treaty of Passau of 1552, and died in 1553 of a wound received in the victorious battle of Sievershausen, "a man of cool political calculation and full of religious indifference."

When Maurice assumed the government in 1541 at the age of 20 years, there were in the duchy some isolated Anabaptists, in spite of the bloody persecution under his predecessor, the strictly Catholic Duke George (q.v.). At the end of July 1543 two women and a man were seized in Beyernaumburg, a village east of Sangerhausen, where Anabaptists had been imprisoned earlier, and were ordered by the duke to be cross-examined by the preachers of Beyernaumburg, Kaltenborn, and Nienstedt. Further information concerning them is unfortunately missing. In Mühlhausen in Thuringia (q.v.), which was jointly ruled by Maurice and the landgrave of Hesse, he ordered the violent extermination of Anabaptists in 1545, but was unable to overcome the tolerant attitude of Philip of Hesse, his father-in-law. And so the Anabaptist leader Christoph von der Eichen was permitted to leave the country with his wife and child, though his return to Mühlhausen was forbidden on penalty of death. On the whole, there were hardly any heresy trials under Maurice; matters of faith played a subordinate role in his politics. The final eradication of the Anabaptist movement in Saxony was reserved for his less gifted brother and successor, the strictly Lutheran August. G.H.

P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); idem, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen von 1526-1584 (Jena, 1913); ML III, 167 f.

Maurice of Orange (1567-1625), the son of William and his second wife Anna of Saxony, was born Nov. 14, 1567, d. in 1625. After the death of his father in 1584 Maurice succeeded him as stadholder of a large part of the Netherlands. He continued the struggle with Spain with vigor, displaying more talent as a general than as a statesman. In his later years he was a fanatical Calvinist, though probably from political rather than religious considerations, and as such he persecuted the Remonstrants (q.v.). Toward the Mennonites he was tolerant. When the magistrate of Middelburg (q.v.) oppressed the Mennonites living in that city, and Maillaert de Poorter and Joost Leonisse (Joos Loysen) in the name of the Mennonites appealed to the prince, he wrote a letter dated March 4, 1593, ordering the Middelburg authorities to leave to the Mennonites all the liberties his father had granted them. As Duke of Mörs and Lord of Crefeld, he also protected the Mennonites of this area in 1622 against his bailiff Sterckenburg, who wanted to execute the Mennonites of Crefeld for holding meetings. vdZ.

G. Brandt, Historie der Reformatie I (2nd ed. Amsterdam, 1677) 780 f., where the letter of 1593 is found in full; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 214; DB 1908, 40; DJ 1930, 136, note 1; Der Mennonit IX, No. 7 (July 1956) 107; ML III, 167.

Maurik, van, a Dutch Mennonite family found at Utrecht, Amsterdam, Haarlem, and Rotterdam. A number of its members served as deacons and at least three of them were Mennonite ministers. Aert Thonisz van Maurik was appointed preacher in the Flemish congregation of Utrecht in 1653 (DB 1874, 81). He was the ancestor of many generations of Mennonites. His son (or his cousin?) Willem van Maurik (q.v.) was a physician and a minister at Utrecht and Amsterdam. Matthys van Maurik (d. 1737) of Utrecht prepared the translation of two books by Herman Schijn (q.v.). The first was published in 1727 at Amsterdam and Utrecht, Geschiedenis der Protestantsche Christenen, in't Vereenigd Nederland genaamd Mennoniten, a translation of Schijn's Historia Christianorum, qui in Belgio Foederatione inter Protestantes Mennonitae appellantur of 1723. The second was published in 1738, after his death, at Amsterdam, Uitvoeriger Verhandeling of Vervolg van de Geschiedenis der Mennonieten, a translation of Schijn's Historia Mennonitarum plenior deductio of 1729. This Matthys van Maurik was a deacon of the Utrecht congregation in 1721-24, 1728-32, and 1736-37. His son Willem van Maurik Matth.zn of Utrecht, after studying at the Amsterdam Lamist seminary, was a preacher of the Vlaemsche Blok congregation at Haarlem 1738-*ca.*60. vdZ.

Maurik (Maurick, Mourik), Willem (Wilhem) van, b. ca. 1625 at Utrecht, d. 1710 at Amsterdam, was a physician and a Mennonite minister. On Feb. 21, 1658, he was chosen as preacher of the Utrecht Flemish congregation. Being rather progressive and of Collegiant (q.v.) inclination, he was soon involved in trouble with the conservative part of the congregation, particularly with his co-preacher Robbert Jansz van Hoog(h)veldt (q.v.), who was very conservative. Van Hoogveldt severely censured van Maurik's officiating in the Waterlander congregation of Rotterdam, and accused him of heresy. Then van Maurik, acting with three co-preachers, Arent van Heuven, Johann Andriesz van Aken, and Goris van Aldendorp, who were in sympathy with van Maurik, published a confession of faith, Een Belydenisse aengaende de voornaemste Leer-stucken (Utrecht, 1659). Though this confession was couched in orthodox terms, its moderation, laying more stress upon Christian practice than upon Christian doctrine, displeased the conservative leaders of the congregation; van Hoogveldt wrote his Korte doch nodighe Waerschouwinghe (n.p., 1659), and the conservatives felt obliged to present a number of questions to van Maurik and his three colleagues. They at first refused to answer, but finally reluctantly gave a reply. This seems to have satisfied the conservatives; at least in January 1660 peace was restored. But the quarrel arose anew. Apparently at the instigation of van Hoogveldt the city government presented twelve questions, which had been drawn up by the Reformed minister Cornelis Gentman (q.v.; see also Geuzenvragen), to van Maurik. Van Maurik did not reply and the city governors dropped the matter. But now the conservatives, charging van Maurik and his three colleagues with Collegiant sympathies and heresy, arranged a meeting in which the leaders from the outside (buitenmannen) were invited to make a decision. The meeting was held at Utrecht July 29-Aug. 11, 1661. Among the buitenmannen, all of whom were conservative leaders, were T. J. van Braght from Dordrecht, Bastiaan van Weenigem and Jean Boenes from Rotterdam, and Isaac Snep from Haarlem. On Aug. 10 they suspended van Maurik, van Aldendorp, van Heuven, and Andriesz from their office. Deep dissension arose in the congregation because many members were in sympathy with the suspended preachers. Finally in July 1664 van Maurik with his following withdrew from the main body and began to hold separate meetings. The root of the conflict was the question whether the Flemish church was the true and only Christian church on earth. Van Hoogveldt and the conservatives affirmed this question, van Maurik and his followers denied it. The division lasted until 1675, when the two groups reunited. In 1673 van Maurik had moved to Amsterdam. Here he was at once appointed preacher of the Lam and Toren congregation (united Flemish and Waterlander church) and worked in harmony with Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), with whom he was so congenial. On April 19, 1706, he stood at the deathbed of Galenus. On May 16, 1706, he commemorated his colleague in a funeral sermon, which was published: Lykreden. Op Galenus Abrahamsz (Amsterdam, n.d.). He also published some posthumous works of Galenus. Besides this and the Belydenisse mentioned before, van Maurik published Wydt-loopiger Verhael van de beklaeglycke onlusten . . . teghen R. van Hoochvelt (Utrecht, 1662) and Verantwoording tegen het Placcaet van de stad Bern. In Amsterdam, as a member of the Committee for Foreign Needs, van Maurik was also active in behalf of the oppressed Swiss Mennonites. vdZ.

DB 1916, 150-93; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1254b; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954); passim, see Index.

Maurissus van Dale, an Anabaptist martyr, b. 1518 or 1519 at Bellem near Gent, Belgium, a sheriff of Gent, joined the Mennonite congregation at Gent. In the records he is called a "bishop of the Mennonites." Further particulars about him were not available. On June 25, 1573, he was burned at the stake outside the Peterselle gate of Gent. Adriaen van Haemstede (q.v.) erroneously listed him in his martyrbook as a Reformed martyr. (Verheyden, Gent, 63, No. 223; idem, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," Ms.) vdZ.

Mauthausen in Upper Austria, an important station for the Anabaptists going from Tirol to Moravia. A decree issued by Ferdinand in Vienna on March 18, 1534, to the council of Mauthausen contains strict orders not to permit the Anabaptists to pass either by land or on the Danube, but to drive them away at once. Wolfgang Brandhuber (q.v.) preached at Mauthausen about 1527-29 and may have established a congregation here. Loserth.

Mauthausen, Marktarchiv 9; G. Loesche in Jahrbuch der Gesellschaft f. d. Gesch. des Prot. in Oesterreich XL f., 179; ML III, 61 f.

Mauve, Anton (Anthony), b. Sept. 18, 1858, at Zaandam, Dutch province of North Holland, baptized at Haarlem in November 1858, d. Feb. 5, 1888, at Arnhem, one of the best (if not the best) landscape painters in the Hague School, in which the finest traditions of the Old Dutch painting were brought to a new and fuller fruition under the influence of the impressionistic views of nature that had already produced in French art in the Barbizon School an era of rich and worthy revival. Mauve, as well as his equally gifted contemporary, P. J. C. Gabriel, kept himself rather aloof from the Romanticism characteristic of the Naturalism of the Hague School. His work is distinguished by its disciplined yet delicate portrayal, in the cool, luminous, yet tender and clear tone of his oils and water colors. The beauty of "het Gooi" and particularly that of the Laren landscape was in a sense discovered by Mauve.

It is probable that Mauve influenced Vincent van Gogh, who was a cousin of his wife (Colmjon, 45). Many of Mauve's paintings are found in the Mesdag Museum; the reason for this is probably the fact that Mauve and H. W. Mesdag were close friends. The Rijksmuseum of Amsterdam also has a large collection. Mauve paintings are numerous in many European and even some American museums.

Anton Mauve was the son of a Mennonite pastor, Willem Carel Mauve (1803-69), who served the congregations at Enschedé 1830-36, Zaandam-Oost 1836-39, and Haarlem 1839-63; he was the author of a small catechism on Biblical history (Haarlem, 1846). He came into the Mennonite brotherhood from the Reformed Church. H.F.W.J., C.K.

Archives of the Zaandam-Oost Mennonite Church; E. Pekema, Iets over de Doopsgezinde gemeente te Enschedé; G. Heeringa, Uit het verleden der Doopsgezinden in Twenthe (1934); Germen Colmjon, The Hague School (Rijswijk, 1951) 41; E. B. Greenshields, Landscape Painting and Modern Dutch Artists (New York, 1906) 155; Frank Rutter, "A Consideration of the Work of Anton Mauve," Studio XLII (1908) 3-16; H. P. Baard, "Anton Mauve," Palet Serie (1947); ML III, 62.

Maximilian I (Maximilian Joseph) (1756-1825), first king of Bavaria, Germany. When he assumed government in Bavaria (q.v.) as Elector Maximilian IV Joseph of Zweibrücken on Feb. 16, 1799, he brought about a radical change in the treatment of the Mennonites in the Palatinate. His Jesuit-educated predecessor, Elector Charles Theodore (q.v.), had passed several suppressive measures, which Maximilian, king since 1805, felt to be unjust, and which he removed in his reforms. By decreasing the Catholic influence on affairs of state, he removed the legal restrictions on the Mennonites and put them on a civil plane with other citizens. On April 17, 1801, the right of redemption (jus retractus, q.v.; also Gem.-Kal. 1912, 120-34) was liquidated. In addition, on Oct. 20, 1811, they were permitted free exercise of their faith, churches without bells, and the regulation of the oath in accord with their wishes.

After the Palatinate was ceded to France, Maximilian Joseph was interested in settling Mennonites on farms in South Germany. A number of German princes sought them out as master farmers (Correll, 130-33). An attempt was to be made to open the Donaumoos (q.v.), northwest of Munich, for agriculture, leading to the founding of Maxweiler (q.v., named after the king) by eight Mennonite families from the Palatinate. The Mennonites also acquired a number of suppressed monasteries (1803) in Upper Bavaria and Franconia, which Catholic peasants, partly because of superstitious reasons, were reluctant to accept (Gem.-Kal. 1912, 91, and Correll, 134). Thus the first emigration of Mennonites from the Palatinate and from Alsace took place to southern Bavaria. A large number of the Maxweiler families went to America about the middle of the 19th century, but after 1880 new settlements of Mennonites from Baden and Württemberg were made in southern Bavaria. Hege.

E. Correll, Das schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (Tübingen, 1925); ML III, 63.

Maxmill Hutterite Bruderhof near Scotland, Hutchinson Co., S.D., founded in 1900. Joseph Wipf, who had been chosen preacher in the Bon Homme Bruderhof in 1891, moved with 17 families to Maxmill and settled the colony there. Wipf was born in Russia, and died in 1917. Samuel Hofer was chosen preacher in 1911. In 1918 the Bruderhof sold its property and settled the Maxwell Bruderhof near Pigeon Lake, Man. In 1947 the New Elm Springs Bruderhof bought this site and rebuilt it. D.D.

Maxweiler, a village in the Neuburg district of Bavaria, Germany, on the Danube, a former Mennonite settlement which helped to open the Donaumoos (q.v.) for agriculture. Maximilian Joseph (q.v.), who was acquainted with Mennonite agricultural skills in the Palatinate, granted the Palatine Mennonites who had settled in Donaumoos 270 acres of wooded land per family, where they were to do pioneer work. The number of families in the settlement rose from 8 to 25 in 50 years, 12 of whom lived in Maxweiler, which they established, and 13 in the surrounding villages.

Immediately after they arrived they organized a congregation in the hunting lodge assigned to them while their houses were in building, and chose two preachers from their midst, Daniel and Heinrich Müller, who were ordained by elder Heinrich Zeiset of Willenbach, near Heilbronn. At first they assembled in the home of preacher Müller, and later in the church they built in Maxweiler in 1832, which contained several rooms for school purposes. They taught their own children or had them taught by a member of the settlement. In 1848 the government provided a teacher for them; they were to raise one fourth of his salary. At their request religious instruction was left to them.

In spite of all their efforts, which were recognized with great praise by the authorities, the struggle for existence was very difficult in the settlement because of the low productivity of the soil. Therefore beginning in 1852 the young men were attracted to America, where there were better prospects and where they would be exempt from military service, to which the second generation of settlers was subject (Correll, 83). They were soon followed by other members of their families. Between 1852 and 1855 most of them emigrated to Lee County in Iowa (q.v.), and joined the Mennonites who had recently come from the Palatinate and from nearby Eichstock (q.v.) in the congregation of Donnellson (q.v.) and West Point, where the former preachers at Eichstock, David Ruth and Jacob Krehbiel, were located (Rupp, 10), with whom they had been acquainted in Germany. The rest of the Maxweiler Mennonites settled in Summerfield, Ill. All left the settlement on the Donaumoos.

The two Iowa churches formed a union in 1859. They thereby laid the foundation for the General Conference Mennonite Church, which was constituted in Wadsworth, Ohio, in 1861, with the addition of six other congregations, including Summerfield.

The church at Maxweiler has since the emigration of the Mennonites served the village as a school. The Mennonite farms passed into the hands of Protestant peasants. HEGE.

Ernst Correll, "Die Mennoniten im Donaumoos," in Gem.-Kal. 1922, 80-91; H. P. Krehbiel, The History of the General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America (Canton, 1898); Jakob Rupp, Entstehung und Auflösung der Gemeinde zu Maxweiler bei Neuburg an der Donau (Moundridge, 1924); Cornelius Krahn, "Zur Auswanderung der Mennoniten von Maxweiler und Eichstock," Gesch.-Bl., December 1938, 81; "Haus- und Handbuch für die Familie David Ruth zu Eichstock, 1852," and "Stammbuch der evangelischen Mennonitengemeinde in Westpoint, Lee County, Iowa . . . 1864" (the last two in BeCHL); ML III, 63 f.

Maxwell Hutterite Bruderhof in Manitoba. In 1918 many of the Hutterian Brethren in the United States went to Canada because of Canada's more liberal provisions for conscientious objectors to war. The Bruderhof at Maxwell, S.D., consisting of 29 families and their preacher Samuel Hofer, made a settlement near Headingly, Man. Samuel Hofer was chosen minister on Jan. 15, 1911, and confirmed on March 17, 1918, in South Dakota. Other preachers are Jörg Waldner, chosen Aug. 4, 1929, confirmed Dec. 16, 1934, Jörg Wipf, chosen Jan. 31, 1937, and Joseph Hofer, chosen 1919 and confirmed March 18, 1928. In 1947 the Bruderhof had 78 inhabitants, of whom 28 were baptized members. D.D.

May City (Alberta) United Missionary Church, organized in 1907, had 33 members in 1953, with Lloyd Torgerson as pastor. M.G.

Mayak Bible School, located in Davlekanovo village, Ufa, Russia, the last of the three Bible schools established by the Mennonites of Russia after World War II, was founded in September 1923 by Karl Friedrichsen (q.v.), a Mennonite preacher, who had served as a Bible teacher in the Davlekanovo Zentralschule in 1913-22. He was the director, and apparently the sole teacher of the school throughout its history. The government permit for the school was issued July 27, 1923, and withdrawn in November 1926. Friedrichsen appointed a school council of four local ministers, including the two local elders (Mennonite and Mennonite Brethren) to assist him. Financial support came from widely scattered sources, including small contributions from the Emergency Relief Commission at Newton, Kan., and from "Licht dem Osten" at Wernigerode, Germany. The school sessions were held in the Davlekanovo Mennonite Church. The course was a three-year curriculum leading to a diploma, the school year Sept. 15-May 1.

Enrollment in the school never was more than seven at one time (1924-25), five in the last full year, with a total of 13 different persons, all men, in the entire first three years, of whom three graduated in April 1926. The enrollment of the final school year is not known. Of the 13 students, nine were M.B., one Mennonite, two Freie Gemeinde, and one Baptist. They came from Siberia (6), Turkestan(5), Alt-Samara (1), and Ufa (1). A picture of the teacher and five students enrolled in April 1926 appeared in Unser Blatt for June 1926 (I, 203).

The school was definitely a ministerial training school, one of three started in 1923. The other two, Tchongrav in the Crimea and Orenburg, had to close before April 1926. Similar shorter preachers' courses planned for Slavgorod and Orenburg in 1926 were not permitted by the government. A general Mennonite Bible School planned by the KfK (q.v.), for Melitopol, which was to begin in the fall of 1927, for which permission had been orally promised on Oct. 20, 1926, by the government but never granted in writing, had to be given up. H.S.B.

K. Friedrichsen, "Die Majak-Bibelschule," with financial report, Unser Blatt I (1926) 138 f.; idem, "Schlussakt der Majak-Bibelschule in Davlekanovo," Unser Blatt I (1927) 220-22; idem, "Die Allgemeine Mennonitische Bibelschule," Unser Blatt I (1926) 280-84; Der Bote II, No. 27, 6.

Maycken (Martine) 's Heeren, an Anabaptist martyr, b. at Belle (Bailleul), Flanders, and living at Brugge, Belgium, a widow, was apprehended at Brugge in February 1568 with 13 other Mennonites, of whom only four, including Maycken, remained steadfast. Maycken was burned at the stake at Brugge between April 13 and July 28, 1568. (Verheyden, Brugge, 54, No. 52.) vdZ.

Mayer, Mar(c)x, an early Anabaptist leader from Alterlangen near Nürnberg in Germany, about whose Anabaptist activity not much is known. In August 1527 he was with many other leaders at the Martyrs' Synod (q.v.) at Augsburg. In June 1530 he was arrested at Creglingen near Ansbach, Germany, but he recanted and was released. Soon after he joined the sect of the Puschenhamers (q.v.) and was beheaded on July 6, 1531. (TA Bayern I, 189, 191, 327-29.) vdZ.

Mayes County (Okla.) Old Order Amish Settlement is located southwest of Choteau, Okla. Among the first Amish families who came there (1910) were Rudy Yoder and M. K. Yoder from Custer Co., Okla., Eli Mast from Ford Co., Kan., David Plank from Reno Co., Kan., R. B. Detweiler from Geauga Co., Ohio, and Eli Miller from Tuscarawas Co., Ohio. The first bishop of the group was M. J. Troyer, and L. M. Yoder was the first minister. There has always been only one district. In 1956 the membership was 64. N.Y.

Mayken (i.e., Maria, Mary), the name of a number of martyrs: see Maeyken.

Mayrl, Hans, an Anabaptist leader, was seized early in 1530 in or near Petersburg in the Tirol, Austria, together with his wife. On April 26 of that year the judge was reprimanded for being too lenient with the prisoners. The judges had received orders to act "not in accord with their conscience, but in accord with the imperial mandate." The orders were further to apply the rack. Two councilors from Innsbruck and two from Hall should be called to the trial; the Anabaptist preacher should be executed, and others pardoned according to their deserts. If Hans Maryl should recant, he might be "pardoned to beheading" and be buried in consecrated earth. Very likely the sentence was carried out. W.W.

G. Loesche, Archivalische Beiträge zur Geschichte des Täufertums und des Protestantismus in Tirol (1926) 33 f.; ML III, 64.

Mayton Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located near Mayton, Alberta, had its origin with the arrival of the first settlers on March 11, 1901, from northwestern Iowa. Amos S. Bauman, a minister, came with his family in the spring of 1903. S. F. Coffman organized the Mayton congregation. On July 27, 1903, A. S. Bauman was ordained bishop by lot, and on Aug. 3, 1903, Noah Gerber was ordained to the office of deacon. John K. Lehman was ordained minister in 1906. In the meantime Bishop Bauman had left the church, to join the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church. In 1915 Lehman with his family moved to Oregon because of his wife's ailing health. In 1918 they, however, returned, but moved to Tofield, Alberta. At about the same time most of the rest of the congregation also moved to Tofield, where they were amalgamated in the Salem (q.v.) congregation. A few members continued to live at Mayton, but held their membership with the West Zion church, near Carstairs, Alberta. E.S.

Meade Bible Academy, located 12 miles southeast of Meade, Kan., operated by the two Mennonite churches in the community (E.M.B. and Emmanuel), was established in 1945 as a 2-year high school and in 1948 became a full 4-year accredited school. It was originally the outgrowth of the Meade Bible School started in 1936 in the E.M.B. church basement, which in turn was preceded by a German Bible School conducted 1927-30 by missionary G. T. Thiessen. The academy in 1955 had an enrollment of 71, a staff of six, a modern fireproof administration building erected in 1955, two frame classroom buildings, and a large teacherage. J.L.E.

Meade County, Kan., is located in the semiarid area of southwestern Kansas along the Oklahoma border. It was not until the late 19th and early 20th centuries that this part of Kansas was transformed from prairie grazing land into tilled agricultural units. Mennonites from Jansen, Neb. (Kleine Gemeinde), and Inman, Kan., were among the early settlers. The first two Mennonite families were those of Peter F. Rempel and Jacob B. Friesen, both from Nebraska, who settled on homesteaded land approximately ten miles south of Meade (pop. 1500) in 1906. Today there are two Mennonite congregations in Meade County with a combined membership of 400. One congregation belongs to the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Conference (q.v.) and the other, the Emmanuel Mennonite Church (q.v.), is at present unaffiliated but was formerly a part of the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.). The family names of Bartel, Ediger, Friesen, Isaac, Loewen, Rempel, Reimer, and Wiens predominate. J.W.F.

Meade Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church, located eight miles south and four miles east of Meade, Kan., a member of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Conference of the United States and Canada, was organized on June 10, 1910, with 14 members, by Elder Henry E. Fast of Mountain Lake, Minn. The first church, built in 1920, has twice been replaced by larger buildings. In 1930 the Nebo congregation united with the Meade congregation. The present membership is 244. The following ministers have served the church: A. M. Doerksen (ordained 1914), Peter F. Friesen, G. T. Thiessen, H. R. Harms, D. J. Ediger, J. E. Wiens, B. A. Wiens, Orlando Wiebe, John N. Wall, H. P.

Wiebe, Alvin D. Kleinsasser, and Arnold Wall, who is now the pastor. The Meade Bible Academy (q.v.) is a co-operative project supported jointly by the E.M.B. Church and the Emmanuel Mennonite Church (q.v.). H.St.

Meade (Kan.) Kleine Gemeinde Mennonite Church was transplanted from Jansen, Neb. (q.v.), in 1906-8. The influences of more evangelistic Mennonite groups, the adjustment to the American environment as a whole, and the determination of the leader to maintain the status quo caused the disintegration of the church. The Diener-Konferenz in 1937, attended by Canadian Kleine Gemeinde ministers, could not settle the problems. The attendance at the two churches dwindled to a mere handful. Separate meetings were initiated in one of the church buildings by some dissatisfied members, which brought about the organization of a new church. H. R. Harms of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church was asked to serve this group, which was officially organized as an unaffiliated Emmanuel Mennonite Church (q.v.) in 1944. The services and activities of the Kleine Gemeinde ceased, although its elders still lived in the community. Most of the members that had not joined the local Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church joined the Emmanuel Mennonite Church. C.K.

Daniel J. Classen, "Meade—A Changing Community," Menn. Life VI (1951) 14 ff.

Meadow Mennonite Church (GCM) in Mingo, 12 miles southeast of Colby, Thomas Co., Kan., a member of the Western District Conference, was organized Sept. 19, 1937, with charter members under the leadership of John H. Epp, who later also served the church as the first resident pastor. The first building was a frame structure with a seating capacity of 90. The present building, a brick structure with a seating capacity of 200, was dedicated Nov. 30, 1952. In 1954 the membership was 82, mostly rural, with J. W. Bergen as pastor. Other ministers who have served are Wm. C. Voth and Walter H. Regier. W.H.R.

Meadow Valley Old Order Mennonite Church, Weaverland Conference, is located in Ephrata Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa. Its meetinghouse was built in 1916. Joseph E. Hostetter is the bishop, Henry W. Martin and Luke N. Good the ministers, and Martin L. Zimmerman deacon. The membership (1955) is 255. I.D.L.

Meadows (Ill.) Mennonite Church (GCM), on U.S. Highway 24 midway between Chenoa and Gridley, a member of the Central District Conference, was organized in 1891, when a white frame building was constructed three quarters of a mile north of Meadows. In 1908 it was moved to its present location in Meadows and remodeled. It was again remodeled, enlarged, and rededicated Sept. 6, 1953, with a seating capacity of 300. The membership in 1954 was 248, mostly rural; the minister was L. E. Troyer. Past ministers (all deceased): Andrew Vercler, Joseph Kinsinger, Aaron Roszhart, George Gundy. L.E.T.

Meadows Mennonite Home, Meadows, McLean Co., Ill., until 1951 called Mennonite Old People's Home, was legally organized as a non-profit corporation on June 6, 1919, by representatives from the Central and Defenseless Mennonite conferences and is supported by these conferences. The main building was erected in 1922, and a west wing added in 1951. On Jan. 6, 1944, the Constitution and Bylaws were revised, and again Feb. 6, 1954, when the name of the institution changed to "Meadows Mennonite Home." Superintendents and matrons who have served the Home are Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Klassen, 2 years, Mr. and Mrs. G. I. Gundy, 22 years, and Mr. and Mrs. Frank R. Mitchell, since 1947. F.R.M.

W. B. Weaver, History of the Central Conference Mennonite Church (Danvers, Ill., 1926).

Meadville Mennonite Mission was located on the southern plateau of the Welsh Mountain, three miles north of White Horse, Lancaster Co., Pa. John L. Musser, then superintendent of the Welsh Mountain Samaritan Home, conducted a summer Bible school in the schoolhouse with success. Thereafter, on July 28, 1954, the ministers of the Hershey district opened Sunday school and services in the same building. The schoolhouse was used until the spring of 1951, when a frame structure 32 x 46 ft. was erected a short distance east of the schoolhouse. In 1955 Galen Hostetter was serving as pastor, with a membership of 41. I.D.L.

Mechanic Grove Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Lancaster Conference, is located near a small rural town by this name, four miles south of Quarryville, Lancaster Co., Pa. When members began to move into this formerly Scotch-Irish area services were desired. In 1877 Amos Herr preached in the village. The 20 members in the fall of 1881 built a frame structure 46 x 35 ft., which served the congregation until 1949, when it was extensively remodeled and enlarged. In 1954 Abram D. Metzler and J. Harold Breneman were serving as ministers, with a membership of 149. In 1920 a schism occurred, led by John W. Swarr, a preacher who led the group into the General Conference Mennonite Church. This group, called the Calvary Mennonite Church, had 57 members in 1954. I.D.L.

Mechanicsburg, Pa., in the beautiful Cumberland Valley is a quiet town of 6,786, seven miles southwest of Harrisburg. The Union House cornerstone was laid June 12, 1798, with Christian Newcomer, a United Brethren bishop, present. It was a house "wherein Christian preachers of all denominations are to enjoy the privilege of preaching." How many decades Mennonites (MC) used this house is not definitely known, but it was only in the early 1950's that they ceased to do so. I.D.L.

Mechel, von, an old publishing house in Basel, Switzerland, which was apparently the only printing office willing to publish whatever the Swiss Mennonites of the late 17th and 18th centuries wanted published. It is well known that this period around the turn of the 17th century was one of harsh persecution by Swiss authorities (mainly in Bern), a time when large-scale emigration to Alsace and the Palatinate took place. And yet, a number of books, tracts, hymns, and prayers were published, to be sure without any indication as to place, year, and author, which soon became standard devotional material of the Brethren. Careful study of all evidence makes it certain that it was this Mechel publishing house where Mennonites found a willing support, not only at the time of the establishment of the firm in 1685, but all through the following centuries, the last publication known from this house being the Ausbund of 1838.

The history of the Mechel house has never been fully studied. The founder of the firm was Johann Conrad von Mechel (1642-1715), who after having been an itinerant journeyman in his trade all over Europe, married in 1681 a daughter of the well-known Basel printer family of J. J. Decker, and opened his own shop in 1685. Since the Deckers had bought the still older Basel printing office of Henricpetri (16th and 17th century), it is not surprising to find woodcuts and colophons of the Henricpetri era on Mechel productions. The elder Johann Conrad was succeeded by his son of the same name (called Hans Conrad, 1681-1734). After the latter's death the firm was continued by his widow Anna Maria, nee Christ, and her twin sons Johann Conrad and Johann Jakob (born 1730), the "Gebrüder Mechel." The last name of interest to us is Jakob Heinrich von Mechel, active 1830-40.

Paul Wernle calls this firm "the pietistic publishing house of Basel" (Wernle, 602). Among other books it published the Basel Gesangbuch of 1743 and later editions, and another Reformed Gesangbüchlein of 1726 and later editions. Most remarkable is also the publication of a Totentanz with 41 woodcuts from 1576, eight editions between 1715 and 1842. (The woodcutter was the well-known Basel artist Gregor Sickinger, the rhymes to the plates come from a certain Fröhlich, both around 1576.)

No one has ever noticed the close ties between this press and the Swiss Mennonites which, however, are quite apparent. An advertising list at the end of the 1822 Mechel edition of the Dordrecht Confession of Faith contains nine Swiss Mennonite books and ten other books much in demand by the Brethren. The Mennonite books are as follows: Ausbund, 1809 (earlier editions seem to have come from the same place); Ernsthafte Christenpflicht, 1796; Güldene Aepffel, 1742 (and also 1702); Schabalie, Die Wandelnde Seele, 1811 (and before 1770); Kleines Handbüchlein, etc., 1801; Glaubensbekenntnis, 1822 (and earlier 1742); D. Philips, Enchiridion, 1822; Ein Sendbrief (about 1720); and G. Roosen, Unschuld und Gegenbericht, 1753. It is most likely that Das Gebätt by Hans Reist (around 1700) was also printed here, as well as earlier editions of the Ausbund (1695 or 99). A Namenbüchlein (see A-B-C-Books) of 1740 was much in use by the Mennonites. Also popular were other Mechel publications such as the Geistliches Lustgärtlein, 1815; Joh. Arndt's Paradiesgärtlein, 1737; Abschied der zwölf Patriarchen, 1744; Sieben Busspsalme, etc., 1751; and Thomas à Kempis (in Teersteegen's translation), 1752 (Friedmann, 98). It is remarkable that in 1822 books more than a century old were still advertised to Swiss Mennonite readers.

A special feature of this publishing firm was its hymn prints. It not only printed official (Reformed) hymnals but also the Ausbund. The 1809 and 1838 editions bear the firm's name, but there is evidence that already around 1695-99 one or two Ausbund editions must have been produced by this press, and most likely one or several 18th-century printings as well (Friedmann, 170 f.). Besides this most important Mennonite hymnal a number of Anabaptist hymn-pamphlets and pamphlet collections were printed here, recognizable by their characteristic colophons and inscriptions on the title page. One Ausbund appeared bound or printed with (same size, same type) Fünf schöne neue geistliche Lieder, 1695 (among them also the Thessalonica hymn), in 1696 followed by the Neuaufgerichtetes geistliches Liederbüchlein (Neff, MQR IV, 1930, 208), and in 1699 by 20 neue geistliche Lieder, with an appendix Drey Geistliche Lieder (Wolkan, Lieder, 157 ff.). The same Drey Geistliche Lieder, 1699, are also found in the rare volume which contains the oldest (1564) edition of the Ausbund. Here they are bound together under one cover. In 1708 another collection of hymns "gedruckt zu Basel" appeared (Neff), and so on. Their Mechel origin is fairly certain. Most remarkable is one volume (at Goshen College Library) containing not less than 96 such hymn pamphlets (with 310 hymns) covering the period from 1709 to 1803 or even later, all of the same size. Among them are found the Haslibacher Lied (q.v.), the Reist-Lied, "Es ist eine wunderschöne Gab," even one hymn from the oldest Ausbund edition, "Wach auf, wach auf," which may be as old as 1540.

There can be no doubt that all these books and pamphlets come from the same press. Two of these books show the same colophon, a circle of 13 death's heads with the circumscription: pope/emperor/king/prince/count/baron/noble/commoner/peasant/rich/poor/old/young. In the center stands the verse from Jesus Sirach, "Mensch du musst sterben" (Eccl. 14:18; see Friedmann, 157 f., and plate III). This emblem is contained in Güldene Aepffel (1702, 1742) and the Sendbrief (1720), both still advertised in 1822. Likewise the inscription "Gedruckt im Jahr da wahre Buss von Nöten war" appears more than once on the title page (Neff and Friedmann, pl. III); since these books are advertised by Mechel in 1822, one may safely assume their origin at this press.

Many of these books and pamphlets bear on their title page woodcuts, some of the early 16th century (once the Henricpetri colophon is used), all of which indicates a fairly uniform publishing policy. This policy is all the more remarkable since it does not conform to the leading style of the period (baroque) but rather uses and re-uses Renaissance or even pre-Renaissance cuts, apparently inherited from the Henricpetri office. Only the death's heads circle is contemporary (around 1700) but it fits very well with the spirit of the reprint of the old Basel Totentanz (originating as far back as 1451) in 1715. A characteristic specimen of the Mechel prints is the Namenbüchlein of 1740 (Bey Johann Conrad von Mechel sel. Wittib) with a woodcut (a family praying before meal), decidedly of early 16th-century origin (Friedmann, plate V; original at Goshen College Library).

With the Ausbund edition of 1838, the connection between the Swiss Mennonite and Amish groups (in Alsace and the Palatinate) and the Mechel publishing house seem to have come to an end. Much gratitude is due to Mechel, for without its readiness to print all these books the literary history of the Swiss Mennonites would have been much poorer. R.F.

Historisch-Biographisches Lexikon der Schweiz; Paul Wernle, Geschichte des Schweizerischen Protestantismus im 18. Jahrhundert I: Vernünftige Orthodoxie und Pietismus (Tübingen, 1923); R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949; here the relationship between Mennonites and the Mechels is studied for the first time); personal information from the Univ. Library of Basel and the Oeffentliche Basler Denkmalpflege; Chr. Neff, "A Hymn of the Swiss Brethren," MQR IV (1930) 208 ff.

Mechelen (Malines), a town in Belgium (pop. 1950, 61,380), which in 1507-30 was the seat of the regent Margaret of Austria (q.v.). Though Anabaptist activity was not very strong here, there must have been some Anabaptists at Mechelen, for in September 1539 a number of them were put to death here (number and names unknown). In 1554-56 Elder Leenaert Bouwens baptized five persons at Mechelen. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 215.) vdZ.

Mechtelt Melis, an Anabaptist martyr of Antwerp, Belgium, drowned there in a sack on Sept. 23, 1552. She was born at The Hague, Holland, and was married to Adriaen Wouterssone, who was executed on the same day as his wife by burning at the stake. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 420, 422, 424; XIV, 20 f., No. 219.) vdZ.

Meckesheim, a village (pop. 2,246) in the Heidelberg district of Baden, Germany, mostly Protestant, was formerly the seat of a Mennonite church, the first of whose members immigrated from Switzerland after the Thirty Years' War. A list of 1731 enumerates the heads of the 16 families (Müller, Berner Täufer, 210). The Dutch Naamlijst of 1766 lists this congregation as Honingerhof and Meckesheim, with Hans Bechtel as preacher from 1732 and elder from 1743; the preachers were Georg Bechtel, David Kaufmann, and Michael Bachmann. The Naamlijst of 1775, where the congregation is called Mauer and Meckesheim, lists Hans Bechtel as still the elder, and Michael Bechtel, Jakob Hursch (obviously Hirsch), and Johannes Neff as preachers, all appointed in 1772. The Naamlijst of 1780 lists Mauer as an independent congregation, with Jakob Hursch as elder from 1778; the Meckesheim congregation then had Johannes Neff (from 1772), Michael Bechtel (from 1774), and Christian Sander (later called Sauter) as preachers (from 1776). In the Naamlijst of 1786 Mauer and Meckesheim were united again, with Abraham Mayer as preacher from 1781 and as elder from 1784, and Michael Bechtel, Christian Sauter, and Jakob Müller (from 1783) as preachers. Finally in the Naamlijst of 1793 the congregation is called Meckesheim, Schatthausen, and Baiertal, with the same ministers as in 1786 and in addition Heinrich Landis, from 1790. A list of preachers of 1787 reveals that services were held alternately in Mauer and Schatthausen (Menn. Gesch.-Bl., 1936, 23), later also in Beiertal (q.v.); in 1840, however, an independent congregation was organized here. The Meckesheim congregation was weakened by emigration. Mannhardt (Jahrbuch 1888) mentions a baptized membership of 25 in 1887, with Heinrich Mosemann serving as elder (preacher 1856, elder 1870) and Heinrich Bechtel (from 1875) serving both as preacher and deacon. Services then were held each Sunday in a rented room. In 1896 it transferred its headquarters to Mönchzell (q.v.) and in 1916 it united with Sinsheim (q.v.) after an existence of about two hundred years. (ML III, 65.) HEGE, vdZ.

Meckville Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Lancaster Conference, began as a mission station in the Meckville area, Bethel Twp., Berks Co., Pa. After some disappointing experiences in joint work with the Church of the Brethren, and then in a purchased schoolhouse which burned to the ground, the mission board in 1932 built a brick building, 36 x 50 ft., near one of these schools. In 1954 Aaron M. Shank and Cletus Doutrich were serving as ministers with a membership of 65. I.D.L.

Medals: see Commemorative Medals.

Medaryville (Ind.) CPS Camp No. 28, about five miles north of Medaryville, was opened in the Jasper-Pulaski Game Preserve when the Bluffton, Ind., Camp No. 13 was moved to this location in early April 1942. It was a Mennonite administered camp, and was the site of a handicraft institute in September 1944 and a conscription institute in March 1945. The men worked in a tree seedling nursery and on a game farm and participated in emergency farm work. The Peace Sentinel was published by the camp from July 1942 to March 1946. The camp was closed in April 1946. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 126-28.

Medemblik, a town (1947 pop. 4,930) in the Dutch Province of North Holland, where there has been a Mennonite congregation since very early times. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized a total of 63 persons here in 1563-65. From the close of the 16th century the attitude of the government was remarkably tolerant in permitting the Mennonites to perform their own marriages, merely notifying the authorities of the union. But otherwise the magistrates were less tolerant: in 1628 Hans Alenson (q.v.), preaching here, was imprisoned for some time on the instigation of the Reformed ministers and then banished from the town. The small congregation (in 1675, 50 baptized members) belonged to the Waterlander branch. There was also a Frisian congregation, which was still smaller and in 1730 united with the former. On several occasions (e.g., 1727, 1733, 1736) the congregation contributed liberally to the needs of the Prussian and Lithuanian Mennonites. In 1826 the combined membership was only 16; by 1847 the number had risen to 31, in 1901 to 53, and in 1938 to 73; since then somewhat less (42 in 1957). Until 1883 the congregation had its own preacher. After having none for six years, it joined the neighboring Enkhuizen for services. But in 1901 it again acquired a preacher of its own (Th. H. van Vens 1901-5, F. J. de Holl 1905-13, J. M. Erkelens 1913-19). In 1919 it united with the congregation of Twisk (q.v.). vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, Nos. 261-71; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, II, passim, see Index; DB 1889, 134; ML III, 65.

Medemblicker Nieu Liedtboeck, a Dutch hymnbook, printed at Wormerveer 1646, of which there is apparently no copy left. (DJ 1837, 65.) vdZ.

Medendorp, a Mennonite family, which seems to have stemmed from De Meeden (q.v.), a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, where Alle Pieters (1595-1641), one of its ancestors, was a Mennonite preacher. In the 17th and 18th centuries the Medendorps belonged to the Old Flemish branch. They were found particularly in the city of Groningen, where Alle Pieters Medendorp (1705-56) became a preacher of the Old Flemish congregation, serving from 1733 until his death. He was an active trustee of the Dutch Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs, and as secretary of the Groningen Old Flemish Conference he corresponded with Prussian Mennonites. His son Christoffer Medendorp (1733-1818), a merchant, moved from Groningen to Leer, East Friesland, Germany.

There is also a Reformed branch of the Medendorp family, to which belonged Lambert Medendorp, born at Appingedam, Dutch province of Groningen, d. 1690, Reformed minister (1678-90) at Larrelt, Leer, and Emden in East Friesland. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1097, 1636, 1664.) vdZ.

Medford (Okla.) Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, located three miles north of Medford, was organized on Nov. 12, 1899, through the initiative of J. F. Harms and daughter Tina, David Harms, Sam Hodel, John J. Wiens, and Mrs. Susanne Wiens. The first meetinghouse was an old schoolhouse moved to its new location in October 1901 and dedicated on Jan. 25, 1903. The congregation was dissolved on Sept. 20, 1909, because most of the members had moved away. P.C.H.

Medford Mennonite Church (GCM), located two miles north and two east of Medford, Grant Co., Okla., a member of the Western District Conference, was organized in February 1897 with 13 charter members and H. J. Gaede as first minister. The first building was erected in 1909, the present one dedicated in 1954. The membership in 1954 was 98. Other ministers who have served are John Lichti, Albert G. Schmidt, Ernest Bergen, and Henry D. Penner, the present pastor. H.D.P.

Medicine. Many of the early Swiss Brethren of Reformation times were well educated, and a list of the Brethren in 1526 mentions a doctor and his wife as being among the group. After the persecution the Brethren largely became peasants in more isolated districts with little opportunity for economic advancement or formal schooling. Lack of reference to medical affairs in their writings leads one to suppose that they had little acquaintance with professional medicine. They were acquainted with the violent deaths accorded to martyrs. As farmers they were acquainted with the cause-and-effect relationships of exposure, violence, nutrition, and disease. It is known from family lists that the birth and death rates were high. Midwifery was practiced among them and booklets on this art ascribed to Aristotle and Albertus Magnus were used. As economic and educational opportunities increased during the 19th century the medical history of the Mennonites is similar to that of the European people of their class and location. A significant contribution to medical advance came through the work of Dr. Peter Dettweiler (q.v., d. 1904), of Alsatian Mennonite parentage, but resident in Bavaria, who discovered that the cure of tuberculosis is not dependent on specific locations and thus became the father of the sanatorium movement.

The Hutterites of the 16th century developed medical practice far in advance of their day. They may have had personal contact with Paracelsus. Their surgeons and bathers (barbers) attended the nobility, conducted famous baths in Moravia, and recognized the contagious nature of certain diseases; the Brethren followed sanitary practices and applied principles of child training consonant with modern concepts of mental hygiene. The excellent work of the physician-surgeons played a large part in developing friendly relations between them and the nobility. Their profession was respected and at least one of the bathers, Sebastian Dietrich, became the general overseer of the entire brotherhood. Dabbling in alchemy, on the other hand, was considered highly improper. The contact of the Hutterite surgeons with the nobility tended to cause dissatisfaction with the simplicity of life practiced by the brotherhood. Frequently they drifted away from their brothers. The death, near the end of the 18th century, of the one remaining physician and his apprentice within a week was taken to be a providential sign that they should get along without professional medical care. The Hutterite chronicles record wave after wave of pestilence decimating the settlements. Unlike their neighbors who fled in panic to the forests leaving the sick to die in utter helplessness, the Hutterites nursed their victims of the plague and gave orderly burial to their dead.

In 1874-77 the Hutterites emigrated to South Dakota and later to Canada. Here they give their children only elementary school education and have not produced any physicians. However, they avail themselves of the medical facilities of near-by towns. At the middle of the 20th century their birth rate was 45.19 per thousand population and their death rate a mere 4.4, making them one of the most rapidly growing population groups on record. Their colonies have recently been intensively studied because of a reported low incidence of mental illness. (See further Medicine Among the Hutterites.)

The Dutch Mennonites were less isolated and economically and socially more favored than their Swiss brethren. One of their unique institutions, that of the deaconesses, had far-reaching results in the medical world. Theodore Fliedner, a pastor of Kaiserswerth, Germany, received some inspiration for founding his famous institution while visiting among the Mennonites in Holland, although the Dutch deaconesses do not deserve the whole credit. The Mennonite deaconesses of Holland were not nurses but rather women ordained to the office of overseer of the poor and needy. They were important in staffing the projects pioneered by the Dutch Mennonite minister Jan Nieuwenhuizen (q.v.). These projects included an old ladies' home, orphanages, and a home for feeble-minded children. These deaconesses also furnished the inspiration for an order of Mennonite deaconess nurses in Russia and the United States. (See further Medicine Among the Dutch Mennonites.)

The immigrants from North Germany to Russia (1789-1820) took with them their medical customs and practices. Babies were delivered by midwives. One practitioner recorded the 13,000 deliveries at which she assisted. These women received no particular stipend but were exempt from paying taxes. The mortality rate was high. In the Chortitza settlement, of the 6,874 children born between 1880 and 1922, 2,008 died in infancy and childhood, a rate of nearly 30 per cent. Trained physicians were scarce and only one was reported among the 60 villages of the Molotschna settlement in 1880.

The sense of brotherhood led the Russian Mennonite settlers to provide for the aged and infirm. From early days the feeble-minded, the deaf, and the epileptic inherited twice the amount the healthy siblings received. Such funds were placed in trusteeship and came to have a stabilizing influence in the economy of the community as well as providing for institutional care. By about the end of the 19th century the settlements had old people's homes, orphanages, a school for the deaf, and a hospital for those with nervous diseases including epileptics. To staff these institutions a school for deaconess nurses was opened at Neuhalbstadt in 1909. The doctors were generally Mennonites who had taken training either in German or Russian universities.

While these institutions were the product of united community action, the first Russian Mennonite hospital was the result of a private venture of faith. Franz Wall, a Mennonite minister, inspired by the noble example of George Müller of Bristol, England, converted his home at Muntau, Molotschna, into a hospital in 1880.

The Mennonites in Russia were interested in helping others in need. One thousand rubles were collected and given to aid wounded soldiers during the Napoleonic invasion. During the Crimean War 5,000 sick and wounded soldiers were transported and cared for in the settlements. As a result of exposure to the diseases of the soldiers, especially dysentery and typhus, a number of the Mennonites died. At the time of the Boxer Rebellion in China 5,000 rubles were sent to the Red Cross to be used for the sick and wounded. In the Russo-Japanese War, in addition to Red Cross support, a group of twenty Mennonite young men volunteered to aid sick and wounded soldiers. Of these, a number died, including a Mennonite doctor. In World War I thousands of Russian Mennonite men served on hospital trains and in special hospitals. Mennonite doctors had responsible positions in these services. This medical service was civilian and staffed by volunteers, who had the legal right to serve in the forestry service. The Zemstwo Union was a civilian organization. (See also Medicine Among the Mennonites in Russia.)

The Mennonites of America were earlier suspicious of the ways of the world in education and science. Hence unscientific means for obtaining cures were often used. Among them was a system of incantations known as "powwowing" (q.v.) or "Braucherei." The formulae used were supposed to have some magic qualities, and were not true prayers as some supposed. References to the Virgin, saints, archangels, and the use of Latin words point to a Catholic origin, possibly pre-Reformation and peasant. Powwowing is frowned upon officially, but is still practiced in a few culturally retarded communities. People in such areas lack scientific standards of evaluation and tend to patronize irregular practitioners, maintain a belief in magnetism and other devices, and place reliance on herbs, home remedies, and advertised nostrums. However, since virtually all childbed deliveries now take place in hospitals, and immunization of children is routine, modern medical practices are being fully accepted.

In some Mennonite groups "anointing" (q.v.), based on James 5, has been practiced sporadically. Occasionally, in most recent times, individuals have been influenced by the "divine healing" movement, and a few have attempted to practice it. However, vigorous counteraction in teaching and discipline has prevented any significant spread of the aberration.

In Mennonitism throughout the world missionary work and the rise of hospitals and charitable work was a 19th-century development, sometimes influenced by Pietism, sometimes the natural result of a strong tradition of the ministry of Christian love to the needy, which found expression in service to non-Mennonites after the spirit of isolationism began to break down. The value of medical work became very clear on the missionary field, and the first missionary effort by the Dutch Mennonites in Java and Sumatra soon developed a medical emphasis. With some modification that pattern is typical of Mennonite medical missions, whether in India, pre-Communist China, Ethiopia, Tanganyika, the Belgian Congo, or Puerto Rico. It consists of a hospital center staffed by a medical missionary and missionary nurses, assisted by native workers who assume more responsibility as they receive training. In time a school of nursing develops, and native assistants or even doctors are added to the staff. In addition to the central hospital there are a series of outstations in charge of a missionary nurse or visited on schedule by the missionary doctor. In Asia and Africa a leprosarium is generally added. Missions in South America do not include hospital work, because of the governments' policy of excluding foreign doctors.

The first Mennonite hospitals in North America were established in the communities of the Russian immigrants about 1900 and later. The General Conference Mennonites developed nursing schools under the direction of a deaconess order. The Mennonites (MC) did not develop community hospitals so early.

The first of their hospitals was an outgrowth of a tuberculosis sanatorium established (1907) as an act of mercy in a non-Mennonite community. It is owned by their board of missions. Recently this board has begun operating a number of community hospitals whose constituency is not primarily Mennonite. The two nursing schools of the group are under the general Board of Education and one of the schools is of the collegiate type. It is estimated that there are now about 1,000 Mennonite nurses in North America. Among them are a number of male nurses.

In earlier days it was unusual to see a Mennonite physician. Family histories reveal that the physicians who came from Mennonite homes often did not remain members of the church. A study in 1947 revealed that one third of the doctors from such homes were no longer Mennonites. Most of these transferred membership after starting practice and attributed the change to a "broadening" viewpoint, or learning to appreciate other religious views and becoming less dogmatic. Fully half of these physicians did not practice in Mennonite communities, explaining that these lacked cultural or educational opportunities, or that some Mennonites were unscientific, patronized quacks, and were generally unappreciative of a physician's services. A Mennonite Medical Association (q.v.) was founded to help in correcting this difficulty.

World War II had a great effect on Mennonite medical affairs. The reservoir of doctors, nurses, and medical auxiliaries was tapped by the MCC to carry on the medical phase of its relief work throughout the world. Fifteen hundred men drafted to Civilian Public Service worked in mental hospitals as aids, and about 170 women volunteered to do similar work. Other young people worked in general hospitals, veterans' hospitals, in public health and sanitation, hookworm and typhus control, or in health education. Others were used as "guinea pigs" in scientific investigations on typhus, pneumonia, infectious hepatitis, nutrition or metabolism experiments. Similar experience was continued after the war in the "I-W" and voluntary services programs.

One of the results of this experience has been an increased interest in mental health. The MCC has established three mental hospitals since 1945, and a fourth is under consideration. Another mental hospital is sponsored by the Lancaster Conference (MC) and yet another in Ontario is sponsored by the M.B. group. These institutions represent pioneer experiments in the value of personal service religiously oriented, combined with a restful rural atmosphere.

Sickness insurance is a relatively new phenomenon on the American scene. The brotherhood has always had an alms fund in the care of the deacon, and the community often turned out en masse to do the season's farm work of the sick or injured member. It is interesting to note that there existed a Beneficial Society in the Franconia (MC) district as early as 1888 and that they paid sickness benefits. In 1902 the Menno-Friendly Beneficial Association was formed at the First Mennonite Church (GCM) in Philadelphia for the purpose of giving relief "to members who shall be confined to their homes by reason of sickness or disability or accident." Local efforts are illustrated by the Health Society of Yarrow, B.C., organized in 1935. This group contracted for medical care by a Mennonite doctor for $12.00 per year for each member's family. A similar plan was sponsored by the Health Society of Coaldale, Alberta. A more extensive movement took place in the Mennonite Church (MC). As a result of official conference action Mennonite Aid, Inc., was authorized in 1949 to set up a plan for payment of hospital and surgical benefits. At the beginning of 1955 it had over 5,000 members. In Europe Mennonites normally take advantage of the state medical insurance plans, such as the German and Swiss Krankenkasse. The Mennonites of Mexico and South America have had special medical problems. Since the Mexican group migrated seeking isolation, it is not surprising that they are not aware that their health and sanitary practices are poor and their medical care inadequate, being limited largely to the ministrations of the bone-doctors (Knochenärzte), midwives, and such patent medicines as may be purchased at the village stores. Knowledge of nutrition is meager. Milk is sold for cash rather than consumed by the family. Sanitary installations are scarce. Immunization is not practiced and the childhood diseases, especially enteritis, take a heavy toll. Villages may be 40 to 50 miles from a doctor and almost as far from a telephone. The MCC relief services offered in various ways to assist in raising the health standards, but difficulty with government regulations and the attitudes of the settlers made it necessary to abandon the clinics. In 1954 plans were under way to have the MCC administer a local hospital in Cuauhtemoc.

The Brazilian immigrant group of 1930 included trained nurses and others who had some elemental knowledge of medicine, but no doctor. Medical services had to be obtained at a hospital 40 miles distant until Dr. Peter Dyck from Russia and his wife, a trained nurse, arrived to establish a hospital in Witmarsum. This medical work was supported financially by the Dutch Mennonites. The colonists had their own dental clinic. When the Witmarsum colony was abandoned this hospital passed out of Mennonite hands.

In many ways the most difficult health problems were presented by Paraguay. The settlers included those from Canada in search of isolation, Russian refugees stranded in Europe but refused admittance to Canada often because of trachoma or tuberculosis, and refugees from Siberia long stranded in Harbin, China. When the Canadian group arrived in 1928 about one tenth died on the way into the Chaco from dysentery and typhus. The Paraguayan government offered free immunizations against typhoid, but only a few immigrants took advantage of this. The Harbin group, too, was decimated by an epidemic of scarlet fever. Medical care was inadequate. Practical nurses and midwives did what they could. Because of poor roads and great distances the Paraguayan doctors were almost inaccessible. The MCC sent Dr. John R. Schmidt, and later his wife, a trained nurse, to bring medical aid. Dr. Schmidt found that 75 per cent had trachoma and about 50 per cent had hookworm. Rickets and tuberculosis of the bone were common. Hookworm control was initiated and trachoma was treated with the sulfa drugs. An adequate hospital was built to supersede the old clay-floored dispensary. A small mental hospital was erected. A North American surgeon, a dentist, and an eye specialist spent terms of various lengths giving their specialized services. A school of nursing was set up, and colonists were trained in pharmacy, anesthesia, and other auxiliaries. Promising young men were sent to Asuncion or abroad to learn medicine and young women to learn nursing. Thus a most difficult problem gave way to relentless will backed up by the world-wide resources of the Mennonite brotherhood. Several European non-Mennonite doctors have been employed by the Paraguayan settlements, particularly Fernheim. In 1954 the first Mennonite doctor, a son of Fernheim but trained in the United States, began practice in the Friesland colony.

It is typical that a leprosarium was to be established in gratitude to Paraguay for offering a new home and a new outlook on life, to be jointly operated by the MCC and the Mennonite settlements with considerable financial assistance by the American Mission to Lepers. Instead of the leprosarium as originally planned, however, a series of clinics was set up, where ambulatory treatment is emphasized. (See Lepers, Paraguay Mission to.)
H.C.A.

Frank C. Peters, "Noncombatant Service Then and Now," Menn. Life X (January 1955) 31-35.

Medicine Among the Dutch Mennonites. Among the Dutch Mennonite ministers of the 17th and 18th centuries there is a striking number of medical doctors. One of the first leaders of the Dutch Anabaptists, Obbe Philips, had been a barber-surgeon, and even before the end of the 16th century some Dutch Mennonites attended the universities to obtain medical training. Among the first was Jan Willemsz (1583-1660), who obtained his doctor's degree about 1610. During the 17th and especially the 18th centuries there were many Mennonite physicians in Holland. Their unusually large number had two principal causes: first, the wealth the Dutch Mennonites had attained by this time enabled them to devote time and money to scholarly pursuits, and at the same time made them eager to partake in university "higher life"; second, they nonetheless still held to the old Mennonite view that talents should be made subservient to the welfare of one's fellow men; in brief, the ethical responsibility of faith caused them to choose medicine rather than, for example, law. Some of them were called to high positions; Govert Bidloo (1649-1713) became professor of anatomy at the University of Leiden and chief physician to stadholder King William III; his nephew Nicolaas Bidloo (b. 1670) became the personal physician of Czar Peter the Great of Russia, and founder of the medical school at Moscow; and Matthias S. van Geuns (1735-1817) was a professor in the medical faculties of the universities of Harderwijk and Utrecht. A large number of the Mennonites who had studied medicine before the Seminary was founded were both physicians and preachers. Particularly after about 1650 the congregations apparently demanded well-trained preachers, and yet wished to maintain the principle of the unsalaried ministry, and since university training seemed a guarantee of adequacy to the task of leading a Mennonite congregation, they often called physicians as preachers and elders. A few of the outstanding doctor-preachers were Jan Willemsz at De Rijp, Joannes de Backer at Amsterdam, Anthoni Jacobsz Roscius at Hoorn, Jacob Cornelis van Dalen at Amsterdam, Galenus Abrahamsz at Amsterdam, Jacob Ostens at Rotterdam, Antonius van Dale at Haarlem, Petrus Teckop at Leiden, Klaas Toornburg at De Rijp, Christoffel Tirion at Utrecht, Herman Schijn at Amsterdam, Willem Bosch at Haarlem, Gerardus de Wind at Middelburg, Abraham van Loon at Gouda, Maarten Harp at Den Ilp, Frederik Toger at Leiden, Jacobus van Zanten at Haarlem, Jan van Beekhoven de Wind at Haarlem, Johannes Nettis at Alkmaar, Petrus Belkmeer at Enschedé, Pieter Schagen at Westzaan. After the founding of the Amsterdam Mennonite Theological Seminary in 1735, the physician preachers gradually disappeared. The last was Pieter Schagen.

The Mennonites of Amsterdam have organized the Mennonite Public Health Association, which is actually a nursing service for all classes of people. Subscribers are entitled to six weeks of nursing service per year. vdZ.

Medicine Among the Hutterites. As the article Medicine has already demonstrated, there was a distinct difference between the medical experiences among 16th-century Anabaptists in general and the unique practices of the Hutterites. Their settled and well-developed community life in Moravia and Slovakia almost necessitated attention to medical care and hygiene, and thus led to developments which singled them out among all the rest of the nonurban population of early modern times. Since the situation has been given careful historical study, a fairly correct picture can be offered in the following.

(a) Hygiene. The Brethren were among the earliest to conduct what today would best be called boarding schools. Accordingly, much attention was directed to have these schools (from nursery age to about 14 years of age) on their Bruderhofs well controlled and supervised. Peter Walpot (q.v.) issued his famous school discipline in 1568, in which almost modern principles of hygiene were set forth to be strictly obeyed. The Brethren were sensibly aware of contagion; thus particular care was directed to an early discovery of children's diseases, whereupon such children were separated, their clothing and linen as well as their food being kept completely from that of the rest. There were sicknesses like scurvy, eczema, even syphilis, and attention was needed to prevent epidemics. The enemies accused them of negligence and claimed a high child mortality (see Handbüchlein and Fischer, Chr. A.), but the Brethren defended themselves effectively, and actually could point to their numerous strict regulations for such group living.

(b) Bathing and Bathhouses. The 16th century in general experienced a decline in bathing. Bathing for cleanliness was deemed by the Hutterites not necessary more than once in four weeks. But for health's sake bathing found quite elaborate attention among the Brethren. To quote the archfoe of the Hutterites, Christoph A. Fischer, who involuntarily had to admit the fame of these Hutterite bathhouses: "Every Saturday their baths are packed full of Christians [i.e., Catholics]. And not alone the common people but also noble persons come running to them if they ever need treatment, as if Anabaptists were the only ones who possessed this art in the entire region" (Fischer, 54 Erhebliche Ursachen 1607, "32. Ursach," p. 85). These bathhouses were administered by professional "Bader" (caretakers of the baths), who also functioned as barber-surgeons and generally replaced physicians, as these latter were a rather rare profession in the 16th century. These Bader must have been quite numerous among the Hutterites of the later 16th century, again a proof that the Anabaptist way had great attraction for all walks of life.

(c) Bader-Ordnungen. Although generally highly respected the Bader nevertheless had to conform to the general pattern of communal life of the Hutterites. Apparently this posed a real problem for these rather independent people who quickly gained also a clientele outside the brotherhood. Thus it is not surprising that strict regulations, called "Bader-Ordnungen," were issued from time to time, particularly during the 17th century when a certain decline in discipline set in. The earliest regulation is no longer extant, but we hear of such documents of 1592, 1633, 1635, 1637, 1654, and 1657 (with the exception of the first named they all come from the period of Bishop Andreas Ehrenpreis, q.v. The Bader-Ordnung of 1654 was published in an English translation, MQR 1953, 125-27). They insisted on cleanliness, asked the barber-surgeons to continue in the study of pharmacy and other medical knowledge, regulated the practice of blood-cupping, and so on. Special emphasis is laid upon the proper behavior of these important brethren: there should be no arrogance among them and no overbearing, in spite of the fact that they enjoyed certain privileges which differentiated them from the rest on the Bruderhof (e.g., horseback riding).

When traveling from Bruderhof to Bruderhof, these barber-surgeons often carried along a whole wagonload of extracts, pills, electuaries, ointments, etc. Needless to say, the Bader were also much in demand outside the Hutterite communities, which made their exceptional position even more difficult. They received payment for their services, and these sums, too, presented a temptation. As the rest of the brotherhood were largely rural in character, the adjustment of these men posed a permanent problem.

(d) Personnel. The Hutterite Chronicle mentions at least three doctors or physicians among the Brethren: Georg Zobel (d. 1603) of Nikolsburg, who was called twice to the Imperial Court of Rudolph II at Prague (the first time, 1581, he stayed six months and is said to have cured the emperor; the second time, 1599, he was supposed to help to stop an epidemic in Prague); Balthasar Gollar (d. 1619), likewise of Nikolsburg, the personal physician of Cardinal Dietrichstein (q.v.), who otherwise fought Anabaptism by all means at his disposal. In 1608-9 Goller was also the personal physician of the Imperial Ambassador, Count Herberstein, on his trip to Constantinople. At the outbreak of the Thirty Years' War Goller was slain in Nikolsburg and his pharmacy was destroyed. The third was Conrad Blössy, a former citizen of Zürich, Switzerland, who in 1612 went back to that city and rendered great assistance in fighting an epidemic there.

The number of barber-surgeons mentioned in the sources is quite considerable. One, Sebastian Dietrich (q.v.) of Markgröningen in Württemberg, even became head bishop or Vorsteher of the entire brotherhood (1611-19). (For more names of such barbers see Friedmann, 130-35.)

(e) Training and Education. Very little is known about the training of the physicians. Most likely they got their training before joining the brotherhood, although the profession of barber-surgeon could also be learned at certain Bruderhofs, e.g., in Nikolsburg, or at the places of their bathhouses. It is also known that Paracelsus, the most famous physician of his century, lived in Moravia 1537-38 on an estate where Hutterites also were admitted. But no sources about possible contacts have become known. It is, however, highly revealing that the Hutterian Brethren of today have preserved two very old medical books. The one, of 1575, was bought by Andreas Ehrenpreis in Sobotiste, Slovakia, in 1638 from a Hungarian book peddler. It is a manuscript book of 230 leaves octavo, entitled Antidotarium, Composita oder Recepta der Schaden- und Wundarzney, etc., by Lienhard Gargasser, 1575. The other, called Arzney Handbüchl, vieler Krankheiten Zustände Causam et Curam, etc., is also handwritten, copied by the Hutterite barber-surgeon Johannes Spengler in 1635 while practicing his art at the mineral bath of Trenchin-Teplic, Slovakia. It comprises 470 octavo leaves, containing mostly prescriptions of remedies and good counsel as to how to cure ailments. The name of Paracelsus is mentioned in it at many places; unfortunately the original from which this book was carefully copied is no longer known. Both books are now in the possession of the Hutterites in Western Canada.

(f) Later Period. The tradition of having doctors or barber-surgeons around on the Bruderhofs was never abandoned. The Klein-Geschichtsbuch (380-81), for instance, expressly mentions for the year 1780 (when the brotherhood had settled in the Ukraine) that the Brethren wished to have again a trained doctor with them, and accordingly dispatched the young and able brother Christian Wurz to study with the French house physician of Count Romanzov, the protector of the Brethren. At first Christian kept rigidly and faithfully to his Hutterite background, but after a while he got "to love the world," even put on a wig, and soon became fully secularized. He later went to Moscow. The chronicle states sadly, "In a few years three members left our faith; they were among the most skilled and learned ones."

Again in 1792, the same chronicle reports the death of a barber-surgeon. "Thus the brotherhood had no one any more who would understand blood-cupping and other medical practices. This fact became a real concern to the brethren" (Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 388). In 1814 again the death of another brother-medicus Zacharias Wipf is reported. He had served his brotherhood for 16 years both in the pharmacy and in the art of medicine (Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 423).

(g) In America naturally the need for doctors has been more easily met than at any time before. Nevertheless the Brethren continued to have their own "bonesetters" (chiropractors), experts in medicinal herbs, and, of course, experienced midwives. Joseph Eaton reports that some of these bonesetters and masseurs are so much in demand that the Brethren set up a special office for one of them. It seems that they are not especially trained in their art but practice it rather out of a certain natural gift and intuition (Eaton, 164, 170). All Bruderhofs have plenty of house remedies for all emergencies. As to psychic disturbances, the friendly atmosphere of the community and the opportunity of talking confidentially to the preacher work strongly toward a high level of mental health. R.F.

J. Loserth, Communismus, chapter "Die Arzneikunst und Bäder der Wiedertäufer," 275 ff.; John L. Sommer, "Hutterite Medicine and Physicians in Moravia in the 16th Century and After," MQR XX (1953) 111-27 (with an English translation of a Bader-Ordnung); R. Friedmann, "Hutterite Physicians and Barber-Surgeons," ibid., 128-36; J. W. Eaton and R. J. Weil, Culture and Mental Disorder, A Comparative Study of the Hutterites (Glencoe, Ill., 1955); Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch.

Medicine Among the Mennonites in Russia. The use of medicine among the early Mennonites of Russia, as in Prussia, was similar to that of any rural area. In the early pioneer days of the Ukraine there was little opportunity for the settlers to avail themselves of the help of medical doctors, drugs, and hospitalization. The traditional bonesetters (Knochenärzte) and midwives functioned. Some of the bonesetters (similar to chiropractors) and midwives had through innate gifts, years of experience, and the knowledge conveyed from generation to generation achieved a wide reputation. The ministers or the teachers were often also advisers in health matters. Health rules, recipes, and the practice of the Knochenarzt were transplanted from Russia to the Great Plains of America, where they have been preserved in some forms to this day, particularly in Mexico and South America. Even the popular contemporary chiropractors in Mennonite communities can no doubt be linked to this tradition, e.g., the Tieszen clinic at Marion, S.D. Schmiedehaus relates that the Mennonites of Mexico still use such medicines as Schlagwasser, Wunderöl, Kaiseröl, Alpenkräuter, Grossmutters Abführtee, and Dr. Bell's horse medicine.

With the increase of the Russian population in the Ukraine, the government helped provide medical aid to the people. As the Mennonites advanced culturally and economically, they also became interested in better medical care. The Russian zemstvo (rural administration) made some provision for trained physicians around 1850. The primary purpose was to prevent the spread of epidemics. Only at a few places were hospitals erected. One of the first doctors to practice in Chortitza was Karnitzky. A Bernhard Schellenberg became the first "Feldscher," a trained assistant to the physician. Among the first midwives who had received some training was Charlotte Voroshevskaya. She was succeeded by Margarete Wieler and later Susie Penner.

The first Mennonite doctor in Russia very likely was Jacob Esau, who was educated at the University of Kiev and became the physician of the Chortitza settlement around 1880. Considerable improvement was made during this period. A small hospital was erected, and two or three assistants (Feldscher) assisted Esau. An apothecary was located next to his office. Medicine, examination, and treatment were free. In addition to this arrangement, the Mennonite factories of Chortitza also employed doctors, among whom were Voth, Hausknecht, Knieast, Ebius, Glückman, Meder, and Heinrichs. Judging by the names, only the first two and last were Mennonites. The factory owners also established a hospital of their own next to that of the zemstvo. One of the most successful doctors with one of the longest terms of service was Theodor Hottmann, who practiced medicine in connection with the zemstvo hospital 1902-37. Hottmann was joined by Dr. David A. Hamm.

In 1908 a new zemstvo hospital was erected between the villages of Rosenthal and Chortitza. The services of the zemstvo hospital were available to all Chortitza Mennonite villages and four neighboring Russian villages. The hospital and doctors were supported by the Chortitza volost (district). For the services given to the Russian village, the provincial zemstvo furnished medicine and instruments as well as two medical assistants and nurses.

During World War I the Chortitza Mennonites maintained a 75 to 100 bed Red Cross emergency hospital in addition to the regular hospital. Many of the Mennonites served in this unit.

Less information is available about the medical care among Mennonites of other settlements in Russia, even in the Molotschna settlement. In most of the other more recent and smaller settlements, the Mennonites availed themselves of the medical facilities of their neighboring Russian communities. The Molotschna settlement apparently did not have the zemstvo facilities. Franz Wall established a hospital at Muntau (see Muntau Hospital) in 1880. During the last phase of its existence, this hospital prospered under Dr. Erich Tavonius, who served 1900-27. Other small Mennonite hospitals existed at Waldheim and Ohrloff in the Molotschna settlement as well as in the Neu-Samara settlement. Bethania (q.v.), near Chortitza, was a mental hospital. On the island of Chortitza a hospital for tubercular patients was established and a sanitarium called Alexandrabad. C.K.

D. A. Hamm, "Das Gesundheitswesen in Chortitza," Menn. Life X (April 1955) 84 f.; Maria Hottmann, "Dr. Theodor Hottmann," Mennonitisches Jahrbuch 1953 (Newton, 1953) 39-48; "Doktor Erich Tavonius," Unser Blatt II (1927) 307-9; Walter Schmiedehaus, "Mennonite Life in Mexico," Menn. Life II (April 1947) 29-38; C. W. Wiebe, "Health Conditions Among the Mennonites of Mexico," Menn. Life II (April 1947) 43 f.

Medina County, Ohio, originally a part of Western Reserve of Connecticut, was organized in 1818. It is the home of three Mennonite congregations with a total of 425 baptized members: Wadsworth (GCM) with 254 members, Lower (OOM) with 40 members, and Bethel (MC) with 131, in the southeastern part of the county, all derived from original Mennonite settlers from Bucks Co., Pa., in 1829, soon joined by others from Maryland, from Lancaster and Lehigh counties, Pa., and from Canada. The first Mennonite school of higher education (GCM) was located in Wadsworth in 1867-78. J.S.U.

Medway Reformed Mennonite Church, located at Medway, Clark Co., Ohio, had eight members in 1948. The meetinghouse was built in 1872, but sold before 1948; the privilege of worship is, however, retained. J.L.K.

Meeden, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, where there was a Mennonite congregation belonging to the Groningen Old Flemish and closely connected with that of Beerta (q.v.) in the early 17th century. It was always small, reaching its highest point in 1773 with a baptized membership of 100, but then rapidly decreasing. Since the end of the 18th century it has been merged with Midwolda (q.v.). Originally meetings were held in a private home. In the 18th century a plain meetinghouse was erected, and a new one was built in 1871. This was used until a new church of the united congregation of Midwolda, De Meeden, and Beerta (now called Winschoten), was built at Winschoten in 1931. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, passim, see Index; DB 1872, 192; 1879, 4; ML III, 65.

Meenen (Menin), a town in West Flanders, Belgium, center of Anabaptist-Mennonite activity in the 16th century. There was a congregation from at least 1545. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 26 persons here in 1554-56 and in 1577-61 another 21 (or perhaps 46). About this time Joris Wippe (q.v.) (he was not a burgomaster of Meenen, as has been supposed), who was executed at Dordrecht, Holland, in 1558, was a member of the congregation, as was also Leenaert Plovier (q.v.), a cloth merchant, executed at Antwerp in 1558. Pieter van der Meersch (q.v.) was a preacher of the Meenen congregation until 1564; Jacob de Keersgieter (de Rore) (q.v.) baptized here about 1566. Since baptism was still performed at Meenen in 1578, it is probable that the congregation existed at least until this time. The Meenen congregation was often struck by severe persecution, particularly in 1561 and 1569, while in 1567 during a raid a number of Mennonites escaped; their property, however, was confiscated. Eight Mennonites arrested here were executed at Kortrijk (q.v.) in 1569: Absolon de Zanger and Willem van Haverbeke in 1561, and Pieter den Ouden, Fransoois de Timmerman, Jan van Raes, Jan Wattier, Wouter Denijs, and Kalleken, the wife of Anpleunis van den Berge. A number of Anabaptists of Meenen suffered martyrdom in other Belgian towns, particularly at Gent and Antwerp. This indicates that there must have been a rather strong Anabaptist-Mennonite movement at Meenen. In 1578 (or 79) the martyr Michiel Buyse (q.v.) was baptized at Meenen.

About 1581 the remaining members of the congregation fled to the Netherlands. Some of them, e.g., the Apostool (q.v.) and the van der Meersch (q.v.) families, emigrated to Haarlem, Holland, where they founded important weaving mills and linen bleacheries. vdZ.

A. L. E. Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," ms.; idem, Gent, 68, note 1; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 439.

Meer (Mehr), Jan ter (1594-1672), was a Mennonite elder at Gladbach, Germany (see München-Gladbach). Of his life and activity not much is known; he was an elder from 1628 or earlier. After 1652 when the Mennonites were forced to leave Gladbach, ter Meer apparently moved to Crefeld (q.v.) with many members of the Gladbach congregation, while others moved to Nijmegen (q.v.) in the Netherlands. In 1656 ter Meer, then living at Crefeld, ordained Jan Godtschalks van Elten, who had moved from Gladbach to Nijmegen in 1654, as a preacher and deacon of the Nijmegen congregation. The Jan ter Mehr who in 1677 wrote a letter to the Mennonites at Nijmegen in the name of the Crefeld congregation cannot be the same person. Possibly he is a son of the former. (Der Mennonit IX, No. 8, Aug. 1956, 123; DB 1874, 15 f., 22.) vdZ.

Meer, Theodorus van der, a Dutch Reformed minister, was the author of a pamphlet against Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), entitled Het gekraay van een Sociniaense Haan onder Doopsgesinde Veederen (Amsterdam, 1663), in which Galenus is accused of teaching Socinian (q.v.) doctrines. vdZ.

H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Arnhem, 1954) 84.

Meerlanders: see Merlanders.

Meersch, van der (sometimes Vermeersch), a family originally found in Flanders and at Antwerp, both Reformed and Mennonite. Pieter van der Meersch, b. at Meenen (q.v.), married to Maria van der Molen, who was probably a sister of the noted Flemish Elder Jacob Pietersz van der Meulen (q.v.), was a preacher of the Mennonite congregation at Meenen (q.v.). In 1564 he fled to Haarlem, Holland. His son, also Pieter van der Meersch, b. 1560 at Meenen, died before 1608 at Haarlem, a grain dealer, married to Maeyken Boutens, was a preacher of the Haarlem Flemish congregation, as was his grandson Arent van der Meersch, b. 1601 at Haarlem, d. 1667 at Amsterdam. Like his father Arent was a grain dealer. He was married to Sara de Veer of Amsterdam, and some of this family served as deacons at Amsterdam. Abraham van der Meersch, probably belonging to the same family, studied at the Mennonite Theological Seminary at Amsterdam and in 1733-48 served as a Mennonite preacher in Dordrecht. Another Abraham van der Meersch (b. 1643 at Amsterdam, d. 1728 at 's Graveland), a son of Arent, was a wealthy linen merchant in Amsterdam, and a deacon of the Lamist (q.v.) Mennonite congregation in 1681-86 and again in 1691-96. In this capacity he tried to found a theological seminary, but found little sympathy for this idea among his co-deacons. In 1721, at the age of 71 years, he wrote an autobiographical sketch, the original manuscript of which is still found in the Amsterdam

Mennonite archives. It gives important information not only concerning his business and his family, but also on several pages expounds his views concerning the Mennonite doctrines of the non-swearing of oaths, believers' baptism, and nonresistance, with which he wholeheartedly agreed. In Amsterdam most of the van der Meersch family belonged to the Lamist church, but a few of them were Zonists (q.v.). A branch of this family lived at Rotterdam. Here Pieter van der Meersch was a deacon of the Old Flemish Mennonites, and Elisabeth van der Meersch was married to Michiel Comans (q.v.). In the 16th century a van der Meersch family was found at Hoorn, of which Israel Jacobsz van der Meersch, the author of Gewyde Poezie, a volume of devotional poems, was a member. Israel Jacobsz, however, left the Mennonite church in 1605 and joined the Reformed. Pieter van der Meersch, of Amsterdam, published in 1713-44 a number of devotional books translated from the English. In the 18th century most members of the van der Meersch family left the Mennonite church. Abraham van der Meersch (1720-92) was a noted Remonstrant (q.v.) preacher. He was a grandson of the linen merchant Abraham van der Meersch mentioned above, who wrote his autobiography for this grandson.

A branch of probably the same van der Meersch family is found in Prussia from about 1668, at first at Danzig. Cornelius van der Meersch was about 1750 a (Mennonite) distiller of brandy and merchant of lace at Königsberg in East Prussia. It is possible that the Vermeersch family at Harlingen, Friesland, one of whom was Gillis Vermeersch (q.v., d. 1721), originally belonged to the same branch.

It could not be decided whether the martyrs Joris van der Meersch (q.v.) executed at Gent, Belgium, in 1570, and Hans Vermeersch executed at Waestene, Flanders, in 1559 were members of the same family. vdZ.

Ned. Patriciaat II (1911) 330-33; Mennonite archives of Haarlem and Amsterdam; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 772; Gesch.-Bl. VII (1956) 22, 27, No. 62.

Meeting Calendar: see Calendar of Appointments.

Meetinghouses. The following series of articles treats by countries the places of meeting for worship used by the Anabaptists-Mennonites through the centuries, the names given to such places, the dates of the first meetinghouses, and any items of particular interest relating to the functions of meetinghouses. See the article Architecture for a treatment of the architectural aspects including style. The countries are treated in the following order: A. Netherlands; B. Switzerland; C. South Germany; D. Northwest and Northeast Germany; E. Russia; F. North America.

A. Netherlands. During the period of persecution the Anabaptist-Mennonites had no regular place to hold their meetings. They met, as the martyr Claes de Praet (q.v.) says (Offer, 246), "there where Christ and His apostles held their meetings, in the woods, in the fields, on the seashore, and sometimes in homes." In larger towns such as Amsterdam meetings were held in private homes from the beginning. For the sake of safety meeting places were constantly changed and messengers (weetdoeners) visited the members to announce the place and the hour of the next meeting.

From about 1575, when persecution had ceased, the Mennonites gradually began to hold their meetings at fixed places, although as late as 1654, for example at Nijmegen (q.v.), the magistrates did not allow Mennnonite meetings to be held at regular places; at Deventer no meetinghouses could be built until 1688. About 1600 the smaller congregations usually met in the home of a member, who placed a room at the disposal of the congregation. Larger congregations at this time or even earlier probably rented or bought houses or warehouses, which were then in simple style adapted for use as meetinghouses. Of these first meetinghouses nothing is known and of most congregations it cannot be exactly stated when they acquired a meetinghouse. It is very questionable whether the Mennonites of Amsterdam had a meetinghouse as early as 1578, as is suggested by Brandt, but the Waterlanders as well as the Frisians and the Flemish had meetinghouses here before 1600. More exact dates are available concerning Rotterdam. Here the Old Flemish Mennonites possessed a house in which they held meetings as early as 1580, whereas the Frisian congregation obtained a meetinghouse in 1593, and the Flemish congregation bought a house in 1609, which was remodeled for meetings. The present Mennonite church at Amsterdam has its origin in an old meetinghouse which had been used since 1608. Utrecht acquired a meetinghouse about 1610, the Waterlanders at Leiden in 1613, the Middelburg congregation in 1616. The two former meetinghouses of Harlingen, Friesland, no doubt dated from before 1600; the former meetinghouse of the Haarlem Flemish congregation, called "d'Oly-block," is also of about 1600. During the 17th century many meetinghouses were built in the province of Friesland, but it is possible that at least some of these were rebuilt from meetinghouses originally built some decades before. Balk built a meetinghouse in 1629, the Leeuwarden Waterlander congregation in 1631, Hindeloopen 1653, Sneek 1654, Grouw 1659, Warns and Joure both 1664, Akkrum ca. 1667, Irnsum 1684, Surhuisterveen 1685, Holwerd 1692, and Drachten 1693.

By 1700 all the congregations had meetinghouses except the conservative Janjacobsz group (q.v.), which was opposed to special meetinghouses. Many small congregations of the Groningen Old Flemish branch also had no meetinghouses, but continued to meet in the homes of the members as late as the end of the 18th century. At present a few newly founded congregations and circles (kringen) do not yet have meetinghouses, but use rented rooms or halls. The Breda (q.v.) congregation holds its meetings in the Lutheran church.

Nearly all the Dutch Mennonite churches now have one or more rooms for catechetical classes, Sunday schools, ladies' circles, and other church activities. Sometimes the sexton's quarters are a part of the church building, and in a number of congregations, particularly in the country, the parsonage is next to the church, and in a few attached to the church.

Since the 18th century Dutch Mennonite meetinghouses have been called churches (Doopsgezinde kerk). The earlier word vermaning (literally admonition," or place where the people are stimulated to faith and Christian life), formerly very common, especially in the province of Friesland, is now obsolete. vdZ.

B. Switzerland. The first Mennonite meetinghouse built in Switzerland is that of the present Holee Street congregation in Basel, which was then known as the Basel-Binningen Church. Most of its members live in adjoining Alsace, and the congregation belongs to the Alsatian Mennonite Conference. The church was built in 1847 at 141 Holee Street, and was completely rebuilt in a modern style in 1932 at the same location. The Emmental (q.v.) congregation, with its seat at Langnau, built a meetinghouse at Kehr, in the outskirts of Langnau in 1888, and renovated and enlarged it in 1947. In 1899 the Emmental congregation built chapels at Bomatt on the Emme, and at Aebnit, near Bowil, west of Bomatt. The Bomatt church was renovated in 1955.

In 1893 the Kleintal congregation built a church at Moron, which was renovated in 1943. In 1894 the Chaux de Fonds congregation built one at Les Bulles, renovated in 1944. The Sonnenberg (q.v.) congregation bought some of the buildings of an inn on Fürstenberg (Mont Tramelan), and converted a dance hall into a spacious meeting place; it was considerably enlarged in 1947. The Jeangisboden (Sonnenberg) congregation acquired its church in 1900; this meetinghouse has been the site of the meetings of the Swiss Mennonite Conference. It was renovated in 1950.

Near the Swiss border in Alsace the Grosslützel (Grand Lucelle) congregation (formerly Delsbergtal) converted a tavern into a church. In 1956 this meetinghouse, which was severely damaged by military occupation in World War II, was renovated. The Schänzli congregation in Basel acquired a chapel on the street from Basel to Muttenz in 1891. A new church was built there in 1903 and renovated in 1954. The spacious Chaux d'Abel meetinghouse on the Jura plateau, which was built in 1905, belongs to the YMCA, of which a number of Mennonites are members.

For the purpose of maintaining a German school the Kleintal congregation in 1921 built a school at Perceux, above the cave called the "Goat Chapel," in which, according to tradition, the Mennonites met for worship in times of persecution. The congregation also built a school on the heights of Montbautier in 1923, in which the Mennonites meet for worship. Les Mottes, north of Tramelan, is the third meeting place of the Sonnenberg congregation. In 1928 a spacious room for meetings was built into a home. Also in Tramelan a room in a Mennonite home was rented for this purpose in 1941 and renovated in 1955. The most modern Mennonite meetinghouse in Switzerland was built at Courgenay in 1938 by the Pruntrut (Porrentruy) congregation. In 1956 a room was privately built into a new home at Reconvilier and placed at the disposal of the Mennonites.

The word "church" is not used by the Mennonites of Switzerland for their meeting places, but rather the word "chapel." Before these meetinghouses were built, the Swiss Mennonites met in rotation in barns, usually in the forenoons. A meal of nutritious peasoup was then served the members, many of whom had come on foot from a considerable distance. S.G.

C. South Germany. From the time of the Reformation to about the middle of the 17th century the Anabaptists and sometimes the Mennonites had to meet secretly for their worship services. During the severest persecutions they at times met in forests (e.g., at Immelshausen until as late as 1654) or on remote farms (e.g., betweeen Kriegsheim, q.v., and Pfeddersheim in 1608), often at night.

With the concession of Charles Ludwig, Elector of the Palatinate, granted in 1664, they were permitted, in villages where four or five families were living, to hold meetings of not more than 20 persons. For this the living room of a home was sufficient. Services were regularly held in rotation among the members.

Very likely, especially in the larger congregations, the need was felt by the first quarter of the 18th century of having a large room of their own for regular use, equipped in the simplest manner possible. Here it is not yet a matter of a building, but merely of parts of residences or other farm buildings which could be remodeled and furnished for the purpose. There are, of course, no records of dates, etc., from this period; nevertheless certain conclusions can be drawn on the basis of evidence in the congregations at Ibersheim, Kriegsheim, Friedelsheim, Weierhof, etc. The hall furnished in 1756 in Erpolzheim, which is still in use, may serve as an example from this period. In some instances the owners of the estates put rooms at the disposal of the Mennonite renters.

Toward the end of the 18th century meetinghouses were built in many places. They had to be built off the street and in the style of a farmhouse, in order not to be noticeable from the outside. Such buildings arose in 1770 at Weierhof, 1777 at Sembach, 1779 at Eppstein and Friedelsheim, 1783 in Heppenheim a.d. Wiese. Of these, Eppstein probably, in spite of frequent remodeling, has best preserved the type of Mennonite churches of that period (low room, rectangular windows, low pulpit), whereas the only other church remaining from that period which is still in use, namely, the Sembach, has been more radically altered.

In the early 19th century, when all legal restrictions were removed from the Mennonites in the Palatinate and Hesse, churches were built in the simple style of the Reformed churches of the vicinity. Churches of this kind were built in Altleiningen in 1811 (abandoned in 1956 because of a dilapidated condition), Monsheim 1820, Uffhofen 1829-30, Kühbörncheshof 1832, Friedelsheim 1836, Weierhof 1837, Deutschhof 1842, Ernstweiler 1843, etc. Of the few Amish congregations of South Germany only Ixheim built a church, erected in 1847, which was still in use until 1937. In other cases private rooms or rented halls were used. The Branchweilerhof congregation has for a long time been using the old arched, former Hospitalkirche. The Friedelsheim congregation (q.v.) in 1807 acquired by legal contract the right to the use of the Protestant church (until 1902).

In Baden, Württemberg, and Bavaria, where the congregations were subject to a great deal of change, since many of the members were renters on large estates, few meetinghouses were built. The churches in Baiertal and Streichenberg (Baden), built after 1800, were sold in the past century. Likewise the meetinghouse in Bildhausen near Schweinfurt, and the building intended for both church and school at Maxweiler. Also the attractive little church at Giebelstadt, built in 1867, had to be given up in 1953, because it was too far from Würzburg, the Mennonite center. The only churches left in this area were the one belonging to the Hasselbach congregation, built in 1846, and the one at Eichstock, built in 1856. In 1945, however, the Heilbronn congregation acquired the former MCC "neighborhood home," and in the same year the Ingolstadt congregation built a suitable room for the purpose. Everywhere else private rooms or space belonging to other churches is used.

In Frankfurt a congregational home was acquired in 1955, in which the MCC also has working quarters; in Kaiserslautern, on the other hand, the congregation is the guest of the MCC in the building erected by the MCC. Modern meetinghouses with additional rooms were built at Backnang in 1955 and in Enkenbach in 1956. They will no doubt point the way for further new meetinghouses, since the old style of building with only the one room which is used for regular worship services is no longer adequate for the manifold needs of congregations. For instance, in 1948 a hall was built at Sembach for worship services as well as youth activities.

As to terminology, the word "church" was not used east of the Rhine before about 1800, but is freely used now. The meetinghouse at Weierhof is, however, called a "Lehr." Elder Schmutz of Baden in an article in the Mennonitische Blätter in 1856 called these churches "meetinghouse, congregational house, or house of God." But later the word "Kirche" (church) was also adopted here and there. In the case of rented halls the word "Saal" is used. P.S.

Paul Schowalter, "Mennonite Churches in South Germany," Menn. Life VII (January 1952) 14; idem, "Der Kirchenbau in den Mennonitengemeinden von Pfalz-Hessen," Gem.-Kal., 1953, 36-43.

D. Northwest and Northeast Germany. It is known that the congregations in East Friesland had meetinghouses at least as early as 1600, although they were long required to worship "in private." The earliest known date for a meetinghouse in Emden, Leer, Norden, or Neustadt-Goedens is 1649 for the Ukowallist group in Emden. Emmerich built a meetinghouse about 1676. Crefeld built in 1693; Neuwied not until 1768, Emden in 1769. In Friedrichstadt the Alte Münze, owned by the deacon, was in use before 1652 when it was purchased by the congregation. In Hamburg-Altona the first meetinghouse was in the rear part of a private house purchased about 1619 (public services were not permitted until 1622). The first "real" meetinghouse (as B. C. Roosen calls it) was built in 1675.

The degrees of toleration granted to Mennonites in East and West Prussia, Danzig, and the lower Vistula region in Poland varied greatly; as a consequence the first meetinghouses were erected at widely differing times. The first meetinghouse built for that purpose was probably the one of 1586 at Muntau in the Culm-Graudenz area, rebuilt in 1898, which is in a sense the oldest Mennonite meetinghouse anywhere in the world. Its fate since 1945 is unknown. The meetinghouse of the Schönsee congregation near Culm, built in 1618, is the oldest Mennonite meetinghouse still standing in its original form. It was converted to a private dwelling ca. 1948. The Elbing-Ellerwald congregation built its first meetinghouse in 1590. In Danzig the Mennonites were not allowed to build meetinghouses until well into the 17th century, and then they were not to appear like public buildings but private dwellings. The Frisian congregation built first, ca. 1638, the Flemish congregation ca. 1648. The country churches were not allowed to build until a century or more later—Thiensdorf 1728, Orlofferfelde 1751, Rosenort 1754, and in 1768 four meetinghouses with permission of the Bishop of Culm—Fürstenwerder, Heubuden, Ladekopp, and Tiegenhagen. Obernessau near Thorn was built in 1778. Before the meetinghouses were built the congregations worshiped in various private homes of members. H.S.B.

The early meetinghouses of the Mennonites along the Vistula River in Danzig, Prussia, and Poland were simple structures resembling the homes or schools of that day. Some resemblance to the early Mennonite meetinghouses in the Netherlands can be detected. The smaller meetinghouses were usually one-story buildings like Schönsee (see ME I, "Illustrations," p. 8). Later two-story buildings were erected where needed to accommodate the growing membership. As a rule, the second story consisted of a balcony similar to the structures in the Netherlands. The main floor was for women and the balcony for men, as in the present Singel Church of Amsterdam. The pulpit was located on the long side with an elevated bench for the ministers and deacons. From the outside the meetinghouse could hardly be recognized as a place of worship. The old churches at Ellerwald, Fürstenwerder, and Heubuden were of this type (ME I, "Illustrations," p. 8). Usually the meetinghouse was a frame building, extremely plain, located in an open field.

The Thiensdorf church, erected in 1728, is thought to have been the first meetinghouse in Prussia. This indicates worship services had previously been held in private homes or public buildings such as schools. Later the meetinghouses were constructed of brick and resembled the surrounding non-Mennonite churches, sometimes having a steeple or a cross. Typical of this change in architecture were the churches of Rosengart and Elbing (ME I, "Illustrations," p. 8). Arched windows became common. C.K.

E. Russia. The Mennonite meetinghouses of Poland and Russia were patterned after the early structures in Prussia. A typical structure was the Chortitza church, and for the Mennonite Brethren, the meetinghouse at Einlage (ME I, "Illustrations," p. 10). Gradually a new style of meetinghouses evolved. Brick buildings replaced the former frame structure. An adjustment to the Russian environment became noticeable. Heavy brick fences as a rule surrounded the churches. The most extreme adjustment to the Russian environment was found in the Einlage church. The early meetinghouse in Russia closely resembled the school building found in every village. The pattern of the meetinghouse in Russia and Prussia was transplanted to the Great Plains of North America. Some of the churches built after this pattern were the First Mennonite Church of Beatrice, Neb.; the Hoffnungsau Mennonite Church near Buhler, Kan.; the Kleine Gemeinde Church near Meade, Kan.; and the numerous meetinghouses of the early Mennonites in Manitoba and Saskatchewan as well as Mexico and Paraguay. (See also Architecture, where literature is listed.) C.K.

F. North America. The Swiss and South German Mennonite immigrants who came to America before the Revolutionary War had never worshiped in meetinghouses in their homelands, nor had the Lower Rhine and Crefeld immigrants of 1683-95 (the first Crefeld meetinghouse was built in 1695); only the few families from the Hamburg-Altona congregation had had one (the Altona meetinghouse was built in 1675). But with all restrictions removed in free America Mennonites of all kinds except the Amish built meetinghouses apparently as soon as the size of the congregation required it and economic conditions permitted. Meanwhile meetings were held in homes, which were sometimes built with a large room especially built to accommodate church services. An illustration is the Christian Herr house near Lancaster, built in 1719 with such a room, the oldest Mennonite building used for worship still standing in America.

The Amish immigrants, however, elevated the practice of holding meetings in homes into a principle. To this day the Old Order Amish basically forbid the building of meetinghouses for worship purposes. The only Amish meetinghouse built in America before 1830 was the one called Chester Valley, near Malvern, Chester Co., Pa., built in 1795. The congregation here, however, died out within a generation after this. The next Amish meetinghouse was the Beech church near Louisville, Ohio, about 1830, followed by the Clinton Frame church near Goshen, Ind., in 1848. The Rock Creek church, near Danvers, Ill., was built in 1853 and the neighboring Partridge (Metamora) church in 1854. Congregations in Ohio which were leaving the "Old Order" Amish began to build meetinghouses, such as Walnut Grove (West Liberty) in 1857, Oak Grove, near Smithville, and Walnut Creek, both in 1862, Central at Archbold and Martens Creek near Millersburg in 1869. The Ontario Amish churches did not begin to build meetinghouses until the 1880's. Sometimes the building of a meetinghouse became the definite sign or cause of a break between the progressive and old order elements.

American Mennonites never in principle opposed meetinghouses. The first one built was in Germantown, Pa., in 1708. The second Germantown meetinghouse, of 1770, is the oldest American Mennonite meetinghouse still used for regular services. The only other meetinghouse built before 1800 and still standing at the original location was built at Landisville, west of Lancaster, Pa., in 1740 as a residence, but was used as a meetinghouse long before 1790; it is now used as a dwelling for the sexton. The Byerland meetinghouse, also in Lancaster County, built about 1755, is still standing but has been moved several miles away. In order of erection the oldest meetinghouses in the original settlements in Eastern Pennsylvania were Skippack 1725, Towamencin 1728(?), Hereford 1732, Swamp 1735, Salford 1738(?), and Deep Run 1746, all in the Franconia Conference. Dates of the earliest meetinghouses in the Lancaster district are not known before the first one at Abbeyville, built in 1747 or earlier, and New Danville, built in 1755. Apparently the first Lancaster Mennonites waited a generation before building meetinghouses. Most of their early meetinghouses were built after 1750; by 1800 the Lancaster Conference had at least 27 known meetinghouses. The earliest known meetinghouses in other areas, with dates of erection, were: Western Pennsylvania—Scottdale (Pennsville) 1800, Blough 1837, Masontown 1840; Ontario—Vineland 1810, Kitchener 1813, Markham 1817; Ohio—Fairfield County, two meetinghouses about 1810-15, Rowland in Canton 1823, North Lima 1824(?), followed by Midway almost at the sametime, Sonnenberg 1834, Bluffton (GCM) 1840; Virginia—Mill Creek near Luray in Page County (a union church) 1800, six erected 1823-28, viz., Trissels 1823, Pike 1825, Brennemans 1826, Weavers 1827, Hildebrand and Springdale; Maryland—Housers, Beaver Creek 1763, Strasburg (in Franklin County, Pa.) 1812, Millers 1835; Indiana—Clinton Brick 1845, Yellow Creek 1849, Holdeman 1851, Berne (GCM) 1852; Illinois—Union near Washington 1858, Sterling 1859, Summerfield (GCM) 1858.

The immigrants from Russia 1874-80 had had meetinghouses in their homeland and proceeded to erect them in their new homes very soon after arrival. The first meetinghouses of the General Conference Mennonite Church were immigration houses (Alexanderwohl, Hoffnungsau, etc.) and schoolhouses; the first Krimmer Mennonite Brethren meetinghouse was Gnadenau near Hillsboro, Kan., built in 1876; the first Mennonite Brethren meetinghouse was Ebenfeld near Hillsboro, built in 1876.

The first meetinghouses in Pennsylvania were simple, plain, and functional, designed only for an assembly for worship, but often serving a double use as schoolhouses, or with schoolhouses or even sexton's quarters attached. This style was generally followed by the later congregations. Later, when Sunday schools and other activities were introduced, basements were added to accommodate the children's classes, and more recently educational wings or sections with classrooms and other facilities have been built. For the most part this has been the pattern of the meetinghouse type and development throughout American Mennonite history, except that some of the groups from Russia brought with them a different type of meetinghouse design.

The descendants of the Swiss-South German Mennonites and the Amish from Alsace, Bavaria, and Hesse universally called their buildings meetinghouses (Versammlungshaus), or "Gmeehaus" (Gemeindehaus) in Pennsylvania Dutch, until recent decades, when the term "church" has partially superseded it. (See also Architecture.) H.S.B.

Megander, Kaspar: see Grossmann, Kaspar.

Mehoude (originally Meaude), a former Dutch Mennonite family. stemming from French Flanders and because of persecutions emigrating to Dutch Zeeland-Flanders, where its members belonged to the Mennonite congregations of Cadzand and Aardenburg, later also of Vlissingen. In the early 18th century this family joined the Reformed Church. vdZ.

Mehrning, Jakob, of Holstein, Germany, author of the book S. Baptismi Historia: Das ist/Heilige Tauff-Historia/In welcher Die Wahrheit der Ersten-Ein- vnd Eygentlichen Tauffordnung Jesu Christi, Aus heiliger Schrift deutlich widerholt/darzu aus vielen Alten vnd Newen/Kirchenhistorien/durch alle Hundert Jährige Zeiten/von Anfang der Tauff bisshieher/bezeuget/Vnd wie solche fast nach allen Hauptstücken/offt verändert/vnd in schändliche Missbräuch verkehret sey worden . . . . Anfänglich durch den hochgelehrten H. Johan. Montanum kurtz/vnd mit blossen Allegaten in Niderlandischer Sprach beschrieben/Nach dessen Todt aber aus seinen hinderlassenen Schrifften/vnd andern Autoren vollkomlich vermehret/vnd in die Hochdeutsche Sprach übersetzet/Durch Jacob Mehrning aus Holstein/der Göttlichen Wahrheit Studiosum (Dortmund, 1646 and 1647). The book, containing XVII plus 1128 pages, is a complete original revision of the booklet by Joh. Montanus and at the same time its translation from Dutch to German. Its purpose was to promote baptism by immersion practiced by the Dompelaers, but it grew into a veritable historical arsenal on the "baptism ordinance of Christ," though with what critical right is another question. Under point five of the foreword the Mennonites are expressly taken to task, "since some of them understand little of this mystery." Nothing is known concerning the author's personal life. No doubt he is partly responsible for the confusion caused by the Dompelaers in the Hamburg-Altona church. The assumption by "many" that the Tauff-Historia is not Mehrning's work, but that of Chr. Raselius, is seen to be untenable when the two are compared. O.S.

Jöcher, Gelehrtenlexikon; Moller, Cimbria Literata; B. C. Roosen, Gesch. der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona (Hamburg, 1886); ML III, 65.

Meihuizen, a widely branched Dutch Mennonite family. On account of persecution a number of Swiss Mennonite families moved to Holland at the beginning of the 18th century. Among them were Samuel Peter and his wife Barbara Fr(e)y (q.v.) and five children from Gontenschwil (at that time in the canton of Bern, now in Aargau). In 1711 they are said to have belonged to the Reformed Church, but "having a great desire to the religion of the Swiss Brethren." When they left Switzerland in the fall of 1714 Samuel Peter was not yet a Mennonite, although his wife had apparently united with them; but in the Netherlands both Barbara and Samuel Peter were Mennonites from the beginning. They settled in Kalkwijk near Hoogezand in the province of Groningen, where they continued to farm as they had done in Switzerland. They adopted the name Meihuizen after a village Maihusen in the Catholic canton of Lucerne, from which an ancestor had fled to Protestant Gontenschwil in 1532. Samuel Peter and Barbara Frey, the former of whom died in 1758 at the age of nearly 87, and the latter in the following year at the age of 86, are the progenitors of this numerous family. A descendant of this family is Hendrik Wiebes Meihuizen, b. at Arnhem on Aug. 29, 1906, married to Minke Wartena, b. 1910, a Mennonite pastor, serving at Wieringen 1933-36, Veendam-Pekela 1936-38, and from 1938 at The Hague. Since September 1955 he has been the chief editor of the Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad. He is the author of a number of publications, including Doopsgezinde Kenmerken en Eigenaardigheden (Amsterdam, 1948, 2nd ed. 1948); Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954); Een Dader des Woords, in memoriam Ds Albert Keuter (Amsterdam, n.d.-1946); De Doopsgezinde Broederschap (The Hague, n.d.-1955); some sermons; a number of historical studies, particularly "De Geloofswereld onzer martelaren," in Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad V (1951); "Spiritualistic Tendencies and Movements Among the Dutch Mennonites of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries," MQR XXVII (October 1953); "De Verwachting van de wederkomende Christus en het rijk Gods bij de oude Doopsgezinden," in Stemmen uit de Doopsgezinde broederschap III (1954, No. 2); "Het geloof in de Heilige Geest onder de oudste Nederlandse Doopsgezinden," in Stemmen III (1954) No. 5.

The family tree, provided with an excellent introduction on the Swiss Mennonites in Holland, was drawn up by the minister Jacob Dirks Huizinga. vdZ.

J. D. Huizinga, Stamboek of Geslachtregister der Nakomelingen van Samuel Peter (Meihuizen) en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890); the genealogical part of this book was reprinted with additions in 1922 (n.d.) and 1946 (n.d.); DJ 1928, 114-26; ML III, 65 f.

Meindert van Emden: see Meynardt van Emden (van Delft).

Meister (Meyster), Leonhard, an Anabaptist (?) martyr executed with Hans Koch (q.v.) at Augsburg, Bavaria, Germany, in 1524 for his faith (according to Mehrning probably a Waldensian). He was the author of the oldest song in the Ausbund, "Ach Gott Vater im höchsten Thron." Neff.

J. Mehrning, S. Baptismi Historia (Dortmund, 1646 and 1647); Wolkan, Lieder, 8 and 140; Mart. Mir. D 1 f., E 413 f.; ML III, 66.

Meiszrod, Barbara, an Anabaptist martyr, baptized by Heinz Kraut (q.v.), made her house a center for the meetings of the Anabaptists in Mühlhausen in Thuringia. A meeting of this kind was surprised in October 1537, the participants arrested, tried on the rack on Oct. 11, and ten of them drowned, including Barbara, in the Unstrut between Mühlhausen and Ammern. (Wappler, Thüringen; ML III, 66.)

Melanchthon, Philip (1497-1560), the German reformer, friend and co-worker of Martin Luther, the son of an armorer, George Schwarzerdt, whose wife was a niece of Johann Reuchlin. After his father's death he attended Latin school and at the age of 12 entered the University of Heidelberg, followed by the University of Tübingen in 1512, earning the M.A. degree there in 1514, which gave him the right to lecture. In 1518 Reuchlin recommended him as professor of Greek at the University of Wittenberg; on Aug. 29 he delivered his inaugural address, which made a deep impression on Luther. A fast friendship was soon formed between them, with a lasting effect on the course of the Reformation. They complemented each other well. Luther, the religious genius and creative spirit, Melanchthon, the man of the pen, the keen scholar, who clothed Luther's ideas in scholarly form. Their friendship went through some difficult trials. Melanchthon was again and again offended by his friend's violent manner, severe judgment, and rough treatment of opponents; and Luther suffered under Melanchthon's timidity, hesitation, scruples, and fear. Melanchthon's last years were saddened by dogmatic strife brought on by his undecisive character, until death gently released him from the "rage of the theologians."

Melanchthon, generally a mild theologian, dealt with extraordinary harshness and increasing roughness with the Anabaptists. He had not the least understanding for them. He saw in them only "irreligious fanatics and murderous revolutionaries, enemies of temporal government, however peaceful they may seem" (a letter to Myconius, February 1530), "a fiendish sect, which must not be tolerated" (a letter to Myconius, Oct. 31, 1531). Therein lies deep tragedy, for in his ideas he was much closer to them than was Luther. He held to freedom of the will, and sponsored the separation of religious and moral civil life (opinion to Philip of Hesse in 1524), favored the reinstatement of the ban (church inspector's protocol), recognized in the immorality of the populace the damage done by the doctrine of justification, which was being used as a convenient bed of ease. He had temporary doubts concerning the validity of infant baptism.

In mid-December 1527 the "Zwickau prophets," Nikolaus Storch, Thomas Drechsel, and Marcus Stübner, came to Wittenberg. They made a tremendous impression on Melanchthon. He wrote about them to Spalatin. Their "divine inspiration" he recognized as fanaticism, but to their objections to infant baptism he could find no answer until a letter from Luther (Jan. 13, 1522) freed him from his doubts. It is reasonable to assume that his later severity against the Anabaptists stemmed from his inability to come to terms decisively and effectively with the arguments of the Prophets. It is significant that his basic characterizations of Anabaptism, developed in later years, did not depart substantially from his analysis of the Prophets.

In 1522 Melanchthon became acquainted with Thomas Müntzer, who is said to have disputed with Melanchthon and Bugenhagen (q.v.). From Alstedt Müntzer wrote at Easter in 1524 a letter to Melanchthon, in which he accused the Wittenbergers of neglecting the inner revelation, too much consideration of the weak, and servility to the princes. Further contacts between them have not been proved. He probably did not write the Historie von Thomas Münzer, which was long the principal source on Müntzer's activities in the Peasants' War (Brandt, 223).

At first Melanchthon took a tolerant attitude toward the Anabaptists and the Zwickau prophets, whom he identified with the former. In the letter to Frederick mentioned above he rejected the application of violent measures. Their "conventicle nature should not be stopped with violence, but with Scripture and judicio spiritualium hominum." But he soon changed his position; his attitude became increasingly harsh. Already in his Unterricht der Visitatoren of 1528 he placed every deviation from Lutheran doctrine under the punitive arm of temporal government as sedition. The mandate issued on Jan. 17, 1528, by the Elector of Saxony, who was somewhat influenced in this instance by Melanchthon, threatened all who did not follow Lutheranism with loss of life and property.

In July 1527 Melanchthon was commissioned by the Elector to conduct an inspection (visitation) of the churches in Thuringia. Among his companions were Friedrich Myconius (q.v.) and Justus Menius (q.v.). On this tour of inspection he encountered at least the teachings of those whom he called Anabaptists, if not the Anabaptists in person (letter to Camerarius Oct. 23, 1527). He appended to his "Visitation Articles" a brief instruction to pastors on methods of effectively refuting Anabaptist arguments against infant baptism. His first major work against the Anabaptists, the Adversus anabaptistas Philippi Melanchthonis iudicium, is an elaboration of this basic argument. It was finished by Jan. 23, 1528, and printed in April 1528. A German translation by Justus Jonas, Underricht Philip Melanchthon Wider die Lere der Wiederteuffer, appeared in October of the same year.

It was dedicated to Friedrich Pistorius, the abbot of a monastery in Nürnberg. It deals with the sacraments, their number, and particularly with baptism, the baptism of John and the apostles, and infant baptism. He attempted to refute the "frightful, abominable, diabolical doctrine and error of the Anabaptists" and defended infant baptism on the grounds that it was the New Testament parallel to circumcision in the Old Testament.

Hardly two years later he expressed himself definitely in favor of the death penalty for Anabaptists in the letter to Friedrich Myconius of February 1530: "At first when I began to become acquainted with Storch and his following, to whom the whole family of Anabaptists owes its existence, I was possessed by a foolish tolerance. Others were also of the opinion that heretics are not to be destroyed with the sword. At that time Duke Frederick was violently angry with Storch, and if he had not been protected by us, the mad and thoroughly bad man would have been executed. Now I regret this lenience not a little. What disturbances, what heresies did he not stir up afterward? For you must think thus: As an armed race is said to have come forth from the teeth of a dragon, so have all these sects of Anabaptists and Zwinglians come forth from him. . . .

All the Anabaptists, even if they are blameless in all other respects, reject some part or other of their civic duties. Though the matter in and for itself may be insignificant, yet at this time and in so many crises it is extremely dangerous. . . . Therefore it is my opinion concerning those who hold beliefs that are, to be sure, not seditious, but still obviously blasphemous, that the government is under obligation to kill them" (Wappler, Kursachsen, 13 f.).

On Jan. 18, 1530, six Anabaptists were executed at Reinhardsbrunn in Saxony (see Kolb, Andreas). This execution evoked great excitement. Elector John now requested an opinion of the Wittenberg theologians. It was composed by Melanchthon and handed in at the end of October 1531 under the title, Gutachten an den Kurfürsten Johann von Sachsen. Following a lengthy introduction it said:

"In the matter of punishments distinctions must be made. For there are three kinds of Anabaptists: First the instigators and those who have made a second beginning; secondly followers and misled ones, who openly hold seditious beliefs, for instance, that it is unfitting to hold government office, that Christians must share their goods among each other, that a Christian should not swear an oath, not even to the government, that the churches should be reformed and the ungodly destroyed, that it is wrong to pay interest, and similar articles; in the third place there are many who erred because of lack of understanding, but could be persuaded to recant.

"The first class is to be killed with the sword, because they persisted contrary to the electoral mandate in holding meetings; for they have thereby shown themselves disobedient to the government. But the second class who hold obviously seditious articles of faith and persisted in them in spite of warning and instruction, should as revolutionaries also be put to death. . . . Finally those of the third class, who have erred because of ignorance, should be shown mercy after they have been instructed and have recanted their error, after they have made public confession and have been warned not to repeat the error. But if they do not desist from their error—'for many of them are possessed by the devil'—they should be expelled from the country, provided that no seditious beliefs or malicious intentions are found in them, or be punished by some other mild penalty" (Wappler, Kursachsen, 26 f.).

At the end of 1532 Luther and Melanchthon warned the council of Münster (Westphalia) and Bernhardt Rothmann of the Zwinglians and fanatics. (See Germany.)

Three years later Melanchthon wrote his booklet, Etliche propositiones wider die lehr der Widerteuffer (erroneously dated 1528). It is a reply to Rothmann's Restitution, and the second edition of the same year bears the title, Wider das gotteslästerliche und schändliche Buch, so zu Münster im Druck neulich ist ausgegangen. In it he refutes the teaching of the Anabaptists of Münster concerning the violent erection of the kingdom of God, since the kingdom of Christ is spiritual, and concerning community of goods and polygamy. It is incomprehensible that he failed to distinguish between the peaceful and the revolutionary Anabaptists. "And it does no good," he writes, "to say that they are not all thus. But on the contrary, because the devil has torn them away from the true doctrine, as one devil is about as impious as another, and they are all together striving every moment against the kingdom of God and temporal order and rule, therefore one Anabaptist is like another, and the fact that they do not all make so much noise and innovation is due merely to lack of opportunity." In point 24 he calls the doctrine that "Christ did not take His flesh from the flesh of Mary, a terrible, abominable blasphemy. In it one can see that they conceal other poison and blasphemy concerning Christ."

From Melanchthon a different verdict might have been expected concerning the Anabaptists. He had far better opportunity to become acquainted with them. On Dec. 1, 1535, he took part in a long cross-examination of Anabaptists imprisoned in Jena. It lasted several days. Melanchthon and his colleagues used all their ingenuity and great learning to convince the prisoners of their error. Results were meager. In a report to the Elector of Saxony (Bericht an den Kurfürsten Johann von Sachsen) on Jan. 19, 1536, he wrote "Against the obstinate it is necessary to apply serious punishment. And even some may not be malicious in other respects, nevertheless we must resist the shameful sect, in which there is so much horrible and shameful error" (Wappler, Thüringen, 149). Several days later, the Anabaptists in Jena, who remained true to their faith, were executed.

In the letter to the elector cited above, Melanchthon urged the publication of an official writing which would reveal what "coarse, seditious, shameful, and harmful articles the Anabaptists hold." He was commissioned to write it. On April 10, 1536, a new mandate against the Anabaptists was issued for Saxony, using the executed Anabaptists as a warning to others. The following are the main articles of their faith, as he states them, by means of which they deceived the simple folk in body and soul: (1) Christians should not and can not be in an office of government, which take the sword; (2) Christians should have no other government over them than the preachers of the Gospel; (3) Christians are forbidden to swear an oath, and to swear is sin; (4) Christians are obliged to give their possessions to the common good, and shall have no property; (5) If one partner in a marriage is a true believer and the other is not, then the believer may leave the unbeliever and court another, merely on account of his faith; (6) That infant baptism is wrong; (7) Infants have no sin; "original sin," so-called, is not in fact sin; (8) That alone is sin which man of his own free will commits.

In addition Melanchthon wrote a booklet that was by electoral command to be given to every pastor in the electorate with the obligation to read it from the pulpit every third Sunday. Its title was Verlegung etlicher unchristlicher Artikel, welche die Wiederteuffer fürgeben. This booklet of instruction appeared in two editions in 1536. It contains very sharp language for the gentle reformer. He called Anabaptism a "horrible devilish sect." He maintained that the government was obliged "to resist and punish such shameful, murderous doctrine, since it teaches only revolt, theft and murder, besides immorality and adultery"; events at Münster proved this, he held. He called them Manichaeans and expressed the hope that like them, they would not increase or remain long. The Anabaptist sect, he said, was simply a diabolical deception, which must be punished with force and wiped out.—What the Anabaptists thought of this booklet is shown by the statement of a prisoner, that there was not a true word in it (Wappler, Inquisition, 78).

In May 1536 Philip of Hesse also requested an opinion of the Wittenberg theologians, for advice in dealing with the Anabaptists imprisoned in his realm. The opinion was delivered on June 5, 1536 (see Punishment). It was composed by Melanchthon and signed by Luther, Bugenhagen, and Cruciger. The title was Das Weltliche Oberkeitt den Widertaufferen mit leiblicher straff zu weren schuldig sey. (One edition of the pamphlet bore the subtitle: Melanchthonis Iudicium: Ob christliche Fürsten schuldig sind, der Wiedertäufer unchristlicher Sekte mit leiblicher Strafe und mit dem Schwert zu wehren.) This booklet states most definitely that Anabaptists are to be punished with the sword.

Also in a letter to Henry VIII of England, Sept. 25, 1538, Melanchthon sponsors the severest punishment for the Anabaptists. In his opinion of Feb. 5, 1539, concerning religious conditions in the duchy of Jülich, he cautions that "there is much vermin of Anabaptists there" (Rembert, Wiedertäufer, 267).

The Anabaptist question occupied Melanchthon once more at the disputation of Worms in 1557 in the summarizing statement which he drew up, called Prozess, wie es soll gehalten werden mit den Wiedertäufern. His attitude had not grown more lenient. As seditionists and blasphemers, he said, they should be killed with the sword, according to Leviticus 24. Two years later, in 1559, when the question was asked: Does a pious government do wrong in killing Anabaptists who cling to their terrible errors? he replied with lengthy argument: If they are obstinate and stubbornly persist in their error, they may be killed as revolutionaries. In this final declaration of Melanchthon against the Anabaptists (entitled Ob fromme Obrigkeiten unrecht tun, wenn sie an schrecklichen Irrtümern festhaltende Wiedertäufer töten) he contends that on the basis of natural law the Anabaptists should be killed. (C.R. IX, 1002-4.)

One can only lament this verdict of Melanchthon's, which has been fraught with such dire consequences in church history. Two hundred years were to pass before religious toleration was given its due. NEFF.

Corpus Reformatorum I, III, IV, IX; J. v. Döllinger, Die Reformation I; G. Ellinger, Philipp Melanchthon. Ein Lebensbild (Berlin, 1902); H. Engelland, Melanchthon, Glauben und Handeln (München, 1931); W. Gussmann, Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte des Augsburger Bekenntnisses (Leipzig, 1911); Fr. Nippold, Was gibt den heutigen Universitäten das Recht und die Pflicht zu Melanchthon-Feiern (Bern, 1897); N. Paulus, Protestantismus und Toleranz im 16. Jhdt. (1911); C. Schmidt, Philipp Melanchthon (Eberfeld, 1861); G. Ellinger, Philipp Melanchthon (Berlin, 1902); J. W. Richard, Philipp Melanchthon (N.Y., 1907); P. Wappler, Inquisition und Ketzerprozesse in Zwickau zur Reformationszeit im Zusammenhang der Entwicklung der Ansichten Luthers u. Melanchthons (Leipzig, 1908); idem, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); idem, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen (Jena, 1913); J. S. Oyer, "The Writings of Melanchthon Against the Anabaptists," MQR XXVI (1952) 259-79; W. W. Wiswedel and R. Friedmann, "The Anabaptists Answer Melanchthon," MQR XXIX (1955) 212-31; O. Clemen, Melanchthons Briefwechsel, Supplementa Melanchthoniana (Leipzig, 1926); Robert Stupperich," Melanchthon und die Täufer," Kerugma und Dogma III (1957) 150-170; ML III, 66-69.

Melander, Dionysius (1486-1561), appointed with Bernhard Algesheimer by the city council of Frankfurt (q.v.), Germany, as the first Protestant preachers, under the pressure of the uprising of the citizens on April 20, 1526. For a decade the two preachers were very successful and influential, since they had the guilds on their side. "What the preachers ordered was done," writes Scheffers Kreinchen in a contemporary chronicle (Dechent, 125). This was demonstrated in the first of a long series of requests presented to the city council concerning the Anabaptists. When Anabaptists began to preach outside the city walls in 1528, the two pastors demanded that the council suppress them; the council complied with the edict of March 24, 1528, which forbade giving them shelter or lodging. This position was still in force in 1704, for when some Mennonite refugees from Switzerland wanted to settle in the city in that year, they were refused, "after they had in a discussion clearly expressed their doctrine" (Dechent, 114).

A presumptuous attitude on Melander's part led to the hostility of wide circles toward him, especially of the colleagues who had for years supported him but now accused him of moral lapses. In February 1535 he requested his release. The council consented, giving him through Wolfgang Capito (q.v.) a testimonial of honorable life and conduct (Dechent, 144). After Easter Melander left Frankfurt and entered the service of Philip of Hesse, who had heard him preach at the Marburg disputation, and now appointed him court preacher.

In this new position Melander again came into contact with the Anabaptists. Characteristic of his attitude at this time is his opinion on measures passed by the government council on Aug. 7, 1536, when he said that the populace must be urged to reform its conduct; offenses must be punished, "in order that the Anabaptists may not take from us an excuse for setting up a new church" (see Hesse). He incidentally gives the Anabaptists a good testimonial in stressing that they, the preachers, must clean their own house in order to deprive the Anabaptists of a pretext for leaving the established church. The government really made an effort "through positive work to remove the foundation from the accusations of the Anabaptists and to remove existing offenses by suitable measures. Clearly and plainly Bucer expressed this in a letter written to Philip in Wittenberg on Nov. 17, 1538" (Diehl, 5). This positive work was to be accomplished through the church discipline of Ziegenhain published in 1539, which Melander helped to draw up (Thudichum, 595), and in connection with this, also a result of dealings with the Anabaptists, the Order of Confirmation which led to the introduction of confirmation (q.v.) in all Protestant countries.

There is no record of any further efforts made by Melander to suppress the Anabaptists. He died on July 10, 1561, in Kassel at the age of 75 years. HEGE.

H. Dechent, Kirchengeschichte von Frankfurt am Main seit der Reformation I (Leipzig and Frankfurt, 1913); W. Diehl, Zur Geschichte der Konfirmation (Giessen, 1897); K. W. H. Hochhuth, "Mittheilungen aus der protestantischen Secten-Geschichte in der hessischen Kirche," in Ztscht für die hist. Theol. XXVIII (1858); Fr. Thudichum, Die deutsche Reformation 1517-1577 II (Leipzig, 1909); ML III, 69.

Melchior, an Anabaptist martyr, who was executed at Schwäbisch-Gmünd (q.v.), Germany, together with Wolfgang Esslinger (q.v.) and five other brethren in 1531. (Mart. Mir. D 32, E 439 f.; ML III, 65.)

Melchior von Salzburg, a knight, an Anabaptist martyr, who baptized and preached in Augsburg, Germany, in 1527. He was burned at the stake at Passau in 1528. HEGE.

Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Ref.-Gesch. I, 2nd ed. (Munich, 1901) 252; idem, Zur Gesch. der Wiedertäufer in Oberschwaben III (Augsburg, 1901) 80 and 99; ML III, 69.

Melchiorites, the followers of Melchior Hofmann (q.v.) after his conversion to Anabaptism in 1530 in Strasbourg (q.v.), Alsace. Among them baptism was performed as a sign that the adult convert was forsaking the world, the flesh, and the devil, and entering into a covenant with God. Members called themselves "Bundesgenossen" or (Dutch) "Bondgenoten" (q.v.) (Covenanters). Hofmann transplanted the movement to northwest Germany and the Netherlands. There were also some Melchiorites in England (q.v.). Hofmann's chiliasm and allegorical interpretation of the Bible, particularly the book of Revelation, as well as the prevalent social, political, and religious conditions, were the factors that determined the chiliastic, revolutionary form adopted by the movement after Hofmann's imprisonment in Strasbourg. Basing their view on Revelation they considered it their obligation to set up the kingdom of God and destroy the ungodly. A group of Melchiorites attacked the Oldeklooster (q.v.) monastery near Bolsward, Friesland. Jan van Geelen (q.v.) stormed the Amsterdam city hall on May 10, 1535. With the fall of Münster (q.v.) on June 25 of that year, the radical form of the movement soon lost most of its followers. With Jan van Batenburg, the group of Melchiorites known as "Covenanters of the Sword" disappeared, although there was occasional revolutionary Anabaptist activity until 1544.

But the spirit of the original Bundesgenossen in Strasbourg was not extinct. Such Melchiorites could now be called "Covenanters under the Cross." They had always protested against the radical form of the movement, as early as 1533 when it first appeared. Among them were men like Jan Volkertsz Trypmaker, Jacob van Campen, and Obbe and Dirk Philips. After the catastrophe of Münster it was the special merit of Menno Simons (q.v.) that the peaceful Melchiorites were gathered together and were able to withstand the severe persecution. The earlier names were now replaced by such designations as Obbites, Dirkites, Mennists, and finally Doopsgezinden. It appears that small groups of Melchiorites persisted in Middle Germany as late as 1560 and after. C.K.

A. Hulshoff, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgez. te Straatsburg van 1525 tot 1557 (Amsterdam, 1905); W. I. Leendertz, Melchior Hofmann (Haarlem, 1883); Kühler, Geschiedenis I; K. Vos, "Kleine bijdragen over de Doopersche beweging in Nederland tot het optreden van Menno Simons," DB 1917; DB 1919, 198 et passim; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim; F. O. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann (Haarlem, 1885) ML III, 69 f.

Melis Jansz, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, on Feb. 11, 1539, because he had been (re)baptized and held "heretical opinions concerning the sacrament and the Catholic doctrines." vdZ.

J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Geschiedenis der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63.

Melitopol, a city (pop. 75,000) in South Russia on the Molotschna in the province of Taurida. As a trade center Melitopol was important to the villages in the volosts of Halbstadt, Prischib, and Eichenfeld. In 1914 among other German Protestant groups there was a small Mennonite congregation there with a church of its own. Some of the members lost their lives in the Machno (q.v.) reign of terror during the spring of 1919.

The Mennonite church in Melitopol is of particular historical interest, since it was the scene of the last meeting of the general conference (Bundeskonferenz) of the Russian Mennonites (q.v.). The church had been closed for some time because the congregation had not registered promptly in the winter of 1923-24, and was unable to raise the necessary funds. It was opened on Aug. 9, 1925, when outside funds were donated, and was used every Sunday.

At the Ukrainian Mennonite general conference of Oct. 5-9, 1926, there were present 83 delegates and 14 visitors, representing 22,380 members. The meeting was watched over by two government officials (Kotelnikov and Schön). The discussions were determined by the pressures and difficulties of the time; ways and means were sought to alleviate them in the spirit of unity and love. Their desire was, as P. Penner (Lichtfelde) said in the conference address, to promote the kingdom of God, to the exclusion of any selfish interests.

This striving found expression in the reports given by representatives of the several districts on work done in the 20 months following the general conference held in Moscow in January 1925. Efforts had been made to elevate the inner life of the church and to resist the destructive spirit of the age. Everywhere church services were well attended.

A resolution passed on these reports states as a confession of faith, "that everywhere in the churches even in the most difficult circumstances an effort is being made to grow as a church of Christ on protective Biblical principles in the generally upset circumstances of life. One of the first requirements toward this end must be mutual loving understanding and the peaceable, fraternal co-operation between the various branches; the reports show us that in all the congregations there is an awakening to the recognition of this need and the efforts in this direction are being made. This is grace and true mercy from God, which watches over the churches, and only in the strength of this grace can we approach our goal. . . . In surveying our widely scattered Mennonite brotherhood we are filled with the conviction that there is resident in our people a capital of religious strength, inner warmth and tenderness, and that our peculiar Mennonite confession presents a rich mine of healthy folkstrength and our Biblical church organization offers a fruitful field for developing the same."

The addresses and talks on the seriousness of the situation were in harmony with the above. The difficult tasks of church work, particularly pastoral care, are in the foreground. The proposals made here had as their object the elevation of the religious and moral life of the brotherhood. Consideration was given to the long recognized need for a Bible school, for expanded evangelization, for unity among the children of God, and expansion of work for the youth. The missionary spirit, which had to a large extent grown lax, was to be revived.

Regarding youth work the government representative reminded the conference that the instruction of children under eighteen was prohibited. The conference planned to work toward procuring government permission to give this instruction. But this was not achieved, nor was the Bible school set up. Already during the conference sessions there were indications of suppression. H. Reimer, the pastor of Rückenau, was sentenced to a month of hard labor for issuing birth certificates, and his congregation was dissolved. At the conference the government representative also raised objections to letting Unser Blatt circulate outside the Ukraine and recommended that they obtain government permission for this, as they had done for their foreign subscribers.

The discussions of the delegates revealed that the congregations had been losing capable leaders by the emigration of many preachers. In 1926 there were only 46,829 Mennonites, including children, in the Ukraine; of these, 9,000 baptized members met in 23 churches in the Molotschna. (Unser Blatt I, 28; II, 46-53, 58-59, 85-88, 113-16, 120-21, 151-55; ML III, 70 f.) HEGE.

Melk, a town (pop. 3,175) of Lower Austria, situated in the upper entry to the Wachau, with a famous old Benedictine abbey. According to the Passau court records in the archives at Munich, Hans Hut (q.v.) introduced the Anabaptist movement here, when he stopped briefly in the spring of 1527 on his return from Vienna. When he went on to Styria, he took with him two highly respected citizens whom he had won, Eibmann and Simon Fleischhacker. In 1528 Jörg Krautschlögel (q.v.), a leader in Melk who had recently been in Krems (q.v.), was in Melk. A Passau court record describes him as "a fat person, a small beard, and was tolltaker on the bridge at Vienna, a leader of the deceiving sect of the Anabaptists, lived especially in Melk and wherever he could mix in, in order to spread the heresies." The authorities of Lower Austria, urged on by Ferdinand, took energetic action in Melk, reporting to the king on March 4, 1528, that in Melk several Anabaptists had been questioned. These were imprisoned and Wolfgang Künigl (q.v.) was appointed to prosecute them. The outcome of the trial was that Krautschlögel and two other Anabaptists were beheaded in October and their bodies burned. These are the three victims mentioned but not named in the martyr list. People traveling from Tirol to Moravia used to end the river trip at Krems or Stein rather than at Melk. P.DE.

A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin von Linz und die oberösterreichischen Täufergemeinden in den Jahren 1525-1531 (Berlin, 1893); J. Loserth, "Wiedertaufe in Niederösterreich," in Bl. des Vereins für Landeskunde von Niederösterreich XXXIII (Vienna, 1899); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 71.

Melles, Jacob: see Rengers.

Mellin (Mellinus, Melling), Abraham Philippus (dates of birth and death unknown), was in the early 17th century a Reformed pastor at St. Anthonispolder, Dutch province of South Holland. He published the Eerste deel van het Groot Rechtgevoelende Christen Martelaers-Boeck . . . (Dordrecht, 1619). This martyr book deals only with the Christian martyrs until 1520; Mellin's intention to continue his work and list also the martyrs of the Reformation period was not carried out. Mellin's book, which shows evidence of thorough scholarship, was used by T. J. van Braght for his Martyrs' Mirror. In 1656 it was severely criticized by the Catholic Arnout van Gelouwe (q.v.). VDZ.

B. Glasius, Godgeleerd Nederland II ('s Hertogenbosch, 1853) 492 f.; Gerald C. Studer, "A History of the Martyrs' Mirror," MQR XXXII (1948) 163-79, particularly 169; Bibliographie II, 435-40.

Mellinger, John H. (Dec. 7, 1858-May 13, 1952), an outstanding lay leader and the father of the missionary movement among Lancaster Conference Mennonites (MC), was born in Paradise Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., the son of Jacob Mellinger, of the Benedict Mellinger line, and Elizabeth Hershey, of the Andrew Hershey and Peter Eby lines. He was married on Nov. 16, 1882, to Barbara K. Denlinger. They started farming north of Vintage in 1883, and the same year were baptized by Benjamin Herr at the Hershey meetinghouse. Here they farmed until 1895 when they purchased a smaller farm on Lincoln Highway East, retiring in 1912. In 1924, after his wife's death, Mellinger went to his son Jacob. His last days were spent in the Amos Mellinger home (a granddaughter). Of the six sons and one daughter, Jacob, John, Enos, and Jesse survived.

Sunday schools, approved by Conference in 1871, did not come into his district until 1887 when John was asked to be the superintendent at Paradise. Here he contributed to the missionary spark which sent John M. Kreider to Missouri, Abram Metzler to Martinsburg, A. Hershey Leaman and Mary Metzler to Chicago (the first M.C. home mission), and J. A. Ressler (the first M.C. foreign missionary) to India. On Sept. 15, 1894, the Mission Advocates (q.v.) were organized in his home. With the organization of the Lancaster Sunday School Mission (q.v.) 16 months later, which he headed, quarterly mission meetings were held in the Paradise-Kinzer district. Whenever any rural or city missions were started, regardless of the distance, he was personally interested. When the larger succeeding organization, the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (q.v.), was organized in 1914 he was chosen president, serving until October 1934; thus he was chairman of the mission movement here over 38 years.

Although he passed through the lot for the ministry three times, his work was elsewhere. He and M. S. Steiner wrote the constitution for the forerunner of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (q.v.). He aided in the organization of the Franconia Mennonite Mission Board (q.v.). He helped to locate the Falfurrias (Tex.), and the Tampa-Ybor City (Fla.) mission fields. He turned the adverse tide in a Philadelphia Quaker meeting in 1919 (?) that caused the Quakers with Mennonite support to feed the German children following World War I (Quaker Child Feeding). He helped to organize the Mennonite Central Committee in 1920 and served as a member on it until his retirement in 1934. He was promoter of the Old People's Home and the Associated Sewing Circles, chairman of the board of the Millersville Mennonite Children's Home for 20 years from the beginning. He was the moving spirit in 1922 and 1924, when $65,000 were successfully loaned to the Russian Mennonite immigrants in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and elsewhere in Canada.

Mellinger's greatest contribution was in his outstanding leadership in the field of missions. Though a layman, he exercised extraordinary influence in the Lancaster Conference over a long period of time. Its extensive current program of foreign and home mission owes very much to him. I.D.L.

Mellinger, Martin (1763-1842), a prominent deacon for 52 years in the Mellinger Mennonite Church (q.v.) just east of Lancaster, Pa., named after him. His correspondence with his cousin Peter Weber (q.v.) of Kindenheim, Palatinate, Germany, published in the MQR V (1931) 42-64, contains much valuable historical information. H.S.B.

Mellinger meetinghouse was a union meetinghouse built by the Lutherans, Reformed, Mennonites (MC), and Dunkards in 1861 three quarters of a mile southwest of Schoeneck in northern Lancaster Co., Pa. The Shirk home east of town was the first Mennonite meeting place in this area. The ministers of the Indiantown Mennonite Church (q.v.) held services here once a month until 1921, and in 1942 relinquished all rights to the building. The services became more frequent in the Hammer Creek-Indiantown district and in 1926 led to the revival of the Cocalico meetinghouse. I.D.L.

Mellinger Mennonite Church (MC), located one mile east of Lancaster, Pa., on the Lincoln Highway, is one of the strongest and largest congregations of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference. With Jacob and Felix Landis, Martin Bare, Jacob Kreider, Joseph and Dorous Buckwalter, and others, Mennonite immigrants from the Palatinate, able to buy land from the London Company by 1722, the fertile acres soon became a prosperous Mennonite community. The settlers first worshiped in private homes. But at least by 1767 had a meetinghouse, called Lampiter. A schoolhouse adjoining was added later. Martin Bare as minister signed the Dordrecht Confession at the 1725 conference in Germantown. Benjamin Landis was his early co-worker as preacher followed by Jacob Hartman, Bishop Tobias Kreider, and John Stauffer in the 18th century. Martin Mellinger (1763-1842), an immigrant from the Palatinate, was a prominent deacon. When a new meetinghouse, now a sexton's house, was built in 1855, it was named in his honor. A new meetinghouse was built on the present site in 1884, with extensive remodeling in 1894. The present large brick meetinghouse replaced it in 1914. This has always been one of the two largest congregations in the Lancaster Conference, and has remained largely rural, although located only three miles from the center of Lancaster. In recent years the city is rapidly moving to engulf the congregation and its building. Among the prominent ministers of more recent times have been John and Tobias Kreider, David Buckwalter, Adam Ranck, John L. and Sanford B. Landis. In 1956 the membership was 600, with Elmer G. Martin as bishop, and David L. Landis and Harry S. Lefever as preachers. I.D.L.

Memelniederung (Lowland of the Memel River) the name given in 1928-41 by the Gemeinde-Kalender to the Mennonite congregation in East Prussia near Tilsit, formerly known as the Lithuanian congregation (Litthauer Gemeinde), except in two issues, 1926 and 1927, when it was listed as Adlig Pokraken. At the earliest appearance of the congregation in the Dutch Naamlijst it already bore the name "the congregation in Lithuania." (See Lithuania.) H.S.B.

Memmingen, a city (pop. 25,250) in Bavaria, Germany, located on the Aach, 35 miles southeast of Augsburg, to which the Anabaptist movement came in the 16th century. The cities of Ulm, Biberach, Isny, Memmingen, Lindau, and Constance met in Memmingen Feb. 26-March 1, 1531, to discuss the Anabaptist situation. Their agreement is known as the Resolutions of Memmingen (q.v.).

In 1527 a flood of Anabaptists passed from Switzerland to the north and northeast, touching Memmingen, and winning some of its citizens. In January 1528, in the absence of the city preacher Christoph Schappeler, Simprecht Schenk of Wertingen advised the city authorities to expel them rather than to "punish them painfully." Thereupon the council forbade the lodging or sheltering of Anabaptists in its realm. In December of the same year the city council resolved to send all Anabaptists to the preachers, whether native or foreign; those who would not recant should be banished from the city. In case of banishment an eight-day period of grace was given, in hope that the penitent would return to the church. Nevertheless imprisonment was also used, as was reported to Mindelheim in May 1528, in order to instruct them in the Scripture, and if that failed, to detain them. A different case was that of a guild master, who as a member of the council had helped to pass the regulation prohibiting Anabaptists in the city. To the complaint of the city authorities that he nevertheless offered shelter to such persons, he replied that it was brotherly to give shelter to the poor exiles, and that it was better to obey God than man. It is to be assumed that he complied with the order to "put an end to it in eight days."

In 1529 after the second diet of Speyer with its sharp mandate against the Anabaptists, little Memmingen and its sister Protestant cities, led by the Protestant clergy, defied the imperial edict by adhering to its lenient Anabaptist policy. In October 1529 several men and women were instructed in the presence of the council; when there were no results, they were told to "spend their money elsewhere." Others who sympathized with them were punished "with words," and ordered "not to have meetings." Adherents should not baptize, but "we do not forbid other discussion of God's Word."

Through 1530 there was not much stir, but by the end of March 1531 it was decided to call to account those who did not attend church services in order to discover the Anabaptists. A month later one of the preachers proposed that they close the city gates on Sunday and put the citizenry under oath not to shelter Anabaptists. In the process the surprising discovery was made that one or another refused to give the oath "for conscience' sake." Hans Binder "could not be convinced by Scripture that he was in error and would not desist." The banishment was carried out; "they were to leave within a day's time and not return." Early in January 1532 some Anabaptist suspects were cited before the mayor; he ordered them to attend the church services, one of the sermons being on baptism. These measures were apparently successful. Not until 1535 were the Anabaptists mentioned again. In adjacent Woringen, which was under the jurisdiction of Memmingen, there were some who were interested in Anabaptism. It seems there were only women in the group. The council decided in case of arrivals from the outside (there had previously been some additions from Kaufbeuren, q.v.) to send two preachers and two church wardens to talk with them "at some suitable place, but not before the people." Then there was silence.

The moderate measures of the authorities were sufficient to control the movement. On only two other occasions are they mentioned. In 1574 a forest worker from near-by Eisenberg was tried on a charge of having joined them. His description of the people is of interest not only for church history, but also for cultural history: "They guard themselves against all sins and direct their lives in accord with God's commands, they do violence to no man, they leave the matter with God, they do not swear, they do not drink, they are chaste, and their life is to be to the praise and honor of God, and they have a fine brotherly love among each other; furthermore they are patient in cross and suffering and thank God without ceasing." In 1710 occurs the last Anabaptist trace: a Swiss woman came to the city via Ulm, and herself requested the pastor's instruction (Anna Margarete Cramer). R.Do.

Fr. Dobel, Memmingen im Reformationszeitalter, Das Reformationswerk zu Memmingen unter dem Drucke des Schwäbischen Bundes 1525-1529 (Memmingen, 1877); R. Dollinger, "Die Freie Stadt Memmingen und das Wiedertäuferedikt Karls V.," in Zeitwende V, No. 11; ML III, 72 f.

Memmingen, Resolutions of (Memminger Beschlüsse). Early in 1531 some of the imperial cities of Swabia, Germany, of Zwinglian creed formulated agreements on matters concerning the Reformation, which also dealt with the treatment of Anabaptists. They were closely connected with the resolutions of the 1530 diet of Augsburg, the religious aspects of which failed to satisfy some of the Protestants, whereupon the evangelical estates on Dec. 31, 1530, formed the League of Schmalkald, in order to bring about clarification on the most important questions and to give each other mutual support in case of infringement of their rights. Unity in the punishment of the Anabaptists was another of their objectives.

The cities of Upper Germany, fearing subjection to the Confession of Augsburg, sought to come to an understanding on several points, including the checking of the Anabaptist movement. Representatives of Ulm, Memmingen, Biberach, Isny, Lindau, and Constance met in Memmingen Feb. 26-March 1, 1531, to discuss these points. Reutlingen was not represented on account of an epidemic of the plague, but presented a written opinion drawn up by its preachers. The city council of Ulm appointed its mayor Bernhard Besserer and Konrad Sam to draw up a draft of the points under consideration. In point of both statesmanship and theology the principles they formulated show understanding for the ideas and demands of the Anabaptists. On many a disputed point they sided with the Anabaptists.

The decisions drawn up by Ambrosius Blaurer (q.v.) and unanimously accepted, declare that in baptism and communion all additions and deviations from the ordinances as instituted by Christ must no longer be countenanced; the use of oil, salt, and exorcism of devils were named as such additions. Nor should infant baptism be compulsory, "in order that the accusations of the Anabaptists might be somewhat moderated and their mouths closed." They were to see that "we observe infant baptism freely and without compulsion, and in accord with the requirement of love grant this custom or omit it." The weak should, however, be permitted to perform an emergency baptism in case the life of the child is in danger, although for the child "there is no danger toward God, if it should happen to die without outward baptism." The effort of the city representatives to meet the reproach of the Anabaptists that not enough attention was paid in Protestant cities to moral living, is shown in the decisions concerning the punishment of the laity and the clergy.

The decisions concerning the punishment of the Anabaptists show that the Swabian cities were not in accord with the course taken against them in the empire and did not approve of severe penalties in matters of faith. They said:

"On account of the Anabaptists we wish very sincerely that they be treated as tolerantly as possible, so that our Gospel be not blamed or impugned on their account. For we have hitherto seen very clearly that the much too severe and tyrannical treatment exercised toward them in some places contributes much more toward spreading them than toward checking their error, because many of them, some out of stubbornness of spirit and some out of pious, simple steadfastness, endured all dangers, even death itself, and suffered with such patience that not only were their adherents strengthened, but also many of ours were moved to regard their cause as good and just.

"Thus it is contrary to the right of Christian government to force faith upon the world with the sword and other violent compulsion and uproot evil therein, which should be resisted alone through the mighty Word of God, and the person erring in faith shall not be suddenly knocked down, but should be tolerated in all Christian love as a harmless person." If he refuses to render the oath and military service, and does not yield after instruction from God's Word, he should be banished from the city. An outsider, who "teaches his error to others, should be kept out of the city." A citizen in a similar case should first be fined, then imprisoned, and if he still persists in his error, banished from the city. However, anyone who "under the pretense of Anabaptism incites other disturbances and revolt," shall be punished in accord with the imperial mandate as a sectarian and revolutionary. Anyone permitting himself to be baptized should be banished. Anyone who has been baptized and has been called to account for it, shall go to the preacher for instruction. Every citizen shall be under oath to report all Anabaptists of whom he knows to the authorities.

The delegates assumed that they could not be reproached in this position by God or either temporal or religious authorities. The decisions state that there were in the cities many God-fearing persons, who thought the government was discriminating against them in not tolerating them, while it tolerated others who with their teaching, life, and seditious acts disgraced the name of Christian. Therefore the cities would punish Catholics in the same manner if "in order to teach others they stir up disturbance or revolution."

The decisions of Memmingen did not adapt themselves to the imperial mandates of 1528 and 1529 nor to the imperial law of 1529 on the punishment of the Anabaptists. They furnish an interesting insight into the attitude of Upper Germany, especially in the territory of the persecuting Swabian League (q.v.). They have thus far received little attention in the pertinent literature. HEGE.

K. Th. Keim, Schwäbische Reformationsgeschichte bis zum Augsburger Reichstag (Tübingen, 1855); Th. Pressel, Ambrosius Blaurer (Elberfeld, 1861); Fr. Thudichum, Die deutsche Reformation II (Leipzig, 1909); ML III, 73 f.

Memorial Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Altoona, Pa., was begun as Bethany Mission in 1913 by the Eastern District under the General Conference Board of Missions. The workers' home was erected in 1918. Jacob Snyder Board of Roaring Spring, Pa., became active director. Elizabeth Voth and Martha Franz served as workers until 1924. The permanent church building was erected in 1920 and dedicated as Memorial Mennonite Church, on Feb. 27, 1921. During George M. Bergen's service 1921-24, the congregation was organized with 48 members.

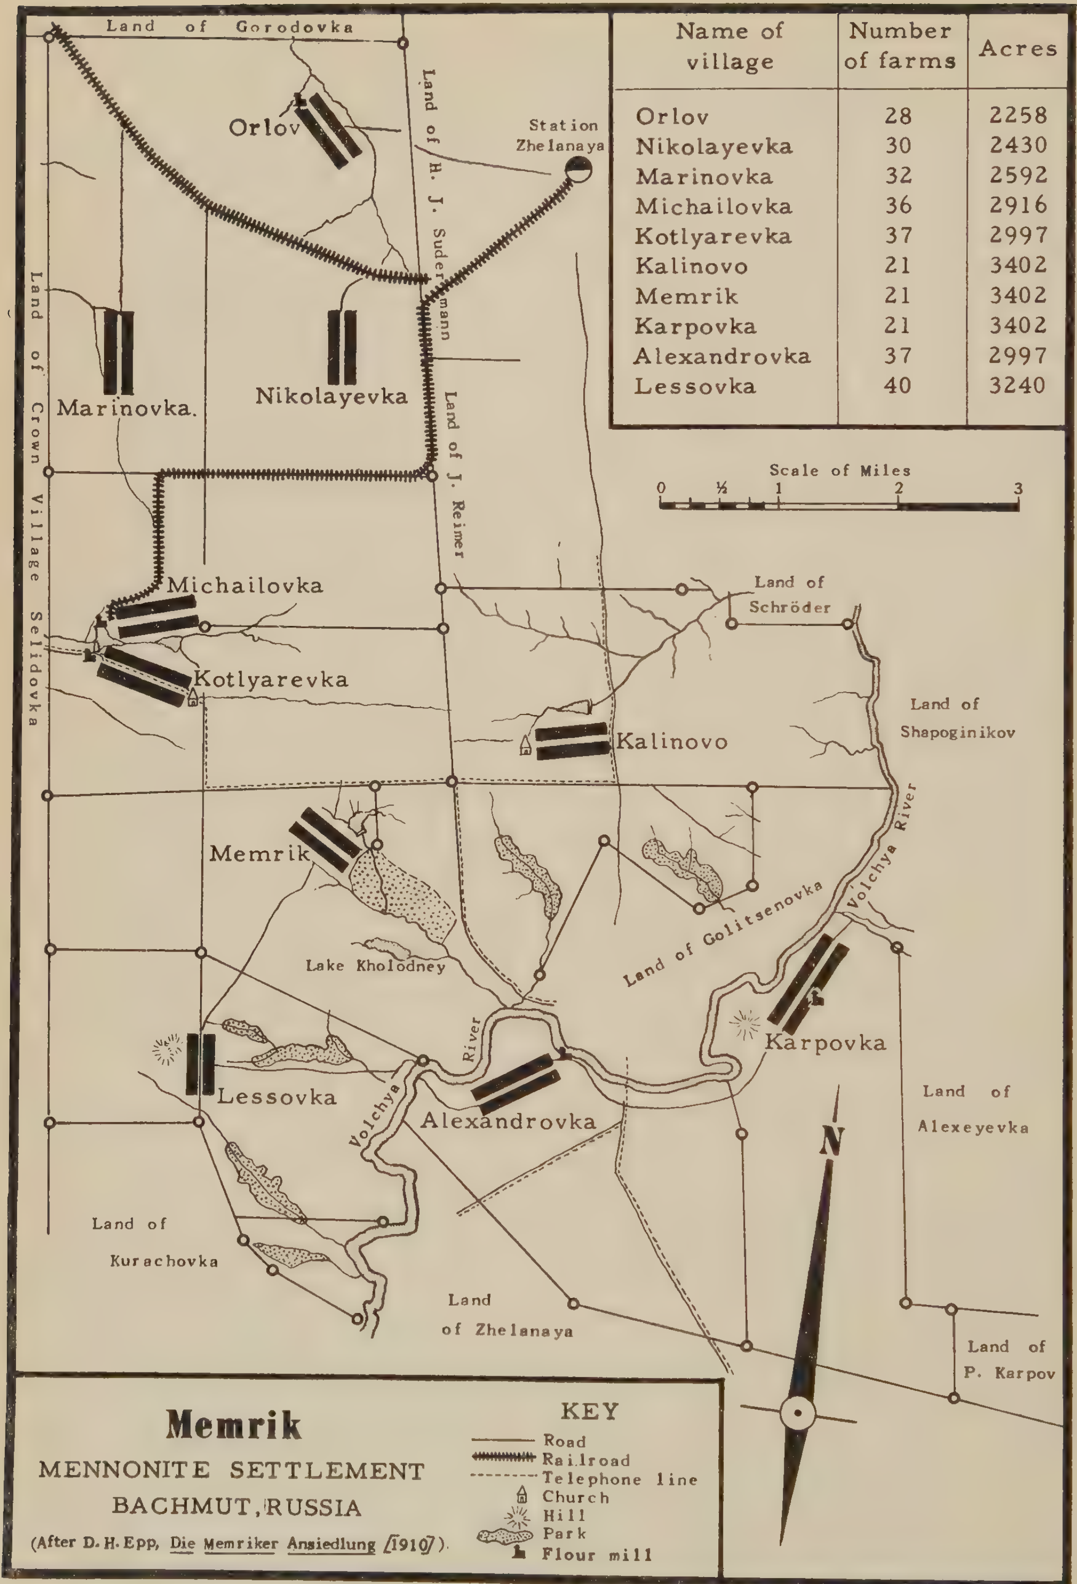
Early in 1925 Louis H. Glass, a railroad-engineer and evangelist, became the leader. Mrs. Edith Stiffler and daughter resided in the workers' home and helped with the work. Their ten-year period of service brought the congregation to its highest point with 95 members. Ill health caused Glass to resign in December 1936 and Mrs. Stiffler closed her service at the same time. Grover Klink served only 18 months as leader and was succeeded by Emerson F. Slotterback, who served till 1942. Much unemployment and a shifting population "on the hill" made work very difficult and the membership slowly decreased. There was no dependable lay leadership. Delbert E. Welty came and sought to rally the forces, but to no avail. The Board closed the field on Aug. 24, 1945. The Salvation Army bought the buildings and is carrying on the work. A.J.N.

Memrik and Kalinovo Mennonite Church, located in the Memrik (q.v.) settlement, Bachmut district, province of Ekaterinoslav, Ukraine, was organized in the early days of the settlement, which had been founded in 1885 by settlers from the Molotschna settlement. The first ministers, elected on Aug. 27, 1885, were Jacob Wiens, Peter Janzen, and Abram Warkentin, all ordained by J. Töws. The congregation first met in private homes and in schools, then purchased one of the mansions of the noblemen in the village of Memrik and rebuilt it as a church. In 1887, when the congregation was visited by Kornelius Dirks, Johann Schartner, and Abram Görz from the Molotschna, the following additional ministers were elected: Johann Dück, Jacob Berg, Dietrich Peters, and Franz Janzen.

On June 28, 1887, in the presence of Elder Abram Görz, Peter Janzen was ordained as elder. In 1898 the congregation built a church 120 x 50 ft. In 1899 Jacob Pankratz, Jacob Penner, and Peter Dyck were ordained ministers, and in 1910 Jacob Martens, Peter Schellenberg, and Bernhard Harder likewise. The congregation observed footwashing in connection with the Lord's Supper. When Elder P. Janzen died of typhoid fever in 1918 Jacob Martens succeeded him, but died of the same disease in February 1920. He was succeeded temporarily by Franz Enns who had come to Memrik from the Terek settlement. In 1922 Jacob Pätkau (q.v.), a teacher and minister, was ordained elder. Under him Bible conferences and song festivals became popular. Pätkau was a member of the K.f.K. and coeditor of Unser Blatt (q.v.).

The Memrik church was soon nationalized and religious instruction for youth under 18 years of age was forbidden by the state. The taxes for the ministers and the church building increased constantly. After Elder Pätkau left (1929) under pressure the other ministers were also soon silenced. The church building was closed. By 1935 most of the ministers had been exiled. For a time the Mennonites and the Mennonite Brethren worshiped together at Kotlyarevka. The Kalinovo church was used as a reading room, granary, and children's home. During the German occupation (1941-44) it was used as a barracks.

In 1905 the Memrik Mennonite Church had a total membership of 2,215 including 1,183 unbaptized children. The contribution for benevolences



Land of Gorodovka
Orlov
Station Zhelanaya
Land of H. J. Sudermann
Land of J. Reimer
Land of Crown Village Selidovka
Marinovka.
Nikolayevka
Scale of Miles
0
½
1
2
3
Michailovka
Kotlyarevka
Land of Schröder
Land of Shapoginikov
Kalinovo
Memrik
Volchya River
Land of Golitsenovka
Lake Kholodney
Karpovka
Lessovka
River
Volchya
Alexandrovka
Land of Alexeyevka
N
Land of Kurachovka
Land of Zhelanaya
Land of P. Karpov

Name of village	Number of farms	Acres
Orlov	28	2258
Nikolayevka	30	2430
Marinovka	32	2592
Michailovka	36	2916
Kotlyarevka	37	2997
Kalinovo	21	3402
Memrik	21	3402
Karpovka	21	3402
Alexandrovka	37	2997
Lessovka	40	3240

Memrik

MENNONITE SETTLEMENT

BACHMUT, RUSSIA

(After D. H. Epp, Die Memriker Ansiedlung [1910]).

KEY

——	Road
╫╫╫	Railroad
- - - -	Telephone line
⛪	Church
✳	Hill
▨	Park
▙	Flour mill

was 1,649 rubles. In 1910 the total population was 470 families with 3,019 persons. C.K.

D. H. Epp, Die Memriker Ansiedlung (Berdyansk, 1910); H. Dirks, Statistik (1905); H. Goerz, Memrik (Rosthern, Sask., 1954); ML III, 74.

Memrik Mennonite Settlement, Bachmut district, Ekaterinoslav province, Russia, was founded in 1885 on the Volshya River, a tributary of the Samara, which in turn flows into the Dnepr. The settlement was located in the Don basin near the Catherine railroad, which connected it with the Sea of Azov. The next larger city was Yuzovka (now Stalino) some 20 miles away.

The settlers came from the Halbstadt and the Gnadenfeld districts of the Molotschna settlement. A total of 32,400 acres of land were purchased from the noblemen Kotlyarevsky and Karpov in 1884 for the price of 600,000 rubles. A total of 221 families with 1,367 persons settled in ten villages on this land. In three of the villages each of the 21 farmers owned 162 acres, while in the remaining seven villages, consisting of a total of 40 farms, each owned 81 acres. The latter were called "half farms." The names of the villages, later Russianized, were Alexanderhof (Alexandrovka, q.v.), Bahndorf (Orlov), Ebental (Nikolayevka), Karpovka, Kotlyarevka, Marienort (Kalinovo), Memrik, Michaelsheim (Michailovka), Nordheim (Marinovka), and Waldeck (Lessovka).

The necessary qualifications of a settler were that "the head of the landless family conduct a quiet and moral life, be industrious and in possession of a wagon, plow, harrow, two horses, two cows, and the necessary means to establish a home." The land was mostly unbroken prairie. Although the quality of the land was excellent the settlers underwent the usual difficulties of pioneering. All settlers were expected to repay the loan and interest within 15 years to the Molotschna settlement, which sponsored the settlement. Originally Memrik was under the administration of the Molotschna settlement. Because the distance was over a hundred miles, Memrik tried to establish its own district or volost (q.v.) administration but failed. In 1888, contrary to the wishes of the settlers, it was incorporated in the neighboring Russian Golitzynov. The group was represented in this office by a settlement leader. The following served in this capacity: Heinrich Martins, Daniel Abrahams, Peter Dirks, Johann Köhn, and Julius Dörksen. In 1921 the settlement had its own volost office and administration for a short time. The settlement also had its own fire insurance agency, organized in 1901; Hermann Janzen, Jr., was its administrator for many years.

During the 1890's some Molotschna Mennonites purchased and settled on a part of a large estate some 12 miles from the Memrik settlement, which they named Ossokino. In the center of the settlement they built their school, which also served on Sunday for worship. The settlers belonged to the Memrik-Kalinovo Mennonite Church. During and after the Revolution this settlement suffered severely and disintegrated. In 1888 Molotschna Mennonites established the village of Alexandropol (30 farms), some 18 miles northeast of Memrik, near the station Ocheretino. The village prospered and had its own school and church buildings. Most of the settlers belonged to the Mennonite Brethren Church (see Alexandropol Mennonite Brethren Church). The settlers were in close contact with the Memrik settlement.

The Memrik settlement had to solve many economic problems in its early life. Grasshoppers, gophers, and other plagues caused great damage. The prices of the products were low. Originally the farmers followed the rotation cycle of wheat, feed, and summer fallow. They sowed mostly summer wheat, which was replaced by winter wheat around 1905. The "German Red" cattle became significant. Later Holsteins were introduced. Markets for agricultural products were found in Yuzovka (Stalino), Mariupol, Berdyansk, etc.

Industry and commerce developed rapidly, particularly the milling industry. Steam mills were located in Bahndorf, Alexanderhof, Kotlyarevka, Karpovka, and near the station Zhelanaya (Heinrichs and Andres). One of the manufacturers of agricultural machinery was Julius Legin at Waldeck (started in 1895), who before World War I produced annually about 1,000 reapers, 600 plows, 300 fanning mills, etc., with an annual turnover of 150,000 rubles. Among the business people were H. Hamm of Zhelanaya and David Warkentin of Kalinovo. At times efforts were made to establish coal mines on the land owned by the Mennonites, but this never developed into large industry.

During the first years of the Memrik settlement elementary education was given in homes. Soon schools were erected in each of the villages. By 1910 most of the villages had modern larger school buildings made of brick, and residences for the teachers, both being modeled after the pattern established by the Molotschna Mennonites. Outstanding teachers were Peter Schellenberg, Jacob Koop, Jacob H. Janzen, Cornelius Unruh, and H. Goerz.

In addition to the elementary schools (six grades) there was also at Kotlyarevo a secondary school (Zentralschule) started in 1918 with D. P. Wiens and H. Goerz as teachers, which had to be closed after a few years. Another secondary school, established at Ebental in 1920, was gradually taken over by the state. Attendance became obligatory in 1930. As a rule the director was a non-Mennonite. Gradually all Mennonite teachers were forced to give up their positions or adjust to the Communist philosophy of education.

In 1914 the estimated property of the settlement (population of some 3,500) amounted to 11,145,000 rubles. During World War I some 240 young men were drafted into forestry and medical service. During the Revolution in 1918 Machno (q.v.) and his bands inflicted great suffering on the settlement, murdering many inhabitants, and taking or destroying much property. During the struggle between the Soviet and White armies the Memrik settlement again suffered severely. Drought and starvation were severe. At last in 1922 some help came from America (MCC). Conditions improved somewhat during the NEP period under the Soviets. Only some 30 families emigrated to Canada in 1923-27. Very few managed to escape from Russia via Moscow in 1929.

In 1930 a great number of the farmers (kulaks) were sent to Siberia. During 1937-38 some 240 men were exiled, none of whom returned nor was any information ever obtained about them. The remaining population was organized into three collective farms under the following names: Thälmann, Petrovky, and Karl Marx. The headquarters of these collectives were located in the former Mennonite Brethren church of Kotlyarevo.

During the outbreak of the German-Russian War in 1941 some young men were drafted. In September 1941 all men between 16 and 65 were sent to Asiatic Russia. On Oct. 5 the remaining population received orders to appear at the station Zhelanaya, and from here they were also transported eastward. It is likely that they were sent to Kazakhstan in Siberia. When the German army reached Memrik there were only a few Mennonites left in the villages; Russian population had been moved into the villages. What happened to the villages in 1943 when the German army withdrew from Memrik is not known. The few Mennonites they had found in Memrik were taken to Germany. Thus only a few of the Memrik Mennonites reached America after World War II. C.K.

D. H. Epp, Die Memriker Ansiedlung (Berdyansk, 1910); H. Goerz, Memrik (Rosthern, Sask., 1954); ML III, 74 f.

Menalda, a Dutch Mennonite family, usually merchants, in the province of Friesland (Bolsward, Harlingen, later also Groningen and Leeuwarden). There are a number of Mennonite preachers of this name: Jan Menalda (1726-1801), of Harlingen, who studied at the University of Utrecht and the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, and served at Huizen 1751-64, Leeuwarden 1764-71, and Rotterdam 1771-1801. His son Eke Menalda (1759-1831), educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, served at Middelburg 1784-1831. Thomas Menalda (1736-94) of Bolsward studied at the University of Franeker and the Amsterdam Seminary and served at Makkum 1761-71 and Zwolle 1771-94. His son Simon Menalda (1763-1822), after studying at the Franeker University and the Amsterdam Seminary, was a pastor of the Bolsward congregation 1789-1813. Rein Sickes Menalda (b. ca. 1660), the grandfather of Jan Menalda, in 1700 conducted an important trade to the Baltic Sea ports. In 1721 he became burgomaster of Harlingen, one of the earliest instances of a Mennonite in government office.

To this family also belonged Cornelis Benjamin Menalda (1862-1950), of Leeuwarden, registrar of the Provincial States of Friesland, and for many years a trustee of the F.D.S. (Conference of Friesland) and the A.D.S. (General Dutch Mennonite Conference), and his daughter Wilhelmina Jacoba Menalda (1891-1946), who was the secretary of the Elspeetsche Vereeniging (q.v.) and also participated in the compilation of the new Dutch Mennonite hymnal, the Doopsgezinde Bundel (q.v.). vdZ.

Menaldum (Menaem), a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 7 persons in 1563-65 and 81 in 1568-82. In the 17th century it was the seat of a Mennonite congregation, belonging to the Jan Jacobsz group (q.v.). About 1623 the district governor made trouble for the Mennonites here because they did not want to have their marriages performed by the magistrate. A Sierck Annes was even punished by having his furniture confiscated. Later on the congregation is called Old Flemish. The small congregation, of which there is no further information, united with the Jan Jacobsz congregation at neighboring Franeker (q.v.) shortly after 1743. vdZ.

J. Loosjes, "Jan Jacobsz en de Jan-Jacobsgezinden" in Ned. Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis XI (1914) 234 f.

Mendon (Mich.) United Missionary Church was founded in 1950. In 1956 the pastor was Elmer Miller. The congregation is a member of the Indiana Conference.

Meneest or Meneese, a name by which 19th-century Mennonites (MC) were sometimes known in the areas in which they lived in eastern Pennsylvania, Ohio, and possibly elsewhere. Theodore Bean, historian of Montgomery County, Pa., states that the Mennonites call themselves "Meneest." This is evidently a corruption of the Dutch and German Mennist (q.v.). J.C.W.

T. W. Bean, History of Montgomery County (Philadelphia, 1884) 369.

Menius, Justus (Jodocus Menig) (1499-1558), a Protestant theologian, entered the University of Erfurt, Germany, joined the circle of Humanists around his uncle Mutianus Rufus and Crotus Rubianus, went to the University of Wittenberg on Melanchthon's advice, became vicar in Mühlberg near Gotha in 1523, pastor in Erfurt in 1525, and superintendent of Eisenach 1529-57. In 1541-44 he served as temporary pastor in Mühlhausen, Thuringia, went to Gotha in 1546 and there succeeded his friend Fr. Myconius (q.v.) as superintendent of Gotha, without, however, giving up his position in Eisenach. Menius was a zealous promoter of the Reformation, taking an active part in the program of church inspection. In the last years of his life he participated actively in the theological disputes of the time. He became involved in a violent conflict with Amsdorf, whose thesis of the harm in good works he contested, defending the necessity of good works as evidence of the new life. This caused him to retire from his offices to the pastorate of the Thomaskirche in Leipzig, where he remained until his death, Aug. 11, 1558.

Menius had extended contacts with the Anabaptists. In his official position he came upon them again and again, and especially tried to refute them in several writings. In 1528, when the Anabaptist leader Melchior Rink (q.v.) was an itinerant preacher in Thuringia, Menius joined the bailiff of the Wartburg in writing a report to the elector of Saxony, warning him of Rink's activity. On Jan. 18, 1530, six Anabaptists were put to death in the district of Hausbreitenbach at Reinhardsbrunn, creating a great excitement, particularly since no seditious doctrines could be proved against them. Myconius expressed his misgivings in a letter to Melanchthon, who did not, however, share them. In order to silence criticism and to justify the position of the government, Menius wrote his booklet (1530), Der widerteuffer lere und geheimnis, aus heiliger Schrift widerlegt; Myconius was to have written it with Menius, but this plan was not carried out. In token of his agreement with its content Luther provided it with a foreword, which shows not a particle of understanding for the Anabaptist position. The lengthy and tedious book was dedicated to Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, in order to move him, who was always inclined to be lenient in matters of faith, to more aggressive action. Menius shows some familiarity with the teachings of his opponents if one disregards the vociferous and fanatical manner in which he calls them hypocrites and servants of the devil. The following paragraph is characteristic of his understanding of the Anabaptist concerns:

"The rabble rousers lodge only with the poor and their greeting is: The peace of God be with you. They preach that they belong only to the poor, to whom God has sent them out, and wherever they go they pretend special piety with peculiar prayers and read the Gospel to the poor people. But what they teach is only good works, such as that one must help his neighbor with gifts and loans and that goods should be held in common, one should injure no one, but conduct oneself friendly and brotherly among each other, none should rule over another, but all should be brethren and sisters alike."

Menius gives a list of "Erroneous doctrines of the Anabaptists," which he then refutes, though of course in a frequently tortuous and petty manner. The articles of faith that he names are as follows: (1) The Word of God shall be preached to none but those who are in the Anabaptist order and are sealed with the sign of the covenant. (2) Faith in Jesus Christ alone, without our good works and suffering, makes one neither pious nor blessed before God. (3) Infant baptism is against God and a sin, neither useful nor necessary for children; therefore only the adults and aged should be baptized. (4) The bread and wine of communion are not the real body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. (5) Jesus is not the actual and true Son of God. (6) All the damned and ungodly and even the devil himself will finally be saved.

In addition he reproaches them with regard to their attitude to the external rules of life and especially to the government, such as the oath, property, marriage, divorce, etc. Upon Luther's advice Menius at the end of the book makes the charge against the Anabaptists that their preachers do not have the proper call, and preach in corners instead of the open, although he would of course be the first to urge the government to interfere in such a case of open preaching. The above "erroneous articles" show that he must have received them at least in part from individual Anabaptist leaders; the sixth is strongly reminiscent of Denk. The first article is a self-contradiction, since the Word of God was to precede baptism, hence could not possibly be limited to baptized persons.

But the Anabaptists did not disappear, but on the contrary became more numerous in the district of Hausbreitenbach. Menius was almost always one of the commissars whose duty it was to notify the authorities of suspects and to cross-examine those arrested. Again and again he urges the authorities to take decisive steps.

At the close of 1538 the elector had two Anabaptists put to death, Hans Köhler (q.v.) and Hans Scheffer, not for sedition but for "blasphemy." Some of the people objected to this verdict and contested the right of the government to execute anyone for his belief. Menius was again compelled to resort to his pen to justify the elector's course of action, and wrote Wie ein jeglicher Christ gegen allerley Lere, gut und böse nach Gottes befehl sich gebürlich halten sol, in which he tries to present the rights and duties of the clergy and the temporal authorities toward the Word of God. To the clergy he grants only spiritual weapons in the struggle against heresy, but to the temporal authorities he makes it a duty to punish severely any teachers of false doctrine as "open blasphemers and murderers of souls," who endanger the peace and security of the subjects in a high degree. The tone of this book is even sharper than that of the previous one, and the threat of punishment by the government much more obvious.

However, the desired results were still not materializing. When Menius came to Mühlhausen as pastor in 1541 he found there an Anabaptist center. The city council hesitated to proceed against them. Therefore Menius directed a new book against it in 1544 titled Von dem Geist der Widerteuffer. Luther again contributed a foreword, full of praise for this irrefutable book by Menius, "so that if a cow had understanding, she would have to say it was the truth and could not be otherwise." The tone of the book is as usual quite intolerant, borne by a fanatical hatred. In content it is largely identical with the first book. The questions concerning the Scripture, faith and works, baptism, original sin, communion, family, marriage, government, etc., are discussed in thesis and antithesis. Again, and at great length the Anabaptist call to preach is contested and the charge of corner preaching repeated. The repeated statement that the Anabaptists were not being punished because of their faith is peculiar. He says, for instance, "And no one may think or say that he is punished for the sake of his faith. For if some one had a peculiar faith, he could not offend any one nor could he be judged for it or punished. But because this sect not only believes erroneously for itself, but blasphemes the true faith, God's Word, the sacraments, and God Himself and in their outward life pervert all the divine order, . . . therefore they are no longer to be judged according to their false hypocritical gestures, but rather according to their evident works."

A noteworthy discussion concerns the charge made by the Anabaptists that the clergy lived ungodly lives and that their teaching had little effect on their hearers. "A distinction must be made between a person with his life, conduct, and works, and his office and teaching, and where the office and teaching are right and pure, but the person blameworthy, follow the office and teaching and let the person with his works go." Is it any wonder that the Anabaptists, who always regarded doctrine and life as a unit, opposed such a position?

But this is not all of Menius' literary opposition to the Anabaptists. In 1551 he wrote a booklet entitled Wider die Blutsfreunde aus der Widertauffer. "Blutsfreunde" (Blood Friends) was the name of a degenerate wing of Anabaptists, which had little in common with the quiet branch. They advocated a libertinistic ideal of freedom, which led them to excesses of a flagrant character under the assumption that Christ had died for all sins. It is not strange that Menius attacks them with sharp words. But this booklet brought the quiet Anabaptists also into bad repute. From this time on little is heard of further contact between Menius and the Anabaptists.

Menius was one of the bitterest literary and personal enemies of Anabaptism on the Lutheran side during the period of the Reformation. With strong prejudice, frequently against his better knowledge, he interpreted as the work of the devil the fruit he could not fail to see. Hence his opposition is by no means free of the fanaticism with which all heresy was to be eradicated in favor of Lutheran pure doctrine. By his books Menius for a long time determined the character of writing about the Anabaptist movement in Middle Germany. P.S.

G. L. Schmidt, Justus Menius (2 vv., 1867); P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); idem, Thüringen; the writings of Justus Menius of 1530, 1538, and 1544 in Der ander Teil der Bücher D. Martin Luthers (Wittenberg, 1551); ML III, 75-77; original prints of the 1530 and 1544 titles in GCL.

Mennist (Menist, and in the 18th century erroneously Benist), a Dutch and German term for "Mennonite." The earliest known appearance of the term was in a mandate of Countess Anna of East Friesland in 1545, where it was used to distinguish the followers of Menno from the Davidjorists and the Batenburgers. It was frequently used in the Netherlands as well as in government decrees of other countries, such as the Palatinate. In North Germany the term "Mennonisten" was long current. But since the 19th century only the designation "Mennoniten" has been preserved in German-language regions. (ML III, 77.) HEGE.

A letter written by King John of Poland in 1660 calls the Dutch Mennonite immigrants "Minnists." Hans Alenson in his Tegen-Bericht (BRN VII, 242) says that the Frisians in 1626 were the first to use the name Mennist or Mennoniet. Though the term Menist is still commonly used in Friesland, the Dutch Mennonites at present are generally called Doopsgezind (q.v.).

In the Dutch and Frisian languages there are a number of expressions and sayings dealing with Mennonites; for example, the name "Mennistenhemel" (heaven) given to an area on the Vecht River in the province of Utrecht, where wealthy Mennonites built their stately country homes in the 18th century. A "Menniste hemel" is also found at Ureterp, Friesland. A number of these names and sayings were collected by D. M. van der Woude and published: "De Mennisten over de tong" (DJ 1941, 39-48) and "Menniste Namen" (DJ 1942, 44-50).

Also frequently mentioned are "Mennisten leugen" (lies) and "Menniste streken" (tricks), meaning distorted truths or half-truths. These expressions probably originated in a 16th-century story about Menno Simons: Menno was once traveling in a coach which was stopped by police looking for him. When they asked whether Menno Simons was in the coach, Menno is said to have asked the passengers, "Is Menno Simons in here?" and replied to the officers, "They say he is not here." The same story is told of Hans Busschaert (q.v.). (See J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, "Mennisten-streken," DB 1868, 23-48.)

A familiar expression in Dutch literature is "Menniste Zusje" (girl), meaning a young woman dressed in the modest Mennonite way and apparently an example of virtue, but doing things on the sly. C. N. Wybrands in 1913 published an important study on this material, entitled Het Menniste Zusje. Menniste Zusje is also the common Dutch name for the flower of the saxifraga nutans. (See Mennonite.) vdZ.

Menniste-Bouwers-Federatie is a Dutch Mennonite association for Mennonite youth (12-18 years), founded at Amsterdam in March 27, 1948. The purpose of the association is to get the children of Mennonites together in special meetings, where they are entertained by various activities, such as sports (also camping) and games. The association is divided into a number of districts and local groups, which are found in 20 congregations. The total membership in 1956 numbered about 1,000. vdZ.

Menniste-buurt, a hamlet in the Dutch province of North Holland. In the Naamlijst of 1780 the Oude-Zijpe (q.v.) congregation is called that "aen de Menniste-buurt in de Zuidzijpe of Oudezijp bij Petten." vdZ.

Menniste Zusje: see Mennist.

Menno Bible Institute (GCM), located near Didsbury between Edmonton and Calgary, Alberta, was founded in 1937 by the Mennonite Conference of Alberta, which still owns three acres of land, the school, two dormitories with accommodations for 80 students, and two teacherages. The enrollment rose from 8 in 1937 to 52 in 1941 with two instructors. In 1941-51 three teachers taught 45-55 students a year. Since then the enrollment has declined. In 1956, the 20th year, 27 students registered for the five-month term. During the last two years four teachers have taught. The Didsbury church was the place for instruction the first 10 years. Now a fine school is used. M.B.I. is an active member of the Evangelical Teacher Training Association. W.P.

Menno Chapel Mennonite Church (MC), better known as the New Stark (Ohio) Mennonite Church, and often called simply Chapel, a member of the Ohio Mennonite Conference, was not organized until 1876 but some of the members had moved in from Stark Co., Ohio, as early as 1839. Children and grandchildren of Bishop John Thut of Bluffton made up the majority of the congregation, never very large. Menno Chapel was built a mile west of New Stark in 1878. John Blosser (q.v.) was bishop for many years. He was followed by his brother Noah, who took his congregation into the General Conference of Mennonites of North America when it disagreed with the discipline of the Ohio and Eastern A.M. Joint Conference about 1924. After his death ministers connected with the Witmarsum Theological Seminary (q.v.) at Bluffton, Ohio, served the congregation. Later the members joined with the few remaining members of the New Stark Presbyterian Church to form the New Stark Community Church. J.S.U.

Menno Colony, located in the Chaco district of Paraguay, was the first Mennonite settlement to be founded in the country, its first settlers arriving at the colony site in April 1928, from Manitoba and Saskatchewan. After the passing of the Canadian School Act of 1915, which was to enforce the use of the English language for all instruction in schools, and because of the Canadian war effort during those years, of which the Mennonites also felt the effects, there developed among their settlements along the Red River and in Saskatchewan a desire to find a new homeland for themselves and their children. On Feb. 11, 1921, six delegates from the Red River settlements went to Paraguay to investigate settlement possibilities and returned with a very favorable report, contrary to that given by the delegation of five Saskatchewan Mennonites who had made the same trip in 1920. Through the help of a New York banker, Samuel McRoberts, the Paraguayan government was approached with a request for granting of certain privileges which the Mennonites demanded. The Paraguayan government reacted very favorably and on July 26, 1921, passed Law #514, giving them all the requested privileges and freedoms. The Mennonites today refer to this law as the "Privilegium." However, economic conditions in Canada delayed Mennonite emigration until 1926, when McRoberts formed the Inter-Continental Company in Winnipeg to buy their land in Canada, and the Corporacion Paraguaya in Paraguay to sell them lands there in return. Their first Chaco land purchase consisted of 137,920 acres, lying about 500 ft. above sea-level.

The first group of 51 families (309 persons) left Altona, Man., on Nov. 23, 1926, followed by other groups, totaling 279 families, in all approximately 1,765 persons, by 1930. Upon arrival the first group in Paraguay was welcomed by President Eligio Ayala on Dec. 29, 1926, in Asuncion, and then continued its journey to Puerto Casado. There the immigrants discovered that the Corporacion Paraguaya had not surveyed the land they had bought while still in Canada, and the group had to wait until April 1928 to take possession of their land. Many became discouraged and 355 returned to Canada, while 147 died of a typhoid epidemic and the difficult climate. It was undoubtedly the most difficult period any Mennonites in Paraguay have ever experienced. The 1937 population was 1,722 in 309 families. The January 1950 population of the colony was 3,370 in 52 villages with 560 families. The July 1955 population was 4,006 with a land area of 800,000 acres owned by Menno and its daughter colony, about six times the original area.

The eastern border of the colony is located 110 miles due west of Puerto Casado. The distance from Puerto Casado to Sommerfeld, the capital of Menno Colony, is 155 miles. The first villages to be established shortly after their arrival in 1928, with an average of more than the intended 16 families each, were Bergtal, Laubenheim, Waldheim, Gnadenfeld, Weidenfeld, Reinland, Bergfeld, Osterwick, Blumengart, Schöntal, Halbstadt, Strassberg, Chortitz, and Silberfeld (abandoned in 1934). In 1950 Menno Colony had 43 villages in the old colony and an additional 6 villages in the new daughter colony located approximately 70 miles south of the colony. In 1955 the total number of villages was 60. As in other Chaco Mennonite settlements the chief cash crops are cotton, sorgo, peanuts, and for home consumption such crops as beans, watermelons, mandioca, and other vegetables. The colony has many orange, lemon, and grapefruit orchards. The houses are usually built of adobe brick and frequently in two-story style as formerly in Canada.

All the immigrants came to Paraguay in one of the three church groups—Chortitz Church under the leadership of Martin C. Friesen; Sommerfelder Church under Heinrich Unruh, and the Bergtal Church under Aron Zacharias. The first two groups together numbered 1,535 souls and the latter only 227. Later the Sommerfelder, Chortitz, and a part of the Bergtal group merged into the Chortitz Church, the latter group, however, retaining its administrative independence. After the death of Zacharias the rest of the Bergtal people joined the united group. The colony has one church building at Osterwick, the village of Elder Friesen, the schools serving as meetinghouses in the other villages. While still in Canada these church groups elected a committee to discharge all business in connection with emigration and resettlement, which consisted of the following: Martin C. Friesen and Abram A. Braun (East Reserve), Heinrich Unruh and Abram J. Friesen (West Reserve), Peter Peters and Peter J. Dyck (Sask.). In 1928 in Paraguay this committee was changed to include Jakob Braun, Johann Derksen, Isaak K. Fehr, Bernhard Penner, Kornelius Wiebe, and Jakob Neufeld. Today the committee, called the Chortitzer-Komitee, is made up of one representative from every three leguas of land, totaling nine members. The secretary is elected out of the committee members by themselves, and the administrator (Vorsteher) is elected out of the committee members by the colony. The secretary and administrator are salaried. This committee is entirely responsible for all colony affairs of whatever form, except church matters, which are handled by the leading ministers. Disputes are settled by the ministers and elders. Its 1951 administrator was Jakob B. Reimer. Previously Jakob Braun had filled this post for many years. There is also the traditional "Waisenamt" (office to care for widows and orphans, and the inheritance of property) brought along from Russia via Manitoba.

Instruction in the schools is carried on by self-educated laymen, and there are usually four classes in each school; namely, Fibler, beginners; Katechismer, Katechism class; Testamentler, the older students studying the New Testament; Bibler, the Bible study and graduating class. The average school attendance is for five years. In 1947 the colony built its own 30-bed hospital, and since 1949 has had its own doctor, either German or Paraguayan, as may be available. All surgical work is done in Filadelfia, Colony Fernheim, in return for which Menno Colony shares the expenses of that hospital. The colony has also its own co-operative store that handles all buying and selling, and a small industrial establishment, including a sawmill and cotton gin, operated by the co-operative.

Because Menno was the first colony to be established in the Chaco its settlers suffered untold hardships and reverses. It is creditable indeed that, coming from a more abundant life in Canada, more of them did not become discouraged. In contrast to subsequent Mennonite immigrants to Paraguay from Russia, few people of Menno Colony have a desire to emigrate to Canada. Although the colony has a difficult financial struggle most of its people are happy and satisfied. In 1955, however a group of some 50 conservative families, dissatisfied with the change gradually coming into Menno's life under the leadership of the more progressive elder and Chortitzer Komitee, decided to migrate to the Santa Cruz region of Bolivia, where a few families from Fernheim had settled a few years earlier. C.J.D.

Walter Quiring, "The Canadian Mennonite Immigration to the Paraguayan Chaco 1926-27," MQR VIII (1934) 32-42; idem, Russlanddeutsche suchen eine Heimat, Die deutsche Einwanderung in den paraguayischen Chaco (Karlsruhe, 1938); idem, Deutsche erschliessen den Chaco (Karlsruhe, 1936); Ministerio de Economia, Las Colonias Mennoniticas en el Chaco Paraguayo (Asuncion, 1934); Schmieder and Wilhelmy, Deutsche Ackerbausiedlungen im südamerikanischen Grasland, Pampa und Gran Chaco (Leipzig, 1938); Friedrich Kliewer, Die deutsche Volksgruppe in Paraguay, eine siedlungsgeschichtliche, volkskundliche und volkspolitische Untersuchung (Hamburg, 1941); Annemarie Krause, Mennonite Settlement in the Paraguayan Chaco (Chicago, 1952); J. W. Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottdale, 1953); ML III, 90-93.

Menno Colony Co-operative, Chaco, Paraguay, was founded in 1936 as a mutual aid organization, hence pays no dividends as most co-operatives do. It advances necessary short-term consumer credit, and uses its profits for the enlargement of facilities, and a smaller part to support the hospital and other welfare activities. The co-operative is under the general direction and control of the Chortitzer-Komitee, which is the general incorporated or registered organization of the Menno Colony and which has general responsibility for the economic aspects of Menno Colony life. H.S.B.

Menno Linden, a very old splendid linden tree which stands before a small house near Fresenburg, between Hamburg and Lübeck in North Germany, which is now a poorhouse. According to tradition this house was occupied by Menno's printer, and the tree was planted by Menno himself, hence the name. This story, though it is quite improbable, shows how tenaciously Menno's memory has attached itself to the locality where he spent the last years of his life. On Sept. 6, 1922, a brief gilded inscription was put on the tree. In 1954 the Menno Stone was moved from its location in the adjacent field to the Menno Linden. NEFF.

Menn. Bl., 1902, with picture; H. van der Smissen, Mennostein und Mennolinde zu Fresenburg (Hamburg, 1922); ML III, 95.

Menno Mennonite Church (GCM), located 20 miles west of Ritzville, and 19 miles northwest of Lind in Adams Co., eastern Washington, a member of the Pacific District Conference, was organized in 1879 near Freeman, S.D., with J. R. Schrag and Joseph Kaufman as elected ministers. In 1888 Schrag and a number of families moved west to Polk Co., near Dallas, Ore. In 1891 they settled near Eugene, Ore., and in 1900 the entire congregation moved by covered wagon to their present location, where they pioneered on homestead land. The first church, built in 1908, was replaced by a modern structure in 1950. A new parsonage was completed in 1952. The membership of the congregation in 1954 was 164, mostly rural, and living within a radius of 20 miles of the church. Other ministers who have served this church are John Waltner, D. D. King, D. B. Hess, M. J. Galle, E. J. Miller, Willard Wiebe, Paul Boschman (assistant), and Lester E. Janzen. W.W.W.

H. D. Burkholder, The Story of Our Conferences and Churches (n.p., 1951).

Menno Mennonite Church, Menno Colony, Chaco, Paraguay, the church of the Manitoba Mennonites who founded Menno Colony in 1927. In 1956 it had 1,359 baptized members. Martin C. Friesen, the single elder, who has served as elder from the beginning, is assisted by twenty-one preachers and six deacons. In 1953 (according to Fretz) there was only one meetinghouse in the colony located in the village of Osterwick, the residence of the elder. The village schools serve as the regular meeting places for worship, but general assemblies are held in the Osterwick church.

The original immigrants, coming largely from the West Reserve in Manitoba, were largely Sommerfelders (q.v.), and since they brought their elder (Friesen) with them, they constituted the dominant element in church life. The Chortitzer Church group, composed largely of people from the East Reserve in Manitoba, which actually differed little from the Sommerfelders, also brought their leader, Heinrich Unruh, with them, but they were smaller and later merged with the Sommerfelders. The Bergthaler Church, a very small group, led by Aron Zacharias, has practically lost its identity. The Menno Church, in contrast to the Old Colony group in Mexico, is moving progressively forward and strengthening its religious life and outlook. H.S.B.

J. Winfield Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottdale, 1953).

Menno Monument, in Witmarsum, Dutch province of Friesland, was erected on the site where the meetinghouse of the Witmarsum Mennonites once stood. Tradition says that the house of Herman and Gerrit Jansz stood here, where Menno first preached after leaving the Roman Catholic Church in 1536, and often stayed, and where he was probably married. These traditions are, however, rather improbable. The monument, a large stone obelisk about 10 feet high, was dedicated on Sept. 11, 1879. On the front it has the words, "In memory of Menno Simons, b. at Witmarsum in 1496. Heb. 12:7"; on the left side: "According to tradition Menno preached to his first followers here"; on the right side (facing the village two miles distant): "For three centuries the Mennonites of Witmarsum assembled at this place"; on the back: "I Cor. 3:11. 1536." The petition of the Dutch Mennonites for contributions to support the project was not universally complied with. Christian Schmutz of Rappenau (Baden) and others rejected the idea of such a monument. The stiffest resistance was encountered in America, where an article in the periodical Zur Heimath called it idolatry and a defamation of Menno Simons. On July 3, 1936, in connection with the close of the Mennonite World Conference, a wreath was placed at the foot of the monument in a solemn ceremony. (DB 1880, 164; Menn. Bl., 1878, 22, 55 ff.; 1879, 63; 1880, 37; 1907, 81; ML III, 94 f.) NEFF.

Menno Simons (1496-1561) was the most outstanding Anabaptist leader of the Low Countries during the 16th century. His followers became known as Mennonites (Mennisten). He was not, however, as is popularly assumed, the founder of the movement in the Netherlands. He became its leader after it had been in existence in that area for a number of years. His significance lies in the fact that he assumed the responsibilities of leadership at the crucial moment of the movement when it was in danger of losing its original identity under the influence of chiliastic and revolutionary leaders who succeeded in winning large followings. He maintained original peaceful Biblical Anabaptist concepts and won many who had been in danger of being swallowed up by the Münsterites (q.v.).

Menno was born in 1496 (exact date unknown) in the little village of Witmarsum, Dutch province of Friesland. Little is known about his youth and parental home. His parents, who lived in Witmarsum, were very probably dairy farmers. His father's first name was Simon, hence the son's name Menno Simons(zoon). Since Menno did not enter the priesthood until the age of 28, it can be assumed that he made the decision for this career not so early in life. He may have received his training in a monastery of Friesland or in a neighboring province. Menno knew Latin, and Greek was not entirely foreign to him. During his study he acquainted himself with some of the Latin Church Fathers. He did not read the Bible as such before his second year as a priest. Naturally he knew large sections of it, e.g., through the Roman missal.

Hardenberg used Menno Simons as an example of men who had "stupid teachers" and who without "learning and sound judgment ran away from monasteries." He also states that he met Menno as a rural priest. Hardenberg received his training at the Aduard Monastery near Groningen (1527-30) at the time when Menno was serving as a priest in Friesland. What occasion brought the two together? Was Menno also a graduate of Aduard? In that case Hardenberg did not speak very respectfully of his alma mater. In any event not too much significance can be attached to his statement regarding Menno's training since he was jealous of Menno's success and not inclined to give an objective evaluation. He says of Menno that he "took the Bible into his hands without formal training causing such great damage among Frisians, Belgians, the Dutch, . . . Saxons, . . . all of Germany, France, Britain, and all surrounding countries that posterity will not be able to shed sufficient tears because of it" (Spiegel, 117).

In 1524 at the age of 28, Menno was ordained priest at Utrecht. His first parish was Pingjum near Witmarsum, where he served as a vicar, with two colleagues. Judged by his reminiscences he was not deeply convinced of the sacredness of his duties, for he states that he joined his fellow priests in "playing cards, drinking. . . ." But during the first year he was suddenly frightened. While he was administering the Mass he began to doubt whether the bread and the wine were actually being changed into the flesh and blood of Christ. First he considered these thoughts the whisperings of Satan; but he was unable to free himself through sighings, prayers, and confessings." We conclude, therefore, that Menno Simons was not entirely free of influences from a movement which had become quite strong at that time in the Netherlands and whose adherents were known as Sacramentists.

The Sacramentists denied the actual presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper, i.e., Transubstantiation. This thought was first advocated publicly by Cornelis Hoen (q.v.). The Sacramentists (q.v.) were promoters of a reform movement in the Low Countries advocating the removal of abuses in the Catholic Church and a return to a Biblical Christianity, although they were not specifically "Lutheran" or "Reformed." This Sacramentist movement became the seedbed for the message proclaimed by Melchior Hofmann (q.v.) and his evangelists when they penetrated the Low Countries from Emden in 1530. Hoen's views regarding the Lord's Supper were published in Switzerland by Zwingli at the very time that Menno was entertaining doubts.

After Menno had been tormented for about two years by his doubts he finally turned to the Bible and searched it for help on his particular problem. "I did not get very far in it before I saw that we had been deceived," is Menno's summary of the result of his search. In the Scriptures he found certainty regarding the Lord's Supper. He found that the Sacramentist view, which interprets the meaning of the Lord's Supper as being symbolic, was the Biblical one. Now he was torn between two authorities: the Bible and the church. Thus far he had avoided the use of the Bible, for he saw that the Bible had taken Luther, Zwingli, and others out of the Catholic Church; now he was on the same path. Which of the two authorities would win? He wanted to be loyal to both. In the meantime Menno found help by reading certain writings of Luther, who taught him that the Scriptures should have the first place. Luther also taught him that if violations of the tradition of the Catholic Church have a Biblical basis they can not lead to eternal death. He may have read Luther's Von der Menschenlehre zu meiden . . . (Krahn, 43). Gradually the Scriptures became the authority for Menno, and the source of his sermons. Soon Menno became known as an "evangelical preacher," yet he complains that in those days "the world loved him and he the world."

Thus Menno, influenced by the Sacramentists and Luther, began to place the Scriptures above the authority of the church.

Melchior Hofmann, a lay preacher and follower of Luther, had traveled on long journeys as far as Baltic regions. In Strasbourg he came into contact with the Anabaptists and was baptized there in 1530, apparently not by the Swiss Brethren or by the group represented by Pilgram Marpeck. During the same year he introduced believers' baptism in Emden, East Friesland (q.v.), where he found the soil well prepared by the Sacramentist movement. As the symbolic meaning of the Lord's Supper had become the center around which its followers gathered, so now believers' or adult baptism became the point around which many Sacramentists and sympathizers of the Reformation gathered. Jan Volkerts Trypmaker (q.v.), a follower of Hofmann, who had been baptized by him, baptized Sicke Freerks Snijder in Emden. The latter then went to Leeuwarden, the capital of the Dutch province of Friesland, where he soon died a martyr's death, being executed because of his "re-baptism." Menno, who lived near Leeuwarden, heard about this event. "It sounded strange to me," says he, "to hear of a second baptism." This made a deep impression on him, although the idea as such was probably not entirely new to him (Krahn, 24). The thought of believers' baptism was now constantly in his mind. He "searched the Scriptures diligently and considered the question seriously but could find nothing about infant baptism." He also consulted his colleague, the Church Fathers, Luther, Bucer, and Bullinger. In their writings he found various reasons given for infant baptism, in which "each one followed only his own mind." He saw himself deceived by all on the question of baptism. The Scriptures, in which he found no definite reference to infant baptism, convinced him that believers' baptism was the true Christian practice. By 1531 he was thoroughly convinced that believers' baptism was Scriptural.

This, however, did not yet cause Menno's withdrawal from the Catholic Church. Instead he accepted a call to become the pastor of his home church at Witmarsum, where he remained until he joined the Anabaptists in 1536. This step may in part be explained by the course which the Anabaptist movement was taking at this time. Hofmann had placed great emphasis on prophetic visions and the Second Coming of the Lord, but under the pressure of persecution he ordered a cessation of baptism for two years (1531-33). After he had been imprisoned in Strasbourg in May 1533 the Anabaptist movement of the Low Countries came under the influence of persons who exploited the chiliastic aspect of the Hofmannite teaching, and threw off Hofmann's restriction on baptizing. Jan Matthijs (q.v.), Jan van Leyden (q.v.), and others like them became prominent leaders. Aided by the results of the severe persecution they transformed a part of the peaceful Biblical Anabaptist movement into a militant Old Testament "Israel," each citizen of which was expected to help Christ usher in the millennium, which Hofmann had prophesied would start in Strasbourg, and which they variously prophesied to come at Münster, Amsterdam, and other places. Particularly the attempt to establish a "New Jerusalem" at Münster (q.v.) in 1534-35 affected the course and future of Anabaptism. Menno Simons, although convinced that the Catholic Church was in need of a reformation, also realized that the Melchiorite movement, which had started well with a reformation program, had now accepted some very unchristian principles and practices. Publicly from the pulpit, and privately, he denounced its evils. As early as 1532 some people in the vicinity of Witmarsum had been baptized. Menno even had some discussions with leaders of the Münsterite movement early in 1534. It is possible that among the men with whom he debated was Jan van Geelen (q.v.), who organized an armed defense at the Olde-Klooster (q.v.) near Bolsward. On April 7, 1535, this group was defeated; among those who lost their lives were Peter Simons (q.v.), who may have been Menno's brother, as well as some members of his congregation. This was a turning point in Menno's life. On July 25, 1535, the "New Jerusalem" at Münster came to a tragic end. Few escaped and the leaders were tortured to death.

All this made a great impression on Menno and brought his inner life to a crisis and final decision. Had he not received some valuable insight through the Anabaptist movement in its earlier and peaceful days? Did he not know that among the Anabaptists were many with a sincere desire to live a consecrated Christian life? What had he done to prevent this tragic development through which so many were misled, although it was said that he "could silence these persons beautifully"? He now states, "The blood of these people, although misled, fell so hot upon my heart that I could not stand it, nor find rest in my soul. . . . I saw that these zealous children, although in error, willingly gave their lives . . . for their doctrine and their faith. And I was one of those who had disclosed to some of them the abominations of the papal system. But I continued in my comfortable life and acknowledged abominations simply in order that I might enjoy physical comfort and escape the Cross of Christ.

"Pondering these things my conscience tormented me so that I could no longer endure it. . . . If I continue this way and do not live agreeably to the Word of the Lord . . . , if I through bodily fear do not lay bare the foundations of truth, nor use all my powers to direct the wandering flock who would gladly do their duty if they knew it, to the true pastures of Christ—Oh, how shall their shed blood, shed in the midst of transgression, rise against me at the judgment of the Almighty and pronounce sentence against my poor, miserable soul!"

Menno continues his account by stating that his "heart trembled within" him and that he "prayed to God with sighs and tears that He would give" him, "a sorrowing sinner, the gift of His grace" and create within him "a clean heart and graciously through the merits of the crimson blood of Christ forgive" his "unclean walk . . ." and bestow upon him "wisdom, Spirit, courage . . . so that" he might "preach His exalted adorable name and holy Word in purity, and make known His truth to His glory."

Thus the gradual acceptance of the evangelical truth and the willingness to take upon him the "cross of Christ" came to Menno in the crucial days of the disastrous end and defeat of the radical Melchiorites at Bolsward and Münster. He was challenged and found the courage to become the shepherd of the flock without a leader. For some nine months after the defeat at Bolsward in April 1535, he preached "the word of true repentance" more openly from his pulpit, "pointing the people to the narrow path, reproving all sin and wickedness, adultery, and false worship," but he also presented "the true worship, . . . baptism and the Lord's Supper, according to the doctrine of Christ," to the extent that he had at that time received from God insight and grace (Complete Writings, 670 f.).

This Menno did, not only in preaching from his pulpit and in personal contact with the people, but also through a writing which was to be the first of many. Jan van Leyden, who had assumed the blasphemous role of a "Second David" of the "New Jerusalem" at Münster, was the reason for this writing entitled The Blasphemy of Jan van Leyden. The pamphlet, which was not printed until 1627, was written after the defeat at Bolsward but before the defeat of Münster, with the intention of publication. But Münster collapsed, and Menno left the Roman church; hence the urgency and possibility of having it published diminished (Complete Writings, 33).

After nine months of the more dedicated and open presentation of his views, Menno's position must have become known. This endangered his life, and so he quietly renounced all "worldly reputation, name and fame," infant baptism, easy life, and "willingly submitted to stress and poverty under the heavy cross of Christ." He left his home community and parish, likely by night, to start an "underground" life. According to available information this was most likely in January 1536 (Krahn, 35). For a year he probably found shelter in the province of Groningen, at times crossing the border into East Friesland. He "sought out the pious" and found "some who were zealous and maintained the truth." He dealt with the erring and "reclaimed them from the snares of damnation and gained them to Christ." Thus we find Menno continuing his labors as a voluntary underground evangelist. In addition to this work he was also studying the Word of God and writing pamphlets to strengthen and guide those in need of spiritual help and to win those in danger of losing their evangelical faith. Some of his writings he probably had started in Witmarsum, such as "The Spiritual Resurrection" (Van de Geestlijke Verrijsenisse, published ca. 1536) which was soon followed by "The New Birth" (De nieuwe Creatuere, ca. 1537) and "The Meditations on the Twenty-Fifth Psalm" (Christelycke leringhen op den 25. Psalm, ca. 1538). One of the most important writings was the Foundation-Book (q.v.) (Dat Fundament des Christelycken leers, published 1539-40). The contents of these writings reveal that Menno had found the foundation and salvation in Jesus Christ and that he was challenging his readers to accept Christ and become His disciples.

While Menno was seeking out the pious and studying and writing in seclusion, he soon became known among the Anabaptists as a capable and devoted leader. One day "some six, seven, or eight persons" came to him who were of "one heart and one soul" with him, "beyond reproach as far as man can judge in doctrine and life, separated from the world after the witness of Scriptures and under the cross, men who sincerely abhorred not only the sect of Münster but the cursed abomination of all other worldly sects." They prayerfully requested Menno in the name of "those pious souls who were of the same mind and spirit" that he should make "the great sufferings and need of the poor oppressed souls" his concern, since their hunger was so very great and the faithful stewards so few. They urged him to use the talents which he had received from God in His vineyard (Complete Writings, 671).

When this request to become an elder or bishop of the scattered Anabaptists came to Menno he was again greatly troubled. He realized that his talents were limited, that on one hand he was weak by nature and timid by spirit, and that on the other hand the wickedness and tyranny of the world was great; yet he saw a great hunger and need among the God-fearing, pious souls who "erred as do harmless sheep which have no shepherd." The delegation and Menno agreed to pray about this matter for a season. When they came again Menno surrendered his "soul and body to the Lord . . . and commenced in due time . . . to teach and to baptize, to till the vineyard of the Lord, . . . to build up His holy city and temple and to repair the tumbledown walls" (Complete Writings, 672).

This marks the call and the assuming of the office of an elder by Menno Simons. When his baptism took place is not known. It is possible that this occurred while he was still at Witmarsum during the time that he was publicly preaching "the true baptism and the Lord's Supper." But it is more likely that he was not baptized upon confession of his faith until he left Witmarsum. A Catholic priest preaching believers' baptism publicly and also receiving a second baptism could not remain unnoticed by the authorities even in a little village like Witmarsum. This consideration makes us inclined to believe that he was baptized soon after his withdrawal from the Catholic Church in January 1536.

Much effort has been made to determine where Menno Simons lived after he left the Catholic Church early in 1536 (see Frerichs, 1 ff.; Vos, 64 ff.; Krahn, 32 ff.). Menno himself wrote in 1544 that he "could not find in all the countries a cabin or hut in which my poor wife and our little children could be put up in safety for a year or even half a year" (Complete Writings, 424). This was his fate from 1536 until 1554. During the first years Menno probably spent most of his time in the Dutch province of Groningen. However, he could hardly stay anywhere for any length of time. Tjaard Renicx of Kimswerd in the province of Friesland was executed at Leeuwarden in January 1539 because he had sheltered Menno. Syouck Haeyes confessed in 1542 that he had heard a sermon by Menno outside Leeuwarden. An official document of Leeuwarden of May 19, 1541, states that Menno, one of the principal leaders, made it a practice to come to the province of Friesland once or twice a year, winning many followers.

On Dec. 7, 1542, one hundred guilders were offered by the authorities of Leeuwarden for the apprehension of Menno, who appeared by night at different places to preach and baptize. This indicates that Menno returned to his native province of Friesland at times in all secrecy but only for a short time. Menno found no permanent home during this time in any of the Dutch provinces.

Soon after his renunciation of Catholicism in 1536 Menno was also in the German province of East Friesland, where Ulrich von Dornum (q.v.) of Oldersum (q.v.) sheltered religious refugees, and according to tradition he found shelter here under Dornum's protection. However, Menno's statement must not be forgotten, that he and his family never found a place where they could live unmolested "for a year or even half a year." When and where Menno married his wife Geertruydt (q.v.) is not definitely known. In 1544 he spoke of their "little children." Peter Jansz confessed on June 14, 1540, that Menno had baptized him at Oldersum "about four years ago" (Vos, 243). This shows that Menno traveled early and extensively after his withdrawal. It will be shown later that he soon became well known in East Friesland. However, it is doubtful that he ever met Ulrich von Dornum or was a guest in his home during Dornum's lifetime, since the latter died early in the spring of 1536 (Ohling, 49). If this did occur, Menno had to proceed directly from Witmarsum to Oldersum. Ulrich was a staunch promoter of the Reformation, a friend of Carlstadt and Sebastian Franck, an admirer of Hans Denk, and a sympathizer with the Anabaptists. Two of his daughters married Anabaptists; one of them in 1551 married Christoffer van Ewsum (q.v.), who sheltered Menno in Groningen and whom Alba called a "principal Mennist" (Ohling, 24).

East Friesland (q.v.), where Melchior Hofmann had baptized some 300 persons in the city of Emden (q.v.), became a refuge for the Sacramentists of the Low Countries and other persecuted minorities. Even Carlstadt (q.v.) found shelter on the estate of Ulrich von Dornum. Menno, as has been said, also found his way to East Friesland soon after his withdrawal from Witmarsum. At this time John a Lasco (q.v.) was the superintendent of the East Friesland churches under the ruler, Countess Anna of Oldenburg.

In January 1544 Menno had a theological discussion with a Lasco. The objective of this discussion was to win Menno and his followers to the Reformed Church. That Menno was called upon to represent the Mennonites makes it clear that he was known in East Friesland as their spokesman. Anna, personally a tolerant ruler, was compelled by the emperor to do something about the numerous religious groups found in her domain. She consented to expel those which a Lasco would designate as "heretical." The latter's first objective was to win those who were spiritually closest to his own views. The discussion was held on Jan. 28-31, 1544, when the articles pertaining to the Incarnation, baptism, original sin, justification, and the call of ministers were discussed. Although the two men did not agree concerning all articles, Menno and his followers were dismissed by a Lasco in a friendly manner. Menno had promised to present a written confession regarding the Incarnation, and he now wrote "in a secluded place" under the title, A Brief and Clear Confession and Scriptural Declaration Concerning the Incarnation. . . . A Lasco had it printed in 1544 without Menno's knowledge or consent and used it against him. The following decree of Countess Anna in 1545 announces that the followers of David Joris (q.v.) and Batenburg (q.v.) should be "corrected on their neck" (executed) if they would not leave the country. The "Mennisten," however, were to be examined by the superintendent, and if they did not surrender were to leave the country. The term "Mennisten" designating followers of Menno appeared for the first time in any official document in the 1545 decree. This again, as well as the fact that Menno left East Friesland before this announcement was published, indicates that he was well known in this area as an Anabaptist leader (Krahn, 59 ff.).

In May 1544 Menno went to the Lower Rhine region, to the area of Cologne and Bonn. A Lasco wrote to Hardenberg on July 26, 1544, that Menno was in the bishopric of Cologne, where he was "misleading" many. This area had long been a fertile ground for the evangelical and Sacramentist movement. Menno was also successful there, and associated with the Anabaptist leaders Zyllis and Lemke. Matthias Servaes (q.v.), who died a martyr's death here, refused at any cost to "renounce" the principles for which Menno Simons stood. This indicates the degree of success of Menno's work in this area.

Menno's activities here coincide with the last years of the bishopric of Archbishop Hermann von Wied of Cologne, who had to give up his position in 1546 because he was promoting an evangelical reformation in the Catholic Church. Hardenberg, an active reformer of this area, influenced by a Lasco, interfered with Menno's activities. Menno was also in all probability active at the following places in the Maas River region: Vischersweert, Illekhoven, and Roermond. Several martyrs of this area testified that they had heard sermons by Menno in 1545. Under the rigid Catholic rule of the successor of Hermann von Wied in 1546, Menno had to leave this district. He now proceeded to the province of Schleswig-Holstein.

In the fall of 1546 Menno attended a discussion at a country place near Lübeck with the followers of David Joris, led by the latter's son-in-law Nicolaas Meyndertsz van Blesdijk (q.v.). Joris himself had left Emden for Basel early in 1544. David Joris (q.v.), an extreme left-wing Anabaptist of the Low Countries, who had been ordained elder by Obbe Philips in 1535, before Menno, had never been in full harmony with the peaceful Anabaptist representatives such as Dirk and Obbe Philips or Menno Simons. He placed too much emphasis on personal visions and "revelations" without checking them against the Scriptures. Menno and his followers opposed all revolutionary and mystical fanaticism. In addition to their spiritualistic conception of the Scriptures, Menno opposed the Jorists for considering it unnecessary to baptize or to organize churches during the time of persecution. Menno was supported in this discussion by the elders Dirk Philips, Leenaert Bouwens, Gillis van Aken, and Adam Pastor, and the group excommunicated Joris.

Another question arose when it became apparent that Adam Pastor (q.v.), a former priest, who had been ordained ca. 1542 as an Anabaptist elder by Menno and Dirk, turned heretical in his Christological views. At a conference at Emden in 1547 no agreement could be reached. Meetings at Goch (1547), the Lower Rhine, and Lübeck (1552) followed. Since no agreement could be reached, Pastor was excommunicated at once. Pastor apparently deviated from the others on a number of other questions also, such as church discipline and relationship to government. He was more liberal than the group. His views regarding Christ differ considerably from those of Menno. Whereas Menno emphasized the deity of Christ, Pastor emphasized His humanity. Pastor believed that Jesus became the Saviour because God endowed Him and ordained Him for this task; but in essence He was not divine or equal with God. Menno on the other hand also deviated somewhat from the accepted orthodox creed, which sets forth the divine and the human nature as equally present in Christ, in stressing His divinity above His humanity. His peculiar conception of the Incarnation (q.v.) of Christ he had adopted from Melchior Hofmann. It became for him an essential part of his concept of the church. Christ in the Incarnation passed through Mary's womb like a ray of sunshine through a glass of water without taking on any of her "sinful flesh." Only thus, he claimed, could the Saviour be perfect, and only because of this can the work of His salvation, the church of Jesus Christ, be perfected.

Menno's traveling schedule indicates that he spent some time during the years after 1546 at Lübeck, Emden, the Lower Rhine, Leeuwarden, Danzig, etc. He still had no permanent home, although it is likely that his family did not accompany him on these trips of a shorter duration. In April 1549 Menno stayed overnight at the home of Klaas Jans, who was executed on this account at Leeuwarden on June 1. During the same summer he spent some weeks with the "Elected and Children of God in the Country of Prussia," as becomes apparent from a letter which he addressed to these believers on Oct. 7, 1549. This indicates not only that the Anabaptists of the Low Countries had spread as far as Danzig, but also that Menno's guidance, counsel, and authority were needed to iron out some difficulties which had risen. His co-worker Dirk Philips became the first elder of the Danzig Mennonite Church. It is possible that Menno's visit to the Anabaptists in Danzig and Prussia was not limited to this one occasion, although definite information is lacking.

In search of a field of labor and a refuge Menno had moved from the Low Countries to the province of East Friesland and was now on his way to Mecklenburg. He no doubt resided for some time in the Hanseatic city of Wismar. He was here during the winter of 1553-54 when a group from a Lasco's church arrived by boat from London as a refugee congregation. Since the Lutheran city of Wismar did not welcome this Reformed group, the Mennonites went out over the frozen ice of the harbor to the boat to meet them and to provide them with help and aid. This led to a religious discussion. On Feb. 6, 1554, the a Lasco group met with Menno and his followers, having invited Martin Micron of Emden to serve as their man. The Incarnation was again among the topics discussed. The discussion ended in hostility, with the Mennonites accusing the Reformed of publishing a list of the Mennonites located in Wismar which had speeded up their expulsion from the city. An exchange of writings between Menno and Martin Micron (q.v.) resulted from this discussion.

Before this occurred Menno and certain other elders met in Wismar for a conference, at which they agreed on certain rules of church practice and discipline known as the Wismar Articles (1554). These articles deal primarily with the relationship between partners in a mixed marriage, i.e., believer and unbeliever, the matter of appealing to a court, and nonresistance. During this time Menno also wrote and published his book against the accusations of Gellius Faber (q.v.), entitled Een Klare beantwoordinge . . . (Reply to Gellius Faber) which was published in the Anabaptist print shop at Lübeck in 1554. In this, the longest book that Menno produced, can be found the account of his "Conversion" or the "Renunciation of the Church of Rome," which he presented in order to defend the calling of the Anabaptist ministers.

On Nov. 11, 1554, the city council of Wismar decreed that all Anabaptists were to leave the city. Menno had already left during the summer and gone to Lübeck. He and his followers proceeded together to the town of Oldesloe in the province of Holstein. In the vicinity of this town Bartholomeus von Ahlefeldt had since 1543 been gathering oppressed Anabaptists on one of his large estates, called Wüstenfelde (desert field). Here at last Menno found shelter and protection. His printer began to print his books, and Menno took the opportunity to revise his early editions and write several new books. Although von Ahlefeldt was often challenged to expel the Mennonites he remained their protector, having learned to appreciate them when he was in Holland.

The Mennonites aimed at nothing less than the establishment of a true Christian and apostolic church. With Paul they were determined to present to Christ His bride without spot and wrinkle and to keep themselves pure and clean as far as the world around them was concerned and also to keep the world out of the church. They were doing this through church discipline, using the ban and avoidance. Questions regarding the application of church discipline led to controversies. Menno had meetings with his fellow workers in Emden, Franeker, and Harlingen. Dirk Philips and Leenaert Bouwens favored a rigid application of church discipline. Others were lenient. Menno mediated between the two extremes. Menno made his last trip to his home province, Friesland, in 1557 to settle a dispute over this question. But in vain. This matter was to occupy the minds and hearts of the Dutch Mennonites for at least another century. After his return he wrote to a friend, "If the omnipotent God had not preserved me last year as well as now, I would already have gone mad. For there is nothing upon earth which my heart loves more than it does the church, and yet I must live to see this sad affliction upon her" (Complete Writings, 1055). Certain reports indicate that Menno was won over by the more rigid church disciplinarians toward the end of his life.

Through Zyllis and Lemke, Menno's friends and co-workers of the Lower Rhine area, the question of church discipline was presented at a large conference of South German Anabaptists which met at Strasbourg in 1557. Some 50 representatives of congregations in various South German countries, such as Moravia, Switzerland, and Alsace, were present. The assembled elders sent an appeal to Menno and his co-workers not to go to extremes in the matter of ban and avoidance, through which even family life was disrupted. Menno and Dirk Philips responded in writing, defending the more rigid position. Menno now emphasized that the heavenly marriage between Christ and the soul is more important than the relationship of man and wife in the earthly marriage. This controversy saddened the last days of his life.

During his last years Menno was crippled. The earliest portraits show him with crutches. His wife preceded him in death, although it is not known when she died. The children included at least two daughters and a son Jan. The son probably also preceded the father in death. One of the daughters gave some information about Menno to the historian Pieter Jans Twisck. According to all available information Menno died at Wüstenfelde on Jan. 31, 1561, 25 years after his withdrawal from the Catholic Church. He was buried in his own garden. The Thirty Years' War destroyed the estate on which the Anabaptists had settled, so that the exact location of the grave is no longer known. In 1906 a simple stone was erected at the approximate place, which was popularly known as the "Menno field." Not far from it the Menno Linden, supposedly planted by Menno himself, and the Menno House, in which his books were supposedly printed, still stand.

Menno Simons was a Biblicist in the truest and best meaning of the word. He turned away from tradition and became Bible-centered in all his beliefs and practices. Once he had turned to the Bible, he took it for the Word of God and made it the cornerstone of all his work. His writings are filled with Bible quotations. His approach to the Bible differs from that of the other reformers. It is above all Christ-centered. Every book and every little pamphlet he wrote have on the front page the motto, "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ" (I Cor. 3:11). Christ-centeredness marks his theology and the practices he derived from the Bible. Discipleship (Nachfolge) or a fruitful Christian life were very strongly emphasized. But this emphasis on true Christian living does not take place in a vacuum or as a matter merely between the individual and his God, but rather within the congregation, the church of Christ. Menno's faith is therefore not only Christ-centered but also church-centered: his chief concern was the achievement of the true church of Jesus Christ or the body of Christ. Again and again he refers to I Cor. 12:13, 25-27, and Col. 1:18-24. The prerequisites for church membership according to Menno are regeneration and willingness to bear the cross of Christ. These two are inseparable. Discipline was as natural in the church of Menno Simons as any normal function of the healthy body.

Behind these views lie first of all Menno's personal experience in the Catholic Church, and the experience which he had with the Reformers and Münsterites. With Luther he rejected the Catholic Church, which did not preach justification by faith, but he also had to reject the Lutheran Church because of its one-sided emphasis on "faith alone." On the other hand he could not accept the radical movement which attempted to usher in the kingdom of God by force. Instead he developed a theology of martyrdom, of suffering for God.

Menno's significance lies in the fact that he prevented the collapse of the northern wing of the Anabaptist movement in the days of its greatest trial and built it up on the right Biblical foundation. He did this as its leader, speaker, and defender, through his preaching as he journeyed from place to place, and through his simple and searching writings. Particularly the Foundation-Book did much to restore the original Anabaptist concepts and principles, which were in grave danger of being lost. His writings were effective not so much because of their superior and logical qualities as a theological system, but because behind them stood a man formed according to the Scriptures who sincerely and honestly wanted to give all for the Christian church and the glory of God. Through Menno's courageous and devoted life a distinctive witness in the Reformation movement, representing a Christian brotherhood and a Christian way of life, was preserved, which have meanwhile become quite generally recognized as an integral part of Protestantism and include such basic principles as separation of church and state, freedom of conscience, voluntary church membership, democratic church government, holy living, and the Christian peace witness in a world of strife.

The questions pertaining to the linguistic peculiarities, the editions and printers of Menno's writings have found some interest among scholars; and a considerable amount of investigation has been made. G. E. Frerichs wrote a detailed article on "Menno's taal" (Menno's Language) (DB 1905). He concluded that Menno's first writings were linguistically colored by the language of the place in which he was living, and which he (Frerichs) thought to find in the province of Groningen, called "Ommelanden." Karel Vos calls the writings and the linguistic coloring of this period (1537-41) an Oosters gekleurd dialect, meaning with "an eastern coloring." The term Oosters (eastern) is, however, relative. "Eastern" is viewed from the standpoint of the province of Holland, which was the leading one in the economy and the culture of the Netherlands for a long time, and whose language became the standard. A slight deviation from its language under the influence of linguistic pecularities of the regions east and northeast of the province of Holland is designated as an Oosters gekleurd dialect. Such peculiarities in the writings of Menno Simons, which are characteristic of the province of Groningen, are designated by Vos as Oosters gekleurd.

Later, when Menno Simons was living in East

Friesland and Holstein, his language was necessarily adapted to the language of this country since he was printing primarily for the people of that territory. Vos refers to the language in which Menno wrote and printed his books in East Friesland and the Hanseatic cities as the Oosters language (not only an Oosters gekleurd dialect). Menno even revised his earlier Dutch writings and had them reprinted at Lübeck, Oldesloe, and Wüstenfelde in the Oosters language. The later writings printed first in Oosters were translated into the Dutch for use in the Netherlands proper. The question of the linguistic peculiarities in the various editions and writings of Menno Simons deserves a more thorough investigation and would be one of the most significant tasks in preparing a scholarly edition of Menno's writings. The following is merely a brief outline of Menno's printers and printing facilities as far as they can be determined at this time.

It is very difficult to determine where and when Menno's early writings were printed and who the printers were. Jan Claesz (q.v.) was beheaded Jan. 19, 1544, because he had 600 copies of Menno Simons' books printed at Antwerp. He sold 200 of them in the province of Holland and sent the rest to Friesland. These books must have been some of Menno's earliest writings. A little information is found in the copy of the Foundation-Book (1539-40) in the British Museum, which has an entry by Johan Enschede of Haarlem pertaining to the type used in the book. Nijhoff-Kronenberg (Ned. Bibliographie I, p. 540) states that this book and Menno's Voele goede leringhen op den 25. Psalm (ca. 1537) and Een corte vermaninghe . . . van de wedergeboorte (ca. 1537) were both printed in the same print shop. It should be possible to discover more details about the print shop by the type that was used (see also Vos, 296). It is likely that others of Menno's books were published in East Friesland during the time he was living there. To what an extent, if at all, Nicolaes Biestkens (q.v.) of Emden, who printed for the Mennonites, printed Menno's writings, should be investigated. Probably no writings of Menno appeared between 1542 and 1551. After 1551 Menno and the Anabaptists had a printer at Lübeck. When the underground print shop here was discovered, the authoritites found ten tons of books. The printer then moved from Lübeck to Oldesloe, and in 1554 to Wüstenfelde, where he continued to function as Menno's printer. At this time an Oosters edition of the Foundation-Book appeared with a certain "B. L." as printer. All of Menno's writings, both new and revised editions, appeared now in Wüstenfelde in rapid succession. Von Ahlefeldt protected Menno and his printer, B. L., whose full name is not yet known, against all attacks. In 1558 a Dutch edition of the Foundation-Book appeared, probably in Wüstenfelde (BRN VII, 253). The printer must have continued his work even after Menno's death in 1561. In 1562 another Dutch edition of the Foundation-Book appeared. In 1619 an unchanged Dutch reprint of the 1539-40 edition was published.

The writings of Menno Simons have been published more often than the writings of any other Anabaptist leaders. The Foundation-Book was translated into German in 1575. The first large collection appeared in Dutch as Sommarie (1600-1) which was followed by the Opera ofte Groot Sommarie (1646) and the Opera Omnia Theologica (1681). In America the first complete edition of Menno Simons appeared in 1871 in English and in 1876 in German. In 1956 a new enlarged English edition, the first practically complete edition in any language, was published. An urgent task in Mennonite research would be to prepare a scholarly edition of Menno's writings, in which the various early and later editions and translations would be fully taken into consideration, similar to the edition of Dirk Philips' writings published in Volume X of the BRN.

Turning to the research pertaining to the life, work, and beliefs of Menno it must be said that no other Anabaptist leader has been the subject of as many biographies as Menno. All major aspects of his life, times, and activities, have been investigated, primarily by Dutch, but also by some German scholars. Much of the biographical information was published in the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen (1861-1919). A. M. Cramer wrote the first significant biography (1837). J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, Christiaan Sepp, and G. E. Frerichs published much biographical information in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen. The first most complete scholarly biography of Menno was produced by Karel Vos (1914) based on extensive archival research. W. J. Kühler published his findings along these lines in his history of the Dutch Mennonites during the 16th century (1932). In the German language early biographies appeared, written by C. Harder (1846) and B. C. Roosen (1848). A recent German biography, with a theological interpretation of the views of Menno and his followers, was written by Cornelius Krahn (1936). In America John Horsch presented the only full-length English biography (1916).

The Amsterdam Mennonite Library has an authentic letter written by Menno Simons himself; it is undated and is addressed (after 1554) to a widow. This letter is the only extant manuscript in Menno's handwriting. It was printed, with somewhat modified spelling, in Opera Omnia, page 336.†

None of the portraits of Menno, circulating since the early 17th century, can be considered historically true. The most acceptable one is the engraving made about 1608 by Christoffel van Sichem (q.v.). Recently the Dutch artist Arend Hendriks made a beautiful etching of Menno. C.K.

Sources: Menno Simons, Opera Omnia Theologica (Amsterdam, 1681); idem, Die vollständigen Werke (Elkhart, 1876); idem, Die vollständigen Werke (Baltic, Ohio, 1926); Menno Simons, The Complete Works (Elkhart, 1871); Menno Simons, The Complete Writings (Scottdale, 1956); Hans Alenson, "Tegen-Bericht op de voor-Reden vant groote Martelaer Boeck," 1630, BRN VII (The Hague, 1910); I. H. V. P. N., Het beginsel en voortganck der geschillen, scheuringen, en verdeeltheden onder de . . . Doopsgesinden; E. F. Goverts, "Archivstücke aus dem Reichsarchiv Hansborg," Ztscht d. Zentralstelle für Niedersächsische Familiengeschichte (Hamburg, 1923) No. 5; Obbe Philips, "Bekenntenisse . . ." (Amsterdam, 1584) BRN VII; Inv. Arch.

Amst. I, Nos. 241 f., 257-60, 323, 343, 356, 367, 417, 463, 617, 619 f., 631, 640.

Biographies: J. Horsch, Menno Simons, His Life, Labors and Teachings (Scottdale, 1916); H. S. Bender and J. Horsch, Menno Simons' Life and Writings (Scottdale, 1936); C. H. Smith, Menno Simons, An Apostle of the Nonresistant Life (Berne, ca. 1936); C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936); idem, "The Conversion of Menno Simons: A Quadricentennial Tribute," MQR IX f. (1935-36); A. M. Cramer, Het leven en de verrichtingen van Menno Simons (Amsterdam, 1837); C. Harder, Das Leben Menno Symons (Königsberg, 1846); F. Bastian, Essai sur la vie et les écrits de Menno Simons (Strasbourg, 1857); J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, "Eenige opmerkingen en mededeelingen betr. Menno Simons," DB 1864, 1865, 1872, 1881, 1889, 1890, 1892, 1894; F. C. Fleischer, Menno Simons (1492-1559) (Amsterdam, 1892); S. Cramer, "Menno Simons," in HRE; idem, "Menno's Leven," in DB 1904; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914); Kühler, Geschiedenis I; Rob Limburg, "Menno Simons, de Herder der verstrooide Kudde," in Cultuurdragers in bewogen dagen (The Hague, n.d.-1941) 112-53.

Other Literature: G. J. Boekenoogen, "De portretten van Menno Simons," DB 1916; G. E. Frerichs, "Menno's taal," DB 1906; idem, "Menno's verblijf in de eerste jaren na zijn uitgang," DB 1906; B. C. Roosen, Menno Simons, den evang. Mennoniten-Gemeinden geschildert (Leipzig, 1848); Sibold S. Smeding, "The Portraits of Menno Simons," Menn. Life III (July 1948); H. van der Smissen, Mennostein und Mennolinde zu Fresenburg (n.p., n.d.); G. Ohling, Ulrich von Dornum . . . (Aurich, 1955); Mellink, Wederdopers; B. H. Unruh, Die niederländisch-niederdeutschen Hintergründe der mennonitischen Ostwanderungen (Karlsruhe, 1955); Friedrich Brune, Der Kampf um eine evangelische Kirche im Münsterland 1520-1802 (Witten, 1953); S. Hoekstra, Beginselen en Leer der Oude Doopsgezinden, vergeleken met die van de overige Protestanten (Amsterdam, 1863); J. H. Wessel, De leerstellige strijd tusschen Nederlandsche Gereformeerden en Doopsgezinden in de zestiende eeuw (Assen, 1945); N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952); J. P. Müller, Die Mennoniten in Ostfriesland (Emden, 1887); idem, "Die Mennoniten in Ostfriesland," Jahrbuch . . . Emden IV (1881) 58-74, and V (1882) 46-79; C. A. Cornelius, Der Anteil Ostfrieslands an der Reformation bis zum Jahr 1535 (Münster, 1852); E. Kochs, "Die Anfänge der ostfr. Reformation," Jahrb. der Ges. für bild. Kunst und vaterl. Altertümer zu Emden XIX (1916-18) 109-273; XX (1920) 1-125; H. Dalton, Johannes a Lasco (Utrecht, 1885); R. Dollinger, Geschichte der Mennoniten in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg und Lübeck (Neumünster, 1930); Julian Heins, Menno Simonis. Ein dramatisches Gedicht (Danzig, 1844); Catalogus Amst. 1919; DJ 1936, 40-69; K. Vos, "Menno Simons in Groningen," in Groningsche Volksalmanak 1919, 139-46; E. Crous, "Auf Mennos Spuren am Niederrhein," Der Mennonit VIII (1955), Nos. 10-12, and IX, Nos. 1-2; N. van der Zijpp, Menno Simonsz (Amsterdam, 1950); ML III, 177-90.

Menno Simons Kerkje, a former meetinghouse in Witmarsum, Dutch province of Friesland, where Menno was supposed to have preached his first sermons after leaving the Catholic Church in 1536. It stood here for 50 years, about two miles from the village. In 1878 it was torn down because it was too small and old, and the Menno monument (q.v.) was erected on its site. The Mennonites of Witmarsum built a new and spacious church in the village. H. Thepass made engravings of both the interior and the exterior of the Menno Church, which were edited by M. Stoffels at Zaandam. (DB 1880, 164; Menn. Bl., 1902, 49, shows a picture of the old church; ML III, 95.)

Menno Simons Lectureship, endowed by the John P. Kaufman family, is a function of Bethel College, North Newton, Kan., which came into being in 1953, when Roland H. Bainton delivered the Menno Simons Lectures on March 8-10 on "Sixteenth Century Anabaptism." The raising of funds and the organizational setup were started in 1947. The lectureship is devoted to the promotion of research in Anabaptist and Mennonite history, thought, life, and culture, and the implications and relationship of these to the whole of society. The results of this research are presented to the public through annual lectures which are, if feasible, published in book form. The speakers are chosen by a committee composed of the president of Bethel College, one representative of the John P. Kaufman family, and one faculty member. In 1957 this committee was composed of Ed. G. Kaufman, D. C. Wedel, and Cornelius Krahn. Some of the lectures have been published in the quarterly magazine, Mennonite Life, and some are to appear in book form. The following are the lecturers and topics 1953-56: Roland H. Bainton—"Sixteenth Century Anabaptism," March 8-10, 1953; Wilhelm Pauck—"The Reformers and the Anabaptists," Jan. 24-27, 1954; Franklin H. Littell—"The Free Church," Oct. 31-Nov. 3, 1954; Robert Kreider—"Anabaptism Speaks to Our Day," Nov. 6-8, 1955; and Martin Niemöller—"Relevance of Christian Nonresistance in Our Present World Situation," Nov. 11-14, 1956. C.K.

Menno Simons Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, located in Butterfield, Watonwan Co., Minn., a member of the Northern District Conference, was organized in 1887 by Mennonites of Swiss origin coming from the Lemberg area of Austria 1880-83. Their leader was Daniel Brubacher. The group was small—exact figures are not available, and in 1915, when their minister and elder Heinrich Kintzi, who succeeded Brubacher, resigned, the congregation merged with the Salem Mennonite Church in Butterfield. Disharmony between the two groups in the Salem congregation soon set in and in 1921 a breach occurred. The Swiss members severed their connection with Salem church, reorganized, and in 1922 erected a new building in Butterfield, known as the Mennonite Church of Butterfield (q.v.). J.J.F.

Menno Stone, the monument to Menno Simons erected on the supposed location of the house where Menno Simons is supposed to have spent the last years of his life, was erected by the Mennonite congregation of Hamburg in 1902 near the village of Fresenburg, about half way between Hamburg and Lübeck in North Germany. It is a simple shaft of granite bearing a bronze plate with a supposed picture of Menno Simons. It was dedicated on Aug. 26, 1906. Sometime after World War II, the bronze plate was stolen from the monument. With the aid of students of the University of Kiel, who wanted to express gratitude for the MCC student feeding program there in 1948 ff., the Hamburg congregation moved the monument the short distance from the field where it stood to the road near the Menno Linden (q.v.). NEFF, H.S.B.

H. van der Smissen, Mennostein und Mennolinde zu Fresenburg (Hamburg, 1922); ML III, 112.

Menno Township, Mifflin Co., Pa., was named after Menno Simons by action of the court in 1837 because of the large number of Mennonite settlers in that vicinity. The township is 6½ miles long, extends from the summit of Jack's Mountain to the summit of Stone Mountain, and is bordered by Huntingdon County on the west and Union Township on the east. See Mifflin County. J.A.H.

Menno-Berg, the name of a wavelike elevation near Oldesloe, Schleswig-Holstein, Germany. Here was located Wüstenfelde (q.v.), the village where Menno Simons lived the last years of his life; it was completely destroyed in the Thirty Years' War. The Menno Stone (q.v., monument) placed here to mark the site was moved to the Menno Linden after World War II. (Menn. Bl., 1900, 5; ML III, 93.) NEFF.

Menno-Blatt, a 4-page (9 x 11½ in.) Mennonite periodical in the German language, issued monthly for the Fernheim settlement of Paraguay since 1930; its editor and publisher until 1955 was Nikolai Siemens. He was succeeded in 1956 by Peter Klassen. The first issue was December 1930, preceded by a 2-page Flugblatt in October 1930. The small hand press, which was a gift of the MCC, was first set up in Lichtfelde (q.v.) in the home of the typesetter Peter Rahn, and later in the home of the editor in Friedensruh, until it was placed in its permanent quarters in Filadelfia. Originally a 4-page supplement, Kämpfende Jugend, was added, but later discontinued. The economic distress caused by drought and grasshoppers in 1935-37 compelled them to discontinue the youth supplement. In content the Menno-Blatt serves all the Mennonites in the Chaco as an informative journal to keep them in contact with each other and with their friends and brethren in Europe and North America. This paper is perhaps unique in the history of Mennonite colonization, in that it appeared in the first year of a new settlement in a primitive country and continued its publication even in the crises of pioneering. In 1955 it was taken over by Fernheim Colony and made an official publication. (ML III, 94.) F.K.

Mennofonds, a fund established by the Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit on Jan. 5, 1920, for the purpose of borrowing money from congregations and individuals at a low interest rate and investing it at a higher rate to obtain means for raising the salaries of the ministers. This plan, though the planned amount of one and a half million guilders was not reached, has been very successful. Klaas Dekker Jzn, a deacon of Zaandam, had suggested the plan. The treasurers of the A.D.S. have taken charge of the fund. In 1947 the total borrowed amount was redeemed. vdZ.

De Zondagsbode, Dec. 19, 1920; DJ 1921, 50-56; Verslag (report) of the A.D.S., 1946-47, p. 18.

Menno-Friendly Benefit Association, a mutual burial aid association, was organized about 1908 in the First Mennonite Church (GCM) of Philadelphia to serve General Conference Mennonites in the Philadelphia area. Its assessment rate in 1953 was 50¢ per month. It aids members in times of disability and death. H.S.B.

Mennonisten-Lexikon. The theological journal, Altes und Neues aus dem Schatz theologischer Wissenschaften (Wittenberg, 1701 ff.), an important journal of the 18th century, which changed its name a number of times, published in 1730 under the title Fortgesetzte Sammlung von alten und neuen theologischen Sachen a lengthy article, "Kleines Mennonisten-Lexikon oder Nachricht von denen Lehrern der Mennonisten." The article is a listing of the Mennonite authors and a description of their works. The compilation begins with Apostool (q.v.) and ends with Wybrandt (q.v.). First on the list are the writers of devotional literature, as catechisms, sermons, and Bible studies. Most of these works and authors had been previously discussed in Hermann Schijn's Mennonite history, which is almost in every case cited as source. Since the discussions contain no critical notes, they are of no particular value today except to show that in Lutheran circles at that time Mennonite literature merited a review in such publications.

Since in that period the Dutch Mennonites, in their position of security, were the most active writers, they are naturally considered first in this lexicon. A few errors, probably due to faulty proofreading, do not disturb too seriously, as when 1339 is given as the date of the origin of the Mennonites in Friesland, or 1661 as the date of Menno's death. In general the lexicon is well informed. The biographical notes contain several items of interest. A Dutch Mennonite linguist by the name of Anton Dahlem is mentioned, who was for a time a Mennonite preacher. Connections with Danzig are revealed by the booklet written against the Socinians by Petrus Johann Twiskerus, Disputationes de Deitate Christi contra Montanum Socinianum, which was printed in Danzig in 1650.

This lexicon was supplemented by occasional references to contemporary Mennonite publications. In 1704, under the title Unschuldige Nachrichten, appeared a short article, "Nachricht vom neuen Zustand der Mennoniten." It is mostly a report on the followers of Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan, with whom many Socinians allied themselves. It also tells of the persecution of the Mennonites of Jülich-Palatine lands, "which soon subsided through the intercession of the lord of Dyckfeld, who induced the glorious King William of Great Britain to come to their defense."

In further reviews the attitude of the publishers is unmistakably revealed. Concerning the Korte Historie der Mennoniten by Herman Schijn they cautiously mention that he protests against the designation Wiedertäufer and denies connections with the Münsterites and Müntzerites. That the publishers are not of Schijn's opinion is clearly revealed in their evaluation of the Latin edition of his book (1723): "There is so little history in this book that it should be called Apologia instead of Historia." Also in the discussion of K. van Huysen's historical treatises the protest against the alleged derivation from Münster, which was taught by every history of theology, was not taken seriously (1716). On the other hand, in the Fortgesetzte Sammlung (1720) the publishers very joyfully discuss J. Chr. Jehring's (q.v.) history of the divisions and disputes among the Mennonites and repeat Jehring's verdict: "Because of these dissensions the foundation of the Mennonites is a poor one, built up on lies."

It is evident that the publishers of the first Mennonite Lexicon, in spite of their good historical information, were enmeshed in the spirit of intolerance prevalent in the 16th century. (ML III, 95.)
H.Q.

Mennonit, Der, a 16-page 9 x 12 in. illustrated Mennonite monthly journal, was established by the Mennonite Central Committee in 1948, to serve first of all the Mennonite refugees from Russia, the Danzig area, and Poland, who were scattered widely over Germany (and Denmark), South America, and Canada, but also to serve all German-speaking Mennonites, especially in Europe. It was to serve as a bond of union and fellowship across international boundaries and also to stimulate the spiritual life of the churches, to strengthen the sense of the historic Mennonite heritage and to promote its modern revival and application, and to promote interest, conviction, and activity in the fields of missions, evangelism, Christian education, and Christian service.

The first editors were H. S. Bender, C. F. Klassen, and Peter Dyck, all MCC workers stationed in Europe, assisted by other MCC workers and by a widely representative editorial council from all Mennonite countries around the world. The managing editors have been H. S. Bender 1948-51, Peter J. Dyck 1951-52, C. F. Klassen with Cornelius Wall 1952-54, and Gerhard Hein 1954- . Beginning with January 1957 the Mennonit was taken over from the MCC by a publication commission composed of representatives of the German-speaking European conferences (German Vereinigung, q.v., Swiss Conference, Alsatian Conference) and the MCC. At first issued as a bimonthly, the journal became a monthly with the issue of July 1950. H.S.B.

Mennonite, the name now given to the churches which descend from the Anabaptists from the Reformation period, except those in the Netherlands, who since 1796 have been officially registered as Doopsgezinden (q.v.), and the Hutterian Brethren (q.v.). For a time the German name Taufgesinnte (q.v.), or Altevangelisch Wehrlose Taufgesinnte (q.v.) was used by certain North German and the Swiss Mennonites, who still officially carry this name though it does not appear in common usage either by the Swiss Mennonites themselves or by others in referring to them. In France, even in modern times the name Anabaptistes has had some currency as a designation for French Mennonites but is now discarded, and Täufer has had some popular currency in Switzerland and Alsace. "Mennonite" is the only name that has ever been used in Russia and in North and South America.

The term "Mennonite" has gone through three forms historically in the Dutch language—Men(n)ist, Mennonist, and Mennonit(e), the last two also in the German and English.

In America the form "Mennist" has been generally used only in the colloquial form "Menischt" in the Pennsylvania Dutch or "Meneest" (q.v.); however, C. Henry Smith reports a letter of 1643 by the French Jesuit traveler, Father Jaques, referring to "Anabaptists, here called Menists" in the Manhattan Island, N.Y., settlement. Smith also reports a later document of 1657 which refers to "Mennonists" at Gravesend, Long Island. The 1712 and 1727 English editions of the Dordrecht Confession use the term "Mennonist." The petition of 1775 to the Colonial Assembly of Pennsylvania regarding exemption from military service refers to the church as the "Society of Menonists," and Morgan Edwards, in his Materials Towards a History of the American Baptists (1770), calls them Mennonists. A study of the book titles in Bender's Two Centuries of American Mennonite Literature . . . 1727-1928, shows the first use of "Mennonite" in titles to have been in 1813, 1835, and 1837. After 1837 Mennonist practically disappears except in the Lancaster Calendar of Mennonist Meetings of 1854 and following years. The two first American Mennonite hymnals, Unpartheyisches Gesangbuch and Kleine geistliche Harfe reprinted the title page relatively unchanged in later editions, carrying the term "Mennonist" along, the former book even in the 1941 edition. The General Conference Mennonites (Oberholtzer group in Pennsylvania) used Mennonite from their beginning in 1847-48. Jacob Stauffer's Eine Chronik oder Geschicht-Buechlein of 1859 still used Mennonist.

In Holland the term "Men(n)ist" was used roughly for the first century of Mennonite history, although it occurred as late as 1670 in a Dutch edition of a book by Stephen Crisp. The first use of the term in a public document was in an edict of 1545 by Countess Anna of East Friesland, issued at Emden, in which she distinguished the followers of Menno Simons from those of David Joris and Jan van Batenburg. In his reply to Gellius Faber (1554) Menno Simons objected to the designations Mennists, Obbenites, or Dirkites, saying "We are not thus divided." The form "Mennonite" appeared in Holland as early as 1643 in a book title by Gerrit van Vryburgh, but it did not displace Mennist until near the end of the 17th century. The variant spellings Mennonyt, Mennonijt, and Mennoniet also appeared at times. Mennonist appeared in the latter part of the 17th century along with Mennonit. A book of 1686 called Lantaerne spoke of "Mennonistendom." Mennist (Mennonist, Mennonit) became a party name in Holland about the turn of the 16th to the 17th century. The strict wing of the Flemish and Frisians claimed it, while the Waterlanders and High Germans adopted the name "Doopsgezinde" (q.v.), which ultimately became the general designation when all the parties reunited about the end of the 18th century. Some, like Rippert Eenkes, the preacher of the congregation at Workum, objected (1607) to the name Mennonite, "because we do not call ourselves for Menno, but for Christ." After the division of the Lamists and Zonists in 1664, the latter preferred the name "Mennonite," while the former rejected it, using "Doopsgezinde" instead.

The usage in Germany followed that of Holland, except that Mennonit finally won out over against Taufgesinnte. Mennonist was used for a time during the 18th century. Roosen's Christliches Gemüthsgespräch (Hamburg, 1702) used it, as did the 1742 edition of Güldene Aepfel (South Germany or Basel) and von Dühren's Geschichte der Märtyrer (Königsberg, 1787). The Elbing Waldeck Catechism of 1778-97 and its later editions of 1833 and 1837 also used it. But "Mennonit" was in use in the German translations of Deknatel and others at the middle of the 18th century; and Rues, Aufrichtige Nachrichten (1743), used "Mennoniten." There is no trace of "Mennonist" after 1800 except in traditional titles reprinted.

It is a historical anomaly that the South German Mennonites, who were excommunicated by Menno Simons and who never were under his influence personally, preferred to use his name in their group identification, whereas the Dutch, who were Menno's immediate followers, finally rejected it. "Mennonite" was of course a useful protective name, referring to a well-known peaceful leader and group, and served to displace the opprobrious name Anabaptist or Wiedertäufer which suffered from its connection with the Münsterites.

Question has at times been raised as to who among the modern descendant groups or conferences is properly entitled to use the name "Mennonite" without a modifying prefix for its denominational designation. Certainly the national groups in Germany, France, and Switzerland have a historical right to the unadorned name. In Russia the original and continuing main body, from which all other groups separated (M.B., K.M.B., Kleine Gemeinde), continued with historical justice to use the simple name "Mennonite," and descendants of the group in North America are properly called Mennonite, although they have chosen for their denominational name General Conference Mennonite Church. (The Swiss and South German elements in the General Conference Church can also rightly claim the simple name "Mennonite.") In North America the original and continuing body, from which all other schismatic groups before 1874 separated (Funkite, Reformed Mennonite, Church of God in Christ, Stauffer Mennonite, Defenceless, Central Conference) before the arrival of the Russian Mennonites, with the same historic propriety uses the name Mennonite Church. In any case, the use of the unadorned name by any particular group in Europe or America does not and cannot mean that such a group is the only legitimate "Mennonite" church. All groups which bear the name Mennonite, simply or with a prefix, and thus claim to be in the line of historic descent of the Mennonite faith are equally "Mennonite"; their legitimate claim to the title might much better be tested by their adherence to the original Anabaptist-Mennonite faith. Some modern groups of Mennonite or partial Mennonite background have deliberately decided to drop the name Mennonite in favor of another (e.g., United Missionary Church, formerly Mennonite Brethren in Christ until 1953, apparently holding that the former name was a handicap in evangelism and missionary outreach). H.S.B.

(S. Muller), "De oorsprong en beteekenis der benamingen van Mennoniten en Doopsgezinden," DJ 1837, 39-50; Pieter Leendertz, "De Naam Doopschgezinden," DB 1861, 33-50; Gbl. 1886, 90; Ottius, Annales Anabaptistici (Basel, 1680) 117, 119; Chr. Hege, Ein Rückblick auf 400 Jahre mennonitischer Geschichte (Karlsruhe, 1935) 15, 28 f., 47 f.; ML III, 102.

Mennonite, The, a 16-page, 8 x 11 in. weekly, is the official English language organ of the General Conference Mennonite Church. Authorized in October 1885 by a resolution of the Eastern District, the paper was first conceived by N. B. Grubb (q.v.), a Philadelphia pastor who felt the need of an English paper for city pastoral work, and A. B. Shelly, who desired something for the younger generation that did not read German. Until 1902 it was published in Quakertown, Pa., by the Eastern District Conference, although the General Conference adopted it as its official English language paper in 1893.

N. B. Grubb, pastor of the First Mennonite Church of Philadelphia, was the first editor of this paper, which was published monthly during its Eastern District tenure. After Grubb's resignation in 1892 A. S. Shelly edited it until 1902 while at the same time serving as pastor of the Hereford Mennonite Church of Bally, Pa.

When the General Conference assumed publication of the paper in 1902, the printing was done in Berne, Ind., while H. G. Allebach, who was living in Pennsylvania, edited it until 1905. I. A. Sommer served as editor 1905-11, followed by C. H. A. van der Smissen 1912-14. Silas M. Grubb, a son of the first editor and an associate editor for five years, held this position for 21 years, 1915-36, the paper's longest editorship. He was followed by J. R. Thierstein 1937-41, Reynold Weinbrenner 1941-48, Jacob J. Enz 1948-49, and J. N. Smucker 1950- .

Beginning with Thierstein's editorship the paper was edited and printed in Kansas, the Bethel College Press, now the Mennonite Press, in North Newton, doing the printing. The printing continues to be done in Kansas, although since 1950 the paper has been edited from the editor's home, which is now in Goshen, Ind.

The Christian Exponent was absorbed by The Mennonite in 1929 and was maintained as a department until June 1930. In 1931 the Missions Quarterly, published by the Board of Foreign Missions, was also absorbed. During the depression years of 1934-35 the paper was published jointly as a biweekly with the Christian Evangel, the official organ of the Central Conference of Mennonites, William B. Weaver sharing the editorship with S. M. Grubb.

Since the beginning the paper has carried as its motto, "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." This motto from I

Cor. 3:11 is to remind readers that the church's foundation is Christ, on which Menno Simons built. The paper is devoted to the interest of the Mennonite church, and the cause of Christ in general. Its basic content consists of devotional articles, general articles of information and inspiration, news of General Conference activities, including missions and relief work, and news of General Conference congregations and schools.

In 1923 the Conference asked that a page be devoted to the interests of young people. This has continued as an important feature until the present. Editors of this section have been C. E. Krehbiel 1923-26, Austin R. Keiser 1927-29, 1930-35, Amelia Mueller 1935-36, Bernhard Bargen 1936-39, Reynold Weinbrenner 1939-45, Esko Loewen 1945-53, Leola Schultz 1953-54, Lois Duerksen 1954-55, Maynard Shelly 1955-56, Robert Schrag 1956- .

In 1948 a number of associate editors were appointed who were to serve as contributors and also as an editorial board. Meeting regularly with the editor they plan editorial policy, help to determine and define issues, and suggest ways of improving the paper.

In 1951, The Mennonite and Der Bote, the official German publication of the General Conference, began to circulate under the Every Home Plan, which allows each General Conference congregation to request a copy of either paper for each family. In return for this service congregations are encouraged to make a yearly contribution of $1.00 per subscription, though the subscription price for others is $2.50. The deficit incurred is assumed by the Boards of the General Conference Mennonite Church. The paper has a circulation of 15,000. J.N.S., M.Sh.

Mennonite Aid Association of the Indiana-Michigan (MC) Conference District was organized in 1911, as a mutual fire and storm insurance society. In 1953 it had 2,608 members with $22,222,000 of property covered. H.S.B.

Mennonite Aid Plan (German, Unterstützungsplan), a Mennonite mutual fire and storm property insurance association, was organized by authorization of the Indiana Mennonite (MC) Conference at its meeting of Oct. 13, 1882. The following statement in the Herald of Truth for Nov. 1, 1882 (p. 330), gives an authentic account of the nature and purpose of the organization: "The subject of aiding each other in case of loss by fire among the brotherhood was presented and discussed. The plan of collecting by general contributions seems of late years not to accomplish the desired results, and a necessity exists for a more systematic plan, by which, according to the admonition of the apostle, each brother may give according as the Lord has prospered him. An arrangement of this kind will also obviate the necessity of brethren identifying themselves with the general insurance companies, to which many of the brethren are opposed.

"It was suggested, in order to give this question a definite form, that an arrangement or system of collection similar to that which has now been maintained already some twenty years by the brotherhood in Canada, be entered into.

"This plan has worked well and given very good satisfaction and has now been accepted by all the churches. The plan is briefly as follows: Each church or meeting district appoints a valuator (or a committee as may be determined on) whose duty it is to get the valuation of the property of every brother or sister who may desire to enter into this plan, and make a record of the same in a book provided for the purpose. A copy of this valuation list shall be furnished by each district valuator or committee to a central man, or general secretary, who shall be chosen by the district valuators. In case of fire, the district valuator shall ascertain the amount of the loss and report the same to the central man, who levies the proportionate assessment, and each church being notified of the amount to be raised, makes the collections and sends them to the central man, who pays it over to the party sustaining the loss, and takes a receipt for it.

"The above is simply a brief sketch of the plan. In its practical workings some changes and modifications may be needful, as the committees or valuators appointed may deem most practical. But the above will give an idea of it so that every one may judge of its feasibility.

"The conference accepted the plan and gave permission to the brotherhood to enter into such an agreement."

The Aid Plan was, however, not a conference-controlled organization, but a voluntary association of property owners; membership was not restricted to the Indiana Conference, and the third report includes "districts" in Michigan, Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, and at Mountain Lake, Minn. Gradually the service of the organization spread into other states and in 1912 the headquarters office was moved to Freeman, S.D., where it has remained ever since, with the name slightly changed to "Mennonite Aid Plan of South Dakota." This was the first all-Mennonite organization. In 1911 the Indiana-Michigan (MC) Conference organized its own Mennonite Aid Association, since when only a few from the Indiana area have continued in the Aid Plan. In 1953 the Aid Plan was serving 4,000 members in 17 states, chiefly in North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Minnesota, Montana, and the remaining prairie and Rocky Mountain states, with a few in Iowa, Pennsylvania, California, and Washington, with a total property evaluation of $40,000,000. The assessment rate was 1 mill. D. J. Mendel and his son D. S. Mendel of Freeman, S.D., have been long-time secretaries of the organization. Rules and Regulations have been printed at irregular intervals, last in 1951. Minutes of the annual meeting of the association have been printed every year since 1882. H.S.B.

Mennonite Aid Plan, West Liberty, Ohio, was organized April 1, 1896, as a mutual fire and storm insurance association to serve the Mennonites (MC) of the Logan and Champaign County settlement. In 1953 it had 205 members with a property coverage of $2,323,000. H.S.B.

Mennonite Aid Plan of the Pacific Coast, a material aid fire and storm insurance association serving Mennonites of all branches in California, Idaho, Oregon, and Washington, was organized in 1922 at Reedley, Cal., its present head office. In 1953 it had 2,500 members with a property coverage of $18,000,000. H.S.B.

Mennonite Aid Societies, Association of (AMAS), was organized in July 1956 as a representative organization for counsel, promotion, education, and fellowship, for all Mennonite and Brethren in Christ mutual aid societies of North America, of which 26 have already joined. All member societies have one vote each, and elect a board of seven directors, which was initially composed of the following: Harold L. Swartzendruber (Goshen) chairman, J. Winfield Fretz (North Newton) vice-chairman, Howard Raid (Bluffton) secretary-treasurer, S. S. Wenger (Lancaster), Jacob Wedel (Moundridge), and William T. Snyder (Akron) representing the MCC. The association meets annually in March. H.S.B.

Mennonite Aid Society of Mountain Lake, Minn., a mutual burial aid society, was organized May 24, 1897, to serve Mennonites everywhere including missionaries in foreign countries. In 1953 it had 4,139 members, with an annual assessment rate of $12 per member. H.S.B.

Mennonite Aid Society of South Dakota, a mutual aid fire and storm insurance association, was organized in March 1922 in Turner Co., S.D., its office now being in Freeman, to serve all branches of Mennonites. In 1953 it served 241 members, chiefly General Conference Mennonites, with $2,000,000 of property covered. H.S.B.

Mennonite Aid Union of Kansas, an unincorporated mutual assessment association, was organized in 1906. Most of the founders were former members of the Mennonite Aid Plan of Freeman, S.D., who felt it would be more economical to organize a society for local Mennonites than to have one whose members were widely scattered. As of 1955 the society had a membership of 2,107 covering 2,464 risks for a total evaluation of $16,435,887.50. Up to 1956, the society did not insure business properties in towns and cities. Only Mennonites in good standing are admitted. This excludes members who belong to secret societies or who have been expelled from church on account of unchristian living. The headquarters as of 1956 are at North Newton, Kan. J.W.F.

Mennonite Aid Union (Ont.), the oldest Mennonite mutual fire and storm property insurance organization, was organized on April 9, 1866, by authorization of the Ontario Mennonite Conference given in September 1864. Its original constitution declared that it was an effort to return to apostolic conditions, and every brother was urged to give his portion willingly in love to cover losses. At first serving only members of the Mennonite Church (MC), in 1919 it made members of the Brethren in Christ Church eligible for participation. It serves the Ontario and Alberta-Saskatchewan areas. In 1953 it had 2,442 members, covering property valued at $25,000,000. H.S.B.

L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of the Mennonites in Ontario (n.p., 1935).

Mennonite Benefit Association, New Hamburg, Ont., was organized in 1948 to serve Mennonites of all branches, primarily in Ontario, but also elsewhere in Canada, with aid to cover losses due to hospitalization, surgery, disability, and burial. In 1953 it had 750 members, with an annual assessment of $25 per member. H.S.B.

Mennonite Bible Academy, Beatrice, Neb. A keen interest in education among the early Mennonites who came to Beatrice was first expressed by classes taught in private homes. In 1881 the first classes were taught by Helene Hamm, and later Mrs. William Penner. After Johannes K. Penner, an able minister and teacher, arrived in Beatrice in 1888, classes grew too large for his home. Recognizing the need for additional room and for instruction in the English language, the congregation built a two-room schoolhouse near "Onkel Lehrer" Penner's home three and one-half miles west of Beatrice, and one-half mile east of the First Mennonite Church, and hired an additional instructor. This school provided half-day instruction alternating between German and English. In later years the school was changed into a two-year course offering a fully accredited ninth grade plus Bible and other church-related subjects. Since students came only from the two local Mennonite churches, the attendance was small. In 1948 the accredited high-school subjects were dropped and a one-year course in Bible and other church-related subjects was offered. The school was closed for one year in 1950. When it later became clear that Nebraska state law prevented young people from being taken out of school for a year before continuing their high-school studies, the school was not reopened. The two-room, two-story frame building was dismantled in 1954 and the lumber sold at auction. Investigations were made of the possibilities of opening a parochial elementary grade school. Problems of transportation, cost, and possible attitude of non-Mennonite neighbors if children were taken out of the small country schools, and the difficulty of competing with superior facilities of the Beatrice public schools were factors to be considered before a parochial elementary grade school could be established. Public school consolidation was also a factor to be taken into consideration. J.T.F.

Mennonite Bible Mission (GCM), located at 4221 South Rockwell St., Chicago: see Grace Mennonite Church.

Mennonite Biblical Seminary, a graduate school for the training of ministers, missionaries, and other church workers, is a school of the General Conference Mennonite Church administered directly by a Board of Trustees, nine in number, elected by and responsible to the General Conference. Additional members of the Board in an advisory capacity represent the three colleges of the General Conference and the alumni of the Seminary. The present Mennonite Biblical Seminary is a continuation of former seminaries, particularly the Mennonite Seminary which operated as a department of Bluffton College 1915-21 and the Witmarsum Theological Seminary into which the former was reorganized in 1921. This latter institution operated independently of the College until 1931 when it was provisionally discontinued. The board, however, continued to meet regularly and to plan for reopening of the institution. This was accomplished in two steps; first, the reorganization of the old board into a new board elected by the General Conference and the turning over of all assets of the former board and institution, and secondly, the opening of a seminary in September 1945 at a new location in Chicago under the name of Mennonite Biblical Seminary.

The Seminary as reopened was conducted in affiliation with Bethany Biblical Seminary, an institution of the Church of the Brethren, which confers the degree. Under the affiliated program Mennonite Biblical Seminary provides a number of faculty members who join the Bethany staff in teaching combined classes of students of both schools. The first president was Abraham Warkentin, who served from 1945 until his death in 1947. S. F. Pannabecker functioned as dean beginning in 1946 and continued as president after the death of Warkentin until 1957, also teaching in the fields of missions and church history. Other full-time faculty members during the first ten-year period were Don. E. Smucker in the field of Christian social ethics, Jacob J. Enz in Old Testament, and Marvin J. Dirks in music. All of these were serving in 1954-55. A number of others have assisted part time or for short periods. Besides the teaching faculty the staff has included a librarian and a director of public relations as well as a business manager and a matron, the latter two serving on a part-time basis. The number of Mennonite students in the affiliated program has varied from 15 the first year to as high as 45, with an average of 35.

While participating in the joint work of the affiliated program Mennonite Biblical Seminary has its own faculty and student organizations and its own physical plant located in the 4600 block on Woodlawn Avenue on the south side of Chicago. Here are provided student rooms and apartments, faculty apartments, business office, quarters for guests, library, and auditorium. Mennonite interests of the institution are centered at this location. Two projects incidental to Seminary activity became significant for the church. One was the provision for housing young Mennonites in the city studying in other institutions and tying them in with the Seminary fellowship. The second was the organization of the Woodlawn Mennonite Church, the congregation of which was based largely on Seminary residents but reached out into an active Christian effort in the local community. A third activity, stimulated in part by the Seminary but actually independent of it, was the mission center established by the General Conference in the same block as that occupied by the Seminary.

At this time of writing Mennonite Biblical Seminary is completing its first decade in the Chicago location. During this period about $250,000 has been invested in property for Seminary use. The number of students who have attended totals 162 with 72 graduates as follows: Master of Theology 2, Bachelor of Divinity 53, Master of Religious Education 17. All degrees have been given by Bethany Biblical Seminary.

The most recent movement is one for an inter-Mennonite co-operative program in ministerial education, in which the Mennonite Biblical Seminary and the Goshen College Biblical Seminary, with any other interested Mennonite seminaries or groups will participate in a project called the Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminaries. This calls for the relocation of the campus of M.B.S. at the south edge of Elkhart, Ind., and the erection of a new plant there ready for occupancy by September 1958, as well as reorganization of the academic program. S.F.P.

Mennonite Board of Charitable Homes (and Missions) was organized at Marshallville, Ohio, in 1899, and merged with the Mennonite Evangelizing and Benevolent Board (q.v.) in 1906 to become the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (q.v.). The phrase "and Missions" was added to the name in 1903. This Mennonite (MC) board was organized as the result of a mistake, not in competition with the Evangelizing and Benevolent Board. It was mistakenly assumed that an organization to hold property in Ohio would need to be incorporated in Ohio, and the desire to take over the Orphans' Home founded at Orrville, Ohio, in 1896, and to establish the Old People's Home at Marshallville, Ohio, in 1899, was the occasion for the organization and incorporation. The first president was M. S. Steiner of Columbus Grove, Ohio, and one of the five directors was A. B. Kolb, president of the M.E.B. Board. The officers of the new board almost throughout its history were M. S. Steiner president, C. Z. Yoder vice-president, D. C. Amstutz secretary, and A. Burkholder treasurer. M. S. Steiner, an aggressive man of vision, was the leader. The Mennonite Yearbook and Directory was begun in 1905 by this board. In 1905 the Eastern Mission Committee was appointed "to oversee and manage any institutions in the Eastern States that may come under the supervision of the Board." The committee was J. H. Mellinger, S. S. Krabill, and S. H. Musselman, all of Lancaster County, Pa., and later leaders in the formation of the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities in 1914. In the merger of 1906, M. S. Steiner became the president of the new board. H.S.B.

Levi Hartzler, A Brief History of Mennonite Missions (Elkhart, 1955).

Mennonite Board of Education was founded in 1905 as the official educational corporation of the Mennonite Church (MC). Its first task was to receive from the Elkhart Institute Association all its assets including Goshen College (q.v.), and to operate Goshen College. In 1909, at the request of Mennonites in Kansas, it established Hesston College (q.v.), and has continued to operate both schools to date. In 1949 it took over the La Junta Mennonite School of Nursing (q.v.), which it operated until its closing in 1958. In 1950 it created the General Educational Council as an autonomous body to represent the interests of the total educational program of the church, including locally operated elementary and secondary schools and colleges as well as the schools under the Board.

The Board holds full title to all properties and assets of the schools under it, and administers all endowment and annuity funds. Earlier the Board had operated its two colleges through the Local Board for each school. In 1942 the administrative structure was changed, the local boards were discontinued, and the Executive Committee of the Board assumed direct operational control working through the presidents of the schools.

The membership of the Board from the beginning was constitutionally provided by election by the district conferences and the Mennonite General Conference, ex officio members being the presidents and business managers of the schools under the Board. Later two representatives elected by each Alumni Association were added, and several members-at-large elected by the Board. In 1957 the total membership of the Board was 39, with a term of appointment of four years. A number of men have rendered long-term and outstanding service in the work of the Board: Presidents, John Blosser 1902-17, D. A. Yoder 1929-48, and Nelson Kauffman 1948- ; others were D. D. Miller, member of the Board 1906-41, and vice-president or secretary 1906-20; J. S. Hartzler, member 1906-18, secretary or treasurer 1910-16; S. F. Coffman, member 1906-39, secretary 1929-39; Aaron Loucks, member 1906-28, vice-president 1913-18; O. O. Miller, member 1920- , financial agent and on executive committee 1925-56; J. B. Smith, member 1917-22, 1930-47, vice-president 1933-45; H. R. Schertz, member 1923-49, president 1924-29, vice-president 1929-31, treasurer 1933-44; C. F. Yake, member 1935-53, secretary 1939-49; S. C. Yoder, member 1916-40, president 1918-24. H.S.B.

Mennonite Board (Council) of Education (Schulrat), Russia, came into being in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement after the Agricultural Association (q.v.), which had been established through J. Cornies (q.v.), had lost its leadership in matters pertaining to education. The Molotschna Mennonite Schulrat, approved by the Fürsorgekomitee (q.v.) at Odessa in 1869, consisted of four, later six, members, of whom at least one was a minister. The members were nominated by the Mennonite communities (the minister by the church). The Fürsorgekomitee approved the candidates. The Chortitza Board of Education (Zentralschulrat) was also established in 1869. Similar organizations functioned in some of the larger daughter settlements.

The Schulrat inspected schools, conducted two teachers' conferences annually, examined teaching candidates, and had general supervision of education. At the teachers' conferences curricula, methods, textbooks, etc., were discussed. Lectures and teaching demonstrations were given. Minutes were kept at all meetings and the attendance was obligatory. The 60 schools of the Molotschna settlement were divided into some ten districts in each of which local teachers' conferences were held. Here local problems were presented and discussed in greater detail.

In 1871 the Fürsorgekomitee was discontinued and the Schulrat was placed under the Russian State Department of Education. Through this transfer gradually great difficulties arose, which became significant factors in causing the great emigration of 1874. Such men as Isaak Peters and Dietrich Gaeddert, leaders of the emigration movement, were also members of the Board.

Outstanding members of the Molotschna Schulrat were Philip Wiebe, A. Voth 1869-83, J. Klatt, and P. H. Heese 1884-96. Many improvements were made during this time, especially on the level of elementary education. The Bible, generally used as a reader in elementary schools, was replaced by a German reader and a Bible history. Books on church history and a German grammar were produced. All books were written by Mennonite authors and were approved by the government. Secondary schools for girls were introduced (Mädchenschule) and teachers' training courses (Lehrerseminar) were added to some of the Zentralschulen mainly through the efforts of the Board. Many educators received medals of distinction and other honors from the State Department of Education.

From 1869 to 1905 the Chortitza Schulrat was mostly in the hands of two excellent educators, Heinrich Epp (q.v.) and A. A. Neufeld (q.v.). The church elder of the Chortitza settlement was always a member of the Board, as was also the director of the Chortitza Zentralschule.

The Schulrat in general played a very significant role in raising the educational level among the Mennonites of Russia, particularly in view of the fact that it confronted almost insurmountable difficulties from the Russian government. The State Department of Education sometimes refused to appoint candidates and sought to be responsible for the inspection of the schools. Gradually the Schulrat consisted mostly of ministers who had permission to supervise and inspect religious and German instruction in the Mennonite schools. Under these conditions its influence and significance decreased, but the Mennonite Teachers' Association (q.v.) had meanwhile taken over its major functions. C.K.

D. P. Enns, "Mennonite Education in Russia," Menn. Life VI (July 1951) 28 ff.; idem, "Die mennonitischen Schulen in Russland," Menn. Jahrbuch, 1950 (Newton) 7 ff.; Peter Braun, "Eduction System of the Mennonite Colonies in South Russia," MQR III (July 1929) 175 ff.; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 645 ff.; L. Froese, Das pädagogische Kultursystem der mennonitischen Siedlungsgruppe in Russland (thesis at the University of Göttingen, privately mimeographed, 1949) 89 ff.

Mennonite Board of Guardians, an immigration aid committee of American Mennonites formed on Dec. 2, 1873, at Summerfield, Ill., to aid the Mennonites emigrating from Russia to the United States. It was created by the merger of two earlier committees, the aid committee appointed on Oct. 9, 1873, by the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite (MC) Conference and composed of John F. Funk (q.v.), Isaac Kilmer, and Bernhard Warkentin (q.v.), and a similar committee appointed on Nov. 17, 1873, by the Western District Conference (GCM), composed of Christian Krehbiel (q.v.), Daniel Baer, and Bernhard Warkentin (q.v.). The new Board of Guardians was composed of Christian Krehbiel president, David Goerz secretary, John F. Funk treasurer, Bernhard Warkentin agent, and Kilmer and Baer as members. It announced its purposes to be to negotiate with the railroads to secure the most favorable terms, to speed up the collection of gifts and loans from all the peace churches, and to solicit the co-operation of all the conferences. Funk seems to have been a moving spirit in the organization; he had already in the November number of his paper, the Herald of Truth, issued a stirring appeal for immediate action to help the immigrants on the part of all Mennonites, "whether old or new Mennonites, Reformed Mennonites, Evangelical Mennonites, Swiss Mennonites, Amish Mennonites, or by whatsoever other peculiar name they may be known." The Board contacted the prospective emigrants in Russia with direct offers of aid in the form of gifts and loans, and gave them counsel as to procedures in reaching America. It unfolded a vigorous and extensive program of aid, negotiated with railroads and steamship companies, and became in effect the director and guardian of the emigration as a whole. Its field of work naturally remained the United States, but it co-operated closely with a similar committee in Ontario led by Jacob Y. Shantz (q.v.), as well as with the Mennonite Executive Aid Committee of Eastern Pennsylvania Mennonites, organized in April 1874 with which it had hoped to arrange a merger, but failed. It had a reliable Mennonite merchant in Hamburg, Germany, Heinrich Schuett, as its agent in that important port. Considerable sums of money were raised for the immigrants, both as contributions and loans, especially to help the many poor in some of the immigrant groups, although the original intent of the Board had been only to aid in the passage money. By 1875 the Board was deeply involved in aiding in actual colonization, working in Kansas through the Kansas Central Relief Committee, organized in April 1875, of which Bernhard Warkentin was secretary. After this committee was dissolved on May 16, 1876, the Board handled its colonization aid directly with the colonists.

The chief work of the Board of Guardians was accomplished by the end of 1875; but minor activity continued for another six or seven years. The loans of the Board were serviced for many years. Records are incomplete but documents are extant of as late as 1886, signed by David Goerz, secretary, and John F. Funk, treasurer, showing that loan repayments were still being collected. The total official receipts of the Board amounted to $40,484.16, of which $23,595.49 was used to provide passage for the destitute. The officers and members of the Board apparently remained unchanged throughout its history; at least Funk and Goerz still carried their office until 1886. No record is known of its formal dissolution. Some of the account books of the Board, as kept by its treasurer, John F. Funk, are in the Mennonite Church Archives at Goshen College. The records of David Goerz, the secretary, were destroyed in the burning of the office of the Western Publishing Company at Halstead, Kan., in 1876.

H.S.B.

Kempes Schnell, "John F. Funk, 1839-1930, and the Mennonite Migration of 1873-1875," MQR XXIV (1950) 199-229; C. Henry Smith, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (Berne, 1927).

Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, Elkhart, Ind., is the general mission board of the Mennonite Church (MC), consisting of elected directors representing all district conferences eligible for affiliation with the Mennonite General Conference, two representatives each of the Mennonite Publication Board and the Mennonite Board of Education, four members elected by the General Conference, eight members at large, and officers and administrative secretaries members ex-officio. The Board meets annually in June in some major Mennonite community to review and act on the missions, relief and service, and institutional program for which it is responsible. The stated purposes of the organization are (1) to systematize and extend evangelistic work; (2) to establish and support home and foreign missions, (3) to care and provide for orphans, the aged, the needy, and the afflicted; (4) to carry on relief and service work; and (5) to receive and manage all properties and funds for the above purposes.

The MBMC stems from the Mennonite Evangelizing Committee, Elkhart, organized by the local Mennonite church in 1882 to collect and disburse funds for the purpose of defraying the expenses of ministers traveling to visit scattered members and churches. In 1892 the name was changed to the Mennonite Evangelizing Board of America (q.v.) with membership from other district conferences and in 1896 to the Mennonite Evangelizing and Benevolent Board to include charitable work in its functions. In 1899 the Mennonite Board of Charitable Homes was organized and incorporated in Wayne Co., Ohio, to operate a children's home and an old people's home. Four years later that name was changed to the Mennonite Board of Charitable Homes and Missions. A merger of these two boards was effected in 1906 and the present name of Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities selected.

Leaders responsible for the early developments of the Mennonite Evangelizing Committee included J. F. Funk, J. S. Coffman, C. K. Hostetler, A. B. Kolb, and Joseph Summers. G. L. Bender served the Mennonite Evangelizing Board of America and the Mennonite Evangelizing and Benevolent Board as both secretary and treasurer and then became the first treasurer of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities in 1906, serving in that capacity until 1921. Leaders who served the Mennonite Board of Charitable Homes and Missions and continued as leaders of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities included M. S. Steiner, president 1906-11; C. Z. Yoder, vice-president 1906-11, president 1911-20; and D. S. Yoder, fifth member on the Executive Committee 1906-18. Since 1920 four men have served as president: D. D. Miller 1920-36, J. N. Kaufman 1936-44, S. C. Yoder 1944-49, and John H. Mosemann 1949- . Three men have served as secretary of the Board since 1906: J. S. Shoemaker 1906-21, S. C. Yoder 1921-44, and J. D. Graber 1944- . Vice-presidents of the Board since 1911 included D. D. Miller 1911-16, D. G. Lapp 1916-27, Levi Mumaw 1927-35, Edwin J. Yoder 1935-48, J. B. Martin 1948- . The following treasurers have served since 1921: V. E. Reiff 1921-34, D. D. Miller 1934-39, E. C. Bender 1939-51, and H. Ernest Bennett 1951- . S. E. Allgyer was a member of the Missions Committee of the Board 1914-37, serving much of that time as field worker. Another person constantly associated with the committees of the MBMC for the first three decades was Daniel Kauffman. In 1948 the secretaryship for Relief and Service was established. Those serving in this secretaryship include Levi C. Hartzler 1949-53 and Boyd Nelson 1953- . A secretaryship for publicity and church relations was established in 1953 with Levi C. Hartzler appointed to serve. In 1955 Nelson E. Kauffman was appointed to serve as the first secretary for home missions and evangelism, on a part-time basis, and Henry Weaver, Jr., as first secretary for radio evangelism. A secretaryship for personnel was established in 1956 and Dorsa J. Mishler appointed first secretary.

Foreign Missions. The Mennonite Evangelizing and Benevolent Board began mission work in India in 1899. Further development of the foreign mission program under the MBMC follows: Central Argentina 1917; Bihar, India, 1940; Chaco, Argentina, 1943; Puerto Rico 1945; China 1948-51; Japan 1949; Belgium 1950; Sicily 1950 (administered by the Virginia Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities); Alaska 1952; England 1952; France 1953; Israel 1953; Uruguay 1954; Brazil 1954; and Cuba 1954 (administered by the Franconia Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities); Ghana, W. Africa, 1956; and Jamaica 1956 (administered by the Virginia Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities). In July 1952 the American Mennonite Mission in India was amalgamated with the India Mennonite Church to form the Mennonite Church in India, an indigenous organization served by the missionaries and funds sent from American churches through MBMC. The trend toward the indigenous church continues on most of the mission fields under the Board.

Home Missions. The MBMC encourages local congregations and district conferences to develop home missions. The Board does operate home missions when requested by local congregations or district boards and/or when the project can develop best as a church-wide mission. City missions under the MBMC with date of founding include the following: Mennonite Home Mission, Chicago, 1893; Ft. Wayne, Ind., 1903-53; Canton, Ohio, 1904; Kansas City, Kan., 1905-46; Toronto, Ont., 1907; Lima, Ohio, 1910; Peoria, Ill., 1919; Detroit, Mich., 1926; Spanish Church, Chicago, 1932; Mathis, Tex., 1936; La Junta, Col. (Spanish), 1940; Denver, Col., 1941-54; Bethel Church, Chicago, 1944; Kansas City, Mo., 1946; Ninth St., Saginaw, Mich., 1950; Cleveland, Ohio, 1951; East Side, Saginaw, 1954; Hope Rescue Mission, South Bend, Ind., 1954; Mennonite House of Friendship, Bronx, N.Y., 1956; St. Louis, Mo., 1956; Corpus Christi, Tex. (Spanish), 1956; and Defiance, Ohio (Spanish), 1957. Rural missions under the MBMC include Culp, Ark., 1935; Camp Rehoboth, St. Anne, Ill., 1953; Black Mt. Mission, Ganado, Ariz., 1954.

Charitable Institutions. In keeping with its purposes, the MBMC has continued and enlarged the institutional program begun by the Mennonite Board of Charitable Homes and Missions: West Liberty (Ohio) Orphans' Home 1896; Rittman (Ohio) Old People's Home 1901. In 1917 another children's home was established in Kansas City, Kan., and in 1950 the Mennonite Youth Village, White Pigeon, Mich., a summer camp program, was launched. Three more homes for the aged—Eureka, Ill., 1922, Froh Bros. Homestead, Sturgis, Mich., 1952, Sunset Home, Geneva, Neb., 1955—and a home for retired church workers, Rockome, Arcola, Ill., 1952, have been added to the institutions serving the aged. In 1907 a sanitarium for tuberculosis patients was established near La Junta, Col. (closed 1956); and the La Junta city hospital was taken over in 1919 forming the Mennonite Hospital and Sanitarium. Since 1915 the La Junta Mennonite School of Nursing has been affiliated with the Mennonite Hospital and Sanitarium. Recently the MBMC has contracted to operate four community hospitals: Lebanon, Ore., 1950; Greensburg, Kan., 1950; Rocky Ford, Col., 1954; Glenwood Springs, Col., 1955.

Relief and Service. Since 1926 when the Mennonite Relief Commission for War Sufferers (q.v.), founded in 1917, dissolved to become the Mennonite Relief Committee of the General Mission Board, the relief and service program has been administered through that committee. Foreign relief work, refugee aid, and mental health work are carried on through the Mennonite Central Committee, all-Mennonite relief agency. In 1944 MRC organized a voluntary service program. In 1948 a secretary for relief and service was appointed by the MBMC to serve as secretary of MRC. Since 1952 the permanent draft program has greatly increased the work of MRSC (the name of the committee was changed in the 1953 revised MBMC constitution) in the areas of service to conscientious objectors and in the voluntary service program. Six full-time administrators and four secretaries comprise the MRSC office staff.

Radio Evangelism. The Board at its 1953 annual meeting set up an administrative committee for radio evangelism and entered into an agreement with Mennonite Crusaders, Inc., Harrisonburg, Va., to make The Mennonite Hour, established in 1951, the official Mennonite (MC) broadcast. In 1955 a secretary for radio evangelism was appointed to serve as executive secretary for the radio evangelism committee. A building was purchased in Harrisonburg by the MBMC and dedicated as the radio headquarters on Jan. 11, 1956. Also in 1956, Mennonite Crusaders, Inc., dissolved and Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc., is responsible for the following broadcasts: The Mennonite Hour (English), Luz y Verdad (Spanish), Menonaito Awa (Japanese), and the Navaho Bible Hour; it also has an affiliate relationship with Heart to Heart, a women's broadcast. Programs in French, German, and Hindi are now in the planning stages. In addition radio Bible correspondence courses are being administered in English, Spanish, and Japanese.

Finances. Total contributions the first year (1882) to the Mennonite Evangelizing Committee reached $27.36. Contributions in 1892 totaled $959.31. The 1897 treasurer's report shows designated contributions for foreign missions for the first time: $153.05. Contributions during the first year of the MBMC, 1906-7, totaled $42,564.69. By 1930 annual contributions had reached $175,598.40 but dropped back to $128,672.87 in 1940. Due to the foreign relief and

CPS programs during World War II annual contributions reached $914,102.55 in 1946. They dropped back to $561,838.41 in 1950, but have been increasing gradually since. The 1954-55 figure reached $1,011,006.54. Property and cash assets of the MBMC as of March 31, 1955, were $1,950,000. L.C.H.

Mennonite Book and Tract Society (1889-1908) was founded in May 1889, near Orrville, Ohio, by a number of Mennonites "to awaken a greater interest for good literature and supply the same." The first formal business meeting was held on Oct. 10, 1892, and the last on Nov. 11, 1907. The Society published ten books and one catalog, at least thirty-three tracts, possibly many more, and Sunday-school materials: Beams of Light (1906-8), Book and Tract Messenger (q.v.), and primary (1906-) and advanced (1907-) lesson helps. The first president was J. S. Coffman, followed by J. S. Lehman, John Blosser, and D. H. Bender. Other officers were: vice-president, David Burkholder, Aaron Loucks; tract editor, J. S. Coffman, A. D. Wenger; secretary, M. S. Steiner. The official place of business of the Society was the address of the treasurer: G. L. Bender, Elkhart, Ind., 1889-98; J. A. Ressler, Scottdale, Pa., 1898-1902; John W. Weaver, Spring Grove, Pa., 1902-5 and A. D. Martin, Scottdale, 1905-8, when the Society's business was merged with the work of the Mennonite Publishing House. J.A.H.

J. A. Hostetler, "History of the Mennonite Book and Tract Society," MQR XXXI (1957), p. 105.

Mennonite Book Concern, Berne, Ind., had its beginning in 1882, when Joel Welty opened a bookstore, with his brother Dan Welty assisting him in the store. The two brothers secured S. F. Sprunger (q.v.), then commonly known in Berne as "der Sam," to make the selection of books. Two years later Sprunger became a partner in the firm, and the store went under the name of Welty and Sprunger. In 1884, when the General Conference convened in Berne, the bookstore became a church institution and has remained as such. Welty and Sprunger became the publishing agents for what later became known as the Mennonite Book Concern.

Revenue from this store was the major source of subsidy for General Conference periodicals and Sunday-school literature until 1929. Its manager also served as business manager for G.C.M. publications until 1939. Managers following Welty have been J. F. Lehman 1895-1929, Ferdinand J. Wiens 1930-36, Fred von Guten 1937-51, and Howard Culp 1951- . E.S., M.Sh.

Eva P. Sprunger, A History of the Mennonite Church in Adams County, Indiana (Berne, 1938) 205; H. P. Krehbiel, The History of the General Conference Mennonite Church of North America I and II (St. Louis, 1898, and Newton, 1938).

Mennonite Bookstore, Rosthern, Sask., was established in 1947 by the General Conference Mennonite Board of Publication to serve as its Canadian retail outlet. Managers of the store have been John R. Dyck 1947-54, Henry A. Wiens 1954-55, and David D. Reimer 1955- . M.Sh.

Mennonite Boys League, an organization for boys 9 to 14 years old of the General Conference Mennonite Church, came into existence through appointment in 1954 of a Boys Work Committee by Mennonite Men (q.v.), the Conference Laymen's organization. The members of this committee were Erwin C. Goering, Clinton Kaufman, and Menno Schrag. The League began to function in August 1955 when the first unit of some 25 boys was established in the First Mennonite Church of Newton, Kan. Other units soon followed in Pennsylvania and Indiana—with manifest interest throughout the conference. The purpose of the League is "to carry out an intensive program of wholesome activities geared to the interest of young boys; to lead boys into a saving relationship with Christ; to foster consistent Christian living, and instill the Mennonite faith as founded on the Word of God." M.Sh.

Mennonite Brethren Bible College, at 77 Kelvin Street, Winnipeg, Man., is a theological institution of the Canadian Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church. It seeks to provide an adequate preparation for young men and women who desire to serve as ministers, teachers, missionaries, choir leaders, and workers in other fields of Christian service. The educational program of the College has been determined in part by present-day educational standards, in part by the great variety of interests and needs of the young people of the church, and in part by the demands of a constantly expanding missionary and educational program of the Conference. The College has been authorized by the Board of Education to offer the following courses: (1) The Theological Degree Course (Th.B.), designed for those who wish to major in theology and practical work as ministers of the Gospel, which covers five years. (2) The Religious Education Course (B.R.E.), offered to meet the needs of those who seek preparation in the fields of Christian education, missionary service, and local church leadership, which covers four years. (3) The General Bible Course, designed especially for students who cannot secure adequate College training. (4) The Sacred Music Course, an intensive course of instruction offered to meet the advanced music standards of the present day. It seeks to prepare the students for the ministry of music in churches, schools, and communities. (5) "Liberal Arts" courses are offered in psychology, philosophy, history, English, and German.

The Mennonite Brethren Bible College was founded in response to a longfelt need within the denomination. Official expression of this need was given by the late J. A. Toews, in his report on Christian Education presented to the Canadian Conference in July 1939 at Coaldale, Alberta. Although the challenge presented by Toews found a favorable response among the Brethren, no definite steps were undertaken until 1943, when a recommendation was accepted by the Conference to found a Bible College in Canada, to be controlled and financed by the Conference, and that such a College be centrally located. The Educational Board, which was elected by the Conference, took immediate steps to open the school in Winnipeg in the fall of 1944. A. H. Unruh was elected by the Conference as the first president of the College. To relieve Unruh of administrative responsibilities, the Conference extended a call to J. B. Toews of Buhler, Kan., in the summer of 1945, to assume the responsibility as president of the College. Both Unruh and Toews deserve much credit for establishing the school on a sound academic and spiritual basis. Ben Horch has built up the music department of the school and his unique contributions in the field of church music have been greatly appreciated by the whole constituency. In 1948, when Toews accepted a call to the pastorate of the Mennonite Brethren Church of Reedley, Cal., H. H. Janzen became president of the College. Under President Janzen's able administration, the College has enjoyed steady progress. In October 1950 the College was accredited in the College Division by the Accrediting Association of Bible Institutes and Bible Colleges (U.S.A.). A change in the administration was necessitated by H. H. Janzen's resignation from the presidency in the summer of 1956 in order to accept a mission appointment in Europe. He was succeeded on Sept. 1, 1956, by J. A. Toews.

The growth of the College necessitated the erection and acquisition of new buildings. Bethany Hall, a spacious, two-story frame building, was purchased at the same time as the administration building (1944). It is used as a music hall at present (1955). Ebenezer Hall, a new structure 67 x 54 ft., with basement and two stories, was built in 1946 and serves as dormitory for married couples and for women students. McIntosh Hall and Carmen Hall were purchased in 1950 and 1951 as dormitories for the men students. A modern library building (L-shaped, 125 ft. frontage, 90 ft. north side) containing an auditorium, two classrooms, seven music rooms, and four spacious offices was completed in the summer of 1956.

After a brief history of ten years the positive and constructive influence of the College may be noticed in all parts of the far-flung Canadian constituency. To date (1955) 860 students have enrolled for longer or shorter terms of study. Among these have been foreign students from the United States, South America, Germany, Holland, Switzerland, and Japan. Of the 146 graduates (1954) a large number are engaged in teaching in public schools, Bible Schools, and Christian high schools. Others serve as pastors, home mission workers, etc., and a goodly number have gone forth to the foreign mission fields (24 by 1955). Through annual courses for ministers, for Sunday-school superintendents and teachers as well as through Bible and missionary conferences, the College has served as a unifying factor in the life of the Conference.

The Voice, official publication of the Mennonite Brethren Bible College, is published bimonthly in the interest of sound Christian teaching. Denominational principles and practices are given special emphasis.

The doctrinal position of the College is frankly conservative, holding to those distinctive principles for which evangelical Mennonites have always stood. Although its doors are open to Christian young men and women of other evangelical denominations, the College is a Mennonite institution whose primary concern it is to serve the needs of the Mennonite Brethren churches and the larger Mennonite brotherhood. Jo.A.T.

Mennonite Brethren Church. The Mennonite Brethren Church, which constitutes an integral part of the general body of Mennonites, had its beginning among the Mennonite settlements of southern Russia in 1860. Here it established itself in its doctrinal position, experienced its early growth and spread, and made some definite contribution toward Mennonite life and history. In the migration of Mennonites from Russia to North America 1874-80, there were also members of the Mennonite Brethren Church and so the church was in part transplanted to America. Here it has experienced its largest expansion and growth, and made its chief contribution toward the sum total of Mennonite life and activity. As a fruit of its foreign mission effort the Mennonite Brethren Church has become established in India, China, Belgian Congo, Africa, where through the converts that have been won, indigenous M.B. churches have sprung up. Through Mennonite immigrations from Europe into Paraguay and Brazil since 1930 the M.B. Church has also been transplanted to this continent, and through foreign mission effort converts from among the Indian tribes in Paraguay and from the nationals in Colombia have been won, resulting in the beginning of indigenous churches in these two countries. A fair historical presentation of the M.B. Church therefore calls for a treatment of (I) the M.B. Church in Russia; (II) the M.B. Church in North America; and (III) the M.B. Church in Other Countries.

I. The Mennonite Brethren Church in Russia.

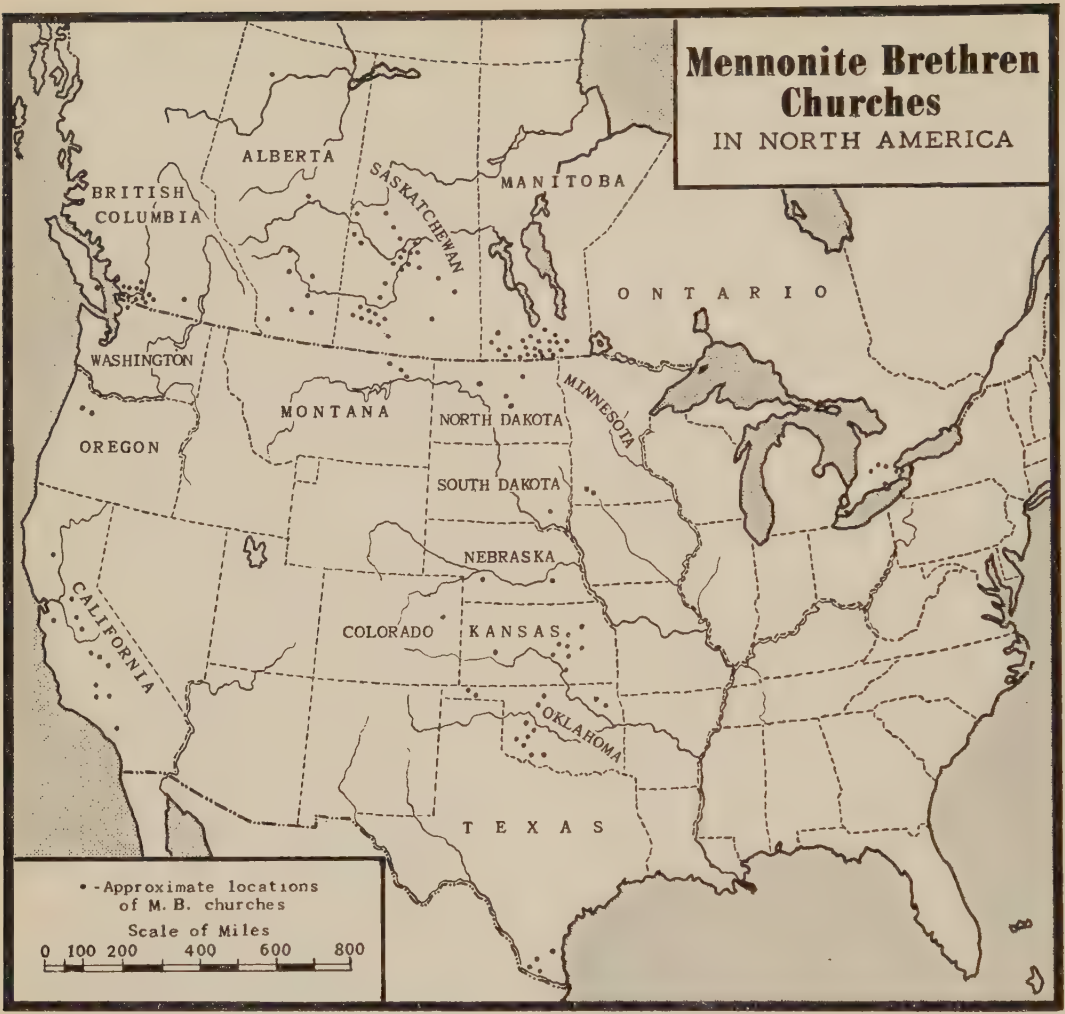
1. The Religious Awakening Which Led to the Beginning of the Mennonite Brethren Church. A settlement of Mennonites, mostly of Dutch origin, migrated from Prussia into South Russia in 1788, and settled at Chortitza, province of Ekaterinoslav. In 1803 a still larger group migrated and established the Molotschna settlement, in the province of Taurida, further south. These colonists struggled with poverty, epidemics, and other hardships during their pioneer years, but ultimately succeeded in making their settlements some of the most prosperous in the Czar's domain. They enjoyed a limited amount of self-government, exemption from military service, and freedom of religion. As there was a lack of ministers and of strong religious leaders from the beginning, the spiritual life in these settlements was low during the first half century. In culture and education there was retrogression, and the schools prior to 1850 were of an inferior quality.

Beginning with 1845 a religious awakening spread over the settlements. For this there were several contributing factors. In 1835 a new group of settlers had come from Prussia, Brenkenhoffswalde, and founded the village of Gnadenfeld, Molotschna. They had formerly come in touch with the Moravian Brethren and had received inspiration and stimulus from them. This group exerted some influence on their surroundings and were later the



Mennonite Brethren Churches
IN NORTH AMERICA
BRITISH COLUMBIA
ALBERTA
SASKATCHEWAN
MANITOBA
ONTARIO
WASHINGTON
MONTANA
NORTH DAKOTA
MINNESOTA
OREGON
SOUTH DAKOTA
NEBRASKA
CALIFORNIA
COLORADO
KANSAS
OKLAHOMA
TEXAS
• -Approximate locations of M. B. churches
Scale of Miles
0 100 200 400 600 800

center of new religious life. Another factor in the spiritual awakening had its origin in a settlement of Lutheran Pietists, who had located at Neu-Hoffnung, south of the Molotschna settlement. This church called Edward Wüst from Germany to come and be their pastor, and he served them from 1845 until his death in 1859. Wüst was a powerful personality and a very effective speaker, a man of deep emotions and of strong religious convictions. His message was definitely evangelical, stressing repentance, conversion, and a life consistent with the Christian faith.

Wüst's work had a remarkable influence on his own congregation as well as on the neighboring Mennonites, whom he occasionally also served as guest speaker. Many of them attended the annual mission festivals which Wüst instituted, and some also his regular church services. The result was that Wüst gained an entrance into the Mennonite settlements. In various places groups began to meet for prayer and for the study of the Bible. Those participating in such gatherings called themselves "Brethren." This revived religious life was not generally understood in the settlement and was at times suppressed rather than nurtured. Among those taking an opposing attitude were ministers and even church elders. Some unsound manifestations accompanied the movement in its early stages and this may partly account for the antagonistic position many took. The movement itself was, however, the most remarkable religious awakening and the most influential revival of spiritual life in the history of the Mennonites in Russia.

2. The Beginning of the Mennonite Brethren Church. As the groups of Brethren increased and became more united, they raised objections to certain practices and inconsistencies of conduct on the part of members of the church and insisted on church discipline. Since this was not carried out as they believed that it should be done, they requested that communion service be administered to them separately. This the church elders declined to do. Thereupon a group of the Brethren met in December 1859 and held a communion service among themselves. This event soon became known and caused a great turmoil in the church. Some of the Brethren were called before the church and were asked to apologize and to promise that they would refrain from this in the future. They, however, did not concede to this, but rather justified their action and claimed Scriptural ground for the step they had taken. Thereupon six members of the Gnadenfeld church were asked to withdraw from the congregation.

On Jan. 6, 1860, a number of the Brethren met in the village of Elisabeththal, Molotschna, and took steps to form a separate church. They drew up a written statement addressed to the elders of the church, in which they declared themselves an independent church and stated their reasons for taking this step. They also stated their intention to remain within the Mennonite brotherhood of the settlement. This document was signed by 18 men. This event is regarded as the beginning of the Mennonite Brethren Church, and the 18 men as constituting the first congregation. Abraham Cornelsen, Johann Claassen, and Heinrich Hübert appear to have been the leading men. Upon receiving this document the elders of the church met and forbade this organization and ordered that no separate religious meetings should be held by the Brethren. They also referred this matter to the local Mennonite council of the settlement. This council forbade the holding of any religious meetings of a private or secret nature.

Several years of acute trials for the Brethren and of strained relationships between them and the existing Mennonite Church followed. The young M.B. Church, however, grew and was able to continue. Through the prolonged efforts of Johann Claassen, in which he applied to the higher government officials in St. Petersburg, the M.B. Church at last received recognition and legal status in the Mennonite settlements. Meanwhile groups of Brethren in the older Chortitza settlement had likewise organized themselves into a church and joined in fellowship with those in the Molotschna settlement. These Brethren in Chortitza for some time met with persecution and passed through a period of severe testings.

In its position the early M.B. Church strongly stressed repentance from sin, conversion as a personal experience of faith in Christ, a life of prayer, and a conduct consistent with the teachings of the Bible. In general the M.B. Church continued to adhere to the teachings of Menno Simons, renouncing military service, abstaining from taking oath, and adhering to a simple way of life. The immersion form of baptism upon a personal confession of faith in Jesus Christ was early instituted and required for church membership. Church discipline for improper conduct of members was practiced. The ministry was elected from among the membership. On May 30, 1860, the M.B. Church assembled and elected Heinrich Hübert as elder and Jacob Becker as minister.

3. Growth and Activity of the Church. In spite of difficulties within and opposition from without, the M.B. Church continued to grow and to spread. The years 1865-72 marked a period of peace, of prosperity, and of rapid growth. The Molotschna congregation, with its center at Rückenau, was fortunate in securing a number of able and devout leaders. Among these were Jacob Jantz, Christian Schmidt, Johan Fast, and Abraham Schellenberg, and a little later David Dürksen and David Schellenberg. The Chortitza congregation, centered in the large village of Einlage, increased even more rapidly, and for a number of years was the largest M.B. congregation. Its early elders and leading men were Abraham Unger and Aaron Lepp. In 1873 Elder Heinrich Hübert moved to the new Kuban settlement, east of the Black Sea, where land had been procured for a settlement of the Mennonite Brethren. Here also a congregation developed. The M.B. Church also spread to the new settlements of Friedensfeld and Tiege-Zagradovka, to the settlements east of the Don River and at Mariupol, and still further east to the Volga River.

The several M.B. churches convened for their first general conference (Bundeskonferenz) May 14-16, 1872. The congregations from Chortitza, Molotschna, and Kuban participated. At this time the total communicant membership numbered 600. Since then a conference was held annually, until the revolution following World War I brought about conditions which made its continuation impossible. The conference was the means by which the M.B. Church remained united as one body, by which it maintained and expressed its position, and by which it directed and promoted its common activities.

A Confession of Faith was drawn up in 1873, adopted by the conference and printed in 1876. This Confession of Faith was thoroughly revised in 1900 and then adopted by the conference as well as by the separate churches. It was published at Halbstadt in 1902. Later the M.B. Church in North America adopted this Confession of Faith as its statement of belief and conduct and in 1917 had it translated into English and published.

The emigration to America in 1874-80 drew considerably from the membership of the M.B. Church, including some of its leading ministers. After this period the church again increased, and in 1885, when it celebrated its 25th anniversary, the M.B. Church in Russia had a total membership of 1,800, and 7 congregations with meetinghouse and 10 other places of worship. The ministry consisted of 4 elders and 35 other ministers.

A period of industrial and economic expansion and growth among the Mennonites of Russia marked the three decades following 1885, which was accompanied by a rapid advance in education and in cultural life. Village schools were greatly improved. Higher institutions of learning, known as "Zentralschulen," were established at various centers. The Mennonite Brethren Church did not establish its own schools or other institutions, but cooperated in this with the existing Mennonite body, thus contributing its share and reaping of the benefits.

The M.B. Church zealously undertook home mission work from the very beginning and continued this as long as possible. With the organization of the church into a conference, the conference directed and promoted this work. A number of effective evangelists and itinerating ministers (Reiseprediger) have done very useful work for the church. In 1890 the M.B. Church began a foreign mission among the Telugus of the Hyderabad State, South India, by sending the Abraham Friesens to this field as their first missionaries. In its foreign mission effort the M.B. Church co-operated with the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society and affiliated itself with this body. A total of 18 M.B. missionaries were sent from Russia to this field. The three mission stations, Nalgonda, Sooriapet, and Jangaon, were built by them, and the work in this responsive field proved to be very successful. The records, closing the year 1910, show a total of 3,000 baptized church members in the indigenous church. When World War I broke out in 1914 and the M.B. Church in Russia found it impossible to continue the mission, the American Baptist Mission took it over completely and has continued since.

In publication efforts the M.B. Church found its expression in the periodical Friedensstimme, which was published by Abraham Kroeker 1903-20, and which can be regarded as the official organ of the church.

When the M.B. Church celebrated its 50th anniversary in 1910, it had spread still further east to include congregations in Orenburg, Russian Turkestan, and Omsk, Siberia; it had advanced southward, where congregations had begun in the Crimean peninsula; it had extended to the west, where congregations had been established in Poland. The total membership at this time was 6,000. With the coming of World War I and the revolution with its period of chaos and the famine that followed, calamities and untold sufferings became the fate of the Mennonite Brethren as well as of other Mennonites in Russia. The change to an atheistic and communistic government made it difficult for evangelical churches to maintain themselves. From 1923 to 1929 many of the Mennonite Brethren migrated to Canada; others later found a new home in South America. We can hardly speak of a functioning M.B. Church in Russia since 1929.

II. The Mennonite Brethren Church in North America.

1. The Settlement of the Mennonite Brethren in North America. When the government of Russia instituted universal military service in 1870, the Mennonites, who had thus far enjoyed complete exemption from such service, were in danger of losing their privileges. The government had decreed that Mennonite settlers should be under obligation to render such service beginning with 1880. Though this order was later modified so that Mennonite young men could substitute work in the forestry department instead, many decided to emigrate to America. In 1874 this emigration to the New World set in, and in the decade which followed many Mennonites left Russia to establish their home in the United States, settling mainly in Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Dakota. No M.B. members settled in Canada at this time. They were not able to form closed settlements in America, as they had done in Russia, but they were fortunate in procuring vast stretches of fertile farm land in the Middle West, where they established themselves in large settlements. Through industry and thrift they managed to found their homes and at the same time took care of their spiritual needs. Worship services were at first held in homes and in schoolhouses, and as soon as possible they erected church buildings.

Among these immigrants were about 200 M.B. families, though most of these were not in the first groups which came. Several families settled in Harvey and Reno counties, Kan., in 1874, and others came into this community later. This group established the Ebenezer congregation, east of Buhler, the first M.B. congregation in America. A large congregation, the Ebenfeld M.B. Church, began in Marion Co., Kan., in 1875. Similar congregations had their beginning in Kansas at this time in Goessel and Lehigh, and a little later in Hillsboro and Marion. The one at Marion joined the German Baptists in 1895.

A congregation known as the Henderson M.B. Church began in York and Hamilton counties, Neb., in 1876. This grew rapidly and was for some time one of the largest M.B. churches in America. Several smaller congregations began in Nebraska, one in Boone County, which continued only a few years, and one at Jansen, which has recently discontinued. Of the Mennonite Brethren coming from the Volga settlement in Russia, congregations were established at Eldorado, Sutton, Hastings, and Culbertson, Neb. Of these only the one at Culbertson has continued to the present.

Among the Mennonites settling in Cottonwood Co., Minn., 1875-76, were several members of the M.B. Church. These began their own services and started a congregation. Through baptism of new converts and the coming of later immigrants a church of more than 100 members grew up in a few years. This church was for many years one of the largest in the M.B. constituency. It was long centered in the rural community at Bingham Lake, but has ultimately developed into the two congregations, Mountain Lake and Carson.

An M.B. congregation began in Turner Co., S.D., in 1876, which is today known as the Dolton or Silver Lake M.B. Church. Several other groups of M.B. members settled in other parts of South Dakota and began services, but these have not materialized into permanent congregations.

2. The Establishment of the Mennonite Brethren Church. In the establishment of the Mennonite Brethren Church the local congregation fulfilled a very important spiritual function. As a rule the members came from homes marked by simplicity, piety, and religious fervor, where daily worship in the family was kept up. Church services were therefore usually also well attended. The Sunday morning church service in early years consisted of hearty congregational singing, a short prayer service led by a lay brother, and two sermons by ministers. The Sunday school, which was instituted almost immediately, was for many years conducted on Sunday afternoon. Christian young people's societies began in the larger congregations in 1898. These societies have proved to be of immense value in occupying the young people and keeping them attached to the church. Church choirs began at the same time, and worship in song occupied an important place in services. The use of musical instruments in church began some time later.

The M.B. Church has held to the plurality of ministers until recently and in many places still does. In early years the presiding minister of a larger congregation held the position of elder (now discontinued) and was assisted by other ministers and by deacons. Ministers as well as deacons were elected from the ranks of the congregation by ballot and after they had proved themselves worthy of their office, were ordained. The ministry was not professional in the sense that it was trained in an institution or employed by the church for full-time service with a stipulated salary. These men usually made their living by farming, and only where need arose did the church give them some support. Their ministry, however, gave evidence of deep consecration to God, and their messages showed that they had attained a thorough knowledge of the Scriptures through constant study. They manifested a grave concern for the spiritual welfare of the individual members, and pastoral house to house visitation was much practiced by this type of ministry. In recent years many of the larger congregations have, however, selected and employed a full-time minister with a stipulated salary.

The M.B. Church in America apparently lacked strong leadership in the five years prior to 1879. In the following years, a number of outstanding men either came with later immigrating groups or emerged from the existing congregations. Among those who have had a leading part in establishing the church and who left their impress on it were Abraham Schellenberg, Cornelius Wedel, Johann Fath, and David Dyck in Kansas, J. J. Regier in Nebraska, Heinrich Voth in Minnesota, and Heinrich Adrian in South Dakota. These men stood out as the leadership of the church and of its activities for many years.

On Oct. 8-20, 1879, representative delegates from M.B. churches in Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and South Dakota met at Henderson, Neb., and organized a conference. The purpose for organizing was to build up the churches in their spiritual life, to give united expression to the position the church holds on various points, and to work unitedly in the various church activities. Such a general conference was held annually 1879-1909, and since then triennially. These conferences have been a very important factor in the upbuilding of the M.B. Church and in the furtherance of its various activities.

3. The Growth and Spread of the Mennonite Brethren Church. To show the growth and spread of the M.B. Church during its 75 years of history in North America, the time may conveniently be divided into three periods of equal length. In 1874-99 the church had not only established itself in the localities already mentioned but it also spread into new areas. Through effective home mission work on the part of the conference, a congregation materialized near Winkler, Man., in 1888. This was the first one in Canada and it grew into one of the largest in the conference. Through new settlements of Mennonite Brethren coming from the United States, several small congregations began in the region west of Rosthern, Sask., about 1895. In this area the churches of Dalmeny, Hepburn, Bruderfeld, Waldheim, Laird, Neu-Hoffnung, Aberdeen, and Borden developed. There were at this time also the beginnings of churches in North Dakota (McClusky, Munich, Harvey, and Sawyer), Colorado (Joes and Denver), Texas (Premont, Los Ebanos, and missions Grulla and Chihuahua), and Oregon (Dallas and Salem). The most noted expansion was, however, in Oklahoma, where the government opened vast tracts of land for homesteads, and many young farmers from M.B. churches in Kansas and Nebraska settled on these lands. Churches sprang up at Corn, Gotebo, Okeene, Süd-Hoffnungsfeld near Isabella, Nord-Hoffnungsfeld near Fairview, North Enid, and Medford.

Statistics for this period are meager. The earliest ones published appeared in Zionsbote for 1888 (No. 2) and are quoted by P. M. Friesen (in Brüderschaft). These give the following figures: churches and places of worship 18, total church membership 1,266, elders 7, ordained ministers and deacons 29, unordained ministers and deacons 23. Toward the close of the 19th century the membership of the M.B. Church in America was probably a little over 2,000.

During the period 1899-1924 the church continued to increase steadily in numbers and to spread into further new areas. A Mennonite settlement in Southern Saskatchewan, centered at Herbert, led to the formation of a cluster of congregations, among which the larger ones were Herbert, Main Centre, Bethania, Green Farm, Elim, and Woodrow. Through new settlements in Montana, M.B. congregations began at Lustre, Volt, Larslan, and Chinook. In Michigan two small congregations began, which later discontinued. Churches also began at Paxton, Neb., at Hooker and Boyd in western Oklahoma, and at Collinsville and Inola in eastern Oklahoma. Several further congregations also began in California, among which the principal ones are Reedley, Orland, Lodi, Shafter, Rosedale, Bakersfield, Los Angeles, and Escondido. The total membership of the M.B. Church in 1924 stood at 8,422.

The period 1924-49 shows a very rapid growth of the M.B. Church in Canada. This increase was mainly due to the immigration of many Mennonites from Russia, 1923-30. Among them a fair percentage were Mennonite Brethren. These either joined existing M.B. congregations or formed new ones where they settled. At present the M.B. Church is well represented with congregations in the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia, and in each of these provinces they are organized into provincial conferences. Through this influx from Russia the church not only gained in numbers, but also received some strong leaders, able ministers, and well-qualified teachers, who have contributed much toward the spiritual welfare and the educational advance of the church. Leading congregations in Canada are in Winnipeg, Kitchener, Vineland, Coaldale, Abbotsford, Sardis.

In the United States the M.B. Church shows a steady growth during this time, but not a noted spread into further new territory. Here its constituency is composed of three district conferences: the Central District Conference comprising the congregations in Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Montana; the Southern District Conference comprising those of Kansas, Oklahoma, Texas, and Colorado; and the Pacific District Conference comprising those of California, Oregon, and Washington.

The total membership of the M.B. Church, according to the statistics compiled by A. A. Schroeter, as of Jan. 1, 1948, was 19,169. Of these, 9,500 represent 59 local churches in the United States, and 9,579 the 83 congregations in Canada. In 1954 the the total was 24,136, with 11,930 in the United States in 65 congregations, and 12,206 in Canada in 81 congregations.

4. The Doctrinal Position and Organization of the Mennonite Brethren Church. The Mennonite Brethren Church has from the beginning held to the verbal and plenary inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, and it expects its members to conform to teachings of Scripture in faith and in conduct. The Confession of Faith as adopted in 1902 is intended to give a brief summarized statement of faith as understood to be the teaching of the Scriptures. The M.B. Church holds to the teachings and practices generally held by Mennonites. Participation in military service is forbidden. Conversion, in which the individual repents from sin and in faith accepts Jesus Christ as his personal Saviour, is regarded as essential for salvation and for membership in the church. The immersion form of baptism is required and no other form permitted. The Holy Communion service is observed and the washing of saints' feet is practiced. In the congregations of the United States an almost complete change has come from the use of the German language in worship services to that of the English, while in Canada German is mostly held to.

The General M.B. Conference has remained the channel through which the church as a whole maintained its organization, defined its position on doctrine and practice, and conducted its activities. In 1900 the Conference drew up a charter in order to incorporate itself under the state law of Kansas. In 1908 it framed a constitution to regulate its activities. This constitution was thoroughly revised in 1936 and was enlarged to cover the newer department of conference activities. According to the provisions in this constitution, the spiritual welfare of the church is supervised by the Committee of Reference and Counsel; its property and funds are taken care of by the Board of Trustees; the various phases of activity, such as foreign missions, city missions, publication, education, relief, Sunday school, and youth interests, are directed by the respective boards elected by the conference for this purpose. The General M.B. Conference has been meeting once every three years since 1909, when it elects its officers and boards and provides for the continuation of its work. The three district conferences in the United States and the Canadian conference convene annually and they confine themselves mainly to their home mission program, to care for the churches in their respective areas, and to matters of local interest. In addition there are provincial conferences in Canada which meet annually.

5. The Activities of the Mennonite Brethren Church. The M.B. Church has from its very beginning had a warm heart for missions and has to the present regarded these as its most important form of activity. The constituency has usually been liberal in its contributions for this purpose, many young people have consecrated themselves for this service.

Home missions, until 1909 conducted by the General M.B. Conference and since then by the district conferences, have been basic in the activity of the church. This work consisted in arranging and holding prolonged evangelistic meetings in the congregations and in neglected communities. Such meetings often resulted in revivals and conversions and largely account for the rapid increase of the church. Extension work among Russians in North Dakota, Saskatchewan, and later also in other parts of Canada, resulted in the formation of several Russian M.B. congregations. Work among Mexicans in Oklahoma and in Texas has resulted in conversions among these people and in the beginning of congregations. A number of other new churches and mission projects have been started, an indication that home mission work is expanding.

A city mission under the direction of the General M.B. Conference has been conducted at Minneapolis, Minn., since 1910. In 1948 the City Mission Board also began a mission among the Jews in Winnipeg, Man. A number of city missions are carried on by the several district conferences.

The M.B. Church in North America has from its early years felt a special urge to do foreign mission work. In 1884 it began to send financial support to missions with which it was acquainted and continued this for 14 years. A Foreign Missions Committee was appointed by the Conference in 1889 which was instructed to find a mission field among the North American Indians and to look for suitable workers. This plan was carried out in 1894 when a mission to the Comanche Indian tribe in southern Oklahoma was begun. A mission to the Telugus of the Hyderabad State in Southern India was established in 1899 and the Conference has since taken over mission fields in Southern China, Western China, Belgian Congo, Africa, and in Paraguay, Brazil, and Colombia, South America. In all 137 missionaries have been sent forth and supported by the M.B. Conference. Besides these many have gone out and worked in other missions. The Foreign Missions financial statement for the fiscal year ending Oct. 1, 1948, shows the total receipts to be $256,602.22; the disbursements for the same period are $255,952.91.

The M.B. Church began its publication activities in 1884, when the conference elected a committee of three to arrange for the editing and printing of a church paper. This resulted in the founding of the Zionsbote (q.v.) in 1885 with J. F. Harms as editor. At first this periodical appeared quarterly, since 1886 monthly, and since 1899 weekly. It is still the M.B. church organ and is printed mainly in the German language. J. F. Harms began an M.B. Publishing House at Medford, Okla., in 1898. The press was moved to McPherson, Kan., in 1907 where the church established a publishing house under the management of A. L. Schellenberg, who also became editor of the Zionsbote at that time. In 1912 the conference transferred its publishing interests to Hillsboro, Kan., where it erected a publishing house in 1913. P. H. Berg served as business manager 1929-48. The Christian Leader (q.v.) was published in English as a monthly paper 1936-48 and since then twice a month. In Canada the Mennonitische Rundschau (q.v.) serves as an unofficial church organ for Canada. The Konferenz-Jugendblatt (1945-) serves as the official youth organ for Canada. The Mennonite Observer (1955-) is the Canadian English paper.

The M.B. Church early realized the need of establishing its own school to provide Biblical instruction as well as general education for her young people. This sentiment was expressed at the conference in 1883. In 1884 J. F. Harms began a private school at Canada, Kan., which provided elementary instruction in German, English, and Bible. A school association (Schulverein) took over this school in 1886 and continued it at Lehigh, Kan., two years longer. A similar school was begun at Buhler, Kan., a little later with J. F. Duerksen as teacher. The M.B. Conference undertook its first project in education at McPherson in 1899, when by arrangement with the faculty and board of trustees of McPherson College it began a German Department School in the college building. This school was under the direction of J. F. Duerksen and continued until 1904. From the students of these early schools came a number of outstanding leaders, evangelists, ministers, missionaries, educators, and other workers of the M.B. Church, such as M. M. Just, J. H. Pankratz, D. F. Bergthold, F. J. Wiens, H. W. Lohrenz, H. S. Voth, and others.

In the winter of 1907-8 a school association was organized among members of the M.B. Church and members of the K.M.B. Church. This association established Tabor College at Hillsboro as a Christian college to meet the educational needs of the two churches. The school began its first term of instruction in the fall of 1908 with H. W. Lohrenz, P. C. Hiebert, and P. P. Rempel as teaching staff. These were soon joined by D. E. Harder and H. F. Toews. Tabor College continued under the direction of the association until 1933, when it was taken over by the M.B. General Conference, which has since operated the institution through its Board of Education. The college has provided training for many useful workers of the church.

Though the educational interests of the M.B. Church have largely centered in Tabor College since 1908, other institutions have likewise contributed toward the education and training of many of her young people. Among those in the United States are Corn Bible School and Academy, Corn, Okla.; Immanuel Bible School and Academy, Reedley, Cal.; Pacific Bible Institute, Fresno, Cal. In Canada M.B. churches established Bible schools at Herbert, Sask., Winkler, Man., Hepburn, Sask., and Coaldale, Alberta. In 1948 there were nine Bible schools and five church high schools serving the constituency of the Canadian M.B. Church. In 1944 the Canadian M.B. Conference established M.B. Bible College, Winnipeg, Man., for training ministers, evangelists, Bible school teachers, and missionaries. In 1955 the Mennonite Brethren Biblical Seminary was established by the Board of Education at Fresno, Cal., as the official seminary of the church. Meanwhile the Pacific Bible Institute, founded in 1943 as a two-year institute, had grown into a four-year Bible College.

The M.B. Church has carried out an extensive program of relief work for many years, under the direction of its Board of Relief and General Welfare. In its foreign relief effort and in rehabilitation this Board is affiliated with the MCC, and P. C. Hiebert served as chairman 1920-57.

During World War II many young men of the M.B. Church were drafted for service. Of these a large number agreed to do only Civilian Public Service. The M.B. Church, in collaboration with other Mennonite bodies, participated in caring for their spiritual nurture and meeting their needs in camp.

III. The Mennonite Brethren Church in Other Lands.

1. India. The Mennonite Brethren Church has been transplanted to India through foreign mission effort. The M.B. Church in Russia sent its first missionary, Abraham Friesen, to India in 1890 and a mission was begun among the Telugus in the southeastern part of the Hyderabad State. Since this work was affiliated with the American Baptist Telugu Mission, the resultant indigenous church was Baptist and with the discontinuance of the M.B. Mission from Russia, when World War I broke out in 1914, the whole work was taken over by the Baptist Mission.

The American M.B. Church sent its first missionary, N. N. Hiebert, to India in 1899 and a mission was begun among the Telugus in the southern part of the Hyderabad State, west of the field worked by the Brethren from Russia. In this field, which has from time to time been enlarged so that it now covers an area of 10,000 square miles having a population of 1,500,000, the work has greatly prospered. The conference has, since the beginning of the mission, sent 46 missionaries to this field and has eight main mission stations, where it operates the work. Evangelism has been strongly emphasized in the mission and has occupied the major part of the missionaries' time and effort. An indigenous church has sprung up, known as the "Andhra Mennonite Brethren Church," which now totals over 12,000 communicant members. This church holds to the doctrinal principles of the American M.B. Church and is similar in organization and church polity. The membership of the whole constituency is composed of 57 local churches. In each of the eight station-fields these churches are organized into a "field association." All the churches of the whole mission area are organized into a convention, which corresponds to the M.B. Conference in the homeland. This convention bears the name "Andhra Mennonite Brethren Convention," and holds its meetings annually.

2. China. The M.B. Church entered China through its missionaries. Several members of the M.B. Church labored as missionaries in the Mennonite Mission in Shantung and Honan province, China. This mission was of an inter-Mennonite constituency and the resultant indigenous church was consequently also of a similar type. In 1911 F. J. Wiens opened an M.B. mission among the Hakkas at Shanghang, Fukien Province, South China. As this work continued to prosper, the M.B. Conference took over the mission in 1919 and sent additional missionaries to this field. Though the work could be carried on only with much interruption, due to revolution in the land on account of which all the missionaries had to leave the field in 1929, a promising indigenous church came into existence, which at one time numbered over 500 members. In 1949 one missionary family was still working in this field and there was still an indigenous church which showed signs of growth. In 1945 the M.B. Conference took steps to establish a mission in the provinces Kansu and Shensi, West China. Missionaries were sent to this area and work was begun. An indigenous M.B. Church from Chinese converts was established. All missionaries were forced out of China by the Communist government by 1952.

3. Belgian Congo, Africa. In 1924 A. A. Janzen began a mission among the Negro tribes in the southwestern part of the Belgian Congo, locating the station at Kafumba, Kwango District. H. G. Bartsch began a mission at Bololo, Dengese Province, about 400 miles northeast of Kafumba, in 1933. Both of these missions began independently of the M.B. Conference. In 1943 the General M.B. Conference took over the responsibility of the two missions in Africa and sent additional missionaries to the field. The station at Bololo was shifted to Djongo Sanga, a more suitable location, and in 1949 this field was given over to a neighboring mission. In the Kwango District the work has expanded and three mission stations have been established. Besides aggressive evangelism, schools are conducted, hospital work is carried on, and the printing of Christian literature in the vernacular is done. An indigenous church from the African converts is organized, which numbers over 2,000 communicant members.

4. Paraguay, South America. Displaced Russian Mennonites emigrated to Paraguay by way of Germany, Poland, and China in 1930-32 and founded the colonies Fernheim and Friesland in the Chaco of Paraguay. Among these were members of the Mennonite Brethren Church who organized themselves as congregations and established places of worship at six centers. These have a total church membership of over 800. With the further immigration beginning 1947 the colonies Volendam and Neuland were established. Among these were likewise some Mennonite Brethren, who organized themselves into congregations. These number about 500 members.

In 1935 the Mennonites of Paraguay organized among themselves a Mission Society and began a mission to the Lengua tribe of Indians, who lived in their vicinity. Since the colonists struggled with poverty in their pioneer days, they appealed to Mennonites in other lands for the support of this mission. Contributions for this purpose soon came from the M.B. Church in North America, and in 1937 mission workers from there arrived and joined in the work. The North American M.B. Conference was approached and asked to take over the responsibility and supervision of the mission. This was done in 1946, and since then missionaries have come partly from North America and partly from Paraguay. The financial support comes mainly through the Board of Foreign Missions of the North American M.B. Church. Some of the Lengua Indians have professed faith in Christ and have been baptized. An indigenous church is in its beginning stages.

5. Brazil, South America. In 1930-32 displaced Mennonites from Russia made two settlements in southern Brazil, one near Curitiba, Parana State, and the other in the Krauel, St. Catharina State. Among these were members of the M.B. Church, who united themselves into local churches. These numbered 450 members in 1948. The M.B. churches in Brazil united into a conference in 1948. The same year this conference was admitted into the General M.B. Conference of North America as a district conference. In 1945 the North American M.B. Church took steps to begin a mission in Curitiba, Brazil, and accepted and sent there the first missionaries. This mission has materialized into an orphanage and school and is in part supported by the churches in Brazil. The Krauel Colony dissolved 1949-52, and a new colony was established at Bage, Rio Grande du Sul, almost entirely of M.B. members.

6. Colombia, South America. The North American M.B. Church began a mission in the northern part of Colombia in 1945. The field touches the Atlantic in the North and the Pacific in the southwest. Its western part is largely an elevated tableland, while the eastern part, known as the Chaco, is a vast lowland plain. The mission has established three stations and work is being done partly among the regular Colombian nationals, partly among the Negroes of the Chaco, and recently work has also begun among the Indian tribes. Several converts have received baptism and an indigenous church has begun. J.H.L.

Friesen, Brüderschaft; P. Regier Kurzgefasste Geschichte der Mennoniten Brüder-Gemeinde (Berne, 1901); J. F. Harms, Geschichte der Mennoniten Brüdergemeinde 1860-1924 (Hillsboro, n.d., ca. 1924); Glaubensbekenntnis der Vereinigten Taufgesinnten Mennonitischen Brüdergemeinde in Russland (Halbstadt, 1902); Year Books of the General Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church in North America; J. H. Lohrenz, The Mennonite Brethren Church (Hillsboro, 1950); H. J. Wiens, The Mennonite Brethren Churches of North America, An Illustrated Survey (Hillsboro, 1954); G. W. Peters, The Growth of Foreign Missions in the Mennonite Brethren Church (Hillsboro, 1952); Mrs. H. T. Esau, First Sixty Years of Mennonite Brethren Missions (Hillsboro, 1954); ML III, 102-6; A. H. Unruh, Die Geschichte der Mennoniten-Brüdergemeinde 1860-1954 (Winnipeg, 1954).

Mennonite Brethren Collegiate Institute, a church high school, was established in September 1945 in Winnipeg, Man., in a few rooms in the building of the M.B. Bible College. In 1947 it erected its own building. Up to 1956 the school had a total enrollment of 1,042 students, of whom 226 had been graduated. In 1955-56, 163 students were enrolled. In 1955-56 grades seven and eight were added. The principals have been Henry Wall, Gerhard Lehrenz, William Neufeld, A. K. Dürksen, and Victor Adrian. H.S.B.

Mennonite Brethren Home for the Aged, Inc., located in Reedley, Cal., founded in 1942, is operated and owned by the Pacific District Conference and managed by a committee, of which H. R. Martens has been the chairman since its origin. The present capacity (1954) is 48 and the personnel consists of 16. A. R. and Kathryn Jost are the house parents. (Yearbook of the Pacific District Conference of the M.B. Ch. of N.A., 1942-54.) C.K.

Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church was the name from 1883 to 1947 of a religious denomination which since the latter date has been called the United Missionary Church (q.v.). It was formed on Dec. 29, 1883, by the union of two bodies, the Evangelical United Mennonite (q.v.), and a Brethren in Christ group in Ohio, known as the Swankites, who had separated from their mother body in 1838. The Evangelical United Mennonites in turn had been formed in 1879 by a union of the Evangelical Mennonites (q.v.) of Pennsylvania (formed in 1857 from the Oberholtzer group (later General Conference Mennonites) and the United Mennonites (q.v.). The latter group had been formed in 1875 from two groups in Ontario—the Reformed Mennonites (organized in 1874) and the New Mennonites, a scattered group which had its origin about 1860. Daniel Brenneman, who had been expelled from the Indiana Conference of the Mennonite Church (MC) in 1874, had joined the Reformed group with his followers. It was this Ontario-Indiana-Ohio group which formed the backbone of the M.B.C. from the beginning and continued to form the heart and majority of the United Missionary Church. The outstanding early leaders of the M.B.C. were Elder Daniel Brenneman (1834-1919) and Elder Solomon Eby (1834-1930), Waterloo Co., Ont., who however left the group to join the Pentecostal movement in 1912.

The organized work of the M.B.C. really got under way about 1879-80. Brenneman established the conference organ, the Gospel Banner, in 1878. The earliest foreign missionary, Eusebius Hershey, went out to Liberia in 1880, with private support to be sure, but organized foreign mission work was in operation long before the United Missionary Society was established in 1920. The first camp meeting, an institution which has been a powerful spiritual influence in the group, was held at Fetter's Grove, west of Goshen, Ind., in 1880. The Reading Course for Ministers was first adopted in 1882. The first home mission was established in Grand Rapids, Mich., in 1880.

In 1883 when the M.B.C. Church was formed, the three district conferences had the following statistics: Ontario, 43 appointments (congregations and mission points) with 909 members; Pennsylvania, 14 appointments with 286 members; Indiana-Ohio-Michigan, 22 appointments with 452 members, a total of 79 appointments with 1,647 members. In 1947, when the new name (United Missionary Church) was adopted and before the schism of the Pennsylvania conference, the total membership was 13,313, with congregations in Michigan, Iowa, Nebraska, Washington, and Alberta, in addition to the original locations.

The Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church represented in its beginning a breaking forth of new life in the Mennonite brotherhood, with emphasis upon evangelism and aggressive work, conversion and Christian experience with a warm, rather emotional piety, and a stronger supervisory organization. Actually it was the invasion of a Methodistic type of piety and sanctification or holiness emphasis (entire sanctification, second work of grace) with a Methodistic church organization with district superintendents and well-organized conferences. All this was in strong contrast to the slower moving, more stolid type of piety and less organized church polity of the Mennonite Church (MC), from which the Ontario and Indiana groups had come. The sense of distance between the new and the old groups has therefore been great, and no fraternization or rapprochement has ever taken place. In fact, although the traditional Mennonite distinctive principles and practices were taken over by the new group and long maintained, such as nonresistance and nonconformity, and feetwashing, these points have gradually received less emphasis, and the decision in 1947 to change the name to drop the name "Mennonite" is an index of a substantial move away from the historic Mennonite anchorage. The name Mennonite was finally felt to be a handicap because of its associations. Daniel Brenneman, however, before he died in 1919, is reported to have stated that if he had known that the old church would change so much and so rapidly into a more progressive pattern, he would never have left it.

Since the doctrines, practices, and church polity of the M.B.C. Church are carried forward in the United Missionary Church, its lineal continuing body, a report on these points will be given in the article on the latter body. H.S.B.

J. A. Huffman, History of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (New Carlisle, Ohio, n.d., 1920); The Test of Time, Indiana Conference 75th Anniversary booklet; Doctrines and Discipline of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ, editions of 1883, 1888, 1897, 1910, and 1916, et seq.; ML III, 96.

Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church of Pennsylvania is the body which continued the denominational name after the General Conference of the M.B.C. on Nov. 3, 1947, changed its name to United Missionary Church (q.v.). The group, formerly the Pennsylvania Conference of the M.B.C., has had a continuing organized existence since 1857, when it separated from the Oberholtzer (GCM) group and called itself the Evangelical Mennonites (q.v.). Although the 1947 M.B.C. General Conference voted a paragraph of the name-changing resolution which says, "One Annual Conference, the Pennsylvania, did not concur in the necessity for the present change in the church name, and was voted full and unqualified relationship to the General Conference of the body, while it continues to use the name Mennonite Brethren in Christ," the separation was in fact complete and the Pennsylvania Conference no longer sends delegates or exercises any fraternal relations to the General Conference of the U.M.C. Thus one of the component parts of the U.M.C. body, which had merged with the United Mennonite Church (at a special conference on Nov. 6, 1879, at Upper Milford, Pa., when it had nine congregations with 175 members) to form the Evangelical United Mennonites, withdrew after 68 years of collaboration and reverted to independent status. The basic causes for the separation in 1947 were differences in polity and administration, but there was apparently also a doctrinal difference. The Pennsylvania Conference had gradually accepted a degree of Calvinist theology, particularly the doctrine of eternal security, whereas the rest of the U.M.C. continued on its original Arminian basis, with the emphasis on the "second work of grace." However, for some years the fellowship had become increasingly less close, with practically no interchange of ministers. The Pennsylvania Conference had long had its own independent foreign and home mission boards and Bible school.

At the time of the separation in 1947 the Pennsylvania Conference had 38 congregations (officially called "appointments"), each with a responsible pastor, organized into two districts with district superintendent, the Allentown and Bethlehem districts, with 2,340 and 2,177 baptized members respectively, in addition to work in six appointments under the Home Mission Society and 22 missionaries, with 88 additional members, for a total of 4,605 members. In 1955 the Conference had 4,635 members. All of the congregations are in Eastern Pennsylvania except three in New Jersey (Jersey City, Newark, and Staten Island), which have a total of 337 members.

The Conference has an extensive series of subsidiary organizations: Board of Foreign Missions (which supports M.B.C. missionaries under other boards but operates no foreign work itself), the Board of Home Missions and the Home Missionary Society, the Board of Publications and Printing, the Board of Education, which has operated the Berean Bible School in Allentown, Pa., since 1950, the Beneficiary Society, the Home and Farm at Center Valley, Pa., the Laymen's Benevolent Society, the Ministers' Retirement Fund, the Menno Youth General Committee, and several annual Camp Meetings, Sunday School Conventions, and an annual Ministerial Convention.

The conference is thoroughly organized, is aggressively evangelistic, fundamentalistic, and premillennial in doctrinal emphasis, and emphasizes a warm type of piety. It recognizes the nonresistant position, but not many of its young men take the CO position and there is no conference discipline on this point. It maintains the practice of footwashing and baptism by immersion.

The Conference has never had its own periodical organ, but beginning with March 7, 1953, it has had a four-page weekly news supplement to the Gospel Herald published by the Union Gospel Press at Cleveland, Ohio. The Conference has long had a friendly relation to this publishing house and its periodical, the publishing house having been founded by a leading minister of the Conference, W. B. Musselman. The Conference long used its Sunday-school helps. The Conference publishes a yearbook of approximately 120 pages with comprehensive reports.

Candidates for the ministry in the Conference must serve a probationary period of three years under license, must pass a three-year reading course, and serve one year successfully as pastor before being ordained. In 1953 the Conference was supporting 35 foreign missionaries, with receipts of $52,361.25. H.S.B.

Mennonite Brethren in Christ Publication Society. The Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church as a conference owned a printing establishment from 1879 on, previously owned by the United Mennonite Conference. The first office and shop were at Goshen, Ind. It published the English and German editions of the Gospel Banner, and was administered by a managing committee. The 1879 conference elected a publishing committee of six, three each from Ontario and Indiana. In 1879 a bookstore was added, which operated under the firm name of United Evangelical Mennonite Publication Society. In 1885 the name was changed to M.B.C. Publication Society to correspond with the change in conference name, and the conference printing plant was moved to Kitchener (then Berlin), Ont. Since the name of the Publication Society apparently never appeared on the masthead of the conference organ, the Gospel Banner, as publisher it must not have carried any responsibility for the paper as publisher, although the conference raised funds to support the rather precarious enterprise. Private persons or Gospel printing companies were contracted by the conference as publishers; H. S. Hallman of Kitchener filled this role for most of the twenty years 1888-1908. The statements regarding the publisher of the Gospel Banner in H. S. Bender's Two Centuries of American Mennonite Literature (1929, pp. 128 f.) are erroneous.

The name of the Publication Society appeared as publisher on the title pages of the conference disciplines published in 1880 (Goshen), in 1888 (Berlin), and in 1897 (Berlin), and also of the conference hymnal (A Choice Collection, Goshen) in 1881. H.S.B.

Mennonite Brethren Publishing House, the official publishing house of the Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America, had its inception in 1904 in Medford, Okla. Before this time the Zionsbote, the official organ of the Mennonite Brethren Conference, had been issued since 1884 with J. F. Harms as editor. Printing of this periodical had been done in Elkhart, Ind., in Canada, Kan., McPherson, Kan., and Medford, Okla., Editor Harms having resided at the latter three places.

At the 1903 conference the decision was reached to purchase a conference printing plant in Hillsboro. The churches were to raise the money for this purchase within 30 days. Sentiment in the churches, however, showed that they would rather establish a new conference publishing house; consequently J. F. Harms purchased machinery and a suitable building in Medford, where he resided at the time. Thus the Mennonite Brethren Publishing House was begun. Here the Zionsbote, Lektionsblaetter, and Golos, a periodical in the Russian language, and other publications were produced. In 1906, since Harms was unable to continue as editor and manager of the new publishing house, the conference decided to move the business to McPherson. This was done and A. L. Schellenberg became the new editor and manager.

Early in 1913 a printing establishment was purchased in Hillsboro, Kan., and the entire business was moved here. Through this purchase the Vorwaerts, a weekly paper, was acquired. In 1939 this became the Hillsboro Journal and in 1953 it was amalgamated with another local paper. In 1915 a large building was constructed to house the printing and publishing plant, and modern equipment was installed. In 1922 a complete bookstore was added. A major addition to the building was completed in 1950. Other additions and equipment have been added from time to time.

A. L. Schellenberg continued to serve as editor and manager 1907-27, with the exception of 1919-22. P. H. Berg was manager in 1930-48 and editor 1951-53. Others who have served in leading positions for shorter periods of time are J. D. Fast, A. J. Voth, and J. J. Gerbrandt. Orlando Harms has served as editor and manager since 1954.

Since 1936 English Sunday-school quarterlies and the Christian Leader, an English Conference periodical, have been produced in addition to the above-named German publications. In addition to these, many books, pamphlets, and much job work has been produced throughout the years. In 1953 and 1954 two editions of the Mennonite Brethren Church Hymnal, the first official songbook of the denomination, were produced.

The Mennonite Brethren Publishing House is the property of the Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America and is controlled by the Publication Board, part of which is elected at each triennial general conference. The size of this board has varied through the years but at present it consists of seven members who represent the various districts of the Conference. O.HA.

Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc., a subsidiary operating agency of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC) and controlled by it, was established in 1956 as successor to Mennonite Crusaders, Inc. (q.v.). Headquarters and studio are located at 1111 North Main Street, Harrisonburg, Va., where a full-time staff of seven to ten persons is at work. The officers in 1957 were Lewis Strite chairman, Daniel Suter vice-chairman, Richard Weaver secretary, Harley Rhodes treasurer, all of Harrisonburg. The mission board controls the agency by recommending and approving members of the board of directors. Broadcasts in 1956 were The Mennonite Hour, Luz y Verdad (Spanish, originating in Puerto Rico), Menonaito Awa (Japanese, originating in Japan), and Navaho Bible Hour (Arizona). The Heart to Heart program, a women's broadcast originating in Harrisonburg, is affiliated, though financed and administered independently. A European broadcast in several languages is to begin in 1957 (French, Italian, and possibly German and Russian). The mission board purchased the headquarters building in 1956. Mennonite Broadcasts is financed through voluntary contributions, largely received from the radio audience. It does not receive mission funds.

An extensive publishing program is also carried on, including the periodical publications, Mennonite Broadcasts Informer and Prayer Calendar, and booklets containing collections of radio sermons, as well as study booklets for the Bible correspondence which it conducts in English, Spanish, and Japanese.

In 1957 Mennonite Broadcasts was broadcasting over seventy stations in the United States and foreign countries. Of this number, fifty-six were in the United States, two in Canada; others were in Ceylon, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Jamaica, Liberia, Tangier, Panama, Philippines, Puerto Rico, and Viet-Nam. H.S.B.

Mennonite Brotherhood Aid Association of Bluffton, Ohio, was established in 1949 to serve General Conference Mennonites in the Bluffton-Pandora area with financial assistance (loans) on a mutual basis in establishing a modest home, getting an education, or getting a start in farming, business, or a profession. In 1954 it had 151 members with about $6,000 out on loan at 3½ per cent interest. H.S.B.

Mennonite Central Committee, the joint relief and service agency of nearly all North American Mennonites, was composed in 1957 of representatives of the following seventeen distinct Mennonite bodies or agencies (with years of adherence); viz., Mennonite (MC) 1920, General Conference Mennonite 1920, Mennonite Brethren 1920, Lancaster Conference (MC) 1920, Krimmer Mennonite Brethren 1920, Evangelical Mennonite (Defenceless) 1930, Church of God in Christ, Mennonite 1940, Brethren in Christ 1940, Conservative (Amish) Mennonite 1941, Old Order Amish Mennonite 1942, Evangelical Mennonite Brethren 1944, Nonresistant Relief Organization of Ontario 1944, Conference of Historic Peace Churches (Ontario) 1944, Mennonite Central Relief Committee of Western Canada 1944, Canadian Mennonite Relief Committee of Manitoba 1944, Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization 1944, Beachy Amish Mennonite 1956. Since conferences are entitled to one representative for each 25,000 members or fraction thereof, the first two groups have two representatives each, and since there are two members-at-large, the total MCC membership in 1957 was 20. In addition there were three associate members, United Missionary Church (Indiana Conference) since 1930, the Missionary Church Association since 1940, and the Emmanuel Mennonite Church at Meade, Kan., since 1952. At the beginning, in 1920, two additional groups were represented, the Central Conference (merged in 1947 with the GCM group) and the Pacific Branch of the Relief Committee for the Suffering Mennonites of Russia (discontinued about 1925). The MCC was incorporated at Lancaster, Pa., on Aug. 27, 1937; before this it had no constitution or bylaws, operating solely on the basis of the authorizing resolution of July 27, 1920, which date may be considered as its date of origin.

The committee, which meets annually, operates through an executive committee elected by its annual meeting, at first composed of the three officers, enlarged in 1930 to four, in 1944 to five, in 1948 to six, which meets as frequently as necessary, averaging six meetings per year. The direct administration of all MCC work is through an executive secretary, who was Levi Mumaw at Scottdale, 1920-35, and then Orie O. Miller at Akron, near Lancaster, Pa., 1935-57. Since 1935 the executive headquarters has been at Akron, where the MCC in 1957 owned six office and residential buildings and employed an average staff of fifty. In addition the following regional offices were maintained with a total staff of ten: Waterloo, Ont., Newton, Kan., Reedley, Cal., each with a clothing and food center, besides the clothing and food center at Ephrata, Pa. Foreign centers, with owned or leased buildings, were maintained at Sao Paulo, Brazil; Montevideo, Uruguay (owned); Asuncion, Paraguay (owned); Kaiserslautern, Germany (owned); Frankfurt, Germany; Amsterdam, Holland; and Basel, Switzerland. The Ailsa Craig (Ontario) Boys Home was also owned property (since 1955). Three mental hospitals were owned and operated through an incorporated agency (Mennonite Mental Health Services): Brook Lane Farm near Hagerstown, Md., Kings View Homes at Reedley, and Prairie View Mental Hospital at Newton. The MCC also still owned considerable holdings (some 200,000 acres) near the Mennonite settlements in the Paraguayan Chaco through its purchase of Corporacion Paraguaya (q.v.) in 1937. The total net dollar assets of the MCC in 1957 were $1,900,000. Long-time office members and staff workers of the MCC have been P. C. Hiebert, chairman 1920-54, chairman emeritus 1954- ; O. O. Miller, member 1921- , executive secretary 1935-57; Levi Mumaw, executive secretary 1920-35; M. H. Kratz, vice-chairman 1920-39; H. S. Bender, assistant secretary 1930- ; H. A. Fast, vice-chairman 1943- ; C. F. Klassen, executive committee member 1944-54; J. J. Thiessen, executive committee member 1948- ; Allen Yoder, executive committee member 1920-30, 1934-44; D. M. Hofer, member 1920-44; John H. Mellinger, member 1920-36; H. F. Garber, member 1936-56; J. B. Martin, member 1944- ; J. N. Byler, director of relief 1945- ; William T. Snyder, director of Mennonite Aid 1945- , executive committee member 1954- ; J. Harold Sherk, executive secretary of the Peace Section 1949- ; Delmar Stahly, director of Mental Health Services 1949- .

In 1957 the MCC had worker teams in Holland, Germany, France, Austria, Switzerland, Greece, Jordan, Indonesia, India and Nepal, South Viet-Nam, Korea, Japan, Argentina, Paraguay, Uruguay, and Brazil. The Latin America projects were all in connection with the Mennonite refugee settlements made there in 1930 and since. Discontinued fields of service were England, Egypt, Italy, Hungary, Poland, Denmark, China, Formosa, Philippines, Puerto Rico, and Mexico.

Two departments of MCC service are organized as sections with membership bodies: the Peace Section (1947), successor to the Mennonite Central Peace Committee (1939), of which H. S. Bender has been the continuous chairman, and the Mennonite Aid Section (1943), of which J. W. Fretz has been the continuous chairman. Other important departments are Mennonite Mental Health Services, Inc. (1946 first form of organization), of which H. A. Fast was chairman to 1957; the Voluntary Service Office (1946) and the I-W Services Office (1952). The latter two were merged into one department in 1955. The Mennonite Resettlement Finance, Inc., a holding agency for certain Paraguay financing, was in existence 1948-55. Menno Travel Service, Inc., was set up as a subsidiary travel agency in 1947. It maintains a main office at Akron, subsidiary offices at Goshen, Newton, and in Europe at Amsterdam.

The MCC was originally created in July 1920 to operate a joint Mennonite famine relief program in Russia, requested by the several Mennonite relief committees of North America at that time engaged in sending aid to Mennonites in Russia. The Mennonite Studienkommission of four delegates from Russia, who were at that time visiting the United States and Canada, had strongly urged such a united organization. Upon completion of the active program in Russia (1920-25) the Committee intended to disband but did not formally do so. It was reactivated by the emergency of 1929-30 when the call came to aid several thousand Mennonite refugees who had come out of Russia into Germany October to November 1929. Its second task therefore was the resettlement of many of these refugees in Paraguay in 1930, since when it has continuously aided the colonies there, especially the Fernheim, Neuland, and Volendam colonies, which it originally sponsored. The third field of service was War Sufferers Relief during and following World War II, beginning in Poland in September 1939. The total program finally included work in twelve western and central European countries, including Egypt. This program was chiefly the distribution of food and clothing, and included community services and peace testimony. At the peak of the work (summer of 1947) 317 workers were simultaneously in service in Europe. The program in Jordan for Arab refugees was begun in 1950. The work in the Far East, with programs in eight countries, was begun with war emergency relief services in Bengal, India (creation of the inter-Mission organization Mennonite Relief Committee in India, MRCI), and entrance into China in 1945. Puerto Rico work began in 1943 in connection with CPS.

In all areas where Mennonite churches were located, especially in Europe, the MCC work led to close and fruitful interaction between North American and local Mennonites. Out of this interaction came among other things a monthly publication, Der Mennonit, published by the MCC at Basel in 1948-56 and later at Frankfurt (continued by a European Board), the European Mennonite Bible School at Basel (est. 1950) under an international Mennonite board, Mennonite Voluntary Service in Europe (1950) under a European Mennonite committee, the International Mennonite Peace Committee (1947), and the Christian Education Materials Project (CEMO) at Basel (1952).

The war emergency relief needs in Europe have almost disappeared (1957), so that the continuing MCC program in Europe is greatly reduced though still continuing in certain special services and in contact with European Mennonites. The relief program in the Far East (Korea, Indonesia, and South Viet-Nam in particular) was also reduced, but not so greatly as in Europe.

In the course of its relief effort the MCC became a member of the following inter-group relief organizations sponsored by the United States State Department: American Council of Voluntary Agencies (1944), Council of Relief Agencies Licensed for Operation in Germany (Cralog, 1946), Licensed Agency for Relief in Asia (LARA, 1947), and Co-operative for American Remittances to Europe (CARE, 1945).

The fourth major field of MCC service was the operation of Civilian Public Service (q.v.) assumed in 1941. At this time the MCC also became a member of the National Service Board for Religious Objectors (NSBRO). The fifth field of service was the resettlement of Russian and Danzig Mennonite refugees after World War II, the former in Paraguay (4,849 persons in 1947-52) and the latter in Uruguay (1,184 persons 1948-52). Voluntary Service for young Mennonite in North America was begun in 1945 as the sixth field of service. The seventh field was that of Mental Health Service, begun in 1949 with the establishment of the mental hospital Brook Lane Farm at Leitersburg, Md. The eighth program was one of aid to the Old Colony Mennonites in Mexico (1950-56). The ninth and last new field was the I-W Service Program begun in 1952 with the renewal of the United States draft of conscientious objectors in that year, which had been suspended 1947-52.

In the course of its various activities the MCC has issued numerous publications—periodicals, books, and pamphlets. Some of the periodicals have been the monthly MCC Services Bulletin (1945-), the monthly I-W Mirror 1953-), and various area relief newsletters such as monthly European Relief Notes 1945-), the monthly Der Mennonit (1948-56), and the biweekly Unser Blatt (1947-50) at Gronau, Germany. Books issued have been: P. C. Hiebert and Orie O. Miller, Feeding the Hungry. Russia Famine 1919-25 (1929); Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace, A History of Mennonite Civilian Public Service (1949); Emily Brunk, Espelkamp (1951); John D. Unruh, In the Name of Christ, A History of the Mennonite Central Committee and Its Service 1920-1951 (1953); J. Winfield Fretz, Pilgrims in Paraguay, The Story of Mennonite Colonization in South America (1953); Proceedings of the Fourth Mennonite World Conference August 3-10, 1948 (1949).

The pamphlets and booklets issued have included a group of titles published by the Peace Section, another group by the Mennonite Aid Section, and the CPS "Core Course Booklets," and some individual titles. PEACE SECTION: Edward Yoder, Must Christians Fight (1943, German translation, Sollen Christen sich an der Kriegsführung beteiligen, 1949); Peace Section Handbook with Draft Manual (1942, later called Manual of Draft Information); Edward Yoder, Compromise with War (1944); Edward Yoder and Don. E. Smucker, The Christian and Conscription (1945); Howard Charles, Before You Decide (1948); Melvin Gingerich, What of Noncombatant Service (1949). MENNONITE AID SECTION: J. W. Fretz, Mennonite Colonization (1944); J. W. Fretz, Mennonite Colonization in Mexico (1945); J. W. Fretz, Christian Mutual Aid (1947); CORE COURSE BOOKLETS: Mennonites and Their Heritage. A Series of Six Studies Designed for Use in Civilian Service Camps (1942) as follows—No. 1, H. S. Bender, Mennonite Origin in Europe; No. 2, C. Henry Smith, Mennonites in America; No. 3, Edward Yoder, Our Mennonite Heritage; No. 4, Ed. G. Kaufman, Our Mission as a Church of Christ; No. 5, G. F. Hershberger, Christian Relationships to State and Community; No. 6, P. C. Hiebert, Life and Service in the Kingdom of God. OTHER TITLES: Twenty-five Years, the Story of the MCC 1920-1945; M. C. Lehman, The History and Principles of Mennonite Relief Work (1945); Esko Loewen, Editor, Mennonite Community Sourcebook (1946); Irvin B. Horst, A Ministry of Goodwill, An Account of Mennonite Relief Work Following World War II (1950). The official MCC handbook appeared first in 1943 and 1945 as Handbook of Information on the Mennonite Central Committee, then under the title Handbook of the Mennonite Central Committee in editions of 1950 and 1954.

The size of MCC operations at the heights of its program may be indicated in part by a summary of the income during the five years Dec. 1, 1947, to Nov. 30, 1952: total income $9,239,601.73; War Sufferers Relief cash $2,008,276.24; War Sufferers Material Aid $5,242,153.33; Mennonite Aid $1,472,636.39; Mental Health $207,588.92; Voluntary Service $136,303.29; Peace Section $79,305.24.

The following statements taken from the MCC Handbook (pp. 7-8, and 27-29) and prepared by Irvin Horst upon the basis of statements adopted at various times by the MCC and constituent bodies indicate the foundation of faith and commitment upon which the work of the MCC has been established and continued.

"In a very real sense the MCC is an organization which spontaneously grew out of the desire of the Mennonite brotherhood to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, and to testify by loving service to the Gospel of peace and love. This desire to respond with a witness of Christian peace and love grew in vision and compulsion as various emergencies were faced both within and without the brotherhood. Relief and peace services were an integral part of the Mennonite witness and way of life in the world. Where the various Mennonite and Brethren in Christ bodies retained their faith and ideals they were moved to remain firm in the position of nonresistance and to be energetic in showing mercy and love toward enemies as well as toward all mankind. To implement these compulsions they desired an organization to provide a channel for sharing their gifts and services 'In the Name of Christ.' "

"The experiences of relief and peace work during the past thirty-six years have indicated the wisdom of organizing a common agency to meet common emergencies and tasks, particularly when such emergencies were greater than any one group could have well performed alone. Through a common witness the various groups were able to speak as one voice against war and militarism; through a common representation the various bodies were able to reach and assist, as in no other way, the Mennonites in Russia, Holland, France, Germany, Switzerland, Brazil, Paraguay, Uruguay. What little the Mennonites of North America with their slender resources have been able to do for a suffering world was multiplied in effectiveness by co-operative administration of these resources, whether it was in Russia, France, India, China, or any of the other countries in which relief and peace services were expended.

"The Mennonite position regarding relief and service is a part of the particular Christian faith and way of life which has its background and origin in the Anabaptist movement of Reformation times. This movement, as others before and after, under the providence of God was a fresh and vital discovery of the living truth and spirit of the New Testament. The experience was so compellingly real that it sought an uncompromising fufillment of the Gospel in life; it was so powerful that it survived the most obliterating persecution, to persist down to our own times. This heritage, in so far as it still lives in the Mennonite bodies of North America, motivates and guides the service program of the Mennonite Central Committee. Its principles, if accepted and put into practice, become for us in our own time, we believe, a unique experience of fellowship with Christ in loving discipleship and service to others.

"A. The Central Position and Authority of Christ and the Bible. While recognizing the hand of God in history and the voice of the Holy Spirit in the experiences of the church and individual Christians, we accept the Bible, particularly the New Testament, as the final authority for faith and action. Relief and service have validity for us only as the motivation, spirit, and methods of work are in keeping with the Bible. We advocate voluntary and sacrificial service because it is enjoined by Christ and the apostles. We have confidence in the Bible as a guide to a realistic understanding of the place and work of the Christian in the world. While recognizing the tools of human training and learning, we believe the Bible is a reference to eternal truth which transcends all indefiniteness and obscurity of human thinking. 'If you seek God with all your heart and would not be deceived, do not depend upon men and the doctrine of men, however old, holy and excellent they may be esteemed, for one theologian is against the other, both in ancient and modern times; but build upon Christ and His Word alone, upon the sure teaching and practice of His holy apostles . . .' (Menno Simons).

"B. The Christian Life as Discipleship. The Christian life is a transformed life, separated from sin and the world and consecrated to good works in imitation of Christ. 'And he that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me. He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it' (Matth. 10:38, 39). The inner experience will result in outward expression. Christians not only hear but are also 'doers of the word.' Christian discipleship signifies the total devotion of one's life and possessions to kingdom service. We believe that discipleship includes the welfare of the brotherhood, but more especially an unlimited response and continual outreach to the needs of all mankind, both spiritual and material. 'Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Matth. 20:28). As disciples of Christ we desire to be more conscious of His leading than the number of persons helped, the total tons of clothing distributed, and whether or not our services are recognized and commended by the world. We are convinced that God leads us forth into the needs of the world at all times with all our resources, but at the same time we know that evil will continue in the world and that we dare not be frustrated or relinquish our services when at times it seems to triumph.

"C. Relief and Service, A Christian Witness. As a part of the life and outreach of the Christian brotherhood, relief and service can be a testimony to the redemptive and reconciling power of the Gospel. Because of this conviction, we are concerned about the Christian faith and character of worker personnel. We are equally concerned that the spirit and methods of service and distribution be Christian, that is, that they are spiritual, sympathetic, merciful, without discrimination and without prejudice. This concern also causes us to use Christian insignia and to speak frequently of the motto, 'In the Name of Christ.' In contrast to some other types of relief, we believe it is important that our own workers be present on the field and represented at distributions. Mennonite relief seeks to be humanitarian plus a Christian witness. Mennonite relief, however, is not mission work in the sense of organized, direct evangelistic appeal to man's spiritual need, but rather in the sense that all of the Christian's life and action is a witness to the Gospel. 'Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven' (Matth. 5:16).

"D. The Emphasis on Christian Love and Nonresistance. In common with various other Christian groups, Mennonites share the conviction that Christian love and nonresistance are applicable to all human relationships. This conviction finds its basis in the teaching and example of Christ and the apostles (Matth. 5:38-48; Rom. 12:17-21). Hate and violence, whether on the personal or national level, are the antithesis of Christ and the Gospel Relief and service are ways of affirming our good faith in the doctrine of nonresistance in that they provide positive, creative expression of peace and good will. Relief and service are not only a witness to the way of Christian love but they can become a method of overcoming evil, of reconciling an enemy. 'Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good' (Rom. 12:20, 21). Real nonresistance, however, is far more than an intellectual concept or even a doctrinal belief to be proved by Scriptural texts; it is part of a way of life which spontaneously reflects the presence of the indwelling Christ. On the relief field and in service projects love and nonresistance often lead to a special concern for despised minorities, neglected persons, prisoners, political outcasts. 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me' (Matth. 25:40).

"E. The Christian Brotherhood and Mutual Aid. The Mennonite concept of the church is that of a true brotherhood, a community of believers, as contrasted to that of an organization or institution. In the Christian brotherhood no degrees of position exist and there is mutual concern and responsibility for the spiritual and material welfare of each member. The community of believers is necessary to sustain the spiritual life and strength of the believers, to nurture the oncoming generation, to teach new disciples, and to give a corporate witness. We recognize that the brotherhood in itself has no validity except as an instrument of God toward these ends. We believe that we have a primary responsibility, when necessary, to bring relief and service to the brotherhood. 'Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ . . . . As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith (Gal. 6:2, 10)." H.S.B.

J. D. Unruh, In the Name of Christ, A History of the Mennonite Central Committee and Its Service 1920-1951 (Akron, 1952); ML III, 97-99.

Mennonite Central Committee Aid Section. The Mennonite Aid Section was established by the Mennonite Central Committee on March 17, 1944, upon recommendation of the Rehabilitation Study Committee, appointed by the MCC in 1943 to study the rehabilitation needs of CPS men who faced World War II demobilization. The demobilization needs were largely met by the individual conferences, but the Aid Section functioned to co-ordinate the various assistance plans. The largest work of the Aid Section came with the movement of the Mennonite refugees from Europe to the Western Hemisphere after World War II. The Aid Section is composed of representatives appointed by the various Mennonite groups. The Sectional meetings are advisory to the MCC on matters coming under the Aid Section purview, for the most part in the following areas: (1) To assist Mennonite refugees to countries of their choice where they may settle and earn a livelihood; countries of destination for this assistance have been Canada, Paraguay, Uruguay, and Argentina. (2) To assist in economic and community development after arrival in the country of resettlement. (3) Operation of a vocational trainee program which provides opportunity for foreign young men and women to live in American Mennonite homes for one year while receiving practical training in their field of interest. (4) To assist the Council of Mennonite and Affiliated Colleges in the processing of students from areas abroad where MCC relief workers are stationed. W.T.S.

Mennonite Central Relief Committee of Western Canada. With the outbreak of World War II in 1939, the Mennonites of Western Canada began the organization of provincial relief committees. In January 1940 meetings were held in Altona, Man., Coaldale, Alberta, and Yarrow, B.C. These meetings appointed provincial committees, each of which delegated two representatives to a meeting on March 15, 1940, in Winnipeg, Man., which in turn formed a central executive committee known as the Mennonite Central Relief Committee. Officers from the beginning have been continuously B. B. Janz, chairman, J. J. Thiessen vice-chairman, C. A. DeFehr treasurer. Up to about 1954 all the committee funds were sent to the Mennonite Central Committee. Since then most of the contributions have been sent directly to committee-supported projects in Paraguay. The committee appoints a regular member to the MCC. H.S.B.

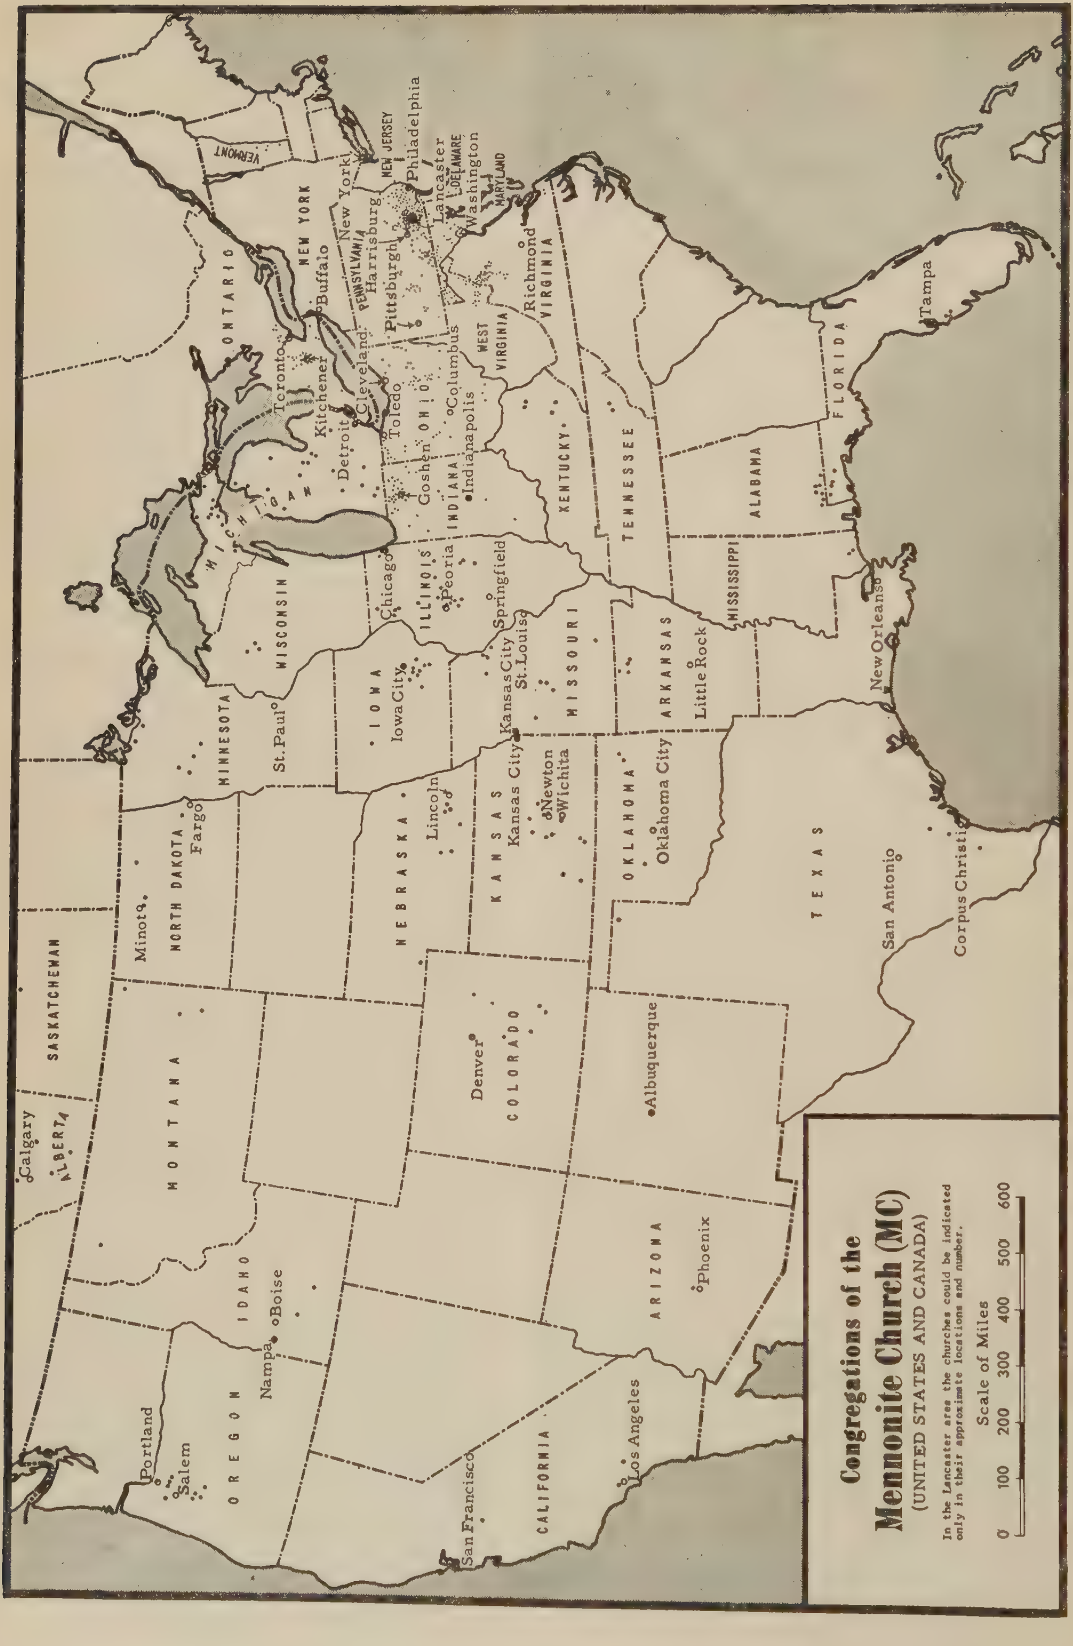
Mennonite Charité (GCM), a private charitable corporation, was organized and incorporated in 1908 by the First Mennonite Church of Halstead, Garden Township Mennonite Church, First Mennonite Church of Christian, and some citizens of Kansas to maintain charitable institutions such as a Christian hospital, a home for the aged, and orphanages, and to employ physicians and nurses. The place of business was Halstead and some of the first directors of the organization were Christian Krehbiel, Arthur E. Hertzler, John C. Goering, and C. E. Krehbiel. The Charité reported regularly to the Western District Conference. Primary purpose of the organization was to help the Halstead Hospital in its financial crises. In 1931 the Mennonite Charité was dissolved and its funds, consisting of $6,000, were turned over to the church building fund of the Western District Conference (GCM). At that time P. P. Wedel functioned as president and C. E. Krehbiel as secretary. C.K.

Charter and By-laws of Mennonite Charité (Halstead, 1908); Minutes of the Mennonite Charité 1909-1931. Original and printed minutes in the BeCL.

Mennonite Children's Home, 1620 S. 37th St., Kansas City, Kan., was established in 1917 in response to the many requests for child care that came to the workers in the Mennonite Gospel Mission (q.v.) here. J. D. Mininger, the mission superintendent, was one of the initiators of this venture in child welfare. The Home is owned and operated by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, Elkhart, Ind., which delegates the actual administration to the local Board of Directors.

The Home is licensed by the state of Kansas to care for 46 children. The building was planned and arranged to care for these children in five groups: six preschool children, ten younger schoolboys, ten older schoolboys, ten younger schoolgirls, and ten older schoolgirls. The children range in age from two to twelve years. The Home is also licensed to place children in foster and adoptive homes. Over 1200 children have either been placed in homes or been given temporary care in the Children's Home since 1917. The present (1956) superintendent is Glen Yoder. G.Y.

Mennonite (MC) Children's Home, located on the east edge of Millersville, Pa., was opened on March 22, 1911, with Levi and Lydia Sauder in charge. In the first year 56 children were accepted. The beautiful 62 x 50 ft. brick building and a similar building near by for the steward and nurses were built on the farm of Abram B. Eshleman, Millersville-Rohrerstown deacon. The chairman of its Board of Directors has included John H. Mellinger, 20 years; Simon H. Heistand, 20 years; and John M. Hertzler at present (1955). Levi Sauder (1878-1940) was superintendent until his death. Gideon Eberly followed in 1941-51, John M. Hertzler five months, Isaac L. Frederick two years, and Chester Steffy



Congregations of the Mennonite Church (MC)

(UNITED STATES AND CANADA)

In the Lancaster area the churches could be indicated only in their approximate locations and number.

Scale of Miles
0 100 200 300 400 500 600
ONTARIO
SASKATCHEWAN
ALBERTA
Calgary
VERMONT
NEW YORK
NEW JERSEY
PENNSYLVANIA
DELAWARE
MARYLAND
WEST VIRGINIA
VIRGINIA
OHIO
MICHIGAN
INDIANA
ILLINOIS
WISCONSIN
MINNESOTA
IOWA
MISSOURI
KENTUCKY TENNESSEE
ALABAMA
MISSISSIPPI
FLORIDA ARKANSAS
OKLAHOMA
KANSAS
NEBRASKA
NORTH DAKOTA
MONTANA
IDAHO
OREGON
CALIFORNIA
ARIZONA
COLORADO
TEXAS
New York
Philadelphia
Lancaster
Washington
Harrisburg
Pittsburgh
Buffalo
Richmond
Toronto
Kitchener
Cleveland
Toledo
Detroit
Columbus
Goshen
Indianapolis
Chicago
Peoria
Springfield
St. Louis
Kansas City
Iowa City
St. Paul
Fargo
Minot
Lincoln
Kansas City
Newton
Wichita
Oklahoma City
Little Rock
New Orleans
Tampa
San Antonio
Corpus Christi
Albuquerque
Denver
Phoenix
Boise
Nampa
Portland
Salem
San Francisco
Los Angeles

since Dec. 27, 1953. The superintendent also has charge of the orchard-truck farm. The Christian day school was opened for the children of the Home in 1940 and is operated by the Home. To date 1,220 children have entered the Home. The number of children "in ward" (1955) is nineteen.
I.D.L.

Mennonite Church, sometimes familiarly called the "old" Mennonite Church in contradistinction to certain schismatic "new" Mennonite groups formed from it, such as the Reformed Mennonites (q.v., founded in 1812 in Lancaster County, Pa.), the Eastern District of the General Conference Mennonite Church (q.v., founded in 1847 in the Franconia area in Bucks and Montgomery counties, Pa.), and the Indiana and Ontario districts of the United Missionary Church (q.v., formerly called Mennonite Brethren in Christ, q.v., founded in 1875). It is the oldest (1683 ff.) and largest (77,369 baptized members in 1956) Mennonite body in North America. The total membership in 1956 was 81,472, distributed by countries as follows: United States 70,513, Canada 6,856, foreign mission areas 4,103 (India 1,613, East Africa 1,212, Japan 86, Argentina 655, Puerto Rico 335, Sicily 73, Belgium 28, Ghana 26, Honduras 28, Cuba 13, Jamaica 30). In 1956 it was composed of 20 district conferences—three in Canada, fifteen in the United States including Puerto Rico, and three abroad formed from missions, viz., India, Japan, and Argentina, besides two dependent mission conferences, viz., East Africa and Bihar in India. The conferences with date of organization and membership in 1956 are as follows in chronological order: Franconia 1725, 5,404; Lancaster 1775, 15, 046; Washington County, Md., and Franklin County, Pa. 1790, 1,673; Ontario 1820, 3,895; Virginia 1835, 4,621; Ohio and Eastern 1840, 11,269; Indiana and Michigan 1853, 8,649; Illinois 1872, 3,293; Allegheny 1876, 2,590; Iowa and Nebraska 1876, 4,336; South Central 1876, 3,407; Alberta and Saskatchewan 1904, 797; Pacific Coast 1906, 2,186; Conservative Mennonite 1910, 5,585; North Central 1920, 766; Ontario Amish Mennonite 1918 (1924), 2,450; South Pacific 1948, 436; Puerto Rico 1955, 339; India 1912, 1,501; Argentina 1923, 655. (For further information about the district conferences, see the pertinent articles.)

The Mennonite General Conference (q.v.), which was organized in 1898 and meets biennially, is an advisory body of considerable importance, but the authority of the church resides in the district conferences, not all of which are officially represented in the General Conference sessions. In 1957 the following conferences participated in the general work and fellowship of the church, but without official delegates in the General Conference: Conservative, Franconia, Lancaster, Ontario Amish, and Washington-Franklin. All of these but the last, however, had official representatives in the General Council of the General Conference. The Mennonite Church thus existed prior to its General Conference and exists apart from it today. The mark of "belonging" to the general body of the church is intercommunion and pulpit fellowship.

The Mennonite Church historically has two ecclesiastical backgrounds, but only one ethnic. Ethnically the body of the membership is Swiss-South German in origin, except for the small number of families from the Lower Rhine area and Hamburg-Altona who settled in Germantown in 1683-1707. Only scattered individual families of Dutch, Prussian, or Russian background are to be found in its membership today, and no entire congregations of such persons, or of Lower Rhine background. Only one congregation today is exclusively of Swiss background, viz., Kidron, Ohio. The one Dutch congregation at New Paris, Ind., founded in 1853, has died out.

Ecclesiastically the group has two constituent backgrounds, viz., Mennonite and Amish Mennonite. The following conferences are exclusively (with minor exceptions) Mennonite: Franconia, Lancaster, Virginia, Washington-Franklin, and Ontario. Exclusively Amish are the Conservative and Ontario Amish Mennonite conferences. The rest are of mixed background, resulting largely from mergers in 1916-25. The sense of Amish background has practically vanished in all but the Conservative and Ontario Amish conferences. The differences have largely disappeared, although locally some echoes of earlier differing traditions still remain. The European geographic backgrounds of the Mennonite and Amish elements, however, were rather distinct. The Mennonite element all came originally from the Palatinate in 1707-56 or Switzerland 1710-56, whereas the Amish came either from Switzerland and the Palatinate (a small number) in 1730-56 or from Alsace-Lorraine, Zweibrücken, Bavaria, and Hesse-Cassel 1815-60, with stragglers down to 1900. The relative proportion of Mennonite and Amish background elements in the sixteen North American conferences is about 70 per cent to 30 per cent. Omitting the two entirely Amish conferences, the ratio of the rest of the church is 75 to 25, with some 22,000 members of Amish background.

The only Mennonite (i.e., non-Amish) settlements made directly from Europe (except the Swiss settlement in Wayne County, Ohio, 1817-30) were those in the Franconia and Lancaster districts; all other Mennonite settlements or congregations further west are derivative from these. Most Amish settlements were founded directly from Europe, but all Amish settlements west of Ohio except Illinois are derivative.

Organizationally the work of the Mennonite Church at large is carried on by three major churchwide boards—the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (organized in final form in 1906), which carries on foreign and home missions, charitable homes, and relief and service work, the Mennonite Board of Education (organized in 1905), which operates Goshen and Hesston colleges, the La Junta School of Nursing, and the Mennonite Publication Board (organized in 1908), which works through the Mennonite Publishing House. All these boards are autonomous and self-perpetuating, but are anchored basically in the district conferences by a membership elected directly by them. All the district conferences also have their own mission boards, largely for home missions; the Lancaster, Franconia, and Virginia conference boards, however, also have foreign missions, the former operating an extensive program in Africa. Some of the district conferences also operate institutions such as schools (e.g., Indiana-Michigan has Bethany Christian High School, Ontario has Rockway School, Virginia has Eastern Mennonite College), or homes for the aged (e.g., Ontario has Fairview), and sponsor mutual aid organizations. In most district conferences the mission boards publish periodicals promoting the work of the conference in missions, evangelism, and service. On the other hand, the General Conference, although it does not operate any institutions either directly or indirectly, does carry on a certain amount of promotional and advisory activity and certain administrative assignments through its standing committees such as the Commission for Christian Education, Peace Problems Committee, Ministerial Committee, Music Committee, etc. In matters of finance there is no church-wide budget, except a budget for the specific general conference activities. Funds for the church-wide boards, district boards, and local institutions are secured by offerings or solicitation, locally or generally as the case may be.

In church polity the Mennonite Church uses traditionally elements of several types of polity, but basically it has a synodal polity with the district conferences having general authority over the congregations. Reserved to the congregations are all local matters, including selection of ministers and ownership of church buildings. Matters of doctrine and practice, including discipline, are the prerogative of the district conferences, which have the power to discipline ministers and congregations. The traditional triple congregational ministry of bishop, preacher, and deacon still prevails in most district conferences, although there is a significant trend away from the office of bishop. For example, two district conferences, South Central, and Ohio and Eastern, have recently suspended bishop ordinations, and are using the idea of district superintendent in some form. In the other conferences, bishop districts (dioceses) of from two to ten congregations or mission stations are the rule, although in areas with Amish background the general pattern is a bishop in each major congregation. In the Lancaster Conference the bishops as a body constitute a sort of upper house in the conference, and are called a "bishop board," which exercises considerable power. In the other conferences all ordained men have equal voice in conference work, regardless of office. The office of deacon is declining in some areas.

The Mennonite Church has suffered a number of schisms. Interestingly, none was due to a major issue in doctrine, all being due primarily to differences over progressive and conservative attitudes in church work or strictness in discipline, or to miscellaneous and personal difficulties. These schisms are all described under the pertinent articles: Funkites in Franconia 1778, Reformed Mennonite or Herrites in Lancaster 1812, Stauffer in Lancaster 1845, Eastern District General Conference Mennonite or Oberholtzer division in Franconia 1847, Church of God in Christ or Holdeman in Ohio 1859 (actually not a true schism), Defenseless or Egly among the Amish of Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio in 1864, Old Order Mennonite or Wisler in Indiana and Ohio in 1871-72 (Ontario similarly in 1889, Lancaster in 1893, Virginia in 1903), Central Illinois or Stucky Amish in 1871 (organized first in 1898), Mennonite Brethren in Christ or Brenneman division in Indiana and Ontario about 1875. Progressive groups also broke off in several places in 1924-30 (Indiana, Ontario, Ohio, Pennsylvania) which never organized a conference but transferred gradually to the General Conference Mennonites.

In contrast to these schisms the reunion of the largest section of the Amish body with the main body of the Mennonite Church, beginning with the adherence of Amish conferences to the Mennonite General Conference in 1898 ff. and to the general church-wide boards in 1892 ff., should be noted as a major achievement in Mennonite unity in North America, exceeding in size of membership involved the total of all the schisms listed above.

The history of the Mennonite Church falls readily into four major periods: Colonial 1683-1783; Westward Migration 1783-1860; Strain and Stress (overlapping) 1840-90; Great Awakening 1890-1910; Consolidation and Forward Movement 1910-57.

Colonial Period, 1683-1783. Although advance contingents came early, such as the first Lower Rhine urban immigrants, who began to arrive at Germantown in 1683 and formed a congregation apparently as early as 1690 with William Rittenhouse as preacher, and also a few from the Palatinate in 1707 and Switzerland (1710 to Lancaster), the main body of rural immigrants (about 4,000-5,000) came from the Palatinate in 1717-56, splitting about equally between the Franconia district twenty to fifty miles north of Philadelphia and the Lancaster district fifty to eighty miles west of Philadelphia. The small number of Colonial Amish settled approximately at the junction of Lancaster, Chester, and Berks counties in 1738-56. The two Mennonite settlements remained distinct, without organic union, as did the smaller Amish group. However, delegates from the two Mennonite settlements met conjointly as early as 1725, probably in Germantown, to adopt the Dutch Dordrecht Confession of Faith of 1632 as their own and arrange for its publication in English (1727). Since the Amish in Europe had already adopted this Confession, Dordrecht became and has remained the accepted confession of the Mennonite Church of North America. In the colonial period the major Mennonite books published in America (Germantown or Ephrata) were the hymnal Ausbund (q.v., 1742), the martyr book (Güldene Aepfel (1745), the Martyrs' Mirror (1748), the devotional Bible history Die wandelnde Seele (1768), the catechism Christliches Gemüthsgespräch (1769), the prayerbook Ernsthafte Christenpflicht (1770), and two books by a native author, Spiegel der Taufe (1744) and Eine Restitution (1763) by Bishop Heinrich Funck of Franconia.

In the colonial century the Pennsylvania Mennonites established their solid communities, successfully transferring their traditional faith and practice from Europe and retaining the German language. But they were subject to considerable pietistic influence, largely through literature, and suffered some loss from the Wesleyan revivalistic influence in the latter part of the period and on into the 19th century. A Lancaster bishop, Martin Boehm (q.v., excommunicated about 1777), was a cofounder of the United Brethren Church and led a considerable body of Mennonites, including several ministers (e.g., Christian Newcomer, q.v.), into the new group which he formed with Philip Otterbein, which was in process of crystallization from 1767 on (notable meeting in Isaac Long's barn in that year). About the same time (1770) began the small rather pietistic movement called the River Brethren (Brethren in Christ, q.v.), led by Jacob Engel (q.v.), a Mennonite layman in western Lancaster County, although the real emergence of the group did not take place until 1785 with the first baptisms by Engel. A considerable part of the new group was composed of former Mennonites. The Mennonites have been described by some writers as having had a part in the Great Awakening of 1744 ff., but this has not been proved. Culturally they were an integral part of the large Pennsylvania German block of Eastern Pennsylvania.

The French and Indian Wars (1756-53) and the Revolutionary War (1776-83) created considerable difficulty for the nonresistant Mennonites, who successfully maintained their position of complete nonparticipation in war. In this they were helped by the Quakers, who controlled the provincial government of Pennsylvania to 1756 and who had great influence even after that. The first schism, the one led by Bishop Christian Funk of Franconia (1778), occurred over the question of paying the war tax and in general supporting the American revolutionary side against England, although military service was not involved.

Westward Migration, 1783-1860. The end of the fighting, and the creation of more stable conditions made possible the great American westward migration across the Alleghenies into the vast central plain of Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, as well as into Ontario. The shortage of available land in the East furnished considerable pressure. Many Mennonites joined the migration, some going northwest into Ontario, some straight west to western Pennsylvania (Somerset and Westmoreland counties, etc.) and on into Eastern Ohio, and some south through the Cumberland Valley from Harrisburg into Maryland, and on down into the Shenandoah Valley in Virginia. By 1840-50 derivative settlements (families from Virginia, Eastern Ohio, and Ontario) were being established in western Ohio and northern Indiana, with small and scattered settlements soon after in Illinois. The few Mennonite settlements in Missouri and Kansas were made mostly after 1870. The movement reached Colorado, North Dakota, and Oregon, as well as Alberta and Saskatchewan (from Ontario and Nebraska chiefly) about the turn of the 20th century or soon thereafter. California received only scattered settlers, with the first organized congregation in 1921. Michigan received its Mennonites mostly after 1900 (a few 1865-1900, chiefly from Ontario). The total Mennonite (non-Amish) population west of Indiana and west of Ontario in Canada has never been large, and in 1956 was less than 6,000 baptized members.

The Amish also shared in the westward migration, although many of the Amish settlements were made directly from Europe as follows: Waterloo County, Ont., Somerset County, Pa. (partly from Hesse, partly from Lancaster County), Stark and Fulton counties and part of Wayne County, Ohio, central Illinois, and part of Wayland, Iowa. These were mostly Alsatian Amish settlements made in 1825-60. Derivative settlements from Lancaster County were made in Mifflin County, Pa., and Fairfield County, Ohio, West Liberty, Ohio, Topeka, Ind., Cass County, Mo., Hubbard, Ore., and partly Wayne County, Ohio, all made from ultimately Lancaster County Amish stock. Holmes County, Ohio, Elkhart and Lagrange counties, Ind., and Johnson County, Iowa, were made largely of Hessian Amish stock from Somerset County, Pa. Leo, Ind., Wayland, Iowa, most Nebraska settlements, Pigeon, Mich., Fairview, Ore., and Tofield, Alberta, were derivative, settled largely by Amish families from Ohio, Ontario, or Illinois, ultimately from Alsace. Characteristic names enable a fairly accurate tracing of derivation. The Amish (Mennonite) settlements west of Indiana are nearly twice the size of the Mennonite, almost 10,000 in membership.

The total membership of all district conferences west of Indiana and Ontario in 1956 was 15,811. West of the Mississippi in the U.S.A. it was about 11,400.

The 19th-century westward migration was completely rural, largely based on free or very cheap government homestead land. (Numerous attempted smaller settlements vanished for various reasons.) All carried with them substantially the traditional faith and practice of the mother communities. Gradually, however, the freer life of the frontier resulted in a less conservative and more flexible type of church life and attitude, and prevented the development of the somewhat radical conservative trend or purely static condition which characterized sections of the East until recent decades. Most of the newer methods of church work and activities which came into the Mennonite Church in the 20th century developed in the newer midwestern settlements in Ohio and Indiana.

Strain and Stress, 1840-90. The limits of this period overlap somewhat the previous one because of the nature of the historical developments. It can be characterized as one of strain and stress, because it was in the fifty years of this period that all the major schisms among both the Mennonite and Amish wings occurred. Outside influences, especially from the Alleghenies westward and in Ontario, but also in Eastern Pennsylvania and Virginia, put great pressure upon the tradition-bound Mennonite communities. Chief among these influences were the Sunday school and revivalism, the Methodist (English) and United Brethren and Evangelical (German) evangelists and camp meetings, a pietistic type of literature, etc., all of which had weighty influence, and resulted in the loss of many members to the more aggressive denominations. Many Mennonite leaders, pressed by conservative laymen, were inclined to resist most innovations, and often those who wanted progress had great difficulty in making their influence felt, or tended to become seriously dissatisfied. The struggle over the German language and the transition to English added to the strain and stress.

At times it seemed that the main body might be so weakened by the struggle and the defections right and left that it would completely disintegrate, as some communities actually did. But the outstanding leadership of several able and devoted men of vision in the Midwest, in particular Bishop John M. Brenneman (1817-95) of Allen County, Ohio, and John F. Funk, publisher (1835-1930), and J. S. Coffman (1848-99), evangelist, both of Elkhart, Ind., did much to turn the tide, both in progress and in unity. The outside influences did in some respects have a wholesome influence.

The Great Awakening, 1890-1914. The work of Brenneman, Funk (1864 on), and Coffman (1879 on), assisted and supplemented by others, soon began to bear fruit. Sunday schools were accepted and did their good work in Bible teaching and lay activity from 1863 on (first Sunday schools at Masontown, Pa., and Kitchener, Ont., about 1840). The spirit of evangelism and revival was spread by J. S. Coffman's widespread itinerant work, followed by others who imitated him such as J. S. Shoemaker, Daniel Kauffman, D. D. Miller, S. G. Shetler, Noah Stauffer, and A. D. Wenger. New life was awakened, and thousands of young people were gathered in who otherwise would have been lost to the Mennonite Church. The spirit of missions arose (first home mission, Chicago 1893; first foreign mission, India 1899), church schools were established (Elkhart and Goshen 1894-1903, Ontario Bible School 1907, Hesston 1909), Sunday-school conferences were held (1891 the first in Indiana), young people's meetings began to spring up (first in Elkhart, Ind., and Smithville, Ohio, about 1893). It was a remarkable awakening to new spirit and life internally, and to a new sense of mission and outreach to the world. The church was transformed, first in the Midwest and Ontario, then in the East as well. Finally the General Conference was launched in 1898 and the three great church-wide boards established in 1905, 1906, and 1908.

Consolidation and Forward Movement, 1914-57. A splendid fruit of the new spiritual life and activity was the growing sense of unity and the need for closer co-operation among the scattered congregations, settlements, and conferences, which manifested slightly varying traditions, and at times varying degrees of progress. The consolidation of the results of the Great Awakening and the unifying of the church were manifested in various ways, e.g., in the growing strength of the General Conference which at first was supported by less than half of the church, in the formation of the three boards with their church-wide representation and operation, particularly in the earlier period the mission board at Elkhart, and in the growing influence of the central church publishing house at Scottdale, with the church organ, the Gospel Herald, and its vigorous editor, Daniel Kauffman. It was manifested also in the formal merger of the Amish and Mennonite conferences in 1916-25. The growth and wider influence of the church schools at Goshen and Hesston, joined by Eastern Mennonite College in 1917, was also both a token and a force in the consolidation and unification. In spite of serious tensions in the twenties and thirties over the degree of change permissible in the traditional expression of nonconformity to the world (with the Midwest changing more rapidly and substantially than the East) the church on the whole moved vigorously forward on all fronts and maintained its unity. The delayed awakening in the East (Lancaster and Franconia) has been largely compensated in the last two decades.

World Wars I and II had significant effects upon the church. On the one hand the severe testing of its nonresistant position, through the military draft and related war measures such as the sale of war bonds and war industry, brought a significant rallying of strength and clarification of position. While certain weaknesses were revealed, basically the church took a united and strong stand and contributed much to the clarification and unification of the nonresistant position of the entire North American Mennonite brotherhood. On the other hand, the experiences of Civilian Public Service, with the great foreign relief effort after World War II, and the development of voluntary service, has greatly stimulated and challenged the church and its youth. Another result was the growing discovery and appreciation of other branches of the Mennonite brotherhood.

Outside currents of influence were not without their effect on the church also in this period. Modernism had scant influence, but the Fundamentalist-Modernist controversy in America had its echoes within the church, which although it succeeded in keeping out of the outright Fundamentalist movement, because of strong sympathies for the general anti-modernist position was definitely influenced by it. One fruit of this influence was the adoption of a statement of doctrinal position by the General Conference in 1921, called A Statement of Christian Fundamentals, the only original general doctrinal statement ever adopted by the church. It was in this period too (1910-40) that millennialism made considerable inroads with the result that a substantial number of both ministers and lay members followed this type of prophetic interpretation. Dispensationalism, however, has been rejected. There has apparently been a decline in interest in millennialism in the past decade.

The growth of confidence in education and its value for the cause of the church has been marked in the past quarter of a century. In higher education two full four-year colleges and one junior college have had an extraordinary growth in attendance (1956-57 over 1,000 college students) and plant and resources. In secondary education nine four-year high schools have been established across the continent since 1942 in addition to the two at E.M.C. and Hesston, with a total enrollment of over 1,500 in 1956-57. In elementary education a remarkable development has taken place since 1939 when the first Mennonite Christian day school was established in Eastern Pennsylvania (preceded by two Amish schools in Delaware of 1925 and 1938 and an Amish school of 1938 in Pennsylvania). In 1956-57 there were 88 such schools in operation, 20 of them Amish. Pennsylvania alone had 45 elementary schools, most of them in the Lancaster area. Almost every congregation throughout the church also had a summer Bible school of two weeks' duration.

The changing concept of the minister's work has also led to the demand in various quarters for a better trained ministry, and along with this the preference for the one-pastor system with full or partial support. In Ontario, Ohio, Indiana, Kansas, and Illinois this change has come rapidly in the past decade. To serve this demand the Mennonite Board of Education established at Goshen College the Biblical Seminary (beginning in 1933, separate organization in 1944), which since 1947 has offered a full graduate course, and has graduated about 200 persons from all curriculums. E.M.C. has also added an advanced Bible training program. However, the majority of congregations are still served by ministers without full support and only a small amount of special training.

The publication work of the church has also shown a significant expansion in the past generation. Whereas John F. Funk's Mennonite Publishing Company in Elkhart (organized 1875, although his publishing work had begun in Chicago in 1864) published chiefly the church paper Herald of Truth and the large historical volumes such as Menno Simons Works and the Martyrs' Mirror, and hymnbooks, it had little original production by Mennonite writers to issue. Funk's influence was exercised chiefly through the Herald and Sunday-school helps. He was also handicapped by a bilingual constituency. With the shift to English in 1890-1910, the establishment of the Mennonite Book and Tract Society (q.v., 1892-1908), and the Gospel Witness Company (q.v., 1905-8), followed by the general church agency, the Mennonite Publishing House (q.v., est. 1908 at Scottdale), and the emergence of two capable writers, Daniel Kauffman (q.v.) and John Horsch (q.v.), the literary output expanded in quantity and improved in quality. The periodical literature and the Sunday-school helps became increasingly influential. By 1930 a younger generation of writers, many of them associated with the three colleges of the church, but particularly Goshen College and Biblical Seminary, emerged, and the past fifteen years have witnessed the flowering of a historical, theological, and practical literature outstanding in American Mennonite history. The Conrad Grebel Lectureship (see Lectureships), established in 1952, has contributed measurably to this.

The rise and growth of the missionary and philanthropic interest in the church in the past 50 years has been a notable development, greatly intensified in the last decade. Foreign mission fields were entered as follows: India 1899, Argentina 1917, East Africa 1934, Bihar (India) 1940, Argentine Chaco 1943, Puerto Rico 1945, Ethiopia 1948, Japan 1949, Sicily 1949, Honduras 1950, Belgium 1950, Luxembourg 1951, England 1952, Somalia 1953, France 1953, Israel 1953, Alaska 1954, Brazil 1954, Uruguay 1954, Cuba 1954, Jamaica 1955, Viet-Nam 1957. The remarkable growth in home missions in the past twenty years has brought the number of mission outposts operated either by congregations alone or by mission boards to over 300, scattered over many states outside of original Mennonite territory, including Vermont, New York, North Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Texas, Minnesota, northern Michigan, northern Ontario, northern Alberta. New types of mission activity have developed such as Negro missions (25 in number), Jewish missions, missions among the Mexicans. Radio broadcasting with a basically evangelistic purpose has developed into a major thrust, with the Mennonite Hour, established in 1952, since 1955 operating under the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, with over 70 stations, and a Spanish broadcast with 10 stations, to which additional foreign language broadcasts in Italian, French, German, and Russian are to be added. A European studio was established in Basel, Switzerland, in 1957.

A remarkable growth in charitable institutions is also to be noted. The church now maintains five children's homes and eighteen homes for the aged, owns two hospitals in North America, and operates four more as well as one mental hospital. It has been a strong supporter of the Mennonite Central Committee from its beginning in 1920, and carries on in addition a large voluntary service program of both summer short-term and year-round units in numerous states and provinces. Much of this is administered by the Mennonite Relief and Service Committee (q.v.) under the general mission board, but the Lancaster Conference mission board also operates a vigorous program of voluntary service.

Organized mutual aid (q.v.) has also developed in a large way, particularly since 1910. District organizations for mutual aid in property losses have become almost universal. The first such was in Ontario, beginning in 1867. The Mennonite Aid Plan (q.v.), organized in Indiana in 1882, served a larger area. In 1945 a church-wide organization, Mennonite Mutual Aid, Inc. (q.v.), was set up under the General Conference to provide hospitalization and surgical aid, also burial aid; automobile accident aid was later added. Today the concept of organized aid of various types is generally accepted. The strong position against commercial life insurance in all forms originally taken still generally holds, although in recent years some modified forms of insurance with investment features are coming into use.

The church has in general maintained a strong position in regard to nonconformity to the world, holding that the full Christian life will of necessity express itself in nonconformity to the world in life and conduct. Its ideals include simplicity in life and costume, rejecting attendance at the theater including motion pictures, the wearing of jewelry, the swearing of oaths, lodge membership, divorce, smoking and drinking, participation in politics and office-holding, membership in labor unions, participation in war or carnal strife of any kind, and advocating simplicity in worship without the use of musical instruments. There is universal observance of the ordinance of footwashing, the prayer veil for women, and close communion. In the application of this principle of nonconformity and simplicity the church in general has maintained a conservative position, with real church discipline, seeking to avoid the evils of legalism and formalism on the one hand and worldliness on the other, though not always successfully. While weaknesses have manifested themselves frequently at various times and places, in general the church has maintained its principles and ideals. Among the means used to this end in recent years have been pronouncements by the General Conference on various major questions of practical Christian living, including the following: Peace, War, and Military Service (1937), Industrial Relations (1941), a Declaration of Christian Faith and Commitment (Nonresistance) first by an all-Mennonite study conference at Winona Lake (1950), Race Relations (1955), and Christian Separation and Nonconformity as a Whole (1955). The declarations of position and commitment, while not having the force of confessions of faith, nevertheless carry great weight and influence.

Among the outstanding leaders of the Mennonite Church through the 275 years of its career in America the following might be noted: Franconia District: Jacob Gottschalk (1666-1763?) of Germantown and Skippack, first bishop in America; Heinrich Funck (d. 1760), bishop and writer at Franconia; Christopher Dock (d. 1771), noted schoolmaster on the Skippack; Abraham Godschalk (1791-1838), minister at Doylestown; Josiah Clemmer (1827-1905), bishop at Franconia; and Andrew Mack (1836-1917), bishop at Bally; Lancaster: Hans Herr (1639-1725), first bishop in the Lancaster area; Christian Burkholder (1746-1809), writer and bishop at Groffdale; Peter Eby (1765-1843), bishop at Pequea; Christian Herr (1780-1853), bishop at Pequea; Amos Herr (1816-97), preacher at Willow Street; Jacob N. Brubacher (1839-1913), bishop at Mount Joy; Noah Mack (1861-1948), bishop at New Holland; and John H. Mellinger (1858-1952), lay leader and long-time president of the Lancaster mission board; John S. Mast (1861-1951), Amish bishop at Morgantown; Virginia: Peter Burkholder (1783-1846), bishop and writer in Rockingham County; Samuel Coffman (1822-94) and L. J. Heatwole (1852-1932), also bishops there; George R. Brunk (1871-1938), bishop and writer at Denbigh; Ontario: Benjamin Eby (1785-1863), bishop and writer at Kitchener; David Sherk (1801-82), minister and writer at Preston; S. F. Coffman (1872-1954), bishop and writer at Vineland; Oscar Burkholder (1886-1956), bishop at Breslau; Western Pennsylvania: Abram Metzler (1862-1924), bishop at Martinsburg; Daniel Kauffman (1865-1944), J. A. Ressler (1867-1936), and Aaron Loucks (1864-1945), all bishops at Scottdale, Kauffman and Ressler being also writers and editors; N. E. Miller (1880-1930), bishop at Springs; S. G. Shetler (1871-1942), bishop at Johnstown (Holsopple); Ohio: John M. Brenneman (1816-95), bishop at Elida; John K. Yoder (1824-1906), bishop at Smithville; M. S. Steiner (1866-1911), minister at Columbus Grove and early missions leader; David Plank (1833-1912), bishop at West Liberty; John Blosser (1855-1921), bishop at Rawson and early educational leader; C. Z. Yoder (1845-1939), minister at Smithville and early missions leader; E. L. Frey (1856-1942), bishop at Wauseon; J. B. Smith (1870-1951), minister and writer at Elida and educator; S. E. Allgyer (1859-1953), bishop at West Liberty and evangelist and missions leader; Indiana: John F. Funk (1835-1930), bishop, writer, and publisher at Elkhart; John S. Coffman (1845-99), evangelist at Elkhart; D. J. Johns (1850-1942), bishop at Goshen; J. S. Hartzler (1857-1953), minister and educator at Elkhart and Goshen; D. D. Miller (1864-1955), bishop, evangelist, and educational and missions leader at Middlebury; Illinois: J. S. Shoemaker (1853-1936), bishop at Freeport and early publications and mission leader; Samuel Gerber (1863-1929), bishop at Tremont; C. A. Hartzler (1876-1947), bishop at Tiskilwa; H. R. Schertz (1886-1954), bishop at Metamora; Iowa: Sebastian Gerig (1838-1924), bishop at Wayland; Abner Yoder (1879-1942), bishop at Parnell; Nebraska: D. G. Lapp (1857-1951), bishop at Roseland; Kansas: T. M. Erb (1865-1929), bishop at Hesston; D. H. Bender (1866-1945), bishop at Hesston and educator; Noah Oyer (1891-1931), minister and educator at Hesston (and Goshen, Ind.); Foreign Missions: India: M. C. Lapp (1871-1923) and George J. Lapp (1879-1951), bishops; Argentina: T. K. Hershey (1879-1956), bishop. (See the pertinent biographical articles for all of these men.) H.S.B.

C. Henry Smith, The Mennonites of America (Goshen, 1909); idem, The Mennonite Immigration to Pennsylvania in the Eighteenth Century (Norristown, 1929); idem, The Story of the Mennonites (Berne, 1941); J. S. Hartzler and Daniel Kauffman, Mennonite Church History (Scottdale, 1905); Daniel Kauffman, The Conservative Viewpoint (Scottdale, 1918); idem, Doctrines of the Bible (Scottdale, 1928); idem, Fifty Years in the Mennonite Church 1890-1940 (Scottdale, 1941); idem, Mennonite Cyclopedic Dictionary (Scottdale, 1937); H. S. Bender, Two Centuries of American Mennonite Literature, A Bibliography of Mennonitica Americana 1727-1928 (Goshen, 1929); idem, Mennonite Sunday School Centennial 1840-1940 (Scottdale, 1940); idem, "The Founding of the Mennonite Church in America at Germantown 1683-1708," MQR VII (1933) 227-50; J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, Pa., 1937); idem, The Doctrines of the Mennonites (Scottdale, 1943); idem, Historical and Biblical Position of the Mennonite Church on Attire (Scottdale, 1944); idem, Separated Unto God: A Plea for Christian Simplicity of Life and for a Scriptural Nonconformity to the World (Scottdale, 1951); idem, Introduction to Theology (Scottdale, 1954); G. F. Hershberger, War, Peace, and Nonresistance (Scottdale, 1944, rev. ed. 1953); idem, The Mennonite Church in the Second World War (Scottdale, 1951); J. S. Hartzler, Mennonites in the World War (Scottdale, 1921); John Umble, Mennonite Pioneers, Biographical Sketches of Some of the Leading Men and Women in the Mennonite Church Who Have Served in the Institutions of the Church in the Home Land (Elkhart, 1940); idem, Ohio Mennonite Sunday Schools (Goshen, 1941); idem, Goshen College 1894-1954 (Goshen, 1955); idem, "Extinct Mennonite Churches in Ohio," MQR XVIII-XIX (1944-45) 36-38, 89-116, 186-92, 225-50, 41-58, 215-37, and XX (1946) 5-52; idem, "Seventy Years of Progress in Sunday School Work Among the Mennonites of the Middle West," MQR VIII (1934) 166-79; Roy H. Umble, "Mennonite Preaching 1864-1944," doctoral dissertation at Northwestern University 1949; John F. Funk, Mennonite Church and Her Accusers (Elkhart, 1878); "Fifty Mennonite Leaders," the title of two series of biographical sketches which appeared in the Gospel Herald, Jan. 10—Dec. 19, 1929; Jan. 18, 1934—Jan. 3, 1935; John Horsch, "Alt-Mennoniten," ML I, 43-46; Ed. G. Kaufman, The Development of the Missionary and Philanthropic Interest Among the Mennonites of North America (Berne, 1931); M. S. Steiner, John S. Coffman, Mennonite Evangelist (Spring Grove, Pa., n.d.—1903); Alice Gingerich, Life and Times of Daniel Kauffman (Scottdale, 1954). For further bibliography, see the articles on the several district conferences, and on specific doctrines, ordinances, and practices. See also the published proceedings of the Mennonite General Conference (q.v.) and the district conferences.

Mennonite Church Buildings, Inc., a nonprofit corporation formed in 1956 as a subsidiary of Mennonite Mutual Aid (q.v.), a standing committee of the Mennonite (MC) General Conference (q.v.), to take over the assets of Mennonite Educational Buildings, Inc. (q.v.), and to continue its program of aiding in the financing of college buildings with the enlargement of scope to include all types of church buildings, such as meetinghouses and buildings for missions and publishing purposes. The initial officers were Abram Hallman (Akron, Pa.) president, H. Ernest Bennett (Elkhart) vice-president, Harold L. Swartzendruber (Goshen) secretary-treasurer. Additional members of the board of directors were Melvin Lauver (Akron, Pa.), Joseph Buzzard (Scottdale), William Yoder (Columbiana, Ohio), and Howard Mellinger (Sterling, Ill.). H.S.B.

Mennonite Church Extension Society (Eine Mennonitische Kirchenerweiterungs-Gesellschaft) of the Western District Conference (GCM) was incorporated on Nov. 17, 1904, by Christian Krehbiel, Joseph Schrag, Jakob Isaak, J. W. Penner, H. Banman, Peter Goertz, David Goerz, J. J. Krehbiel, and C. F. Claassen. Christian Krehbiel was the president, David Goerz secretary, and C. F. Claassen treasurer. The purpose of the society was the promotion of public worship through the establishment or furnishing of churches at places where the Western District Conference did mission work, or where a local congregation was being organized and needed help to acquire a meetinghouse. As soon as newly established congregations became independent and self-supporting these churches became their property. The society collected funds and raised membership dues which enabled it to build churches. Membership dues were $5.00. Little information is available of the actual activities of the Extension Society and of the time when its work came to a close. C.K.

The above information is contained in a twelve-page pamphlet entitled Eine Mennonitische Kirchenerweiterungs-Gesellschaft.

Mennonite Collegiate Institute was founded at Gretna, Man., in 1889 by a group of progressive Mennonite pioneers who had settled in the West Reserve in 1875. Its purpose was to train teachers for the Mennonite elementary schools which were then operated as private schools and after 1890 partly as public schools. From the very start the M.C.I., a private school, was supported by voluntary contributions and student fees. Until 1908 classes were held in a small building. In 1908 a three-story structure with two classrooms and room for about 20 boarding students was built. In 1912 the plant was enlarged to about three times its former size.

After World War I the Mennonite constituency which supported the M.C.I. and received the benefits of the school was greatly expanded by immigration of Mennonites from Russia (see Manitoba). Therefore in 1944 a building fund was started for the construction of a new building to take care of the growing student body, quadrupled in size. The new building, a modern plant with five classrooms, two large and well-equipped laboratories, and a chapel, was completed in 1946 at a total cost of some $60,000. Since the school had offered boarding facilities for boys only, four private residences were bought and converted into girls' boarding houses. In 1948 the old school building was converted into a boys' residence and infirmary. In 1952 a large auditorium capable of seating 1800-2000 was built. In 1955 a new dormitory was erected to accommodate 150 students.

Since 1916 the M.C.I. has taught the full general course for grades 9 to 12. It is not an accredited collegiate but prefers to have its students write the Departmental Examinations at the end of June. The State Department of Education fully recognizes the work of the M.C.I. In addition to the prescribed subjects, stress is placed on the German language and Mennonite heritage. In the last eight years of its operation seven Isbister scholarship winners have been graduated from the school, and fourteen Manitoba scholarship winners. The school had 179 students in 1955-56. The first principal was H. H. Ewert, who was succeeded by G. H. Peters. The staff now consists of P. J. Schäfer, Principal, and six teachers. (†ME I) (ML III, 99.) P.J.S.

Mennonite Colonization Board, headquarters at Newton, Kan., was organized in the spring of 1924 to give financial aid to the movement of Mennonite immigrants from Russia to Canada. The board was constituted at a meeting held at the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church north of Newton, where by popular election at the meeting seventeen members were elected representing six Mennonite branches (MC, GCM, MB, KMB, EMC, CGC) from Pennsylvania to Kansas, nine from the latter state. The first officers were D. E. Harder, president, D. H. Bender, vice-president, J. G. Regier, secretary-treasurer, all from Harvey County, Kan., with J. G. Wiens and O. O. Miller as additional members of the executive committee. Later J. M. Sudermann became president and executive secretary, P. C. Hiebert, secretary, and H. E. Suderman, treasurer. These men, with O. O. Miller and John Lichti, constituted the executive committee to the close of active operations in 1926. In 1947 the MCB was dissolved and its assets turned over to the MCC.

The MCB had two active projects. The one was financial aid to immigrants to Canada. By Aug. 1, 1925, $15,000 had been raised and sent to Canada, $12,000 as loans to be repaid. The second project, colonization of Russian Mennonites in Mexico, arose because of the inability of some of the prospective Russian emigrants to pass the Canadian health requirements. The Board failed in its attempt to secure admission of these people to the United States, and then turned to Mexico because of the favorable attitude of the Mexican government as well as the earlier (1922) actual establishment of an Old Colony Mennonite settlement from Manitoba in the state of Chihuahua. When the possibility of settlement in Mexico was reported to the Mennonites in Russia there was immediate response and a considerable movement to Mexico set in at once via Tampico and Vera Cruz. The first two groups of six families, a total of fifteen, arrived on July 1, 1924, and settled on a tract of their own choosing near Rosario, state of Chihuahua. By October about 200 persons had arrived. By the end of 1924 approximately $14,000 in cash and supplies had been contributed to this settlement by the Board from donations received in the United States. The Rosario settlement, suffering serious reverses due to climate, also due to the divisive effects of the founding of a second (San Juan) colony near Irapuato about 550 miles south of Rosario, finally disintegrated and by the end of 1925 almost all had gone on to Canada. The Irapuato settlement was organized by several private individuals in the G.C.M. church in Kansas, who solicited individuals to leave the Rosario settlement and finally diverted 24 families from Rosario to Irapuato. In spite of additional aid which the MCB finally gave in an attempt to aid and save the Irapuato colony, it too disintegrated, the settlers moving to Canada. A third settlement was attempted at Las Animas near Irapuato by a private individual, A. A. Rempel, himself an immigrant from Russia to the United States a few years earlier, chiefly for his own relatives. A total of 18 families were received by Rempel in November 1924, but by the end of January 1925 they left to go to Rosario (10 families) and Irapuato or Canada. A fourth settlement was attempted at El Trebol, Durango, about 500 miles south of Rosario, by 24 families from Russia arriving in late 1925. This colony also disintegrated, most going to Canada, although a few families still live here. Most of the Russian Mennonites who remained in Mexico (some 35 persons) finally located at Cuauhtemoc (q.v.), a town adjacent to the Old Colony settlement in Chihuahua. This group was organized into a G.C.M. congregation in 1938. The total number of immigrant families (1957) from Russia to Mexico was 124, with about 600 persons. The last group of eight families arrived in December 1925. The MBC aided all of the four settlements, although its only own project was Rosario. The total funds received by the Board were: for Canada, loan $11,050, donations $3,096, total $14,146; for Mexico, loan $10,105, donations $22,800, total $32,905 plus two cars of supplies and one car of milk cows.

The failure of the MCB colonization effort in Mexico 1924-25 can be attributed to the following causes: (1) lack of sufficient aid funds to carry the settlements through to self-support; (2) lack of sufficient rainfall in the areas chosen, at least without expensive irrigation; (3) fear of the degrading influence of the Mexican population; (4) no opportunity to earn money by hiring out during the pioneer years as in Canada and the United States because of the low wage scale; (5) the changed attitude of the new Mexican president Calles (succeeding the tolerant Obregon), who in early 1925 issued a decree to the effect that "in the future not more than ten families of foreigners shall be permitted to colonize any particular farming locality."

When the MCB was liquidated in 1947 it had succeeded largely through the help of C. F. Klassen (q.v.) in collecting most of the loans advanced to the settlers in Canada and Mexico and had been able to discharge all its financial obligations. The remaining assets were contributed to the MCC relief fund. J.M.S.

S. C. Yoder, For Conscience Sake (Goshen, 1940) 154-59; files of J. M. Suderman and H. P. Krehbiel (BeCL); ML III, 99 f.

Mennonite Commission for Christian Education (MC) was organized in 1937 by action of General Conference. It was an enlargement and reorganization of the General Sunday School Committee (1915-37) and a merger of other General Conference committees active in Christian education, viz., Young People's Bible Meeting Committee (1909-37), and Young People's Problems Committee (1921-37). The Commission was charged with the responsibility to co-ordinate, promote, and supervise the Christian education agencies operating in the local congregations, not including the church schools under the direction of the Mennonite Board of Education.

The Commission is composed of 12 members. At first six were elected by General Conference, one each by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, Mennonite Publication Board, and the Mennonite Board of Education, and three by the Commission itself. In 1941 General Conference adopted a revised constitution by which ten members are elected by General Conference and two by the Commission itself.

The Commission meets semiannually. In these meetings the Commission works as a cabinet, each of the officers and divisional secretaries for the various phases of education giving his report. The Field Secretary is the executive officer of the Commission, and with each divisional secretary forms a committee of two to implement recommendations from the Commission and to plan a program of promotion in each area of interest. The scope of Commission work is seen in the present (1957) list of divisional secretaries: (1) Sunday schools, (2) summer Bible schools, (3) weekday Bible schools, (4) church camps, (5) Christian service training, (6) missionary education, (7) church music, (8) junior activities, (9) young people's activities, (10) adult activities, (11) home interests, (12) audio-visual aids, (13) Sunday evening services. Each secretary is to study his respective field, to carry on a program of promotion in co-operation with field secretary, to co-operate in the planning of curriculum materials, and to collect pertinent statistics.

During 1941-56 the Commission published annually the Handbook for Christian Workers. It has also published many pieces of promotional literature.

The Commission has co-ordinated the teaching efforts of the Church, and has contributed to improved teaching efficiency. The Commission has led the church in facing educational problems, such as child evangelism; it has taken the lead, through its Curriculum Committee, in planning needed curriculum materials. It has sponsored Sunday-school conventions and workshops, and has brought the attention of the church to special teaching emphases through its annual teaching themes, such as "Christian Training for Every Member" (1943), "Christian Nonresistance" (1953), "Every Member Evangelism" (1954), "Christian Nonconformity" (1955), and "Knowing and Using the Bible" (1956). The Curriculum Committee is at the heart of the educational program. It is responsible both to the Commission and the Mennonite Publication Board (q.v.). Its work in stating objectives and outlining curriculum materials for summer Bible school and Sunday-school use is worthy of note.

The first officers of the Commission were as follows: A. J. Metzler, chairman; O. O. Miller, vice-chairman; Paul Erb, secretary-treasurer; fourth member, Jesse B. Martin; and I. W. Royer, fifth member. J. R. Mumaw was first field secretary. In 1957 the officers are Richard Detweiler, chairman; Noah Good, vice-chairman; J. J. Hostetler, secretary-treasurer, and Paul M. Lederach, field secretary. Fourth and fifth members are no longer elected. Paul Mininger was long chairman of the Curriculum Committee. P.M.L.

Mennonite Community, The, a 36-page periodical published by the Mennonite Community Association (q.v.) at Scottdale, Pa., January 1947 to October 1949; at first a bimonthly, in January 1948 it became a monthly. In November 1949 responsibility for its publication was assumed by the Mennonite Publishing House. Stressing the social implications of the Gospel, the journal conceived of the Christian community as church-centered and was concerned that its economic, social, educational, and cultural life should be a true expression of the Gospel to which the church adheres. Emphasis was placed on social ethics, stewardship, brotherhood, Christian education, and health practices. In January 1954 the Mennonite Community and the Christian Monitor (q.v.) were discontinued and replaced by a new periodical, Christian Living (q.v.), combining the interests of both, and described as "A Magazine for Home and Community." The editor of the Mennonite Community was Grant Stoltzfus to August 1952, after which an editorial committee with Ralph Hernley as chairman had charge of the journal. G.F.H.

Mennonite Community Association (MC) was organized in 1946, its stated purpose being "to support and strengthen the Christian community as expressed in Mennonite teachings and practices; to stimulate community interests—religious, social, cultural, economic—among the Mennonite people; to publicize the Mennonite way of life through the medium of publications and any other means deemed advisable by the Association."

The major undertaking of the Association was the founding of the Mennonite Community (q.v.) magazine which it published from January 1947 to October 1949. Beginning in November 1949 and continuing to December 1953 the magazine was published by the Mennonite Publishing House. Beginning in January 1954 the Mennonite Community and the Christian Monitor were discontinued and a new periodical, Christian Living (A Magazine for Home and Community), took their place. The Mennonite Community Association maintains a close relationship to the new periodical, two of its officers serving as consulting editors of Christian Living.

In 1950 the Association, in co-operation with the John C. Winston Company, published the Mennonite Community Cookbook, a compilation of 1,400 favorite family recipes collected by Mary Emma Showalter from Mennonite communities in the United States and Canada. Since 1949 the Association has co-operated with the Committee on Economic and Social Relations of the Mennonite Church (MC) in sponsoring an annual Conference on Christian Community Relations. The Association also supports the work of the Mennonite Research Foundation (q.v.), and since 1953 has awarded several scholarships annually to advanced students who show promise in the area of Christian community leadership. G.F.H.

Mennonite Community Church (GCM), located in Fresno, Cal., and previously known as the General Conference Fellowship of Fresno, was organized on Nov. 21, 1954, and affiliated with the Pacific District Conference in 1955. Ground-breaking services for a new church, with a seating capacity of 180, took place in August 1955. The building was dedicated in April 1956. The minister (1957) is Peter J. Ediger; there are 57 members. P.J.E.

Mennonite Country Church (GCM), located near Monroe, Snohomish Co., Wash., a member of the Pacific Conference, was organized on June 14, 1944. The first settlers arrived in 1911, coming from Oklahoma and Pretty Prairie, Kan. The church, a cement block building with seating capacity of 150, was dedicated in February 1946. In 1956 the membership was 52, with Donald Emmert as pastor. D.R.E.

Mennonite Crusaders, Inc., organized in June 1951 and incorporated in Virginia June 16, 1952, was an organization of interested Virginia Mennonites created to operate The Mennonite Hour (q.v.). In 1956 it changed its name to Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc. (q.v.). In June 1953 it entered into an agreement with the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities to operate and promote a Mennonite broadcasting program co-operatively and thus it became an officially endorsed and supervised agency. Headquarters were at Harrisonburg, Va., where it maintained its studio. The officers were Lewis Strite president, Richard Weaver vice-president, Harley Rhodes secretary-treasurer, Norman Derstine program director, B. Charles Hostetter radio pastor. Besides its periodical publications, Mennonite Hour Informer and Mennonite Hour Prayer Guide, it began in 1952 a series of publications consisting of collected sermons of the radio pastor. It also operated a Bible correspondence course. Mennonite Crusaders was financed by voluntary contributions, largely from the radio audience. In June 1955 it was broadcasting over 32 stations in the United States, in addition to two in Canada, Radio Ceylon on four beams, Quito, Ecuador, Manila in the Philippines, with eight programs, two in Puerto Rico, and one in the Virgin Islands. H.S.B.

Mennonite Cultural Problems Conference. General cultural developments by the latter 1930's had made a number of American Mennonite leaders conscious of the need for periodic discussion of common problems on an inter-Mennonite basis. Acting on this awareness, Harold S. Bender, Guy F. Hershberger, Melvin Gingerich, and J. Winfield Fretz took the initiative in organizing a program for a one-day discussion of some of the common problems confronting Mennonites. It was called a Conference on Mennonite Sociology and was held on Dec. 31, 1941, in the YMCA Hotel in Chicago, 47 of the 53 invited guests being present. It was unanimously agreed that further conferences should be held. A committee drew up a two-day program for a conference to be held on Aug. 7-8, 1942. There were 119 registered guests at the first session of what came to be known as the Conference on Mennonite Cultural Problems.

The first six sessions were held annually, but from 1949 on it was decided to meet every two years, usually on Mennonite and Brethren in Christ college campuses on a rotating basis. Although this conference had a spontaneous origin by a group of interested individuals, it was decided at the first meeting to place the responsibility for future conferences in the hands of a more permanently organized group. The group chosen was the Council of Mennonite and Affiliated Colleges, which is a loosely organized association of college administrators. This Council appoints the program committee for the Cultural Conference sessions and assumes financial responsibility for the publication of the conference proceedings, which have appeared regularly.

The significance of the Cultural Conference sessions is becoming more apparent as the results of its first ten sessions can be appraised. It provides the occasion for a periodic meeting of Mennonite and affiliated college faculty members to discuss common cultural problems. It stimulates intellectual inquiry and academic research in areas and on problems that universities and non-Mennonite colleges would normally not touch. It provides a method for regularly collecting and publishing research data, which in turn become valuable documentary material for further reference and study. J.W.F.

Mennonite Cyclopedic Dictionary, A Compendium of the Doctrines, History, Activities, Literature and Environments of the Mennonite Church (Scottdale, 1937), a condensed reference manual of 445 pages, with mostly short articles, was not only edited but also largely written by Daniel Kauffman (q.v.). The subject matter is limited largely to the Mennonite Church (MC). It includes, besides a large number of biographies and brief sketches of congregations and institutions, thumbnail genealogical reports on 382 Mennonite families. H.S.B.

Mennonite Deaconess Home and Hospital was founded in Beatrice, Neb., as the result of a jubilee celebration on Jan. 27, 1905, which commemorated the founding of the Mennonite church in the Beatrice community and the 25th anniversary of the ministry of Gerhard Penner and Peter Reimer. A block of ground in the city of Beatrice was donated to the Mennonite church as a site for the proposed hospital. The church elected a group of 12 men to serve as a board for the building and operation of the hospital. Building operations began in 1910 and on July 16, 1911, the hospital was dedicated. The work of the hospital is conducted by a small group of deaconesses.

A nurses' training school was conducted by the hospital for a number of years, which was later reorganized on a two-year basis and for a number of years trained practical nurses. The hospital has sought to serve the church as means of expressing Christian love and concern for our fellow men through care of the sick, and has been a means of interpreting Mennonite principles to the community.

The hospital is now engaged in a building program which will result in a new hospital building of 50 beds. The existing building will then be used for chronically ill and convalescent patients.

In 1956 the administrator was Edmund P. Zehr; the superintendent of nursing was Martha Thimm, with a staff of five deaconesses. E.Z.

Mennonite Disaster Service, an organized program for a service by Mennonite laymen in the United States and Canada to aid the victims of natural disasters such as floods, tornadoes, storms, earthquakes, and fire by cleanup and reconstruction work, largely in damaged homes. Such work supplements the familiar Red Cross operations which primarily provide emergency food and medical supplies, clothing, and shelter in addition to direct financial aid. MDS operates typically by assembling groups of men who at their own expense and with their own tools proceed to the disaster area and work at their own expense for a period of several days or weeks doing what they can to make damaged homes livable again.

The idea of MDS arose after World War II. The first organization was made at Hesston, Kan., in 1950 in the local Mennonite Church (MC); it was made inter-Mennonite in 1951. The second organization was formed in Northern Indiana and Western Ohio, where in 1953 a group was formed to work in the tornado area at Flint, Mich. As the idea spread, other local MDS organizations were formed, usually inter-Mennonite in character. The need for larger co-ordination and counsel led to a request by several conferences for co-ordination on a national basis. On May 15, 1954, the Executive Committee of the MCC created by appointment the Disaster Service Co-ordinating Committee. This committee also has the responsibility of liaisonship with the United States Government, particularly in matters relating to Civil Defense, and the American Red Cross. In 1956 it was composed of representatives of the following Mennonite Conferences: M.C., G.C.M., E.M.C., C.M., the Brethren in Christ, and the MCC headquarters office. Provision is also made for Canadian representation. It meets annually with representatives of the local or regional disaster organizations. Most of the local units also meet annually. The program is decentralized, with local units springing into action as needed, and without centralized administration. In 1957 the organized regional Mennonite Disaster Service units in active existence were as follows: Arizona-California, British Columbia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana-Michigan, Iowa-Missouri, Kansas, Manitoba, Minnesota, Nebraska, New York State, Eastern Ohio, Western Ohio, Oklahoma, Western Pennsylvania, Lancaster County, Pa., Eastern Pennsylvania, and South Dakota. W.T.S.

Mennonite Educational Buildings, Inc., a nonprofit corporation organized in 1950 to take over the assets of Mennonite Educational Finance, Inc. (q.v.) and continue its program of financing Mennonite

(MC) college building erection on a long-term loan basis. Its officers were Edwin Yoder president, and C. L. Graber secretary-treasurer. In 1957 it transferred its assets to Mennonite Church Buildings, Inc., (q.v.) and was dissolved. H.S.B.

Mennonite Educational Finance, Inc., was organized in 1928 to secure funds on a loan basis from the constituency of Goshen College to supply long-term loans to the college to finance the erection or remodeling of college buildings. It financed Coffman Hall, the remodeling of Kulp Hall, and the erection of three college cabins. It also financed a building for Hesston College. Officers throughout were Edwin Yoder (Topeka, Ind.) chairman, and C. L. Graber (Goshen) secretary-treasurer. In 1950 it transferred its assets to Mennonite Educational Buildings, Inc. (q.v.) and was dissolved. H.S.B.

Mennonite Educational Institute (M.E.I.), at Clearbrook, formerly Abbotsford, B.C., the first Mennonite high school in British Columbia, was founded in 1944. The need for Mennonite high schools in British Columbia became more and more obvious as the Mennonite population increased. A small group of Mennonite Brethren parents in the Abbotsford district decided to begin such a school, and classes were announced (grades 9, 10, and 11) for the fall of 1944, when 43 enrolled, together with a smaller group of Bible students, using the Bible School building. F. C. Thiessen was the first principal, with I. J. Dyck and H. H. Nikkel as teachers. Six local Mennonite Brethren churches (South Abbotsford, Abbotsford, Arnold, Clearbrook, Matsqui, and East Aldergrove) and one General Conference Mennonite Church (Abbotsford United Mennonite) officially supported the school, but the 403 pupils (1955-56) came from 20 different congregations. A commodious new building located just north of the Clearbrook M.B. Church was dedicated at Christmas of 1946, when the student body numbered 164. In 1954 a Junior High School with four classrooms, a library, and a gymnasium were added; two additional classrooms were added in 1956.

The curriculum includes all the courses of the public schools for grades 7-13, as well as classes in music, Bible, Mennonite history, and German. The staff in 1955-56 consisted of 14 teachers, with I. J. Dyck as principal. The graduates numbered 38 in the year 1953, 47 in 1954, 38 in 1955, 35 in 1956, and 56 in 1957. Of the 260 graduates in 1946-55, 140 are engaged in teaching, 27 in business, 21 in nursing. The Students' Call, a monthly paper edited by the students, and the annual, Evergreen, cover all school activities. In scholastic endeavors, students of the M.E.I. have monopolized the scholarships offered locally. The school has two excellent choirs and a good sports program. A readily noticed Christian spirit pervades the school life, and is given opportunities for expression in the morning devotions, prayer meetings, and the testimony meeting at the end of each week. This is the largest of all Mennonite high schools, with an enrollment of about 450. I. J. Dyck has been principal since 1945.

C.F.K.

"Mennonite Educational Institute," Konferenz-Jugendblatt, September-October 1955, 11, 13; Evergreen (School Annual) for 1954 contains a history of the school.

Mennonite Educational Institute, Altona, Man. By 1905 it was felt that the building of the Mennonite Collegiate Institute (q.v.) at Gretna should be remodeled or replaced by a new building. Some felt that the new building, if any, should be constructed at Altona, which would offer a more convenient site. In an open meeting in May 1905, a majority vote was cast for the Gretna site. Those favoring Altona thereupon raised money for a new school, and somewhat later the Gretna supporters also raised money for a new building. By 1908 the two schools were built and in operation. The Gretna school was incorporated as the Mennonite Collegiate Institute (M.C.I.) and the Altona school as the Mennonite Educational Institute (M.E.I.).

The M.E.I. was built on the present site of the Agricultural Hall and Fair Grounds of Altona. In January 1926 the building was burned to the ground and has not been rebuilt. The object of the school was to train Mennonite teachers for the schools in the Manitoba Mennonite settlements. The principals of the school have been J. J. Balzer, G. G. Neufeld, J. S. Schultz, and Gerhard Friesen. H.H.H.

Mennonite Evangelizing Board of America, the first mission board of the Mennonite Church (MC), was organized at the Salem Church south of Elkhart, Ind., on Jan. 20, 1892, as the successor to the Evangelizing Committee which had been organized Oct. 13, 1882. The constitution reads: "The object of this organization shall be to collect means and maintain a treasury for the purpose of carrying on a general missionary work." The money was to be used to send men wherever needed, "but especially among scattered members of the church, and churches not supplied at all or unsufficiently supplied with laborers." Whereas the Evangelizing Committee had been composed solely of local men in Elkhart County, the new board was to be general, with representatives invited from all the Mennonite and Amish conferences in sympathy with the work. Headquarters, however, were to continue at Elkhart. To begin with, fourteen members were "elected" from Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska. The officers were F. W. Brunk president, Herman Yoder vice-president, A. B. Kolb secretary, Josiah Sommers treasurer, all laymen, and all from the Elkhart and Goshen area. In 1894 G. L. Bender was elected treasurer, to begin his long career of treasurer and chief executive officer of the central mission organization of the church. At the annual meeting held on Oct. 7, 1896, the name of the board was changed to Mennonite Evangelizing and Benevolent Board, to indicate a merger with the Benevolent Organization of Mennonites, which had been incorporated in Indiana on April 23, 1894, "to support, maintain, and carry on Home and Foreign Missions, Hospitals, Orphans' Homes, Training Schools for the Education of Nurses, Deaconesses and Bible Students," also with headquarters at Elkhart, and considerable overlapping of membership. The new Mennonite Evangelizing and Benevolent Board was now incorporated.

The first act of the new board was to "accept" the Chicago Home Mission, which had been started as an independent work in 1893. This launched the board on a direct mission career. Its first foreign mission project was the establishment of a mission in India, J. A. Ressler and W. B. Page and his wife going out in 1899. The mission was located in Dhamtari.

The Home and Foreign Relief Commission (q.v.), which was organized in 1897, a committee under the Mennonite Evangelizing and Benevolent Board, withdrew from the parent organization and organized itself independently on Nov. 22, 1897. It continued in existence as a companion organization to the Board until 1906-7, when the latter became the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. Its chief work was to send relief to India in 1897-98 and support famine orphans in India in the years immediately following.

The final stage of organization of the Mennonite Evangelizing and Benevolent Board was the merger with the Mennonite Board of Charitable Homes and Missions (q.v.) at a joint meeting of the two boards at Rittman, Ohio, on May 22, 1906. Thus at last the general mission and charitable organizations of the church were unified and a strong and broad base created for the expanding work of the Mennonite Church in these fields. Officers of the Evangelizing and Benevolent Board in 1896-1906 were A. B. Kolb president to 1905, J. K. Hartzler, Daniel Shenk, A. R. Zook successive vice-presidents, the latter 1900-5, C. K. Hostetler secretary to 1905, except for the first year when G. L. Bender served, G. L. Bender treasurer throughout except for the first year when C. K. Hostetler was treasurer. In 1925, in preparation for the merger, the following officers were chosen: J. S. Shoemaker president, D. S. Yoder vice-president, I. R. Detweiler secretary, G. L. Bender treasurer. The minutes of the Board to and including 1897 were reprinted in the Gospel Herald for March 11, 18, and 25, 1952 (254-57, 278-80, 302). H.S.B.

Levi Hartzler, A Brief History of Mennonite Missions (Elkhart, 1955).

Mennonite Evangelizing Committee, the first organization for evangelistic and mission work in the Mennonite Church (MC), was organized on Dec. 28, 1882, at Elkhart, Ind., by members of the Elkhart congregation acting as private persons. The pastor, J. F. Funk, was the leading spirit in promoting it, and the chairman for several years. The report of the organizing meeting states that it was decided to form a "local permanent organization consisting of a managing committee of three, plus a secretary and treasurer." The first election placed J. F. Funk, Martin Wenger, and Henry Brenneman on the managing committee and Joseph Summers and J. J. Hostetler as treasurer and secretary. The Committee actually was an unofficial organization formed to carry out the decision of the Indiana Conference of Oct. 13, 1882, "that means should be collected for the purpose of defraying the expenses incurred in traveling to visit scattered members and churches." A meeting of the Committee on March 15, 1883, decided to enlarge its purpose to include fund-raising, "also to preach the Gospel where our church and doctrines are not known." It decided to activate the conference request to hold quarterly offerings. It also decided that it should work under the Elkhart congregation. At the first annual meeting J. F. Funk and J. S. Coffman were elected president and secretary respectively, Coffman serving a number of years. The members of the managing committee for several years were Martin Wenger, Noah Hoover, and Henry Brenneman. Later A. B. Kolb was a leading member. Although the Committee was local, it held most of its meetings as public sessions in the Mennonite meetinghouses south of Elkhart, and did much to promote interest in evangelism through its programs. The last meeting was held on Jan. 20, 1892, when the Committee was transformed into the Mennonite Evangelizing Board (q.v.). The work of the Committee was usually small (e.g., 1887, $118.61), although in 1890 it reached a peak of $718.97. The minutes of the Committee were printed entire in the Gospel Herald for March 4, 1952, pp. 230-33. H.S.B.

Mennonite General Conference is the over-all representative body of the Mennonite Church (MC), formally organized in 1898. Since the locus of authority in the Mennonite Church is the district conference, and the general boards and institutions of the church are independent and self-perpetuating, the General Conference has remained from the beginning advisory and consultant in relation to the district conferences and general boards. In fact four district conferences of the church (Franconia, Lancaster, Washington Co., Md. and Franklin Co., Pa., and Ontario Amish) have never formally joined the General Conference, although they participate in varying degrees in General Conference work and all but the third work in the General Council of General Conference. They are fully a part of the Mennonite Church nevertheless. In spite of its lack of authority the pronouncements of the General Conference in matters of faith and life carry great weight, and the work of the committees which it has created and directs has had and still has great value and influence for the church at large.

In 1957 the committees of the General Conference were the following: Executive Committee, General Council, Commission for Christian Education, Peace Problems Committee, Committee on Economic and Social Relations, General Problems Committee, Ministerial Committee, Mennonite Mutual Aid, Committee on Worship (projected for creation at 1957 session).

The General Council, established in 1951, which acts as the interim representative body for the General Conference, is composed of the officers of the G.C., a representative from each G.C. committee, each district conference and each church-wide general board, with a total membership in 1957 of 35. It has become an important body, meeting three or four times between the biennial sessions of General Conference. It recommends the General Conference biennial budget, approves the biennial conference program, counsels the General Conference committees at their request, and acts in emergencies for the General Conference. It does not have administrative responsibility for General Conference committees; they are directly responsible to the General Conference. Since 1953 the conference has had an executive secretary. The first incumbent is Paul Erb, still serving.

The delegate body of General Conference was formerly constituted of all the ordained bishops of the church, delegates elected by conference, and one representative from each General Conference committee. In 1955 the basis of representation was changed so that now the delegate body consists of all members of the General Council and delegates elected from the district conferences at the rates of one delegate to 200 members, but bishops from nonelecting conferences are recognized as delegates ex officio. The number of delegates in attendance in recent sessions averages 125-150, with a total audience varying from 1,500 to 6,000.

The sessions of General Conference are held biennially in the odd years, usually entertained by the larger Mennonite communities. They combine business sessions for the delegates with general and inspirational addresses.

A preliminary session was held in 1897 at Elida, Ohio, the first regular session at Wakarusa, Ind., in 1898.

The proceedings of the conference have been regularly printed, and since 1925 include the full text of all reports and the text of most or all of the programmed sermons and addresses. H.S.B.

H. S. Bender, "The Function and Authority of General Conference, A Review of Past History," Gospel Herald XXXVII (1944) 289 f., 306, 316 f.; Proceedings of the Mennonite General Conference, Including Discussions Leading to Its Origination (1890-1919) (Scottdale, 1921).

Mennonite Girls' Center (MC), located at 412 E. Lincoln Ave., Goshen, Ind., was founded for the purpose of providing a Christian home for Mennonite girls who are working in Goshen. This 16-room building was purchased in May 1947 and dedicated on Dec. 1, 1947, with 16 roomers. The Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Mission Board and the Women's Missionary Auxiliary sponsor the work of the Center and appoint a committee of four members for a term of two years, which effects its own organization and appoints a fifth member who serves as executive vice-chairman and manager. This committee also secures the matron in charge of the Center. The Center has served more than 165 girls from 12 different states and various denominations, providing Christian fellowship, conveniences, various activities, and social contacts. A.Br.

Mennonite Girls' Home (Reading, Pa.). Because many girls from outside this immediate area were working as domestics in Reading, and a few were attending night school or taking nurses' training in the city hospital, the Girls' Home was opened at 704 N. 12th Street in 1935, to serve as a home for those who roomed away from their place of employment and as a congregating center for the others on hours off duty. These benefits, with a licensed placement agency, made this a real home for such girls. Margaret Horst was for many years matron of the Home. As a home and girls' center only it has continued over the years, with Elsie Gehman as chairman of the management. It is sponsored by the Eastern Board of Missions and Charities, and has been a real asset to Mennonite missions in the city. In 1937 alone, 63 girls had contact with the Home, and in two years 150 girls from thirteen states and numerous conferences used its facilities. I.D.L.

Mennonite Girls' Home (Saskatoon, Sask.). With the immigration of Mennonites from Russia to Canada in 1923-30, many girls worked in Saskatoon to aid their parents, who had lost their possessions during the Revolution in Russia, in establishing new homes and in repaying the transportation debt to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The Home Mission Board (GCM) was interested in the spiritual welfare of the girls in the city and on the recommendation of David Toews of Rosthern established the Girls' Home (dedicated on Jan. 29, 1931), with the following aims: (a) to provide the girls with a home as a substitute for their parental home; (b) to find suitable employment for the girls and, where necessary, to protect them from exploitation; (c) to give them the necessary spiritual guidance. J. J. Thiessen and Mrs. Thiessen were in charge of the home from the beginning until its closing in 1956.

On Thursday afternoon and evening, when the girls were off duty, they gathered in the Girls' Home for relaxation, recreation, and fellowship. Whenever possible the girls attended the church services in the First Mennonite Church of Saskatoon. During their association with the Mennonite Girls' Home and the church many of the girls were received into the church by baptism.

The largest attendance was registered in the depression years. During World War II many girls went home to the parental farms to replace their brothers who were drafted. At the close of the war and the following years, with the coming of the Mennonite refugees to Canada, the number of Mennonite girls working in the city again increased. Since the establishment of the home over 500 girls of various denominations have availed themselves of the services of the Mennonite Girls' Home in Saskatoon. The twenty-fifth anniversary of the home was celebrated on Jan. 29, 1956. J.J.Th.

Mennonite Gospel Center (MC), 1238 Washington Ave., Kansas City, Mo., was one of the two descendants of the Mennonite Gospel Mission (q.v.) of Kansas City, Kan., the other being the Morris Gospel Hall, R. 2, Kansas City, Kan. The Center was organized in 1946. Edward Yoder was superintendent from the beginning of both locations until he withdrew from the Mennonite Church to start an independent work in 1951, when the membership was 41. Morris Gospel Hall was destroyed by the great Kansas City flood about that time, and F. B. Raber took charge of the Gospel Center. In 1956 John T. Kreider was in charge, with a membership of 39. H.S.B.

Mennonite Gospel Mission, Ft. Wayne, Ind.: see Fort Wayne First Mennonite Church.

Mennonite Gospel Mission (MC), Kansas City, Kan., was opened in 1905 at 200 S. 7th Street, under the direction of a local mission board appointed by the Missouri-Iowa and the Kansas-Nebraska district conferences; later the work was taken over by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. In February 1946 the Mission was discontinued and the Argentine Mennonite Church (q.v.) was organized as its direct successor, acquiring 130 of the 176 members of the Mission.

The following served as superintendents in the order named: J. F. Brunk, J. D. Charles, C. A. Hartzler, J. D. Mininger, Wm. Smith, and Edward Yoder. Many persons have contributed years of service as mission workers, assisting the superintendent and matron. J. D. Mininger (q.v.) was the long-time superintendent and outstanding leader. The original building at 200 S. 7th Street was sold and a church was built at 3701 Metropolitan Ave., Kansas City, Kan., and dedicated Feb. 25, 1925. Additional places of worship were located at Morris, Kan., and at 1238 Washington Ave., Kansas City, Mo. When the Argentine Mennonite Church was organized these two places were continued as missions under the joint name of Twin City Missions (q.v.), the Washington Avenue place being called the Mennonite Gospel Center (q.v.). R.P.H.

Mennonite Gospel Mission, Norristown, Pa.: see Norristown First Mennonite Church.

Mennonite Gospel Mission, a project of the Pigeon River Conservative Mennonite Church, is located near Vassar, Mich. Work was begun here by Emanuel Swartzendruber in 1939. In 1945 Orie Kauffman took charge of the mission, moving into the community in 1948. In 1950 a new church was dedicated. The membership in 1956 is 15; Elam Bender is pastor in charge of the mission. Or.K.

Mennonite Gospel Mission Church, Peoria, Ill., was opened in 1914 by the Home Mission Committee of the Central Conference (GCM). Jacob Sommer, who was assisting at the Mennonite Gospel Mission in Chicago, was called to open this new work in Peoria. The first service was held in a rented store building at 920 North Adams St., with 37 in attendance; in 1916 the present building was erected at 1001 North Adams St. At present (1956) there is a church membership of 148, which affords a strong working group for constant need of mission work in a city such as Peoria, and the minister is Samuel Ummel, with Melvin Norquist as assistant. S.U.

Mennonite Hilfs-Plan (Aid Plan) of Moundridge, Kan., a mutual fire and storm insurance association, was organized Jan. 13, 1900, to serve all branches of Mennonites in the prairie states, chiefly Kansas. In 1953 it served 3,000 members with $20,000,000.

Mennonite Historical Association (Society) of North America was founded at the General Conference Mennonite Church sessions at Bluffton, Ohio, Sept. 2, 1911, by individuals interested in collecting and preserving historical material pertaining to the Mennonites. Those present at this first meeting were N. B. Grubb, H. P. Krehbiel, Eddison Mosiman, C. H. Regier, J. R. Toews, Gerhard Penner, C. H. A. van der Smissen, S. M. Grubb, H. D. Penner, N. W. Bahnmann, H. A. Bachmann, S. K. Mosiman, J. H. Langenwalter, J. S. Krehbiel, A. J. Krehbiel, G. Wiebe, H. H. Ewert, G. A. Haury, J. W. Kliewer, John H. von Steen, Hermann Wiebe, and D. C. Welty. A second meeting was held on September 5, at which time N. B. Grubb was elected president; S. K. Mosiman, vice-president; H. P. Krehbiel, secretary; G. A. Haury, treasurer. Twenty-two charter members joined the newly founded organization, each one paying one dollar membership dues.

The next meeting of the Association took place in connection with the General Conference Mennonite Church sessions at Meno, Okla., at which time S. M. Grubb presented a paper, "The Importance of Collecting Historical Material of Our Denomination." H. R. Voth was elected president; S. K. Mosiman, vice-president; H. P. Krehbiel, secretary; and G. A. Haury, treasurer. The executive committee was given authority to make changes in organization in line with the needs and to ask the Conference to set aside at the next session a whole evening for the Mennonite Historical Association. During the General Conference sessions in Reedley, Cal., in 1917 the Association presented its first report. From then on the reports were printed with the Conference minutes. A constitution had been printed in German and in English. The dues were now one dollar for five years, and ten dollars for a lifetime. Membership was 117. H. R. Voth, who had done most in collecting materials, was chairman at this time. The classification of some 6,400 items was under way. G. A. Haury was also actively engaged in collecting materials. Some of the material was kept in the vault of the Herald Publishing Company and some at Bethel College, both at Newton, Kan. Periodicals, books, photographs, manuscripts were being collected, filed, and catalogued "during the late hours of the night" in the home of the chairman, H. R. Voth. At the Freeman Conference sessions in 1923, the officers H. R. Voth, H. P. Krehbiel, and G. A. Haury reported that 2,110 items of the 10,240 objects collected had been catalogued. The pressing question as to where to place and make available the collected material was answered when Bethel College offered space in the newly erected Science Hall.

The reports of the Association for 1925 indicate that plans were under way to establish a Mennonite Memorial Museum on the Bethel College campus to house the collection. The reports of 1926 and 1929 also emphasized this need. When the report of 1933 was given, the chairman, H. R. Voth, had passed away and the work came to a near standstill. The executive committee of the Association, consisting of P. H. Richert, P. H. Unruh, A. J. Dyck, and H. P. Krehbiel, stated that "the extensive collection of the historical material continues to be stored rent-free in a fireproof vault owned by H. P. Krehbiel." The latter was the chief promoter of the Association at this time. In 1938 he proposed the erection of a Mennonite Historical Institute. C. E. Krehbiel also became active in the Association at this time. However, meanwhile the Mennonite historical libraries (q.v.) at Bethel College, under the able direction of A. Warkentin, and at Bluffton College, under the senior historian C. Henry Smith, had become the chief centers of collection and preservation of Mennonite materials within the General Conference Mennonite Church.

The special Historical Committee, which gave its first report at the Conference sessions in 1941, was now appointed by the Executive Committee of the General Conference, consisting of J. R. Thierstein, H. P. Krehbiel, A. Warkentin, and H. A. Fast. This interim committee worked in close harmony with the Bethel College Historical Library. The bulk of the material remained in the H. P. Krehbiel vault but material received at this time was placed in the Bethel College Historical Library with a college or conference label. The Conference made $25.00 available monthly for the cataloguing of such materials. The members appointed to this special committee at the 1941 Conference were A. Warkentin, H. A. Dyck, P. A. Penner, E. E. Leisy, and C. Henry Smith. In 1947 a permanent Historical Committee (q.v.) of the General Conference Mennonite Church was appointed, with A. Warkentin as chairman, Cornelius Krahn as secretary, and C. Henry Smith, A. J. Dyck, E. E. Leisy, and Paul R. Shelly as members, which took over the responsibility of the old Mennonite Historical Association, and the latter was dissolved. The collection of the Association located in the H. P. Krehbiel vault at Newton was transferred to the Bethel College Historical Library, some of which was later transferred to the Mennonite Biblical Seminary Library, Chicago, and other Mennonite libraries.

The Mennonite Historical Association was the first organization among the Mennonites of North America to pioneer in the preservation of valuable Mennonite documents. C. H. Wedel (q.v.), who died when this organization was coming into being, had laid the foundation, and inspired the younger generation to preserve records of the heritage which would have otherwise been lost. A list of the materials collected by the Association is to be found in the Bethel College Historical Library. C.K.

Minute Book of the Mennonite Historical Society (Association), 1911-31, kept by H. P. Krehbiel, contains constitution, minutes, membership lists, and articles received (BeCL); reports of the Mennonite Historical Association in Minutes and Reports of General Conference Mennonite Church, 1917, 1920, 1923, 1926, etc.

Mennonite Historical Bulletin is published by the Historical Committee of the Mennonite General Conference (MC). The first issue appeared in April 1940 and for two years it remained a four-page semiannual publication. Since 1942 four issues a year have been published, two of which have been eight-page since 1952. It features biographies, local church history, family history, book reviews, and other articles of a semipopular nature. The Bulletin has maintained the same format, 8½ by 11 in. Editors have been John C. Wenger, Edward Yoder, Grant Stoltzfus, Melvin Gingerich, and John A. Hostetler, who is the present editor (1956). M.G.

Mennonite Historical Library of Bethel College (or Bethel College Historical Library), North Newton, Kan., had its beginning at the turn of the century, when C. H. Wedel (q.v.), the first president of Bethel College, engaged in Mennonite research, taught Mennonite history, collected materials, and published books along these lines. The C. H. Wedel Collection and the acquisitions for the college library in his days are evidence of this. Historical books and artifacts were kept in the Bethel College Museum located in the Science Hall. Various faculty members were in charge of this growing collection, which also contained Mennonitica. In 1932-33 the Museum was reorganized by a committee headed by Abraham Warkentin. The Museum proper was now transferred to Alumni Hall, and the Mennonite books and documents of the Museum, together with those from the college library, became the nucleus of the present Bethel College Historical Library. The cataloging of books was begun on March 30, 1937, by Mrs. P. S. Goertz, who continued this work for a number of years and devised a cataloging system for Mennonite libraries based on the Dewey Decimal Classification system. By Jan. 1, 1940, 1,130 books had been cataloged. Warkentin served as director of the library from the reorganization until 1944, when Cornelius Krahn succeeded him. In 1933-53 the Historical Library was housed in the basement of the Science Hall, in which a vault had been established. During the summer of 1953 the Historical Library was moved to its present location, the basement floor of the new college library building. Some of the rooms have been furnished by friends of the library in memory of their relatives. John and Linda Warkentin furnished the director's room in memory of Abraham Warkentin; Mrs. Elva Leisy furnished the office in memory of her father, H. P. Krehbiel; Cornelius J. and Aaron J. Claassen established the Cornelius Jansen Collection and furnished the vault, etc.

The new rooms were planned to house the following major divisions of the Mennonite Historical Library: books, periodicals, archives, photographs, charts, microfilms, slides, works of art, special collections, and Mennonite Life, (q.v.).

(1) In the book division it is aimed to collect books and pamphlets dealing with any phase of Anabaptist-Mennonite history. The number of cataloged books in 1955 was over 10,000, exclusive of reference books, periodicals, annual publications, etc. The 16th- and 17th-century items are kept in the vault of the library.

(2) In the periodical division all official Mennonite papers, some Mennonite community papers, conference reports, school publications, church bulletins and yearbooks are kept on display for a year, then bound. Some 200 current periodicals are received.

(3) The archives contain church records, diaries, special collections—some of which are special memorial units, such as the Rodolphe Petter Collection, A. A. Friesen Collection, J. H. Janzen Collection, and Cornelius Jansen Collection (see Archives). A large special fireproof vault houses this material.

(4) Several thousand photographs and slides dealing with various phases of the Mennonites covering a period of centuries are being cataloged. Over 2,000 cuts used in Mennonite Life have been cataloged and filed. Slides on Mennonites and church history are made available for classes, lectures in churches, etc.

(5) Microfilms are kept in a special room with a microfilm reader. The collection contained over 100,000 exposures in 1955, owned by the college and the General Conference Historical Committee. Many documents pertaining to the Mennonites of America have been microfilmed, but the greater portion consists of European Anabaptist sources. Most important among them are the Archives of the Mennonite Church of Amsterdam, the largest collection of this kind, which has been completely microfilmed.

(6) The Mennonite Art Collection contains original etchings and paintings by Rembrandt, J. Ruisdael, the Mesdags, D. Wohlgemuth, and many contemporary Mennonite artists. In addition to this there are many etchings of Mennonite leaders, etc.

(7) Several hundred different Bible translations and editions, some going back to the 16th century, have been collected. The library has a nearly complete collection of the Mennonite songbooks used in Prussia, Russia, and America.

An increasing number of graduate and undergraduate students as well as interested laymen avail themselves of the research opportunities, for which three special study-rooms are available. Numerous dissertations and theses have been written on the basis of the facilities offered by the library. The Historical Library is constantly in use in the production of Mennonite Life, the MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA, and other publications.

The Historical Library collects books, documents, etc., from the churches and homes of its constituency and purchases rare Mennonitica through funds made available through the college, special donations from individuals, and the allowances of the G.C. Board of Education and Publication. Although it is the aim to collect everything pertaining to the Mennonites everywhere, the library is probably most complete in the areas dealing with the Mennonites of Holland, Prussia, Russia, Poland, and the Prairie States and Provinces. It is the only library of its kind west of the Mississippi River.

Since 1947 the director has been ably assisted by John F. Schmidt, who is particularly in charge of the archives, periodicals, photographs, microfilms, and slides. C.K.

Peter J. Wedel, The Story of Bethel College (North Newton, 1954) 489 ff.; John F. Schmidt, "The Story of a Library," Menn. Life IX (April 1954) 68 ff.

Mennonite Historical Library of Bluffton College is a collection of books, periodicals, microfilm, pictures, vertical file material, etc., by and about Mennonites, concerning their history, doctrine, and culture. It is especially designed to serve the Mennonite constituency of Bluffton College, viz., the Eastern, Central, and Middle District conferences of the General Conference Mennonite Church, but is open to anyone who desires to use its materials.

The collecting of materials for the Mennonite Historical Library was begun by C. Henry Smith (d. 1948). About 1928 Edna Hanley, then librarian of Bluffton College, began to arrange the material as a separate collection. Especially significant in the growth of the library was the accession of the Grubb Collection of Mennonite History, the lifetime collection of Mennonite materials by father and son, Nathaniel B. Grubb and Silas M. Grubb of Philadelphia, Pa., and the C. H. Smith Collection of Mennonite History donated by C. Henry Smith in 1943.

The entire collection contains approximately 4,000 books, files of about 250 Mennonite periodicals, about 6,000 frames of microfilm and other materials as maps, clippings, etc. The Library is particularly strong in materials on Swiss, South German, and Eastern American Mennonite materials and also Mennonite family histories. D.L.G.

Mennonite Historical Library of Goshen College, Goshen, Ind., a research collection of books, pamphlets, periodicals, microfilms, photocopies, manuscripts, maps, pictures, museum items, and other materials relating to Anabaptist and Mennonite history. The collection was begun by action of the Alumni Association of Goshen College in 1906 at the suggestion of C. Henry Smith. Collection of materials began in earnest in 1924, when H. S. Bender and Ernst H. Correll came to the faculty. Since that time the collection has grown steadily through the gifts of books and other materials received from many individuals and agencies, and through purchases with funds allocated from the budget of the Goshen College Library or provided by the Mennonite Historical Society, an organization of Goshen College faculty and students.

From time to time the holdings have been augmented by the accession of large groups of materials representing the personal collections of individuals. Notable among these have been the books and papers of John F. Funk (1835-1930), Elkhart, Ind., publisher and leader in the Mennonite Church; S. D. Guengerich (1836-1929), Wellman, Iowa, publisher, schoolteacher, and lay leader among the Amish Mennonites (Old Order); W. J. Kühler, professor of church history in the theological faculty of the University of Amsterdam and the Mennonite Seminary there, and librarian of the Library of the United Mennonite Church (Bibliotheek der Vereenigde Doopsgezinde Gemeente) in Amsterdam; and Christian Hege (1869-1943), Frankfurt, Germany, one of the coeditors of the Mennonitisches Lexikon. The most outstanding of these collections, however, is the library collected by John Horsch (1867-1941), Scottdale, Pa., the first American Mennonite to devote major time to research in Anabaptist history. This collection, which has been kept separate as a memorial to Horsch, is particularly rich in German and Swiss Reformation history and is of value to those who are studying the Reformation movement in these countries, as well as to the student of Anabaptist and Mennonite history.

At present (April 1957) the collection contains more than 13,000 books, pamphlets, and bound periodicals. The microfilm collection includes approximately 150 items. Among the books and microfilms are 150 items with an imprint date of 1600 or earlier, many of which cannot be found elsewhere in the United States. There are more than 22 vertical file drawers of pamphlets, folders, photocopies, maps, photographs, etchings, engravings, seminars, term papers, manuscripts, and other materials of varying importance. Additional manuscript materials, numbering in the thousands and belonging to the Mennonite Historical Library, are deposited in the Archives of the Mennonite Church (q.v.).

As the property of Goshen College, the Mennonite Historical Library is administered as part of the Goshen College Library. Since 1949 Nelson Springer has been in charge of it. It was housed in the basement of the Memorial Library Building at Goshen College, occupying one large room, which served as reading room and stacks. Adjacent rooms housed the Archives of the Mennonite Church. The close proximity of these two collections was of mutual benefit to their administration and use. In late 1958 the library and archives were transferred to the new building of the Goshen College Biblical Seminary.

While the users of the Mennonite Historical Library have included many persons from many places, the faculty and students of Goshen College use its resources constantly. The fine quality of scholarship which has characterized the Mennonite Quarterly Review, published by the Mennonite Historical Society of Goshen College since 1927, would have been impossible without the resources of the collection. While H. S. Bender has been more active than any other individual in the building of the collection, he has also drawn most heavily on its resources for his research and editorial work and for his course in Mennonite History in the Goshen College Biblical Seminary. Other men on the Goshen College faculty who have done outstanding research in Mennonite history, doctrine, and life have included Ernst H. Correll, Robert Friedmann, Melvin Gingerich, G. F. Hershberger, John Umble, John C. Wenger, Edward Yoder, and S. C. Yoder. The location of the central editorial office of the MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA in an adjoining room has enabled the editorial staff to draw constantly on the resources of the collection. N.P.S.

R. Friedmann, "The Mennonite Historical Library of Goshen College," in The American-German Review IX, No. 2 (December 1942) 12-14; N. P. Springer, "The Mennonite Historical Library at Goshen College," and "The Holdings of the Mennonite Historical Library," MQR XXV (1951) 296-306, 307-19.

Mennonite Historical Library of the Mennonite Biblical Seminary in Chicago, Ill., was begun by Abraham Warkentin, the first president of the institution, who was intensely interested in the matter and had previously served as collector for the Historical Committee of the General Conference. Coming to the Seminary in 1945 he brought much historical material and continued gathering. The largest quantity of material in the beginning came from the collection of the Mennonite Historical Association made by such men as H. R. Voth and H. P. Krehbiel, which had been gathered at Newton, Kan., and stored in the H. P. Krehbiel vault. This provided sets of early church periodicals as well as books and pamphlets of interest. Noteworthy items were also contributed from duplicate items in the Bethel College Historical Library. Duplicate files at Bluffton College provided a large supply of church periodicals. Continued additions to the library are financed from certain memorial funds and a grant of $200 given annually since 1952 by the General Conference Historical Committee for the acquiring of research material in the field of Mennonite literature.

The Historical Library is located in a fireproof vault on Seminary property with convenient arrangements for access and study. The accessions at the present time (1955) number 1,560 volumes and include valuable historical books from Holland and Germany, as well as several hundred volumes of bound Mennonite periodicals in English, German, and Dutch. S.F.P.

Mennonite Historical Series, sponsored by the Historical Committee (q.v.) under the General Conference Board of Education and Publication, was started in 1949 when From the Steppes to the Prairies appeared. The Committee members at that time were S. F. Pannabecker, chairman; Cornelius Krahn, secretary; J. Herbert Fretz, J. H. Janzen, E. E. Leisy, and J. D. Unruh. The second publication was Leland and Marvin Harder's Plockhoy from Zurikzee. The Study of a Dutch Reformer in Puritan England and Colonial America (1952). The third was the study by Gustav E. Reimer and Gustave R. Gaeddert, Exiled by the Czar. Cornelius Jansen and the Great Mennonite Migration, 1874 (1956). Hans Fischer's Jakob Hutter is in print (1956). The Historical Committee selects, edits, and publishes the books of this series through the means of budget allowances and other sources, and the Mennonite Publication Office, Newton, Kan., markets the books. As a rule the books consist of original studies in the field of Anabaptist-Mennonite history and thought. C.K.

Mennonite Historical Society (of Goshen College) was founded in October 1924, after an earlier organization by the same name founded on the Goshen College campus in 1921 by John J. Fisher and others had discontinued. The membership of the Society, which has varied from 50 to 125, is limited to the faculty and students of Goshen College and occasional persons from the immediate community. The Society has regularly held three or four meetings during the school year, at which scholarly and popular addresses are given. It has given strong support to the Mennonite Historical Library at Goshen College, having contributed over $8,000 for this purpose. It has been the publisher of the Mennonite Quarterly Review since its founding in 1927, and has been the publisher (since 1953 editor only) of the scholarly monograph series known as "Studies in Anabaptist and Mennonite History," in which eight volumes have been published since 1929. Subsidies have been granted to others. The officers in 1957 were H. S. Bender president (since the beginning in 1924), G. F. Hershberger vice-president (1925-32, 1935-), J. C. Wenger secretary (1947- , following Silas Hertzler 1927-41 and John Umble 1941-47), J. Howard Kauffman treasurer, and S. C. Yoder as a member of the executive committee (1943-). Ernst Correll was an active member of the organization 1924-29, having been a cofounder. The Society is governed by a board of fifteen directors, twelve of whom are faculty members and three students. In addition to the officers listed above the following have been long-time directors and are still serving: W. H. Smith since 1930, Nelson Springer since 1938, Carl Kreider since 1945, and Melvin Gingerich since 1947. H.S.B.

Mennonite Historical Society of Iowa was organized Sept. 7, 1948, at Wellman, Iowa, with Thomas Miller as president. Its purpose is to promote the local history of the Mennonites and Amish Mennonites in Iowa, particularly in the local settlements around Kalona, Wellman, and Wayland, including preservation of historical records and materials. It holds occasional public meetings, usually annually. Elmer G. Swartzendruber, local historian, was the prime mover in organizing the society. H.S.B.

Mennonite Home (MC), a home for the aged in Lancaster, Pa. Through the vision of the Sunday School Mission, the foresight of Abram B. Eshleman of Millersville, and the gift of a site by John L. Landis, the Mennonite Home, 1520 Harrisburg Pike, Lancaster, Pa., was opened on April 1, 1905. Jacob H. Mellinger (1866-1934) was the first steward. John L. Landis (1834-1911) donated two adjoining farms, which made it possible for the Home to operate on a self-supporting basis ever since. Abram K. Diener (1842-1911) was the second steward 1906-8, followed by Jacob Benner (1851-1917) until 1911. Tobias E. Moyer (1863-1933) served until his death, followed by John N. Wissler until 1937. Phares N. Frank (1881-1944) served until his death, followed by Jacob Thomas for 16 months and Jacob D. Mellinger since 1946. The board of trustees, headed by Bishop Jacob T. Harnish, is composed mostly of deacons. Many additions have been made to the building, so that the present residential capacity is 135, of whom 123 are aged guests. I.D.L.

Mennonite Home for the Aged, Albany, Ore., was established in 1946, and is operated by a local board of five men under the Pacific Coast Conference (MC). In 1956 it had 57 guests; the superintendent and matron were Mr. and Mrs. Joel D. Roth. H.S.B.

Mennonite Home for the Aged, Eureka, Ill., is operated by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC). Authorized in 1921, the Home was dedicated July 23, 1922. It is located on a hill north of the city, and accommodates 47 persons, including the workers. Five acres of the 18-acre tract are used for the buildings, garden, and orchard. In 1946 the institution became a licensed nursing home. J. D. Smith served as superintendent of the Home from its beginning until his retirement in 1947, when Clayton Sutter was appointed to the office. Earl Greaser became superintendent of the home in 1956. M.G.

C. F. Derstine, "The Mennonite Home for the Aged," Christian Monitor, January 1923.

Mennonite Home for the Aged (GCM), located at Frederick, Pa., had its beginning when N. B. Grubb (q.v.) purchased the former Frederick Institute on Feb. 11, 1896. It was a three-story brick building erected in 1857, with three acres of land. On March 24, 1896, the Eastern District Conference (GCM) purchased this property from Grubb. The Mennonite Home for the Aged was dedicated and officially opened on Sept. 1, 1896. The buildings consist of the main building, a south wing added in 1928, the three-story Stetler property located across the street and occupied by members of the staff, 22 acres of adjoining land purchased later, and the administrator's residence erected in 1954. A $400,000 building program was instituted in 1957 to add 39 rooms, a chapel, and an elevator.

In 1956 there were 31 guests and a staff of 10. The Home is controlled by a board of managers of nine members elected by the Eastern District Conference. In 1956 they were Freeman H. Swartz, chairman; Vernon F. Detweiler, secretary; Harry M. Detwiler, financial secretary and (now also) treasurer; William H. Mohr, vice-chairman; Eugene S. Oberholtzer, Stanley Stauffer, Lester Shaffer, Willis A. Moyer, and Stanley Fretz. Mr. and Mrs. Wilmer S. Shelly were the administrators. W.S.S.

Mennonite Home Mission (MC), a congregation located at 1907 South Union Avenue, Chicago, Ill., a member of the Illinois Conference, was started as a mission station in 1893 by Dr. S. D. Ebersole, Dr. W. B. Page, M. S. Steiner, and J. S. Coffman, assisted by Mennonite medical students and other Mennonites living in Chicago. It had its beginning in a four-story building at 639 West 18th Street. From there it moved to its present location. There have been 17 different nationalities represented in the church and 20 in the Sunday school. In the (1956) membership of 123, about 50 per cent were of non-Mennonite background. The ministers in charge of the church in 1956 were Laurence M. Horst and James Christophel (licensed minister). One of the outstanding events in the history of the congregation was a combined missionary meeting, dedication service, and twenty-fifth anniversary celebration, which lasted four days in January 1919. The outstanding superintendent in the history of the mission was A. Hershey Leaman (1878-1950), who served the mission as pastor 1905-20. E.Le.

Emma Oyer, What God Hath Wrought (Elkhart, Ind., 1949).

Mennonite Homes: see Refugee Camps.

Mennonite Hospital, located at Bloomington, Ill., came into being through a growing concern on the part of Mennonite leaders in the Central and Evangelical (then Defenseless) Conference churches in Central Illinois, that provision be made by and in behalf of the Church, for the carrying out of Christ's command to "heal the sick." They were encouraged and aided by Bloomington physicians, particularly Dr. E. P. Sloan, nationally known surgeon, who served for many years as chief of the medical staff. The Mennonite Sanitarium Association (q.v.) was organized on Jan. 23, 1919, its membership consisting of delegates from the constituent churches. (The name was subsequently changed to Mennonite Hospital Association, q.v.) A board of five directors was chosen, consisting of Emanuel Troyer, who served as president until his death in 1942, Benjamin Rupp, John Kinsinger, Allen Miller, and J. H. King. The board was subsequently enlarged to nine members, three being elected each year by the Association at its annual meeting in January.

A property was purchased on North Main Street in Bloomington, and the first patients entered on May 1, 1919. While plans were afoot for the construction of a new building, it was learned that the Kelso Sanitarium at 807 North Main Street was available and by action of the Association it was purchased at a cost of $75,000, the purchase being made by five men making themselves personally responsible for the amount, for which fact many of them paid heavily in later years. In 1931-32 the present main building was added to the single fireproof structure in the Kelso plant. After weathering the depression, the institution grew rapidly in favor and patronage, and the southern east wing of 45 rooms was added in 1941-42. In 1944-45 the Troyer Memorial Nurses' Home with a capacity of 80 was built; and in 1956 the northern east wing was completed, giving the hospital a total capacity of 130 beds.

Benjamin Rupp was the first superintendent of the hospital, serving in that capacity until 1927, at which time N. O. Hoover became administrator and held that position for more than 29 years. The present administrator is Theodor F. Kaap, Jr. The hospital also operates the Mennonite Hospital Training School for Nurses (q.v.) with a usual complement of 65 girls in training.

In 1956 the institution served a total of 7,357 at an operating cost of $719,384.91. Births numbered 901. Total assets of the institution are listed by the auditor as $1,147,261,99, with a net worth of $772,354.19. Not more than 4 per cent of its patients come from its constituent churches. The hospital seeks to render a service in behalf of the church and in the spirit of Christ, and the testimony of many who are served by it attests to the fact that it is serving that purpose. R.L.H.

Mennonite Hospital and Sanitarium, La Junta, Col., is a general hospital with a separate building for the treatment of tuberculosis, operated by the Mennonite (MC) Board of Missions and Charities, Elkhart, Ind. The purpose of the hospital is to provide medical, surgical, and nursing treatment for the sick and to provide for nursing education; the sanitarium is limited to patients with tuberculosis. The ultimate purpose is to carry a witness for Christ by ministering to both body and soul.

Since tuberculosis patients were generally sent to an arid climate for treatment in those early days, many found their way to the west, and Mennonites from eastern sections of the Mennonite Church (MC), principally Virginia and Ohio, settling in Colorado found themselves confronted with the problem of caring for these sick people. At first some of them were taken care of in homes, but the need of an institution for their care was evident. Individuals such as D. S. Brunk, D. S. Weaver, and J. F. Brunk of the La Junta-Holbrook settlement then conceived the idea of organizing a sanitarium. Steps were immediately taken to organize a stock company for this purpose, and some certificates of stock were sold. The proposed plan was then presented to the Kansas-Nebraska Mennonite Conference meeting in Hubbard, Ore., in 1905, which passed a resolution approving the project. However, the association idea was soon dropped, and the project was taken over by the Mission Board. A fund of $10,000 from the Mrs. Snavely Estate in Ohio was used for the proposed sanitarium. It was built on a hill overlooking the Arkansas Valley, about 5 miles west of La Junta, and dedicated Oct. 28, 1908, with accommodations for 38 patients.

Very early in the development it was felt that the service should be adapted also to take care of general medical and surgical cases, and an appeal was made to the Mission Board to build a new hospital. The Board then leased a building located in the city and owned by the La Junta City Hospital Association, a 25-bed institution built with very limited resources. This equipment was turned over without cost to the Board, and on Jan. 1, 1920, four nurses from the Sanitarium, Lydia Heatwole, Ada Burkhart (Ziegler), Ruth Erb (Ebersole), and Gladys Grove, began to operate the institution for the care of general medical, surgical, and obstetrical cases. At the General Conference session of 1921 final approval was given to the Mission Board to proceed in building a hospital. The original sanitarium was then sold and the sale price applied to the new building, which was built in La Junta in 1927 and dedicated on Easter Day of 1928. In 1946 a new wing was built to this hospital. In 1949 a new nurses' home was built for students in the La Junta Mennonite School of Nursing, which was established in 1915. The general hospital is a 108-bed institution, with 18 bassinets. During the last 10 years (1944-54) the average number of patients admitted annually was 2,994; the average number of babies born annually was 724.

The tuberculosis wing of this new institution had been operated as a tuberculosis sanitarium since it was built in 1928, but the reduction of the incidence of tuberculosis led to such a reduction of patient census that the state, which had been paying for all patients, directed the closing of the sanitarium on March 1, 1955. This marks the end of a 46-year period of experience in ministering to those afflicted with this disease. Many are helped physically, some were helped spiritually, and many nurses were trained to care for the sick. From the beginning, Christian services were held in which patients were invited to participate. In late years, a chaplaincy program has been organized and executed in the institution. From the La Junta nursing school movement has developed the present Goshen College Collegiate School of Nursing. A.H.E.

Mennonite Hospital School of Nursing. The Mennonite Hospital (q.v.), Bloomington, Ill., organized in 1919, included in its organizing statement provision for a school of nursing, which was established at the very beginning, the first class graduating in 1922.

The hospital and the School of Nursing are under the control of the board of trustees as one institution. Responsibility for the formulation of the curriculum in its relationship to the State Department of Registration and Education and to co-ordinate the factors which go into the education of Christian nurses falls to the School of Nursing Advisory Committee, composed of the Director of Nursing Service and Education, Educational Director, President of the Board of Trustees, hospital administrator, a member of the Alumni Association, a member of the faculty of the Illinois State Normal University, and a lay member of the Mennonite constituency.

The course requires 1,374 hours of formal classroom work during the three-year period. Applied nursing experience is gained in the hospital itself. College credit is received for work done at Illinois State Normal University, and there is opportunity for co-ordination with Bluffton College, Bluffton, Ohio, to receive a Bachelor's degree in Nursing.

The School of Nursing has graduated 439 nurses, many of whom have entered some form of full-time Christian service. Graduates are now serving in Liberia, British West Africa, Belgian Congo, and Nepal, in addition to the United States. N.O.H., T.F.K.

Mennonite Hospitals and Homes, Association of, founded in 1952, serves as a fellowship for counseling and inspiration, composed of representatives of most of the North American institutions included under the title. It meets annually in connection with the annual meeting of the American Hospital Association. The officers in 1956 were H. J. Andres (Newton) president, H. Ernest Bennett (Elkhart) executive secretary. H.S.B.

Mennonite Hour, The, the official broadcast of the Mennonite Church (MC) through the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (q.v.), was formally begun in June 1951, under a private organization of Mennonite men, largely at Harrisonburg, Va., who formed the Mennonite Crusaders (q.v.) to take over the half-hour Sunday broadcast of a male quartet from Eastern Mennonite College called "Crusaders for Christ," which had begun in March 1951 over the local Harisonburg station WSVA. In January 1952, B. Charles Hostetter became the radio pastor, a position he still held in 1957. In June 1953 the Crusaders entered into an agreement with the MBMC, whereby the planning and promoting of the broadcast became a co-operative venture under an administrative committee of the Board called "Radio Evangelism Committee." The Crusaders, who had been incorporated in Virginia June 1952, continued to operate and finance the broadcast, however, and did so until 1956, when its name was changed to Mennonite Broadcasts, Inc. (q.v.). The Mennonite Hour is a half-hour program, basically of worship and preaching. The radio pastor delivers a ten-minute sermon, and music is provided as a cappella singing by the Mennonite Hour Chorus, composed largely of community people and students of Eastern Mennonite College. The program director is Norman Derstine, a local Mennonite minister; music director, Earl Maust of the E.M.C. faculty. The international English version is called "The Way to Life." In early 1957 the Mennonite Hour was broadcast over seventy stations in the United States and foreign countries. Of this number, 56 were in the United States, two in Canada, plus broadcasts in Ceylon, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Jamaica, Liberia, Tangier, Panama, Philippines, Puerto Rico, and Viet-Nam. The weekly listening audience was estimated in 1957 at five million. The program is self-sustaining, supported largely by voluntary contributions from the listening audience. The Mennonite Hour Informer has been published monthly since 1952, and the Mennonite Hour Prayer Guide monthly since 1953. H.S.B.

Mennonite Indemnity, Inc., a reinsurance corporation serving all Mennonite Aid societies desiring to participate, incorporated in Pennsylvania in 1957. Sixteen societies were the initial participants. A board of twelve directors is elected by the stockholders. The first officers were S. S. Wenger (Lancaster) president, Elvin Souder (Souderton) vice-president, Wayne W. Martin (Goodville, Pa.) secretary-treasurer; the capital was $150,000. The MCC nominates the board of directors and exercises a paternal influence. H.S.B.

Mennonite Land Settlement Association was formed by a group of Mennonites (GCM) interested in organizing an inter-Mennonite settlement of landless people, particularly young married couples living in Ontario and western Canada. The Association was organized in 1953 to assist in buying livestock, machinery, and if possible, suitable farm lands. Any member of any branch of Mennonites in Canada was eligible to join the association. While not an official agency of the church, the Mennonite Land Settlement Association was organized with the express purpose of strengthening the church, by establishing new Christian communities.

Because of high costs of land and farm machinery, it was found impossible to raise the necessary capital to launch an effective settlement program. The ease of getting city jobs at high wages by farm young men further complicated the aid program. Because the Association has been unable to achieve its purposes, it is now inactive. J.W.F.

Mennonite Land Settlement Board was organized in July 1924 to take over from the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization the work of land settlement. It had nine members, three each from the CMBC, the Central Mennonite Immigration Committee, and the Canadian Pacific Railway. Its work was financed by the Canada Colonization Association, a subsidiary of the C.P.R. In 1929 the Board was discontinued and its work taken over by the Canadian Colonization Association (see Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization). The original executive committee was David Toews, chairman, T. O. F. Herzer, and A. A. Friesen. J.G.

Mennonite Life, a 48-page illustrated quarterly magazine, published by Bethel College, North Newton, Kan., "in the interest of the best in the religious, social, and economic phases of Mennonite culture." The magazine, begun in January 1946, presents Mennonite principles, doctrines, culture, and history in a popular and illustrated form based on thorough research, to readers in all Mennonite groups and branches the world over. A large staff of co-workers contributes articles from all parts of the world where Mennonites reside, and the resources of the Bethel College Historical Library are constantly used to illustrate and check contributions. During the first ten years of publication over 3,000 ilustrations appeared on its pages, most of which had never before appeared in print and were rather unique. Many works of Mennonite artists, poets, and writers of fiction have been published. Annually in April all books and articles dealing with Anabaptist-Mennonites published during the preceding year are listed under the title "Mennonite Bibliography." The same issue publishes reports on "Mennonite Research in Progress" in the field of Mennonite beliefs, history, culture, etc. The issue of January 1956 contains an exhaustive index of authors, titles, and topics for the first ten years (1946-55). The circulation of the magazine has been between 2,000 and 3,000, but an edition of 4,000 is printed. The issue during the first year (1946) was semiannual.

Mennonite Life is published by Bethel College under the auspices of an executive board. The chief responsibility of the editorial work rests with the editor, Cornelius Krahn (1946), and John F. Schmidt, assistant editor (1947). Among the associate editors and contributors the most active have been J. W. Fretz, Melvin Gingerich, Erland Waltner, M. S. Harder, and Andrew Shelly. The subscription price has always been $2.00. C.K.

Mennonite Medical Association, an organization formed in 1944 for Mennonite (MC) physicians and Mennonite medical students. Its officers (1956) are president, Galen Miller, Elkhart, Ind.; secretary-treasurer, Charles Neff, Street, Md.; vice-president, Meryl Grasse, Calico Rock, Ark. Samuel J. Bucher, Harman, W. Va., is the editor of the Mennonite Medical Messenger, a quarterly which publishes news items from the various members of the Association. There are 105 members in the Association. The Association has an adoption program whereby physicians and students in the states "adopt" those physicians who are serving in relief or missionary work in order to develop a closer link with those who are serving in foreign lands. S.J.B.

Mennonite Men or Men's Brotherhood is an organization within the General Conference Mennonite Church with divisions in district conferences and local congregations. The first organization of this type within the Conference originated in 1918 in the Zion Mennonite Church at Souderton, Pa., after Maxwell H. Kratz of Philadelphia had challenged the men at the Eastern District Conference during the preceding year to greater activity within the local congregations and the Conference. The "Mennonite Men" of the Eastern District Conference has met annually since 1918. They raised money for the Mennonite immigrants from Russia to Canada to help them pay for their transportation and had an active part in developing the Eastern Conference camp, Men-O-Lan (q.v.).

In 1945 at the General Conference Mennonite Church sessions at Bethel College steps were taken to organize "Mennonite Men" on a General Conference scale. Ever since the "Mennonite Men" of the General Conference reports about its work at all triennial Conference sessions.

At the Northern District Conference sessions in 1950 held at Mountain Lake, Minn., the Northern District "Mennonite Men" was organized. As a rule they meet in conjunction with the district conference sessions. One of the outstanding projects of this district was the purchase of a bulldozer which arrived at Fernheim Colony, Paraguay, in 1952. The brotherhood raised $18,468.94 for this purpose.

The Western District "Mennonite Men" was organized in September 1950. They have assisted youth fellowship in the development of Camp Mennoscah (q.v.), in purchasing a linotype for the Mennonites in Brazil, and numerous other projects. They have published The Spotlight since 1950.

At present the General Conference "Mennonite Men" is trying to organize additional districts. One of the projects is to assist the Mennonites of Paraguay in road construction. Another project is in the field of boys' work and youth activities. Officers in 1957 were John O. Schrag president, Menno Schrag vice-president, and Carl M. Lehman secretary. C.K.

"Mennonite Men at Work," Menn. Life IX (October 1954) 167-71; Reports and Official Minutes of the General Conference Mennonite Church, 1947, 1950, 1953, 1956.

Mennonite Mental Health Services, Incorporated, an agency holding title to mental hospitals established by the Mennonite Central Committee, and responsible for policy guidance and technical consultation in the operation of those hospitals. It was incorporated on Dec. 12, 1952, as a successor to a Mental Health Services Committee which as the Homes for Mentally Ill Planning and Advisory Committee formed by MCC on Jan. 3, 1947, had planned the three-hospital program. Initial members, all of whom were directors of the corporation, were George Classen, Titus Books, Dr. Paul M. Nase, and Henry Martens, in additon to officers H. A. Fast president, E. C. Bender vice-president, Delmar Stahly secretary, and Orie Miller treasurer. At its annual meeting on Dec. 27, 1956, the MCC approved a reorganization of its mental health program and called for a change of function and make-up of MMHS during the ensuing year. At a meeting of the new members on April 6, 1957, officers elected were Dr. H. Clair Amstutz chairman, Robert Kreider secretary, Orie Miller treasurer. Other members at that time were Dr. Otto Klassen, Dr. Norman Loux, H. A. Fast, and Frank Peters. Although the stated purpose of MMHS changed little, the reorganization effected during 1957 was significant and involved the establishment of responsible local boards for the operation of each mental hospital, administrative responsibility having theretofore rested directly with the Executive Committee of the MCC. A more specific policy code was established by MMHS, with a full-time staff member responsible for representing the concerns of the Corporation in co-ordinating the various hospital programs and in serving Mental Health interests of Mennonite churches in liaisonship with professional, voluntary, and governmental organizations within the field. The corporation maintains an office in connection with the Mennonite Central Committee at Akron, Pa. See Brook Lane Farm, Prairie View Hospital, and Kings View Homes.) D.S.

Mennonite Migration Aid Society was founded after World War I to aid Mennonites from Russia in their attempt to settle in North America. The business office was in Newton, Kan., and the Executive Board consisted of H. P. Krehbiel, president, C. E. Krehbiel, secretary, and J. G. Regier. Other members were P. H. Unruh, Gerhard Regier, and P. H. Richert. According to the files of the president of this organization the primary purpose seems to have been to settle a group of Mennonites from Russia in Mexico at San Juan, Irapuato, and Gto. The Society dealt with Mennonite immigrants from Russia, the government of Mexico, land agents of Mexico, the Dutch Immigration Bureau, of Rotterdam, and the Mennonite congregations who supported the project. The settlement in Mexico was unsuccessful. The activities of the Society and the settlement have not been fully investigated. C.K.

Mennonite Mission Board (MC) of Ontario. The Mennonite Conference of Ontario, seeing the need for urban evangelization within the conference area, organized the City Mission Board in 1907 when the Toronto Mission began, and four years later the Mennonite Board of Finance. In 1914 the conference, to build up isolated and declining congregations in the conference district, appointed a committee of five to provide for rural mission work in Ontario. A constitution was prepared and at the 1915 session the Mennonite Board of Rural Missions was established. After some years it seemed advisable to unify the various mission interests in Ontario; accordingly, on Sept. 11, 1929, the former organizations were dissolved and the Mennonite Mission Board of Ontario was fully organized in their place. In 1953 changes were made in the constitution to provide for a missions council. Until 1952, when a conference charter was inaugurated, this mission board was also the charatered body of the conference for the holding of properties. J.C.F.

Mennonite Mission Church (MC), 1530 Lyon Street, Hannibal, Mo., formerly known as the Mennonite Gospel Mission, 2313 Market Street, is a member of the South Central Conference, with a membership in 1956 of 77. Mennonite services were first conducted in Hannibal by members of the Palmyra Mennonite Church in 1927. Nelson E. Kauffman was appointed the first superintendent by the Missouri-Kansas District Mission Board in 1934, and the congregation was organized in August 1934. A church was built at 1530 Lyon Street in 1936. Young men have been given missionary apprenticeship experience there since 1939. Nelson E. Kauffman served as the minister from August 1934, and bishop from September 1940, with Harold Kreider as minister. In 1956 Kauffman moved to Elkhart, Ind., and Kreider became pastor of the congregation. N.E.K.

Mennonite Missionary Messenger, an illustrated 4-page monthly, published by the Home and Foreign Relief Commission (MC), Elkhart, Ind., devoted to mission interests, "especially to the care and support of orphans," appeared first in April 1901 as a supplement to the Herald of Truth; it ran only a few months. A. C. Kolb was editor. N.P.S.

Mennonite Mutual Aid, Inc., was incorporated in 1945 as an Indiana nonprofit corporation sponsored by the Mennonite General Conference (MC) to provide a means within the church for its members to carry out the historic Mennonite practice of sharing financial burdens and providing loan aid to those in need of assistance. The first project was assisting in the rehabilitation of returning Civilian Public Service men. At present loan aid is given to any member, provided satisfactory local credit is not available and the applicant merits assistance. Financial counsel and vocational placement services are provided. A plan for sharing expenses of hospitalization, surgical and burial aid is carried on by a subsidiary Pennsylvania nonprofit corporation called Mennonite Aid, Inc. (q.v.). Another subsidiary Pennsylvania nonprofit corporation called Mennonite Automobile Aid, Inc. (q.v.), has been organized to share costs of automobile collision and comprehensive expenses. Another Indiana nonprofit corporation, the Mennonite Foundation (q.v.), is recognized by the Treasury Department of the United States as a depository for tax exempt funds, therefore bequests, legacies, or gifts of property to the Mennonite Foundation are deductible as provided by law. Orie O. Miller has continued as president of Mennonite Mutual Aid from its beginning. C. L. Graber has been secretary-treasurer from its beginning to 1954 and continues as its treasurer. Original Board appointees, made by Mennonite General Conference, and still active members are Guy F. Hershberger and H. A. Diener. Also Simon Gingerich and John H. Alger were original appointees but recently retired from active participation. Later appointees now serving are E. C. Bender, vice-president; Harry Wenger, John D. Burkholder, J. Robert Kreider, H. Ralph Hernley, Abram P. Hallman, and Harold L. Swartzendruber, secretary. H.L.S.

Mennonite Mutual Aid Association, Kalona, Iowa, a mutual fire and storm insurance organization, organized originally in 1913 as the Mennonite Aid Plan of Iowa, was reorganized and incorporated in 1948 under its present name, in Washington County. It has permission to do business in this county and any other adjoining it. In 1957, with a property coverage of $14,000,000, it had over 800 members. Membership in the association is open to "persons of the Mennonite or Amish faith who are in good standing in their church." L.G.G.

L. G. Guengerich, "The Mennonite Aid Plan of Iowa," MHB, December 1946.

Mennonite Mutual Aid Society of Bluffton, Ohio, a mutual fire and storm insurance association, was organized June 5, 1866, to serve the Swiss Mennonites of Allen, Putnam, and Hancock counties, Ohio, but no longer restricts its membership to Mennonites. It was incorporated April 10, 1907. In 1953 it had 852 policy holders with a property coverage of $7,500,000. H.S.B.

Mennonite Mutual Fire Insurance Association of Intercourse, Pa., was organized Aug. 17, 1893, to serve all branches of Mennonites and Amish in Pennsylvania. In 1953 it served 8,116 members with a property coverage of about $38,000,000. H.S.B.

Mennonite Mutual Insurance Association of Ohio, a mutual fire and storm insurance association, with office at Orrville, Ohio, was organized in 1897 to serve all branches of Mennonites. In 1953 it had 5,550 members with over $55,000,000 property coverage. H.S.B.

Mennonite Mutual Insurance Company of Kansas. When the Mennonites migrated from Prussia to Kansas in the latter 19th century, they brought with them the system of mutual insurance. (See Tiegenhöfer Privat Brandordnung; also Insurance.) The minutes of the earliest organization of the Newton Mutual Fire Insurance Company were destroyed by fire, but is is certain that the association was in operation in 1879 and for at least a brief time previously. An early experience of the fire association was the fire at Halstead, Kan., the headquarters of the association, which destroyed the Mennonite Book Concern, one of the company's risks. In 1880 the company was incorporated and chartered as the Mennonite Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Kansas.

Outstanding among the organizers and founders of this association were David Goerz, Bernhard Warkentin, William Ewert, H. Richert, and B. Buhler. The headquarters of the association today are at Newton, Kan.

At first this insurance company accepted only Mennonites as members, but in time began to include others. In 1937 the name of the organization was changed to Midland Mutual Insurance Company (q.v.); it is a commercial mutual and is no longer a strictly Mennonite company. J.W.F.

Mennonite Observer, a 12-page, 10¼ x 12½ in. weekly companion to the Mennonitische Rundschau, has been published by the Christian Press at Winnipeg, Man., beginning on Sept. 21, 1955, with Leslie Stobbe as editor. The first six numbers had only eight pages. H.S.B.

Mennonite Old People's Home (MC), Maugansville, Md., was opened Jan. 1, 1924, with Ben Stauffer as superintendent, who served until 1938. He was followed by Laban Eshleman 1938-44, S. L. Horst 1944-47, Henry Hostetter 1947-53, Samuel J. Diller 1953- . The average number of guests is 20. It serves the Washington Co., Md., and Franklin Co., Pa., Conference district. S.J.D.

Mennonite Old People's Home (MC), located near Rittman, Ohio, is a charitable institution built in 1901 on a 155-acre farm given by D. C. Amstutz to the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities for such a home. Board members were Christian P. Steiner, Menno S. Steiner, David S. Yoder, Lewis J. Lehman, and Abram Metzler. The first building, having a capacity of 34 inmates, burned to the ground in 1919, but through the untiring efforts of S. E. Allgyer, the present home, with a capacity of 41 inmates, was dedicated on Jan. 1, 1939. Since that time, under the care and direction of Aaron J. Peachey and wife, who are still (1956) serving as superintendent and matron, approximately 280 different persons, from at least eight states and seventeen different denominations, have been cared for. The present members of the board are Melvin Hartzler, chairman; Herman Brenner, Lloyd Sommer, and Melvin Rohrer. A.J.P.

Mennonite Orphan and Childrens Aid Society was organized in Halstead, Kan., in 1893 for the purpose of caring for orphans and other needy children either by keeping them at an orphan home or placing them with Christian families. This organization was started in order to give opportunity to a wider circle to share in the Christian service to homeless children which was started when the Leisy Orphan Aid Society (q.v.) was incorporated in 1884. The organization held annual meetings and printed its activity reports. Annual memberships were available for $5.00 and life memberships for $100.00. A total of 426 membership certificates were issued. Later the Mennonite Orphan and Childrens Aid Society merged with the Leisy Orphan Aid Society. C.K.

Mennonite Orphan and Childrens Aid Society of Halstead Kansas. Reports 1894-1911.

Mennonite Pioneer Mission, an agency of the Bergthaler Mennonite Church of Manitoba, began mission work in Chihuahua, Mexico, in 1944. Because of visa and other difficulties, the work had to be abandoned in 1948. In the same year work was begun among Indians and other settlers in the Lake Winnipeg area of Manitoba. Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Unrau were the first missionaries. To these have been added Mr. and Mrs. Edwine Brandt, partial support; Mr. and Mrs. Henry Neufeld, Helen Willms, Mary Janzen, Mr. and Mrs. Larry Klippenstein, and Mr. and Mrs. Otto Hamm, besides associate workers in the public schools of the area. Mr. and Mrs. Peter Falk are supported under the Congo Inland Mission and Anne Penner under the General Conference board in India. The 1956 budget was $24,500.

The mission board members are elected by the several congregations. The following are in the present (1955) executive committee: George Groening, chairman; Bernie Leoppky, vice-chairman; H. J. Gerbrandt, secretary; J. N. Braun, treasurer. Plans are now under way to amalgamate this work with that of the Canadian Conference of Mennonites (GCM) in 1957.

The mission has been publishing a bimonthly bilingual, six-page periodical, which is sent to all members of the church. H.J.G.

Mennonite Press is a joint venture of the Board of Education and Publication of the General Conference Mennonite Church and Bethel College (q.v.) of Newton, Kan. It came into official existence July 1, 1949, after a two-year period of negotiations, its purpose, as expressed in the charter, being "to merge their respective printing interests in a jointly operated Press." It is controlled by a separate board consisting of five members, two of whom are selected by each of the two parties to the venture for indeterminate tenure and a fifth being elected by these four. The first chairman of the Board was H. J. Andres. The Mennonite Press is responsible to the Conference through the Conference Board of Education and Publication, and to the Bethel College through its board representatives. It is located at 2513 North Main St., North Newton. Official reports showed net assets of $20,827.37 at the close of 1949, and $52,135.50 on June 30, 1954. It began with five full-time employees in 1949; in 1954 there were nine. The Press does general letterpress and offset-process printing, as well as extensive mailing operations for various church bodies. The first manager was Bernhard Bargen. Dan Epp is the present (1957) manager. B.B.

Mennonite Publication Board (MC) was organized in 1908, and chartered in the State of Indiana. For ten years previous to this, conviction had been developing in the Mennonite Church (MC) that the denomination should own its publications. The Kansas-Nebraska Conference so expressed itself in 1898. By November 1907, when the Mennonite General Conference met at Kokomo, Ind., nine conferences had appointed representatives on a proposed church-wide publishing organization. General Conference approved the plan and appointed three representatives. The Board was organized at Goshen, Ind., on Jan. 8, 1908, and elected the following officers: J. S. Shoemaker, president; Jonathan Kurtz, vice-president; S. H. Miller, secretary; Abram Metzler, treasurer. Shoemaker had served as chairman of the organizing committee, and was president until 1933. Succeeding presidents have been D. D. Troyer, M. H. Shantz, Simon Gingerich, John C. Wenger, and E. C. Bender.

The Board purchased the assets of the Gospel Witness (q.v.) Company and the Mennonite Book and Tract Society (q.v.) of Scottdale, Pa. It also purchased the church periodicals published by the Mennonite Publishing Company (q.v.) at Elkhart, Ind. Publishing headquarters were established at Scottdale as the Mennonite Publishing House (q.v.). The Gospel Herald (q.v.) was established as the official organ of the church and began publication, with other periodicals, in April 1908.

This Board now has a membership of more than thirty, including representatives from all district conferences, from the Mennonite General Conference, and members at large. It meets annually to hear reports, elect officers, and consider needs and policies. Between meetings its business is conducted by the Executive Committee. The Board produces and distributes books, periodicals, tracts, and educational materials. Its net worth as of Dec. 31, 1956, was $1,019,223.72. It owns the publishing headquarters at Scottdale and retail outlets at Scottdale, Lancaster, New Holland, and Souderton, Pa.; Goshen, Ind.; Kitchener and London, Ont.; and Bloomington, Ill. The general management of the affairs of the board is in the hands of a Publishing Agent, who is appointed by the Board. The Board is autonomous in its operation, but reports to the biennial sessions of the Mennonite General Conference. Officers following the 1957 election were: E. C. Bender, president; Clarence Lutz, vice-president; Harold Zehr, secretary; C. L. Graber, financial agent; John C. Wenger, fifth member of Executive Committee. A. J. Metzler is the Publishing Agent. Annual reports have been published every year since the beginning (1908) in the Gospel Herald. P.E.

Mennonite Publishing Company, Elkhart Ind., the successor to the firm of John F. Funk and Brother, was chartered in 1875 and completed its chartered life of fifty years, although it sold its periodical publications (Herald of Truth and Mennonitische Rundschau) in 1908 to the Mennonite Publication Board (q.v.) which had just created the Mennonite Publishing House (q.v.) as the publishing agency for the Mennonite Church (MC). The Mennonite Publishing Company was a stock company, whose stock was widely held in the eastern Pennsylvania section of the Mennonite Church. Due largely to a bank failure and a fire it was forced to bankruptcy in 1903 with heavy loss to its stockholders. Its president throughout its history and business manager until about 1900, was John F. Funk (q.v., 1835-1930), an outstanding leader in the Mennonite Church (MC). The Mennonite Publishing Company did an outstanding service in its book and periodical publications both in German and English, serving not only the Mennonites and Amish Mennonites but also a large block of the Russian Mennonite immigrants, particularly in Manitoba. For the latter group it published the Mennonitische Rundschau (q.v.) and hymnals, catechisms, and confessions of faith.

Due to Funk's deep historical interest the Mennonite Publishing Company and its predecessor, John F. Funk and Brother, published two notable large historical works, Menno Simons' Complete Works (English 1871, German 1876), and the Martyrs' Mirror (German 1870, English 1886). Funk became the major publisher for the Mennonite Church (MC), publishing its hymnals, catechisms, confessions, yearbooks, Sunday-school literature, etc. Through his press as well as his personality Funk wielded immeasurable influence upon the cause and molded the course of its history in the second half of the 19th century, working for unity and progress. It was a tragedy that in his later years he lost much of the confidence of the church he once had, so that from about 1900 on his publishing work decreased in size and influence.

During the years 1880-1900, the Mennonite Publishing Company became the center of a group of younger progressive men, who found in its activities almost the only available outlet for their desire to serve in the church and who made significant contributions to the new day in the church. Among these were A. B. Kolb, A. C. Kolb, F. W. Brunk, J. S. Coffman, G. L. Bender, and John Horsch. H.S.B.

Mennonite Publishing House (MC), Scottdale, Pa., is the headquarters and chief place of business of the Mennonite Publication Board (q.v.). It is a church-owned nonprofit institution. Proceeds above expenses and additional capital for expansion go into subsidies for literature and other forms of church work. It dates from 1908, when the Mennonite Publication Board was chartered and made Scottdale its place of business. Three years previously the Gospel Witness Company had been organized and had begun the publication and sale of religious literature. Jacob S. Loucks, Aaron Loucks, and A. D. Martin had an important part in these first steps in the development of a church-owned publishing house. The assets of the Gospel Witness Company were purchased by the Mennonite Publication Board, and the two privately owned buildings which had been used by the Gospel Witness Company were rented until purchased in 1914. Expanding business made it necessary to build a new four-story building in 1921-22. Again in 1948-49 a three-story annex was added to this building. Together with the growth in floor space there has been commensurate addition of machinery and equipment and an increase in personnel. The number of employees in 1957 was about 175.

Aaron Loucks was the General Manager of the Publishing House from its beginning in 1908 until 1935, when A. J. Metzler became his successor (since called Publishing Agent). Others who had a large part in developing this business were Daniel Kauffman, M. K. Smoker, J. A. Ressler, Levi Mumaw, Henry Hernley, George Cutrell, C. B. Shoemaker, C. F. Yake, and J. L. Horst.

The Mennonite Publishing House is engaged in printing, publishing, and bookselling. It publishes periodicals (Gospel Herald, Christian Living, Youth's Christian Companion, Words of Cheer, Beams of Light, Christian Ministry, Christian School, El Heraldo, and The Way), tracts, books, and educational materials (Herald Uniform Sunday School Series, Herald Summer Bible School Series). It prints most of its own published materials and does much work for district conferences, institutions, and other organizations of the Mennonite Church (MC), although most of the district conference organs are not published by it. It sells by mail order and through eight retail stores (Scottdale, Lancaster, New Holland, and Souderton, Pa.; Kitchener and London, Ont.; Goshen, Ind.; and Bloomington, Ill.). Sales in 1956 totaled $1,289,646.86. The net worth of the Publishing House as of Dec. 31, 1956, was $1,019,223.72.

The Mennonite Publishing House is organized into five divisions: editorial, production, sales, finance, and personnel. The head of the institution is the Publishing Agent, who has an Assistant Agent. Heading the divisions, respectively, are the executive editor, the production manager, the sales manager, the treasurer, and the personnel director. Annual reports of the House have been published regularly in the church organ, the Gospel Herald, from the beginning in 1908, and an annual catalog has appeared every year since that time. P.E.

Mennonite Quarterly Review, a quarterly scholarly journal of 80 pages published by the Mennonite Historical Society, Goshen College, Goshen, Ind., first issue dated January 1927. It was preceded by the Goshen College Record Review Supplement (3 numbers in 1926). It is devoted largely to learned articles on Anabaptist and Mennonite history and theology, but also to current Mennonite issues and affairs, with sections on bibliographical and research notes and book reviews. It is the only journal of its kind, and its files are a rich treasury of historical materials. The editor from the beginning has been H. S. Bender. The circulation in 1956 was about 600. H.S.B.

Mennonite Relief and Service Committee. In 1926, after more than eight years of service, the Mennonite Relief Commission for War Sufferers (q.v.) came to an end as a separate organization and its functions were assumed by a committee of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (q.v.) of Elkhart, Ind. The new committee was known as the Mennonite Relief Committee, later renamed the Mennonite Relief and Service Committee. The Mennonite Relief Committee (MRC) and the Mennonite Relief and Service Committee (MRSC) have maintained a policy of supporting the work of the Mennonite Central Committee (MCC), and in addition of maintaining relief and service projects under their own administration.

During 1937-40 the MRC administered a relief program in Spain. Six workers were sent to the field and a total of $57,000 was contributed to the work by the Mennonite churches, besides a small amount of support by the Mennonites of the Netherlands. In addition, the MRC workers distributed large quantities of food contributed through the International Commission for the Assistance of Child Refugees to Spain.

From the beginning of the relief projects associated with World War II the MRC served the Mennonite Church (MC) constituency in supporting the MCC program with funds and personnel. During 1937-48 a total of 572 Mennonite relief workers were in the field, of whom 282 (49 per cent) were from the MRC constituency. In September 1945 the MRC opened a relief work under its own administration in Ethiopia. After the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (q.v.) established its mission in Ethiopia in 1949 the relief project in that country was taken over by the EMBMC. In 1944 an MRC unit of relief workers was working in India under general MCC administration and in 1946 a unit was working under similar arrangements in China. In 1946-48 an MRC unit was operated in Belgium, and 1947-49 one was operating in Poland. On Jan. 1, 1950, the MRC took over from the MCC administration of the La Plata, Puerto Rico, project and has administered it continuously since that date.

One of the wartime functions of the MRC was the raising of funds for the support of the Mennonite Church (MC) share of the Civilian Public Service (q.v.) program. During much of the time the quota for this service was fifty cents per member per month, which amount the MRC collected and paid to the MCC. Beginning March 1944 the MRC also administered for its constituency a CPS dependency support fund which continued for three years. During this period allowances of more than $130,000 were paid to CPS dependents. This does not include dependents from the Lancaster, Franconia, Virginia, Washington County, Md., and Franklin County, Pa., conferences, nor from the congregations of Fulton County, Ohio, which administered their own CPS dependency programs.

The MRC also administered a fund to provide tuition grants-in-aid for ex-CPS men studying in Mennonite colleges. This fund consisted of the surplus remaining in the CPS and the CPS dependency funds at the close of CPS, in addition to continued contributions from the churches as needed. During 1946-50 a total of 240 students at Goshen, Hesston, and Eastern Mennonite Colleges received grants-in-aid in payment up to a maximum of 27 months each. Total grants received by these men amounted to nearly $80,000, of which nearly $66,000 was paid by the MRC.

In 1943 the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities authorized the administration of a voluntary service (q.v.) program by the MRC. The first such service unit was of eight weeks' duration in the summer of 1944, with an enrollment of five workers, including the leader. In the four successive summers of 1945-48, the number of units with the number of workers was as follows: three with 15 workers, seven with 30 workers, 13 with 56 workers, and 16 units with 77 workers. In 1948 L. C. Hartzler was appointed the first full-time secretary of the committee with the title Secretary for Relief and Service. From this time the voluntary service program of the MRC experienced a steady growth, with long-term units in addition to the short-term summer units. In 1953 the MRC was renamed the Mennonite Relief and Service Committee. In 1953 Boyd Nelson succeeded Hartzler as Secretary for Relief and Service.

When the Selective Service System resumed the conscription of conscientious objectors in 1952 the MRSC established a I-W counseling service with responsibility for all I-W (see volume I, 697) men in the MRSC constituency. Beginning with age 16 a register is kept of all prospective I-W men. These men receive regular mailings of literature giving information regarding the services of the church to conscripted men. Financial support of I-W men in Pax (q.v.) and voluntary service units is the responsibility of the MRSC. A number of I-W centers and units are also administered under the direction of the I-W counseling service of the MRSC.

During the fiscal year 1956-57 the MRSC consisted of six appointed members, and the three chief officers of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities ex officio. The administrative staff consisted of Boyd Nelson, secretary for Relief and Service; Ray Horst, director of Voluntary Service; and Victor Esch, I-W Services counselor. During 1956-57 thirteen I-W units were under MRSC direction. The MRSC reported 27 short-term service units for the summer of 1956 with an enrollment of 22 men and 63 women. On Dec. 1, 1956, 25 long-term voluntary service units were in operation under MRSC administration with an enrollment of 167 persons, many of them being I-W men. G.F.H.

Mennonite Relief Commission for War Sufferers was organized in December 1917 with headquarters at Elkhart, Ind., its stated purpose being "to solicit, receive, hold and dispense or distribute funds or supplies for the relief of war sufferers." From the beginning of World War I the periodicals of the Mennonite Church (MC) stressed relief for war sufferers as an essential part of the Gospel message for nonresistant Christians. Following the entrance of the United States into the war, funds for this purpose began to flow into the treasury of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (q.v.). The MRCWS was then organized for the effective administration of a work which had begun in a more or less spontaneous manner.

The Commission was made up of one representative each from the district mission boards of the Mennonite Church (MC) plus three members appointed by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. It was organized with Aaron Loucks president, E. G. Reist vice-president, Levi Mumaw secretary, and G. L. Bender treasurer. Since the treasurer was also the treasurer of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, and the vice-president an officer of the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (q.v.), the relief program of the Mennonite Church was thus closely associated with its mission program.

In January 1918 the MRCWS took action to support the work of reconstruction in France under the administration of the American Friends Service Committee, and also the work of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, later known as the Near East Relief. This action was followed by regular monthly contributions to these two organizations. The MRCWS also organized among the women's sewing circles of its constituent congregations a program of sewing and knitting for the support of the relief work. The Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities co-ordinated its relief efforts with those of the MRCWS as did also the Nonresistant Relief Organization (q.v.), organized in 1917 by the Mennonite and Brethren in Christ congregations of Ontario.

By April 30, 1919, the receipts of the relief agencies of the church under the leadership of the MRCWS had amounted to more than $463,000. A report of the secretary-treasurer of the Mennonite Central Committee (q.v.), summarizing all Mennonite relief activities for the decade 1917-27, shows total contributions of approximately $2,500,000 for this period, of which amount approximately one half was contributed through the MRCWS and the agencies closely associated with it. The report shows a total of $339,000 contributed to the Near East Relief and $291,000 to the French reconstruction program. Of these two amounts all but $45,000 was contributed through the MRCWS and its affiliates. Most of the remainder of the contributions of the MRCWS were for relief work in Austria, Germany, and Eastern Europe, and (after the organization of the MCC in July 1920) for the support of Russian relief.

More than 50 Mennonites gave terms of personal service to the French reconstruction work. Some thirty served in the Near East Relief. These with others who served in Eastern Europe and in Russia make a total of nearly 100 men and women who served in foreign relief work under the auspices or sponsorship of the MRCWS.

Soon after its organization efforts were made to open foreign work to be administered directly by the MRCWS. As early as 1918 inquiry was made into the possibility of opening such work in Serbia or in Russia. When the first Mennonite contingent sailed for the Near East in January 1919, it was accompanied by William A. Derstine and Aaron Loucks, the president of the MRCWS, who explored the possibilities of an independent work in that region. When this proposal was found inadvisable the Mennonite workers entered service directly under the administration of the Near East Relief.

In the summer of 1920 the MRCWS co-operated with the relief agencies of other Mennonite groups in organizing the Mennonite Central Committee as a central Mennonite relief agency which then became responsible for the relief program in Russia. In May 1926 the MRCWS came to an end as an independent organization, when its work was taken over by the Mennonite Relief Committee, later known as the Mennonite Relief and Service Committee (q.v.), a committee of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. G.F.H.

Mennonite Relief Committee: see Mennonite Relief and Service Committee

Mennonite Relief Committee of India was organized in 1942 at the suggestion of the Mennonite Central Committee primarily to serve refugees whose coming to India from neighboring war-stricken countries was anticipated. The first meeting of representatives from the five Mennonite and related missions in India was held at Champa, C.P., on April 9, 1942, at which time plans for a relief program were considered and an organization effected. It was agreed that members should be elected to MRCI by the respective missions on the basis of one representative for every 15 missionaries or fraction thereof. This representation is as follows: M.C. (Dhamtari) two, M.B. (Hyderabad) two, B.C. (Saharsa) one, G.C.M. (Champa) two, and M.B.C. (Ragandih) one. The membership of eight has been maintained except in 1945-51, when the MCC had a director in India (along with other MCC workers) who also served on the MRCI. While war refugee needs were less than anticipated, MRCI had occasion to render aid to some such persons. The main relief projects, however, have been carried on in Bengal following the tidal wave disaster of 1943, in refugee camps of North India and Pakistan following the partition of the country in 1947, and in local communities of the several mission areas in times of crop failure.

The MRCI marked the first attempt at any organic relationship between the four Mennonite bodies and the Brethren in Christ working in India. This organization has emphasized a peace testimony along with its relief program and has aided in bringing together the historic peace churches found in India for conferences on peace. Two such conferences have been held in India since 1952 with members of the Brethren in Christ, Church of the Brethren, Friends, and Mennonite churches participating. S.M.K.

Mennonite Religious School at Winnipeg, Man., operating in 1932-46, was located in the Schoenwiese Mennonite Church and supported by the following churches: Schoenwiese, Schoenfeld, Lichtenau, Springstein, and Elim Mennonite church. The subjects of instruction were introduction to the Scriptures, the Christian faith, church history, the Mennonite heritage, church hymnology, and the German language. The teachers were the local ministers: J. H. Enns, J. J. Schulz, D. Loewen, and P. Dirks. The school offered a four-year course. It was followed by the Bible School at Altona and the Canadian Mennonite Bible College at Winnipeg. J.H.E.

Mennonite Research Fellowship was organized in 1945 at Bluffton, Ohio, to meet the desire of a number of Mennonite college faculty members to promote scholarship in the fields directly related to the Mennonite church, its history, faith, and life. It had 13 charter members. Membership is by invitation to scholars who are communicant members of some Mennonite congregation and who have a demonstrated capacity and achievement in research. Candidates for membership must have a minimum of publications directly related to Mennonites and the quality of writing must be at least on a Master's Degree level. The organization consists of a president, vice-president, and secretary-treasurer, who serve as the Executive Committee. The meetings are arranged for on an annual or biannual basis as circumstances may dictate. J.W.F.

Mennonite Research Foundation, a semiautonomous organization, chartered by the Mennonite (MC) Board of Education (q.v.) with office at Goshen, Ind., was founded in February 1947 to serve the research needs of the Mennonite Church (MC) by carrying on or aiding research and publication in such fields as Mennonite history, theology, sociology, education, evangelism, and current activities and problems. It is controlled by a board of seven directors appointed by the Executive Committee of the Mennonite Board of Education including representatives from the three major boards of the Mennonite Church (MC), education, publication, and missions, and its three colleges, Goshen, E.M.C., and Hesston. Officers from the beginning have been Paul Erb, chairman, H. S. Bender, secretary, A. J. Metzler, treasurer. Melvin Gingerich has been director of research from the beginning, with G. F. Hershberger serving as acting director 1955-57. The budget is supplied by contributions from the boards and a group of private supporters known as Mennonite Research Associates, plus fees charged for services rendered. H.S.B.

Mennonite Resettlement Finance, Inc., was incorporated as a nonprofit organization on Dec. 16,, 1946, to function as the trustee of funds received from the Mennonite Central Committee and others for the purpose of aiding and assisting in the migration, location, resettlement, and rehabilitation of Mennonite refugees and other individuals or groups served by the MCC. The members, constituting the Board of Directors and numbering not less than five and not more than eight, were appointed by the MCC for terms of one year. The officers—chairman, vice-chairman, secretary, and treasurer—were elected by the MRF Board members.

From the beginning of its function as a trustee, the economic problems of the settlement in South America, particularly in Paraguay, became a major concern of the MRF. Responsibility for receiving and administering additional loan funds was lodged in the MRF, as well as the trusteeship for receiving repayment on loans and for reinvestment. From time to time adjustments were made on the debts of immigrants.

On Dec. 30, 1954, the MRF was dissolved by action of the MCC annual meeting, and its functions and assets were transferred to the parent organization, the MCC. The directors at the time of liquidation were E. C. Bender, C. A. DeFehr, C. L. Graber, Abe M. Hallman, Raymond Schlichting, Elvin R. Souder, and William T. Snyder. W.T.S.

Mennonite School of Nursing, Beatrice, Neb., was founded at the Mennonite Deaconess Home and Hospital at Beatrice in 1911 shortly after the hospital was opened, and continued until 1929. The course of study was three years and included courses which led to high-school graduation and upon graduation from the School of Nursing eligibility for registration. Special courses in Bible, ethics, and the deaconess work were given. The school gave training to 27 girls; of these a number became ordained deaconesses and have devoted their lives to the care of the sick. The school was under the leadership of Sister Marie Wedel, Sister Elise Hirschler, Sister Sarah Rempel, Sister Magdalene Wiebe, and Herman Wiebe. In 1941-47 a two-year course in practical community nursing was offered under the leadership of Mrs. Ursula Penner Frantz.
E.P.Z.

Mennonite Settlers Aid Society, an organization incorporated in 1927 with headquarters at Newton, Kan. Its purpose was to assist General Conference Mennonites who were looking for farm land to settle in solid Mennonite communities. The Society reserved large tracts of land for periods of time in which General Conference Mennonites could ask for membership and buy land. The Society did not finance settlers nor did it buy the land directly. It merely negotiated for large blocks of land with agencies such as railroads and lumber companies. One of the first aids of the Society was to reserve 50,000 acres of cutover timberland in northeastern Washington through the Great Northern Railway.

Three settlements were attempted—one each at Elk, Deer Park, and Newport, Wash. None of these settlements flourished, although there is still a small Mennonite community at Newport, with a baptized membership (1955) of 54. This land was not suitable for general farming purposes. The Aid Society eventually disintegrated because it never enjoyed strong support. A number of the families attracted were Mennonite refugees who had come from Russia to the United States after World War I. The original founders and directors of the Settlers Aid Society were H. P. Krehbiel president, P. H. Unruh vice-president, A. J. Dyck secretary, and P. P. Buller and D. D. Unruh. J.W.F.

Mennonite Song Festival Society (GCM) became a permanent organization June 8, 1930, at a business meeting held in connection with a Sängerfest (song festival) at the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church near Goessel, Kan. The officers for this new society were John W. Unruh, president; Carl Krehbiel, vice-president; Isaac Balzer, secretary; and Weldon Rupp, treasurer. Other leaders in carrying on the work of this annual spring song festival for more than a quarter century include Walter H. Hohmann, G. F. Friesen, and the late Paul G. Baumgartner. This festival has become the largest Mennonite gathering of its kind in Kansas and probably in the United States.

Sängerfests were held in the communities of Newton, Moundridge, Goessel, and Buhler in the early 1920's, to which music organizations of the surrounding churches were invited. In accord with the newly adopted constitution this Sängerfest was now held at the various churches upon invitation, and all Kansas, Oklahoma, and Nebraska churches were invited to participate. The host church erected a large tent on the church grounds and by having the choirs sing in the church and tent alternately, a large listening audience of several thousand was accommodated quite adequately. Within a few years, however, the local churches were unable to accommodate such vast crowds, and in 1934 it was agreed to have the festival at Bethel College. Permanent bleachers were erected on the slopes of Kidron Creek and the festival was held out-of-doors. In the case of inclement weather the festival was held at Lindley Hall at Newton. Upon completion of the Bethel College Memorial Hall in 1942, Joliffe Auditorium became the meeting place for this festival. The constitution as revised in 1947 stipulates that "Memorial Hall is to be considered the home of the song festival unless it becomes necessary to meet elsewhere."

Approximately 30 churches from the Western District Conference participate in this annual festival. The idea of having a massed choir make up a part of the program has continued at every festival. This choir has sung such oratorios as the Holy City, Elijah, and practically all of the Messiah. At other times as many as 12 anthems, carefully selected by the officers, have made up an evening's program. German and English chorales and Gospel hymns are sung by the massed choir as well as by the entire audience. To complete the afternoon and evening programs mixed choirs and men's choruses, ladies' choirs, young people's choirs, ensembles, and in later years children's choirs have sung at the festival. Between 500 and 800 singers participate annually.

The Mennonite Song Festival Society endeavors to fulfill its stated purpose: "To glorify the name of God in song; to create opportunities for fellowship between the different Mennonite churches; to stimulate interest in church choir work; to constantly strive to improve the quality of the singing of choirs and congregations." E.N.

Mennonite Spanish Church (MC), 1014 South Blue Island Ave., Chicago, Ill., on the near west side of the city, was organized under the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities in 1934 with 14 charter members. The main services are bilingual, Spanish and English. The membership in 1956 was 64. Pastors who have served the church are David Castillo (4 years), Lester Hershey (5 years), D. Parke Lantz (one year), Elvin V. Snyder (one year), John Litwiller (2 years), and Mario Snyder (3 years). It serves the Latin-American community of Chicago.
D.Be.

Mennonite Teachers' Association (Lehrerverein), an organization established in the Chortitza, Molotschna, and other Mennonite settlements of Russia after the Russo-Japanese War (1905-6). Until then associations of this nature had been forbidden in Russia. A new educational organization was particularly urgent because the Mennonite Board (Council) of Education (Schulrat, q.v.) was losing its significance because of constant difficulties with regulations of the Russian Department of Education. The Mennonite Teachers' Association took over some of the functions of the Board, such as arranging for teachers' conferences where problems pertinent to education were discussed, such as methods, curricula, textbooks, and visual aids. Gradually the achievements and qualifications of the new organization were recognized by the constituency. Although there were some difficulties in working harmoniously with the Board there was co-operation among them. Major difficulties arose when a reactionary policy of the government set in. When World War I broke out the Association was forbidden because of its German background. After the March Revolution in 1917 the Association was revived and accomplished some significant tasks. Gradually it was discontinued because all teachers were expected to join the professional organizations of the Soviets.

The Mennonite Teachers' Association and its local branches in the various Mennonite settlements played a very significant role in improving standards of education through the means of a professional exchange of thoughts and experiences, and fellowship and mutual encouragement. C.K.

D. P. Enns, "Mennonite Education in Russia," Menn. Life VI (July 1951) 28 ff.; Peter Braun, "The Education System of the Mennonite Colonies in South Russia," MQR III (July 1929) 179 ff.; Leonhard Froese, Das pädagogische Kultursystem der mennonitischen Siedlungsgruppe in Russland (thesis at the University of Göttingen, privately mimeographed, 1949) 96.

Mennonite Teachers' Association (or Conference) of Kansas (Mennonitischer Lehrerverein) was founded in 1886 for the purpose of promoting Christian education among the Mennonites who had recently come from Russia, Prussia, and Poland. It was a continuation of a similar organization in Russia. H. H. Ewert of Halstead, Kan., called a first meeting of teachers in the spring of 1886, and a second meeting during the summer, at which a constitution was adopted, which was slightly revised and reprinted in 1910 and 1925. The Mennonite Teachers' Association grew out of the Kansas Conference of Mennonites (q.v.), which became the Western District Conference (GCM) and had originally concerned itself chiefly with matters of education. The Association met twice annually, during the Christmas and summer vacations. Local or district meetings of the Association were held at various places. These meetings took place in the school of the local teacher, where one of the teachers presented a demonstration lesson which was later criticized and used for discussion. A public program followed. The Mennonite Teachers' Association organized and sponsored the German Teachers' Institute (q.v.), which had its first session Aug. 6, 1894.

During World War I, when the feeling against the use of German was strong, the Association experienced a setback from which it never recovered. In 1924 the Association published the Lehrplan für Ferien-Bibel-Schulen (Lesson Plan for Vacation Bible Schools) prepared by a special committee. The Bethel College Monthly (Jan. 15, 1927) reports the 65th meeting, which was held on Dec. 28, 1926, at Newton. During the Christmas vacation of 1932 the 71st meeting was held (Mennonite Weekly Review, Jan. 11, 1933). The last meeting was held in 1941 at the First Mennonite Church of Newton. The interest in the organization had apparently disappeared.

In Nebraska the Mennonite teachers founded a Mennonite Teachers' Association in 1898, which included the teachers of Jefferson, Gage, Cumming, Hamilton, and York counties. The first meeting was held in Jansen. The activities were similar to those in Kansas, but the organization was discontinued at an earlier date. It is probable that similar organizations existed in Dakota and Minnesota.

The contributions made to Mennonite education by the Association during the difficult pioneer conditions have never been fully investigated and evaluated. A very valuable source for this purpose would be the questionnaires filled out by the 31 existing Mennonite schools in Kansas in 1892-93 (in BeCL), which give much information pertaining to schools, teachers, textbooks, etc.

H. H. Ewert (q.v.) organized a number of activities along the line of the Teachers' Association among the Mennonites of Manitoba. Before the turn of the century he introduced local monthly teachers' conferences in the various school districts under his supervision. The program was very much the same as in Kansas. During World War I these conferences were discontinued, and after the war attempts to revive them were not very successful. In 1900 Ewert created a German Teachers' Conference (Lehrerkonferenz) for Southern Manitoba, which met annually, alternating between Gretna and Winkler. Later Altona and Plum Coulee were added. The conferences usually lasted two days. First they were conducted in German and after World War I in English. In 1929 the Mennonite teachers who had come from Russia organized another (German) Teachers' Conference in Manitoba, which has its regular meetings. In 1948 it was decided at a teachers' conference to publish the Mennonitische Lehrerzeitung (later Mennonitische Welt), which appeared 1948-52. C.K.

H. P. Peters, History and Development of Education Among the Mennonites of Kansas (Hillsboro, 1925) 78 ff. (contains translated constitution); Statuten für den Mennonitischen Lehrerverein von Kansas (1886, 1910, 1925); P. J. Schaeffer, Heinrich H. Ewert . . . (n.p., 1945) 76-86; Theodore Schmidt, "The Mennonites of Nebraska" (thesis, University of Nebraska, 1933) 45 ff.

Mennonite Teachers' Institute: see German Teachers' Institute.

Mennonite Theological Seminary: see Amsterdam Mennonite Theological Seminary.

Mennonite Union Aid is an organization serving the members of the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, throughout North America in times of disaster caused by lightning, fire, and storm. The office is located at Montezuma, Kan. The organization began to operate on Oct. 1, 1943, and was adopted by the General Conference in November 1946. It functions under the direction of an Executive Board, a Board of Directors, and 41 local committees representing 41 districts in the United States and Canada. Mortgage certificates are recognized by loan companies. In April 1957 the assessed valuation was over $14,000,000, with 1,765 members. A.U.

Mennonite Voluntary Service, European organization: see Mennonitischer Freiwilligendienst.

Mennonite Weekly Review, published at Newton, Kan., by the Herald Publishing Co., appeared in its first introductory issue of Aug. 9, 1923, as a supplement of Der Herold. Its purpose was set forth in an editorial by H. P. Krehbiel, president of the Herald Publishing Co.: "When the Herald Publishing Co. was organized in 1920 the principal purpose was to create an institution through which literature in the German language would continue to be prepared, published, and circulated in behalf of our Mennonite people. But it was also recognized that in the central West the English language was rapidly coming into prominence among the incoming generation. . . . A year ago . . . it was decided to proceed to the establishment of an English Mennonite periodical suitable particularly to the needs of the Middle West."

Regular and independent publication as a 4-page, 6-column paper was begun Sept. 18, 1923. Gradually it became a 6- and 8-page paper, with space devoted to family, church and community events, articles on current issues, school reports, and a summary of news around the world. After mostly local circulation for ten years, the Mennonite Weekly Review later assumed the character of "A Mennonite Family Paper—Published in the Interest of Mennonites Everywhere," with readership extending into most branches of Mennonites throughout North America. Special columnists and contributors serving over a period of years include Peter Brown, J. W. Fretz, Melvin Gingerich, Cornelius Krahn, John P. Suderman, Andrew R. Shelly, and Ida M. Yoder. The 12-page tabloid format was adopted in 1951. Editors have been A. J. Krehbiel 1923-25, H. P. Krehbiel 1926-35, Menno Schrag 1935- . Assistant editors have been Abe Epp 1925-26, Menno Schrag 1927-28 and 1931-35, Ferdinand Wiens 1928-30, J. Richard Blosser, associate editor, 1946- . M.S.

Mennonite Welfare Board (MC) of Ontario was organized in 1939 by the Ontario Conference as a board under which the Poor and Charity Funds administered by various committees were brought under the administration of the deacon body of the conference. Its purpose is to see that the welfare needs are met equally among the churches. Each deacon presents the needs of both laymen and ministers for his congregation. A levy of 15-30 cents has been sufficient as dues per member. The Board meets in September and in March. Special needs may be cared for by the Executive Committee between regular meetings. The Board contributes funds for needy Mennonites in the Braeside Home for the Aged in Preston. Considerable income is derived from endowment sources. Since 1948 the child welfare work in Ontario has been under this organization. The deacons are encouraged to co-operate in presenting the needs of all members with serious reverses caused by illness and other misfortune. In 1954, 18 cases were helped with a sum amounting nearly to $3,200. J.C.F.

Mennonite Women's Missionary Association (GCM): see Women's Missionary Association.

Mennonite Women's Missionary Society, the first women's organization in the Mennonite Church (MC), was organized in 1918 as the result of the initiative of Clara Eby Steiner of Columbus Grove, Ohio, the widow of M. S. Steiner, an early General Mission Board president. She served as the general secretary from the beginning until her retirement because of ill health in 1926. Because of misunderstandings between the organization and the officers of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, the organization was in effect forced to dissolve in 1927, when the Board appointed a General Sewing Circle Committee to co-ordinate the work of the local sewing circles in their sewing for missions and relief. The MWMS did a good work in co-ordinating the work of the local sewing circles and stimulating missionary interest and giving on the part of the local sewing circles of the Mennonite Church. It operated through local and state branches, of which there were 20 in 1920. Since in certain sections the sewing circles worked under conference or district mission board organizations, and since there was little co-ordination across state and conference lines the pioneer work of the MWMS was not easy. The treasurer throughout its history was Ruth A. Yoder of Bellefontaine, Ohio. Presidents changed a number of times, the first being Mary Burkhard of Goshen, Ind. The organ of the Society was the Monthly Letter. H.S.B.

Mennonite World Conference has held the following sessions: (1) Basel, Switzerland, June 13-16, 1925; (2) Danzig, Free City of Danzig, Aug. 31-Sept. 3, 1930; (3) Amsterdam, Elspeet, and Witmarsum, Netherlands, June 29-July 3, 1936; (4) Goshen, Ind., and North Newton, Kan., Aug. 3-10, 1948; (5) Basel and Zürich, Switzerland, Aug. 10-15, 1952; (6) Karlsruhe, Germany, Aug. 10-16, 1957. The proceedings of the first five conferences have been published as follows: (1) Bericht über die 400jährige Jubiläumsfeier der Mennoniten oder Taufgesinnten (Karlsruhe, n.d.-1925?) pp. 183; (2) Mennonitische Welt-Hilfs-Konferenz (Karlsruhe, n.d.-1930?) pp. 192; (3) Der Allgemeine Kongress der Mennoniten (Karlsruhe, n.d.-1936?) pp. 183; (4) Proceedings of the Fourth Mennonite World Conference (Akron, 1950) pp. 341; (5) Die Gemeinde Christi und Ihr Auftrag. Vorträge und Verhandlungen der Fünften Mennonitischen Weltkonferenz (Karlsruhe, 1953) pp. 410. Editor of the first three was Christian Neff (q.v.), of the fourth H. S. Bender and P. C. Hiebert, of the fifth Paul Schowalter and H. S. Bender.

The father of the Mennonite World Conference, and its recognized leader for the first three sessions, though he was never officially elected its chairman, was Christian Neff, pastor of the Weierhof, Germany, Mennonite congregation and president of the Conference of South German Mennonites. The South German Conference issued the call for the first session at his proposal. He issued the call personally for the two following conferences. The first conference was based upon the idea of the 400th anniversary of the founding of Anabaptism in Switzerland in 1525, the second upon the need for co-operative effort to meet the urgent need for aid to Mennonite refugees from Russia then being settled in Paraguay, Brazil, and Canada, the third upon the 400th anniversary of Menno Simons' conversion from Roman Catholicism in 1536. The several relief agencies (MCC, Dutch, German) joined in sponsoring the Danzig meeting. The Dutch A.D.S. was the chief sponsor of the third conference. The programs of these three sessions were naturally oriented around the three distinct occasions listed above, and the promotion of the idea of a world conference was made easier (some Mennonites were hesitant and many rather indifferent) by the nature of the three occasions.

Attendance at the first conference was small, with only one delegate from North America, H. J. Krehbiel, the president of the General Conference Mennonite Church, and only a few from Holland, France, and Germany. In spite of the historical setting the first conference devoted a major session to the question, "How can we improve the spiritual life of our congregations?" The chief speakers were W. J. Kühler and T. O. Hylkema from Holland, Jacob Kroeker, Michael Horsch, and Christian Schnebele from Germany, and David Geiser from Switzerland. The moderators were Samuel Nussbaumer and Fritz Goldschmidt from Basel.

The program of the second or Danzig conference was devoted exclusively to the history of past Mennonite relief efforts (addresses by Christian Neff and W. J. Kühler), current relief operations (H. S. Bender from the United States, S. H. N. Gorter from Holland, Christian Neff and Michael Horsch from Germany). C. F. Klassen, David Toews, B. H. Unruh, H. S. Bender, and S. H. N. Gorter spoke on the conditions of the Mennonites in Russia since 1917, the flight from Russia, and the emigration to South America and Canada. Two moderators were elected, P. B. Westerdijk of the Netherlands, and David Toews of Canada. The attendance from beyond the local area was small, with only three from Canada, and three from the United States. A general resolution was adopted by the conference summarizing the work of the sessions, accompanied by an appeal to the Mennonite brotherhood everywhere to support the relief work being carried on in behalf of the Russian Mennonite refugees and emigrants.

The program of the third conference at Amsterdam in 1936 was strongly historical and descriptive. N. van der Zijpp gave the major commemorative address, "Menno Simons' Significance for the Mennonite Brotherhood." Historical-descriptive addresses were given on Holland (J. Yntema), Germany (Christian Neff), Switzerland (Samuel Geiser), Russia (B. H. Unruh), United States (H. S. Bender), Canada (David Toews), Mennonite settlements in South America (B. H. Unruh) and in Paraguay (Fritz Kliewer), on missions (C. Nijdam and O. O. Miller), on relief work and colonization (S. H. N. Gorter, P. C. Hiebert, and David Toews), on Mennonites and Culture (C. Henry Smith and Frits Kuiper), on Mennonites and Youth (P. R. Schroeder and Erich Göttner). The conference closed with a commemorative ceremony at Witmarsum, having spent the first two days in Amsterdam with services in the Singel Church, and the last two days in Elspeet at the Brotherhood House grounds. An appeal was made by the conference for a world-wide collection on behalf of the debts of the Russian Mennonite immigrants in Canada, and an international Mennonite relief office was created at Karlsruhe, Germany (by the several Mennonite relief agencies, not by the world conference), with B. H. Unruh as director, to be supported by the relief agencies in Europe and North America. The latter attempt failed after a year or so, and the response to the collection appeal was not as large as hoped for. The chairman of the A.D.S. was chosen as moderator of the conference, with Christian Neff as honorary moderator; assistant moderators were Emil Händiges (Germany), C. F. Klassen (Canada), and P. R. Schroeder (United States). The attendance was much larger than in the previous conferences, with a large number from Germany, a few from France and Switzerland, and about fifteen from North America (six from Canada). An important side meeting on nonresistance was held at Fredeshiem near Steenwijk, Netherlands, immediately following the conference close, attended by some twenty persons, mostly from Holland and North America, at which an International Mennonite Peace Committee was created and a message sent to all Mennonites on behalf of the peace position.

The coming of World War II made the calling of the fourth world conference in 1940 in the United States, as planned, impossible; and the traditional world conference leader, Christian Neff, died in 1946. The MCC then assumed the leadership and called the conference to meet in the United States in August 1948, serving the large attendance by holding sessions at two centers, Goshen, Ind., and North Newton, Kan., with similar two-and-a-half-day programs at each place. The program was planned by the Committee of Guidance and Counsel representing the leading North American conferences, together with the chairman and vice-chairman of the MCC, the latter two men also being designated as moderator (P. C. Hiebert) and assistant moderator (H. A. Fast) of the conference sessions. The very full program was devoted to the following major topics, each being given a session with an average of three speakers: Relief, Nonconformity to the World, Faith and Life, Missions, Young People's Work, A Young People's Program, the Peace Testimony, Colonization, Institutions and Mennonite Life, and Christian Education. The conference sermon was by P. C. Hiebert. The developments among Mennonites during World War II and after (1936-48) were thoroughly reported by Emil Händiges (West Prussia), Dirk Cattepoel (Germany), H. W. Meihuizen (Holland), and Samuel Geiser (Switzerland and France), and similar reports were given on the new refugee settlements in Paraguay and Brazil. Some 45 major addresses were delivered in addition to shorter testimonies. The attendance was very large, although only a few came from overseas: Netherlands 8, Germany 6, France 3, Switzerland 2, Paraguay 2, Brazil 2, India 3, China 1, a total from overseas of 27. The MCC aided in the travel expenses of most of the official delegates from Europe. No official resolutions or appeals were issued by the conference, except one making provision for a fifth conference through authorization of a Preparatory Commission to be constituted by representatives from Mennonite conferences throughout the world who might choose to participate.

In the 1952 conference held on the grounds of the St. Chrischona Seminary near Basel, Switzerland, the program development and attendance reached a new level. The general theme of the program, "The Church of Christ and Her Commission," was developed largely around several sub-themes such as (1) the nature of the church; (2) the concept of the church held by the Anabaptist forefathers and its realization in history and the present in Holland, Central Europe, and America; (3) the work of the church and its expression in missions and evangelization; (4) the church and the world; (5) the Mennonite Church and the rest of Christendom; (6) the church and her youth. There was a review of current world Mennonitism in six descriptive addresses, with a summary address on the total situation of world Mennonitism. Samuel Gerber of Les Reussilles, Switzerland, preached the conference sermon. Two new features marked this conference, the use of discussion groups following the major addresses, and the setting up of side meetings for women, youth, missions, scholars, publishers, and editors, peace testimony, nurses, and voluntary service. One day was spent in an historical celebration in Zürich, at which addresses were given by the president of the Zürich Cantonal Reformed Church, Oskar Farner, and Fritz Blanke of the Zürich theological faculty, in the Grossmünster Church, and a memorial tablet was dedicated to Conrad Grebel and Felix Manz. The officers of the Preparatory Commission were elected as officers of the conference (H. S. Bender, chairman, Hans Nussbaumer, vice-chairman, Ulrich Hege, C. F. Klassen, H. W. Meihuizen, the five constituting the executive committee). A noteworthy feature of this conference also was the adoption of a conference message to the world Mennonite brotherhood. The attendance was very large, averaging 600 in the day sessions. The 218 delegates were distributed as follows: Europe 104, North America 111, Indonesia two, Paraguay one.

The sixth world conference, by action of the Basel conference, is to be held at Karlsruhe, Germany, Aug. 10-16, 1957. The conference theme will be "The Gospel of Jesus Christ in the World." The Preparatory Commission is in full charge of the program, and works through a local committee on arrangements. For the Basel and Karlsruhe conferences simultaneous translation equipment (IBM) has made possible translation of all addresses and business in three languages (English, German, French), but the official language has been German. A trilingual conference hymnal has been published.

From a meeting oriented primarily to historical occasions, with a limited attendance and certain uncertainties and hesitancies, the world conference has developed into a large-scale session with significant addresses and discussions on major doctrinal and practical themes of current interest and concern to Mennonites as a whole, and with an increasing warmth of fellowship and practical value. The conference is basically an inspirational and discussion conference, with no jurisdiction whatsoever over its constituent groups, but responsive to their wishes. It has demonstrated a growing value and won increasing acceptance, and its regular five-year sessions can contribute much to the strengthening of worldwide Mennonitism and the effective discharge of its spiritual tasks. H.S.B.

Mennonite Writers Fellowship, established in 1951 by the editorial staff of the Mennonite Publishing House to promote better religious writing, holds annual meetings and writers' workshop at Laurelville Mennonite Camp near Scottdale, Pa., and issues a quarterly multilithed release, the Christian Writer. In 1956 it had 227 members, with officers as follows: John A. Hostetler chairman, Helen Trumbo vice-chairman, Elizabeth Showalter secretary-treasurer. H.S.B.

Mennonite Yearbook and Directory (MC) was first published in 1905 by the Mennonite Board of Charitable Homes and Missions, at Scottdale, Pa. Issued as an annual publication, it contained articles, ministerial directories, statistical data, and names of institutional personnel. In 1905-13 it also contained the Almanac. The 1906 issue was published by its founder, and the 1907-8 issues were published by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. The publication was not issued in 1909-12, but appeared again in 1913 with the Mennonite Publishing House, Scottdale, as its publisher. During these four years (1909-12) some information and statistical data appeared in the Family Almanac (q.v.). Except for one issue dated 1914-15, the Mennonite Yearbook and Directory has been published annually by the Mennonite Publishing House. It contains articles and biographical sketches of general church interest, church organizations and institutions including domestic and foreign missions, with names of their personnel. The Conference Directory for the Mennonite Church (MC) gives names and addresses of congregations by conference districts with the membership and ministry for each congregation. Conference directories are also given for the Conservative Mennonites, Old Order Amish Mennonites, Old Order (Wisler) Mennonites, and affiliated congregations. The Ministerial Directory includes lists of names and addresses of ordained men for Mennonite bodies throughout the world. The issues of 1905-7 inclusive were edited by a compiling committee of three. Those who served on this committee were Aaron Loucks 1905-7, M. S. Steiner 1905-7, J. S. Shoemaker 1905-6, D. H. Bender 1907. No names appear in the 1908 issue. The 1913 issue was edited by J. A. Ressler, Daniel Kauffman, and H. F. Reist. Beginning with the 1914 issue the editors were J. A. Ressler 1914-24, John L. Horst 1925-42, Ellrose D. Zook 1943- . The 1956 issue contained 136 pages and had a circulation of 8,600. The size has remained at 6 x 9 in., and except for typographical changes in format it is similar to the first issue. It has become in a sense a world Mennonite directory, with lists of Mennonite ministers and total church membership for all Mennonite groups. E.D.Z.

Mennonite (MC) Youth Fellowship (generally called "MYF") is a general church-wide organization for the stimulation and guidance of young people in Christian life and service. MYF was organized at Eureka, Ill., in 1948, after extensive study by the Commission and approval by the General Conference. It serves the youth organizations in the Mennonite (MC) congregations. In January 1955 there were 121 member units. There is an annual meeting, usually held in connection with other church-wide meetings. The general organization promotes youth work concepts, participates in the production of program materials, and prepares promotional literature. There is a general council, consisting of the president, vice-president, secretary, treasurer, secretaries in the areas of faith, fellowship, and service, representatives of the Youth's Christian Companion staff and the Mission Board, and the sponsor. The sponsor is the Secretary of Young People's Activities of the Commission for Christian Education, to which MYF is generally responsible. Officers are elected by the delegates at the annual meeting. Area secretaries are appointed by these officers and the sponsor. An executive office is maintained at Scottdale, Pa.

The local units of MYF are not uniform in organization of functioning, nor do all carry the MYF name, but they are expected to function in supplying young people's needs in accordance with local conditions and standards. The general organization furnishes to the local units only such guidance as they wish or can use. In some districts, particularly in the Middle West, there are also district MYF organizations, conference-wide or state-wide. P.E.

Mennonite (GCM) Youth Organization of Saskatchewan was initiated with the help of Olin Krehbiel of Berne, Ind., largely as the result of the influence of the General Conference sessions held at Saskatoon in 1938. In June 1941 the first youth retreat was held, and in the same year a youth conference at Laird. Here a constitution was adopted connecting the organization with the Young People's Union of the General Conference; but this was changed July 1949 to connect it with the Canadian Conference. In 1942 the daily vacation Bible schools were started and still enjoy a great popularity. The executive Committee of the Mennonite Youth Organization of Saskatchewan at first consisted of five members, but in 1946 it was enlarged to nine members.

Most of the interests of this organization have centered on the Rosthern Youth Farm, since the activities and projects are mostly on this farm. Here the first and largest projects were started. In 1941 and 1942 the first retreats were held at the Rosthern Dominion Experimental Farm. In the winter of 1943-44 the experimental farm was bought from the government for $20,000, consisting of 640 acres and buildings that the government built for about $60,000. In 1944 the Invalid Home was opened and now (1954) has about 80 patients in two houses. In 1945 the Elim Gospel Beach in South Saskatchewan was bought and in 1947 paid in full. In 1946 the first children's home was built and in 1953 the Crippled Children's Home was opened. Combined, these homes are able to take about 20 children. In 1951 the Invalid Home in Herbert was started, which now has about 20 patients. This farm also organizes workshops for youth, the first one in 1952. The farm supplies the town of Rosthern with pasteurized milk. Besides this the farm supports missionaries in foreign and domestic fields. The main endeavor comes from the Youth Organization, particularly H. W. Friesen and J. C. Schmidt. J.G.R.

Mennonite Youth Service (MC) is an 8-page quarterly published by the Lancaster Mennonite Conference. In order to increase Christian testimony and to provide suitable activities for Christian development, especially among the young people, the Lancaster Mennonite Conference encouraged the organizing and conducting of Christian worker groups in the local congregations. As early as 1939 groups were organizing for Christian service, such as distributing tracts and other Gospel literature, making scrapbooks, advertising the Gospel in trolley cars and buses, and visiting shut-ins. At the fall session of Conference in 1946 a resolution was passed to prepare a folder to give suggestions and guidance concerning objectives, opportunities, methods of organization, and safeguards in the organizing and conducting of the Christian worker groups. This folder was distributed among the congregations in the conference area. The years which followed saw a rapid increase in the organizing of these worker groups. At the spring session of Conference in 1950 a committee was selected to give guidance to the Christian worker groups within the conference. About a year later this committee, known as the Youth Christian Service Activities Committee, planned for the publication of a monthly paper for the promotion and guidance of Christian service activities by the worker groups.

The first issue of Mennonite Youth Service was published in July 1951, with a circulation of approximately 3,000 copies. It was printed monthly thereafter, with one exception, until October 1954, when it became an 8-page paper and was printed quarterly. It contained reports of the various activities of the worker groups, testimonies by young people of blessings received, also articles giving encouragement and helpful suggestions. News notes and poems also added interest to its pages. It is intended that this little paper shall aid in enlisting the interest and support of the several thousand young people of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference and surrounding areas to the great task of witnessing to the saving power of Christ through Christian service.

H.H.W.

Mennonitentag. In the constitution of the German Mennonite churches adopted on June 11, 1934, provision is made for an annual "Mennonite Day" "to reflect on the Gospel and the Mennonite confession of faith as the foundation of our church life in the past and present." The first Mennonite Day was held on Ascension Day, May 30, 1935, in Altona. Since then the plan has been to hold the meetings annually in rotation in various parts of Germany. Further Mennonitentags were held: Gronau and Emden 1936, Berlin 1937, Regensburg and Munich 1938, Crefeld 1939. Later attempts to revive these meetings have been fruitless. (ML III, 106.)

NEFF.

Mennonites of America, The, by C. Henry Smith, the first and thus far only comprehensive work on American Mennonite history, was published by the author at Goshen, Ind., in 1909, printed by the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottdale, Pa., 484 pp. illustrated. It was Smith's Ph.D. dissertation at the University of Chicago, and chapters I-IV were published in the same year as a booklet of 147 pages to fulfill the doctoral requirements. Its content was ultimately absorbed in revised form into the author's Story of the Mennonites (Berne, 1941). Smith also wrote a booklet of 71 pages, Mennonites in America (Akron, 1942), as one of the CPS Core Course booklets called Mennonites and Their Heritage, published by the MCC. H.S.B.

Mennonitische Auslese, a German-language periodical edited and published by Arnold Dyck, Steinbach, Man., of which only one issue appeared in 1951. It was intended to be a Mennonite "digest" and to appear biannually. On its 85 pages the editor presents articles from Mennonite papers, e.g., Der Bote and Mennonitische Rundschau. The 25 illustrated articles deal with the Mennonites the world over including numerous biographical sketches. Lack of subscriptions compelled the publisher to give up his plan. The Mennonitische Auslese may be considered a continuation of the Mennonitische Volkswarte (q.v.) and Warte-Jahrbuch (q.v.).

C.K.

Mennonitische Blätter, the oldest periodical of the German Mennonites (not published since 1941), was founded on Jan. 1, 1854, by Preacher Jakob Mannhardt (q.v.) of Danzig. Determinedly and faithfully following the motto of Menno Simons (I Cor. 3:11) he considered it "as the beautiful goal of our work to bring about a closer community among our congregations, to awaken or revive the consciousness that we belong together and of our brotherhood on a basis of faith and work and so to lead to deeper bonds of union, and help to cultivate and promote the kingdom of God and its concerns everywhere in our churches." In nine points he drew up the program of work for the paper. Above all else it was to present historical information, then articles on the faith and organization of the brotherhood, excerpts from the writings of our Reformers, contemporary events in the churches, articles of a devotional nature, on home and foreign missions, religious news, hymns (of the martyrs), and notices of various kinds. Assisted by a staff of co-workers, including B. C. Roosen of Hamburg-Altona, Heinrich Neufeldt, of Ibersheim, Johannes Risser of Sembach, and Johannes Molenaar of Monsheim, he successfully carried out his program. Under his leadership the Mennonitische Blätter became a mine of historical research and a reflection of the intellectual and spiritual life of the German Mennonites of the time. In 1874 old age compelled him to retire from its direction.

Mannhardt was followed by Hinrich van der Smissen (q.v.), who had been called as pastor of the Ibersheim congregation the year before. For fifty years (1874-1924) he conducted the paper with skill. During the first five years he was supported by his older cousin Johannes van der Smissen, pastor of the Sembach congregation. As the interest of the churches was stirred by the historical research of Ludwig Keller (q.v.), the periodical became the vehicle of publication of many articles in the field of Mennonite history.

In 1888 H. G. Mannhardt (q.v.) became an associate editor and the paper was published twice a month. After six months, when H. G. Mannhardt resigned, the paper ended its bimonthly appearance. The volumes 1887-89 printed sermons by preachers of various congregations; volumes 1890-91 offered interesting and entertaining supplements. Both of these innovations were experimental. During World War I the paper was able to continue its work. The postwar period was more difficult. The volume of 1924 appeared in double numbers. In September 1925 it ceased publication until 1927.

Then the Vereinigung (q.v., a German Mennonite conference) intervened. At its request Pastor Emil Händiges assumed the editorship of the revived paper on Jan. 1, 1927, with the voluntary assistance of H. G. Mannhardt and Christian Neff of Weierhof. When the former died (July 1927), Pastor Erich Göttner stepped into his place. Thus the paper was able to fulfill a great and important mission in reviving, strengthening, and uniting the German Mennonites (Menn. Bl., 1929, 1 ff.). In 1939 the issue numbered 1,450 copies. The last issue was dated March 1941, when it was forced to cease publication by order of the German government. (ML III, 107.) NEFF.

Mennonitische Druckverein, Der (Mennonite Printing Association), the first Mennonite publishing organization in America. Soon after the founding of the Eastern District Conference on Oct. 28, 1847, John H. Oberholtzer (q.v.), who had taken the leadership in the new conference, decided to publish a periodical which would promote and unify the church. It was also his hope that the old breach might be healed through such a paper. Accordingly with a certain heroism he purchased a hand printing press with his much-needed money and set it up in his locksmith shop near Milford Square, Bucks Co., Pa. His first publication was Verhandlungen des Hohen Rathes der Mennoniten Gemeinschaft (gedruckt bey Johann H. Oberholtzer, n.p., n.d.), a broadside, published in 1848. This would suggest that he set up his print shop at once after the division. He wrote, edited, set type, printed, and mailed out his first paper, Der religiöse Botschafter, a biweekly, on June 9, 1852, the first successful Mennonite periodical in America. It required tremendous efforts to continue this work together with his busy ministry. Sometimes he worked all night in the shop without sleep to get the copies out. Perhaps, more than will ever be known, this paper helped to form the bond of fellowship among scattered groups of Mennonites hungering for new life in the church, which led to the General Conference Mennonite Church in 1860.

Oberholtzer continued his printing until 1856, when, on account of financial difficulties, a group of local Mennonites formed a stock company under the name "Der Mennonitische Druckverein" and took over the press. The constitution of this organization was printed by Oberholtzer under the date of May 31, 1856. Oberholtzer continued to edit the paper until 1867, although the name was changed on July 30, 1856, to Das Christliche Volksblatt. A young man, John G. Stauffer, then established the press in the village of Milford Square. Stauffer entered the business in November 1856 and after six months' apprenticeship assumed the management and acted as compositor, printer, foreman, and in part as bookkeeper and assistant editor. The chief business of the Druckverein was the publication of the Volksblatt, but some book and job printing was also done.

For many years Stauffer and his younger brother, Daniel G. Stauffer, continued as printers in Milford Square, publishing a number of religious periodicals for Mennonites and other groups, The present Quakertown Free Press, in the near-by town of Quakertown, is an outgrowth of this printing venture.

The Druckverein erected a brick building in Milford Square as a printing house. The annual meeting of the stockholders on Dec. 1, 1866, decided to transfer its publication work to the newly established school (Mennonitische Bildungsanstalt) at Wadsworth, Ohio, provided that certain conditions could be met, giving as one of the chief reasons the expectation that the professors and students would participate in the publication. This plan failed to materialize, however, and the publication continued at Milford Square. The name of the paper was changed to Der Mennonitische Friedensbote beginning in January 1867, when it also became a monthly instead of semimonthly. The publication was placed under a Publication Committee, but the printing was henceforth taken over by J. G. Stauffer as a private venture, who apparently at this point purchased the printing establishment from the Druckverein. The Druckverein continued to be the publisher of the Friedensbote until the end of 1871. At that point the Eastern District Conference took over the publication with J. G. Stauffer continuing as printer. The conference, at its meeting in October 1871, accepted the proposal of the Druckverein to take over the Friedensbote and appointed a Publication Board of five members to handle the journal and any other publications desired by the conference.

Following is a list of the known imprints of Oberholtzer and the Druckverein: A. Oberholtzer imprints: (1) Verhandlungen des Hohen Rathes der Mennoniten Gemeinschaft (broadside in 1848, reprinted as broadside in 1849); (2) Religiöser Botschafter (1852-56, then Das Christliche Volksblatt 1856-66); (3) J. H. Oberholtzer, Aufschluss der Verfolgungen gegen Daniel Hoch (1853, pp. 168); Part II, Samuel B. Bauman, Eine Erleiterung an Benjamin Eby (1855, pp. 108); (4); idem, Lieder für die Tauf-Kinder (broadside, 1854?); (5) Gottfried Arnold, Geistliche Erfahrungs-Lehre (1854, pp. 504); (6) Constitution des Mennonitischen Druck-Vereins (1856). B. Druckverein imprints: (1) C. N. Hall, Komm zu Jesu (1857, pp. 96); (2) Das unparteiische biblische Fragenbuch (1859, pp. 121); (3) J. H. Oberholtzer, Der wahre Character von J. H. Oberholtzer (1860, pp. 115); (4) Gemeinde-Ordnung . . . Summerfield (1861, pp. 36); (5) A. Hunzinger, Das Religions-, Kirchen-, und Schulwesen der Mennoniten oder Taufgesinnten (1862, pp. 162); (6) Katechismus (1863, pp. 105).

H.S.B.

H. P. Krehbiel, History of the General Conference (n.p., 1898) 364 ff.; "Life of J. H. Oberholtzer," The Mennonite, March 1895, 44; A. J. Fretz, Stauffer-Stover Family History (1899) 264; J. B. Battle, History of Bucks County, Pennsylvania (Philadelphia, 1887) 1067 f.

Mennonitische Flüchtlingsfürsorge (Mennonite Refugee Care). The arrival of many Mennonite refugees to Germany from Russia after World War I, their number constantly increasing as revolutionary bands violated the villages of the Ukraine, called for organized assistance in alleviating their distress, in which all the Mennonite congregations in Germany were to take part. In South German circles it was discussed several times. In April 1920 a meeting was held at Heilbronn with representatives chosen by the Mennonites of Russia to explore possibilities for settlement (see Emergency Relief). The South German Conference then sent its traveling evangelist, Abram Warkentin, himself a former Russian Mennonite, to investigate conditions in the refugee camps in North Germany. He visited about 70 families in August and September 1920 and found them in a desperate situation, many of them in rags and undernourished (Menn. Bl., 1920, 77-78). A number of the refugees had already been taken in by Mennonite families.

Now an organized and centralized program of support was inaugurated on Nov. 22, 1920, when the Flüchtlingsfürsorge was organized in Ludwigshafen with its seat at Heilbronn. Its purpose is "to assist with pastoral and material aid the German refugees from Russia, especially the brethren in the faith, who have been sorely tried in soul, spirit, and body in consequence of war and anarchy." An attempt was made to find the Mennonite families and support them with money, clothing, and food. An effort was made to give permanent aid by finding employment for them in industry and on farms. A considerable number of families settled in Gronau in Westphalia and worked in the textile mills of the van Deldens. Others were settled on state lands east of Lübeck in Lockwisch and Westerbeck near Schönberg in Mecklenburg-Strelitz in the winter of 1920 and summer of 1921; this was made possible by loans from the German Mennonite congregations. But the settlers soon emigrated to America with the exception of one family. The loans were fully paid back; some of the funds were donated to the conference of the South German Mennonites for benevolent purposes.

Other refugees were given work and lodging for their families in the Lechfeld (q.v.) camp, a former army drill ground which was given for agricultural purposes to the Mennonite Fürsorgekomitee, the Mennonite relief organization called "Christenpflicht" (q.v.), and the union of German Baptists. This farm yielded about 50,000 marks in 1923 for charitable purposes. The refugees who could not be used in farming were given other work such as basket making or the manufacture of work clothing. At the same time a camp was kept in Lechfeld for Mennonite refugees whose admission to Canada was postponed for reasons of health. The German government consented to this arrangement after the Heilbronn committee had given a guarantee that it would take care of all expenses and assume political responsibility for the inmates.

To meet the increasing scope of its work the committee changed its name on May 9, 1922, to "Deutsche Mennonitenhilfe" (German Mennonite Aid) and transferred its seat to Oberursel near Frankfurt. Most of the refugees were able to emigrate to Canada with the support of the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization.

At this time calls were coming from Russia for German literature, especially for Bible and school books. The German Mennonite Aid was able to send the Mennonites in the Ukraine 12,000 textbooks and 4,000 Bibles. This committee also supported the publishers of the Mennonitisches Lexikon in ordering for Russia one hundred copies of the first volume, which offer was gratefully accepted by the Russian Mennonite churches. Before World War I, however, only the first two installments could be sent to the 900 subscribers in Russia; after that no further shipments to Russia were possible.

The committee was dissolved on Dec. 16, 1926. The work of the Mennonitische Flüchtlingsfürsorge and the Deutsche Mennonitenhilfe was done during the period of inflation of German currency, enormously increasing the difficulty of the task. But thanks to the co-operation of the Mennonites in countries with stable currency, it was possible to render the Mennonite refugees from Russia genuine assistance throughout the period to relieve their great need. HEGE.

Deutsche Mennonitenhilfe, ihre Entstehung und Arbeitsgebiete (Oberursel, 1924); Chr. Neff, Bericht über die Mennonitische Welthilfskonferenz vom 31. August bis 3. September 1930 in Danzig, 67-68; ML III, 107 f.

Mennonitische Friedensbote, Der, a continuation of Das Christliche Volksblatt (q.v.) under a new name from 1867 to 1881, when it was merged with Zur Heimath to form Der Bundesbote (first issue January 1882). It was an eight-page semimonthly, 10 x 12 in., published by the Eastern District Conference (GCM) at Milford Square, Pa. The editor was A. B. Shelly. H.S.B.

Mennonitische Geschichtsblätter, published by the Mennonite Historical Society (Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein, q.v.) of Germany, is an annual publication in the field of Mennonite history. It was edited in 1936-40 by Christian Hege and appeared annually, each issue consisting of 64-100 pages. It suspended publication 1941-48, but was revived in 1949, with Horst Quiring as the editor, assisted by Ernst Crous and Paul Schowalter. The issues of 1949-55 consisted of 48-80 pages each. The content of the magazine has remained the same throughout the years of its publication. Questions pertaining to the Mennonites and Anabaptists, particularly in Germany, are discussed. Numerous historical articles, short biographies, bibliographies, and book reviews have appeared. The magazine is the only European publication completely devoted to Mennonite history. (ML III, 110.) C.K.

Mennonitische Heime, e.V. (Mennonite Homes, Inc.) was organized on June 17, 1949, at the Thomashof, Germany, and registered Oct. 12, 1949, at Neustadt a.d.W., Palatinate, under the name Mennonitisches Altersheim e.V., to operate homes for the aged on the basis of the Mennonite faith. Seven years later, on June 24, 1956, its purpose was changed to a general charitable service to old people, youth, and children, and its name changed to the present form. Its field of service is West Germany, where it now (1957) operates three homes for the aged with 215 guests, practically all Mennonite refugees from West Prussia, Poland, and Russia. The homes are "Marienburg" at Leutesdorf on the Rhine, near Neuwied; "Friedenshort" at Enkenbach, Palatinate, near Kaiserslautern; and "Abendfrieden" at Pinneberg, near Hamburg in the North. All three homes are in rented buildings. The inmates receive a daily support from the state, mostly based on their claims to reparations as refugees. In addition the MCC contributes relief food, and many inmates work in the homes and in attached acreage in food production. The homes are thus self-supporting.

The organization operates through an executive committee, a council, and a members' annual meeting. In 1957 the association had some 1,000 members, who were expected to contribute a remuneration of one-half Mark monthly toward overhead expense. The Executive Committee in 1957 was composed of Fritz Hege president, Richard Hertzler executive secretary, Otto Regier, Gertrud Schowalter, and Gottfried Horsch. The homes have achieved great significance in German Mennonite life. In addition to the spiritual work in the homes through visiting ministers from all Germany, other indirect and unplanned benefits include stimulation to greater giving by the members, larger inter-area Mennonite contact, and to scattered needy individuals, capital loans from the association's surplus, for building of homes for refugees, etc. R.HE.

Mennonitische Hilfskasse (Mennonite Aid Fund), a fund of the Mennonites of the Palatinate and Hesse, Germany, with its seat in Monsheim, which was incorporated on June 30, 1905. According to its constitution it has the following aims: (1) support of the needy in the Mennonite congregations of the Conference in special cases; (2) care of the widows and children of its preachers, as well as of preachers no longer able to serve; (3) support of individual congregations under special conditions, such as the building or major repairs of church buildings. On Dec. 6, 1912, four paragraphs were added to the constitution to provide a pension fund for ministers.

The new tax laws necessitated some changes in the constitution. In 1933-34, when the organization was put on a purely church basis, aim (1) was dropped. In 1947 another change was made in order to insure the character of an "organization for the public welfare." On the basis of a decision of Jan. 30, 1951, the executive expenses of the Palatine-Hessian Conference are borne by the Aid Fund.

On June 13, 1882, the Fund was originally organized as the "Mennonitische Central-Hilfskasse" at the instigation of Hinrich van der Smissen, pastor of the Ibersheim Mennonite Church. Several congregations of North Germany—Emden, Hamburg-Altona, and Leer—participated in the project.

When the Vereinigung (Conference of Mennonite Churches in Germany) organized in 1886, the North German churches withdrew from the Fund. The funds in the treasury, 2,677 Marks, were given to the Palatine-Hessian Conference, and the name of the Fund shortened to "Mennonitische Hilfskasse" on Dec. 13, 1886. Participation by all the congregations of the conference was attained in 1891, when a resolution was passed at the conference meeting in Sembach on May 21 to give more general and faithful support to the Fund. At this time the congregations at Ernstweiler, Kühbörncheshof, and Neudorferhof joined the project; Eppstein, Friesenheim, and Uffhofen continued their annual contributions. Ibersheim had joined in 1888. Hamburg-Altona contributed until 1915.

The development of the Fund was promoted by Jakob Ellenberger, pastor at Friedelsheim, who served as its chairman for many years. In 1900 Thomas Löwenberg, the minister of Ibersheim, succeeded him. In 1907 Löwenberg called for a contribution to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Fund; over 7,000 Marks were contributed. A far greater sum, over 32,000 Marks, was collected in 1916 to operate the provision for the pensioning of preachers. On Dec. 31, 1918, there were nearly 100,000 Marks in the treasury.

The Fund was wiped out by the inflation of German currency in 1922-23, which left less than 1,800 Marks at the end of 1924. It had to be built up anew; only by sacrificial giving could the work progress. By Dec. 12, 1939, the treasury had accumulated RM 49,099, and on July 20, 1948, the date of the second currency reform, RM 65,498.21. Since this second devaluation it has been impossible to raise any considerable sum. In 1926 the annual assessment was raised to 250 Marks; by 1933 it was reduced to 200, and by 1935 to 150 Marks. In 1937 both the chairman, Rudolf Stauffer of Ibersheim, and the treasurer, David Galle, Weierhof, resigned. Fritz Stauffer of Kaiserslautern was chosen chairman, and Heinrich Rink of Kaiserslautern treasurer. In 1957 Christian Galle of Weierhof was chairman, and Heinrich Rink was still treasurer.

Extraordinary services were rendered by the Fund during World War I and also in the very difficult postwar period, with the support of the American Mennonites. In 1957 the fund held 17,000 Marks and supported three retired ministers; since the income of the fund was not sufficient, the congregations added about 2,000 Marks by pro rata contributions. A substantial part of the capital is loaned to the Mennonitische Siedlungshilfe (q.v.; Mennonite Settlement Aid). ML III, 108 f.) C.G.

Mennonitische Jugendwarte, a periodical published 1920-39 by the Youth Commission of the Conference of the South German Mennonites (q.v.). The Youth Commission was created in 1919; at its first session, Feb. 27, 1920, at Weierhof, it considered its first obligation to be the publication of a quarterly, "whose contents consider the interests of youth and should therefore perform the function of advising, teaching, and stimulating young people."

Emil Händiges, minister of the Ibersheim Mennonite Church, was appointed editor. Since the duties of the editor as traveling evangelist had taken him into many homes, the periodical was gratefully received in all the homes of the conference. The subscription list, extending as far as West Prussia, numbered 1,000 in its early period. The great topics of faith and a Christian world view, questions of youth, suggestions on good literature, and also articles on Mennonite history were published by the paper. The youth movement, which was at that time developing spontaneously, was reflected in the reports: Youth Days were held now and again, youth groups were organized left of the Rhine, and leaders chosen. In March 1924 Händiges resigned. The editorship was temporarily assigned to a committee, which functioned until Feb. 28, 1927, when Walter Fellmann, pastor of the Monsheim Mennonite Church, became editor. After 1929 it appeared in six issues (later only four) annually with 750 subscribers. The last issue was August 1939, but it continued two years as a bimonthly supplement to the Gemeindeblatt. (ML III, 109.) W.F.

Mennonitische Lehranstalt, Gretna, Man.; see Mennonite Collegiate Institute.

Mennonitische Lehrerzeitung, a 16-page quarterly edited by Victor Peters, Horndean, Man., first issue July 1948. With the July 1950 number it changed its title to Mennonitische Welt (q.v.) and became a monthly. As the title indicated, its purpose was to serve Mennonite teachers in Canada, especially those still speaking German, with educational, literary, and cultural material, definitely oriented within Mennonitism, but also concerned to promote the maintenance of the German language among Canadian Mennonites beside the English. H.S.B.

Mennonitische Rundschau, Die, the oldest Mennonite periodical published continuously under one name, first issue June 5, 1880, the direct successor to the Nebraska Ansiedler (q.v., first issue June 1878), was established by the Mennonite Publishing Co. (John F. Funk) to serve the newly established

Russian Mennonite communities in the prairie states and Manitoba. It appeared as a 4-page semimonthly, 10 x 15½ in., until the end of 1882, and has continued as a weekly ever since. A semimonthly edition was published from 1883 on "for readers in Europe and Asia," apparently to keep the Mennonites in Russia in contact with American Mennonites. The edition was still being published in 1889, when the publisher described it as in "format somewhat smaller, but it contains all the Mennonite news which appears in the weekly edition in addition to other reading matter out of the latter." The subscription price was given as 50 cents, 3 marks, or 1 ruble. Since January 1899 was the first time that the subscription price for the weekly edition was given in terms of German and Russian money, it is probable that the "European edition" continued until then.

